[2.] We may further infer, that they who attempt the conversion of sinners, should do it with a humble dependence on the cooperation of divine grace.

Otherwise they will probably find themselves fatally disappointed; and after their most skilful or most laborious attempts, they will complain that they have laboured in vain, and spent their strength for nought; and find reason to say, The bellows are burnt, and the lead is consumed of the fire, yet the dross is not taken away. A dependence upon God, in all the common affairs of life, becomes us, as we are creatures; and it is most necessary that we should, in all our ways, acknowledge him, as we expect or desire that he should direct or prosper our paths: but the greater the undertaking is, the more solemn should the acknowledgment of God be.

Let me therefore especially recommend this to those who are coming forth as young officers in the army of Christ. See to it, my brethren, that in the name of your God you set up your banners; that you apply from time to time to your public work with a deep conviction upon your minds, that no strength of reason will effectually convince, that no eloquence will effectually persuade, unless he that made men's hearts will plead his own cause, and bow those hearts in humble subjection. With these views I have often known the feeblest attempts successful, and the meek and lowly have out of weakness been made strong: while the want of this, all the charms of composition and delivery have been, at best, but like the lovely song of one that has a pleasant voice, or the art of one that can play well on an instrument. It is those that honour God by the most cordial dependence upon him that he delights to honour; and I will presume to say, that it is the inward conviction of this important truth, which I feel upon my soul while I am confirming it in you, that encourages me to hope, that this labour shall not be in vain in the Lord, but that a divine blessing shall evidently attend what has already been delivered and what shall further be spoke. Only let me conclude my present discourse with this one necessary caution,

[3.] That you do not abuse this doctrine of the necessity of divine influences, which, from the word of God, has been so abundantly confirmed.

God does indeed act upon us, in order to produce this happy change; but he acts upon us in a manner suitable to our rational nature, and not as if we were mere machines. He saves us, as the Scripture expresses it, by awaking us to save ourselves: a new heart does he give us, and a new spirit does he put within us, to stir us up to be solicitous to make ourselves a new heart and a new spirit: he circumcises our heart to love him, by engaging us to take away the fore-skin of our hearts. You see the correspondency of the phrases, and it is of great importance that you attend to it.—If any therefore say, "I will sit still, and attempt nothing for my own recovery, till God irresistibly compels me to it;" he seems as like to perish, as that man would be, who, seeing the house in flames about him, should not attempt to make his escape, till he felt himself moved by a miracle. Sirs, the dependence of the creature on God, though it be especially, yet it is not only, in spiritual affairs: it runs through all our interests and concerns. We as really depend upon his influence to stretch out our hands, as we do to raise our hearts towards him in prayer. Your fields could no more produce their fruit without his agency, than his word could without it become fruitful in your hearts: yet you plough and sow, and would look upon him as a madman, that upon this principle should decline it, urging that no crop could be expected if God did not produce it; and that if he pleased to produce it, it would come up without any human labour. The argument is just the same in that case, as when men plead for the neglect of means or endeavours, from the futility and necessity of a divine concurrence. And if they apply this argument to the concerns of their souls, when they do not apply it to those of their bodies, it plainly shows, that they regard their bodies more than their souls, and that, in pretending to make these excuses, they belie their conscience, and act against the secret conviction of their own heart. Such persons do not deserve to be disputed with, but rather should be solemnly admonished of the danger of such egregious trifling, where eternity is at stake. And sure I am, that it is offering a great affront to the memory of the blessed Paul, when men pretend to encourage themselves in this perverse temper from any thing he has said. For when he gives us, as it were, the substance of all I have been saying in those comprehensive words, "It is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do, of his good pleasure;" he is so far from mentioning it as any excuse for remissness and sloth, that he introduces it professedly in the very contrary view, as engaging us to exert ourselves with the utmost vigour in a dependence upon that divine operation. And therefore, as he there expresses it, I say with him, Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; and if you will not do it, you have reason to tremble in the prospect of a final condemnation from God, aggravated by your having thus irrationally and ungratefully abused the revelation of his grace.

SERMON XXIX.

OF THE VARIOUS METHODS OF THE DIVINE OPERATION IN THE PRODUCTION OF THIS SAVING CHANGE.

1 Cor. xii. 6.

There are diversities of operations; but it is the same God which worketh all in all.

Whatever the original sense of these words was, and how peculiarly soever they may relate to the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, the whole tenor of the discourse now intended will show, with how much propriety they may, at least, be accommodated to the operations of his grace. I have proved to you in the last of these Lectures, that wherever regeneration is produced, it is ultimately to be ascribed to a divine agency; and though I cannot say it is equally important, yet I apprehend it may be both agreeable and useful, to proceed,

Fifthly, To survey the variety of those methods, which God is pleased to take in producing this happy change; or, to borrow the language of the text, to consider the diversity of operations, by which the same God, who worketh all in all, (i. e. who produces all the virtues and graces of the Christian character, in some degree, in all his people,) is pleased, according to his own wise and gracious purposes, to proceed in his agency on those whom he regenerates and saves.

And this survey will not be matter of mere curiosity, but may probably revive the hearts of some amongst you by the recollection of your own experience: and it may be a caution to others, who, for want of due compass and extent of thought and knowledge, are ready to argue, as if God had but one way to work on the human heart, and that one the particular manner by which he recovered them. Of this I shall speak more largely hereafter. In the mean time, I judged it necessary to premise this hint, to direct us as to the temper with which this discourse should be heard, as well as to the purpose to which it is to be improved.

Now what I have to offer on this subject will be ranged under these three heads. There is a diversity and variety observable—in the time,—the occasion,—and the manner, of the divine operations on the soul.

I. There is an observable variety, "as to the time of God's gracious operations on different persons."

Some are called in their infancy;—others, and these perhaps the greatest part, are wrought upon in youth;—and some very few in the advance, and even in the decline, of life.

1. Some are wrought upon by divine grace "in their infancy."

This is often the case; and I doubt not, but if parents were to do their duty, it would much more frequently be so. And it is an honour which God is pleased, in some instances, remarkably to confer on a good education; which is indeed so important a duty on one side, and so great a privilege on the other, that it is the less to be wondered at, that he so mercifully encourages Christian parents in the discharge of it; thus granting, as it were, an immediate reward for this labour of love. And I must here take the freedom, on my own observation, to say, that God seems especially to own the faithful endeavours of pious mothers in this respect. He has wisely and graciously given that sex a peculiar tenderness of address, and an easy and insinuating manner, which is admirably adapted to this great end, for which, no doubt, he especially intended it, that of conveying knowledge to children, and making tender impressions on their minds: and there is hardly any view in which the importance of the sex more evidently appears.

We have encouragement to believe, there are a considerable number who are, as it were, sanctified from the womb, and in whom the seeds of divine grace are sown, before they grow up to a capacity of understanding the public preaching of the word: a remark, which Mr. Baxter carries so far as to say, "that he believes, if the duties of religious education were conscientiously discharged, preaching would not be God's ordinary method of converting souls; but the greater part would be wrought upon before they were capable of entering into the design of a sermon." And indeed it seems to me, that children may early come to have some apprehensions of what is most important in religion. They may have a reverence for God, and a love for him, as that great Father who made them, and that kind Friend who gives them every thing that they have; they may have a fear of doing any thing that would displease him: and though it is not so easy for them to understand the doctrines peculiar to a Redeemer, yet when they hear of Christ, as the Son of God, who came down from heaven to teach men and children the way thither; who loved them, and did them good every day, and at last died to deliver them from death and hell; their little hearts may well be impressed with such thoughts as these, and they may find a growing desire to be instructed in what Christ is, and what he taught and did, and to do what shall appear to be his will. And wherever this is the prevailing disposition, it seems to me that the seeds of holiness are sown in that soul, though but small proficiency may be made in knowledge, and though the capacities for service may be very low.

I will add, that some remarkably pertinent and solid things, which little children have said concerning religion, seem to me plainly to evidence, that they have been, in many instances, under some uncommon teachings of the divine Spirit: and it seems perfectly suitable to the genius of Christianity, that in this sense God should ordain strength out of the mouths of babes and sucklings, and should reveal to them what he has suffered to be hidden from the wise and prudent. Nor can I suppose it hard for any, who have been for a considerable time acquainted with the state of religion in Christian societies, to recollect various instances, in which persons thus early taught of God, who have heard, and known, and loved the Scriptures, and delighted in ordinances and serious discourse from their childhood, have been, in some measure, like Samuel, Obadiah, Jeremiah, Josiah, and Timothy, honoured with eminent usefulness in the church, and have happily filled some of its most important stations of service. Almost every age has afforded instances of this; and I am persuaded, many are now growing up amongst us, who will be instances of it in ages yet to come.

2. Others, and these perhaps the greatest part of real Christians, are wrought upon "in their youthful days."

Many parents are very deficient in a due care to cultivate the infant minds of their little ones; or the feeble and general impressions then made, are, perhaps, worn out and lost, in the growing vanities of childhood and youth. They begin to be drawn away by evil inclinations and examples, and by the delusions of a flattering world, which then puts on its most attractive charms, to gain upon their unexperienced minds: and hereupon they follow after vanity, and become vain: of the Rock which begat them they grow unmindful, and forget the God that formed them. But by one method or another, God often stops them in this dangerous career; and awakening ordinances, or more awakening providences, bring them to a stand, and turn them the contrary way. The terrors of the Lord set themselves in array against them; or his mercy melts their souls, and they yield themselves its willing captives. They consecrate their hearts, warm as they are with youthful vigour, to be the sacrifices of divine love, and enter, it may be, very early into the bonds of God's covenant; and so prove such a seed to serve him, as is accounted to the Lord for a most honourable and useful generation. Blessed be God, I speak to many who know this by experience! By far the greater part of those who have been admitted to your communion, since I settled among you, have been, as I apprehend, under the age of twenty-four years: and several of those, who were further advanced in life when they first approached the table of the Lord, had been brought to real religion in their much earlier years; though particular circumstances, or some mistaken apprehensions, might prevent their giving up their names publicly to the Lord, so soon as they might, and as they ought to have done it.

3. Some few are wrought upon by divine grace "in the advance, and even in the decline, of life."

I confess that the number of these is comparatively small: and it is not to be wondered at, that it is so. There are not many who arrive to what can properly be called old age; and of them but a very inconsiderable part are then brought to any thing which looks like a saving change. Nor shall we be much surprised at this, if we consider the inveterate nature of bad habits, which renders it almost as hard for them that are accustomed to do evil, to learn to do good, as it is for the Ethiopian to change his skin, or the leopard his spots. To such a degree are prejudices rivetted in the mind, so insensible is it rendered of tender and generous impressions, so cold are the affections, and the memory (if the phrase may be allowed) so rigid, that, humanly speaking, there is much less probability of their being impressed with religion, than there was when they were in the bloom of life; notwithstanding all the seeming advantages which might arise from riper reason, deeper experience, and a nearer prospect of eternity. In all these things, it is in vain to reason against observation of fact, since we evidently see how uncommon a thing it is, for persons to be awakened and reformed in old age, especially if they have been educated in the principles of religion, and have made a florid profession of it in their youth, from which they have afterwards apostatized, out of a love to the wealth or honours of the world, or a relish for sensual delights. Such persons generally live and die monuments of divine wrath, bearing, as it were, in characters dreadfully legible, the sad inscription of those, "who, having forsaken God, are finally forsaken of him." They appear as dry trees, twice dead, and fit for nothing but to be plucked up by the roots, and cast into the fire.

Nevertheless, to prove the infinite energy and sovereignty of divine grace, God is sometimes pleased to work even on such. He touches the rock which has stood for ages unmoved, and the waters flow forth: he says to the dry bones, Live, and they obey; they are clothed with beauty, they are animated with life, and stand up as with the vigour of a renewed youth, to pursue the labours of religion, and to fight the battles of the Lord. Such instances, in which aged sinners have been thus wrought upon, I have read and heard; though (I grieve to say it) I can recollect very few, if any, that have occurred to me within the sphere of my own personal observation and acquaintance.

But besides this variety in the time, there is also,

II. An observable diversity "in the occasion which divine grace takes to operate upon different persons."

The occasions are indeed so various, that it would be impossible to enumerate them: I shall, however, just touch on some of the chief.

And here I might particularly consider a religious education in this view, and that daily converse with pious friends, which is of course connected with it. But though, perhaps, there may be no occasion more considerable in itself, and none that has been more eminently honoured of God; yet it is proper to wave it here, as having been mentioned under the former head, as well as much more largely illustrated in my sermons on that subject, which are in most of your houses, and which, I hope, you will often review.

I proceed, therefore, further to observe,—that some are wrought upon by the word of God;—others by some remarkable providence;—some by little incidents, which, inconsiderable as they seem in themselves, grow memorable by the noble effects they are made to produce;—and others by secret and immediate impressions of God upon their spirits, which cannot be resolved into any external cause, or any visible occasion at all.

1. "The administration of divine ordinances, and especially the word of God and prayer," is an occasion, which he most frequently takes to work upon men's hearts by his grace.

I do not mention the administration of the sacraments upon this occasion; because, though they have so noble and effectual a tendency to improve men's minds in piety, and to promote Christian edification; yet I do not remember to have heard of any instance, in which they have been the means of men's conversion; which is the less to be wondered at, as they are appointed for a very different end.

There are many, however, that have been wrought upon in prayer, as there are many things concur in this to awaken and impress the mind. The solemn acknowledgments then made of the divine perfections, the praises offered to his tremendous Majesty, the deep and humble confession of our various and aggravated guilt in his holy presence, the lamentations over it, the importunate pleadings for a variety of blessings, both for time and eternity; in a word, all the overflowings of pious affections in the breast of him that leads the devotion, and especially the earnest entreaties then offered for unconverted sinners, the genuine expressions of an undissembled apprehension of their danger, and the fervent breathings after divine grace, to be communicated to them for their spiritual life: all these things, I say, and many more, which occur in prayer, when it is managed aright, may, by the divine blessing, be singularly useful. And I am well assured, there have been happy instances, in which, while God's people have yet been speaking to him on this head, he has graciously heard and signally answered them.

But the reading, and especially the preaching, of the word, is the grand occasion and instrument in the conversion of souls. Of his own will he begets them with the word of truth: and it is admirably suited to those saving impressions which it is intended to make on the heart, being quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword. It was while Paul was preaching, that the Lord opened Lydia's heart, so that she attended to the things which were spoken by him: and it was while Peter was thus employed, that such vast multitudes were pricked in their hearts, and said to him, and to the rest of the apostles present, Men and brethren, what shall we do? And I am well persuaded, that, various and lamentable as the instances are, in which men stop their ears, and harden their hearts against it, God does not even to this day leave it without witness; but the terrors of the Lord, as displayed by his faithful ministers, have subdued their thousands, and the riches of his grace their ten thousands, when illustrated by those who have not only heard, but have themselves tasted, of their sweetness. The preaching of the cross may indeed to them that perish be foolishness; but blessed be his name that died upon it, there is still a happy remnant, to whom it appears to be the power of God, and the wisdom of God. Evangelical subjects, when opened with perspicuity, and enforced with vigour and tenderness, by those that have experienced the transforming energy of them on their own hearts, and desire, above all things, to be wise to win the souls of others, are generally the occasion of producing the most immediate, and the most important, change: as I doubt not, but many now present have seen and felt. And the observation of every year of life convinces me more and more, that they who desire to be signally instrumental in this good work, this work, of all others, the most benevolent and important, must, in the account of a vain world, become fools, that they may be wise. How contemptuously soever it may be fashionable to treat such preaching, we must make these subjects familiar to our hearers, and must treat them with all plainness of speech, and all seriousness of address, or we shall generally labour in vain, and spend our strength for nought. Would to God, that the teachers of our Israel may consider the importance of it, and grow wise by such experiments as these! that they may act the part of prudent physicians, who prescribe the medicines they find in fact most useful, and not those concerning which the finest speculations may be framed. Till then, whatever their learning, politeness, and parade may be, it cannot be expected that our health should be generally recovered; but we are like to continue, what we have long been, a vicious people, amidst the finest encomiums of virtue, that are any where to be found: nor will there be much room to wonder, if some of its most eloquent advocates should appear, even in their own practice, insensible of those charms which they so gracefully recommend to others, and sink in their character below those heathen moralists, whom they may choose to imitate, rather than Christ and his apostles. Nevertheless I am persuaded, that if God intend mercy for us as a people, he will support among us a succession of those who shall dispense his ordinances in such a manner, as he has generally chosen to honour with success. But though the greater part of sincere converts are reduced by these, I am to add,

2. That "remarkable providences, whether merciful or afflictive," are occasions which God takes to work upon the hearts of many others.

When ordinances have long been attended in vain, God perhaps interposes, by other more peculiar and signal methods, to pluck the trifling and lethargic sinner as a firebrand out of the burning.

Sometimes remarkable mercies and deliverances accomplish the work. An appearance of God in their favour, when they are conscious to themselves that they are the unworthiest of all his creatures, shall shame and melt them, and powerfully prevail on their minds to turn unto the Lord, who daily loads them with his benefits, and thus seems, in more senses than one, to send from heaven to save them, and to draw them out of many waters, in which they had otherwise been lost.

But we more frequently see, that afflictions are the means of performing this happy work. By a gracious severity God is pleased to lay hold on many, and to give them reason to bless the hand, which, though by a rough motion, delivers them from the flames that were kindling around them, and shows the Lord to be merciful to them. Like Jonah in the ship, they are awakened by a storm, to call upon their God: like Manasseh, they are taken among the thorns, and laid in fetters, that they may be brought to know the Lord: like the jailer, they are shaken with an earthquake, and, trembling and astonished they fall down, and inquire what they shall do to be saved? The terrifying fear of the approach of death, or the distressing weight of some calamity, which threatens every moment to swallow them up in destruction, rouses their consciences to an attention to those divine truths which they had long forgotten, and open those records of guilt which they had studiously sealed up.

And there seems to be no affliction by which God more frequently works upon men than by sickness. When he weakens their capacity for the business of life, and spoils their relish for its enjoyments; when he confines them to their chambers, or even to their beds, and makes their chain strait and heavy; when he threatens to take them away in the midst of their days, to deprive them of the residue of their years, and immediately to bring them before that awful tribunal, for which they know, in their own consciences, they are so ill prepared: then do we often see the accomplishment of that observation which Elihu made so many ages ago; He chasteneth a man with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain, so that his life abhorreth bread, and his soul dainty meat; his flesh is consumed away, that it cannot be seen; and his bones, that were not seen, stick out; yea, his soul draweth near to the grave, and his life to the destroyers: but sending him an interpreter, one among a thousand, to show unto man his uprightness, then he is gracious to him, and saith, in a spiritual as well as a literal sense, Deliver him from going to the pit, I have found a ransom. Blessed be God, instances of this kind have been known, and known among us, in which the sickness of the body has wrought the cure of the soul, under the conduct of the great Physician of both: and so has proved eminently to the glory of God, and the good of those who, for a while, have been in heaviness.

Yet it must be acknowledged, that, in other instances, the remorse which a man expresses upon a sick bed, and in the near views of eternity, proves but like that of some condemned malefactor, who, when he has obtained a pardon, throws off all those appearances of repentance with which he had once deceived himself, and perhaps deceived others too, and plunges himself anew into capital crimes; it may be, into crimes for which he afterwards suffers death, without those compunctions of conscience which he before felt, being hardened by a return into sin, attended with such dreadful aggravations. —This has been the case of many; and I pray God it may not be thus with any of you. But if there be any among you that were once under powerful awakenings; any that have cried out of terrors on every side; that have confessed your sins, it may be, with greater freedom, and a more particular detail of circumstances, than the minister who attended you could have desired, and have resolved against them with all the appearances of the most determinate purpose; and yet, after all, have returned with the sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire; such have peculiar reason to be alarmed and terrified. Every day of divine patience toward such is astonishing. And if to all this have been added the returns of danger, and signal interpositions of Providence for your deliverance, and yet there be no kindly impressions of penitence and gratitude on your hearts, they who know the particulars of the case, must surely look upon you with horror as well as with wonder: for what can one imagine of such, but that they are given over by God to a darkness, which nothing but the flames of hell can enlighten, and a hardness, which nothing can penetrate but the sharpness of unquenchable fire, and the gnawings of the never-dying worm?

But to return from a digression, into which compassion towards such a deplorable case has insensibly led me, I would further observe, that as these various interpositions of a remarkable providence are often the means of working saving impressions on men's minds, so,

3. God is sometimes pleased to overrule "little and inconsiderable incidents in life," as the occasion of accomplishing this happy change.

As the treasure of the gospel was at first put into earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power might appear to be of God, and not of man; so God, to make his own praise glorious, is sometimes pleased to produce the most important effects, by causes which seem in themselves least considerable. And it is astonishing to see from how small and seemingly unpromising a seed this plant of paradise springs up, and with how little cultivation too in some instances, after Paul had long attempted in vain to plant, and Apollos to water.—A few lines in the Bible, or any other good book, perhaps taken up by chance, shall be the instrument; and a passage, on which the eye glances without expectation or design, shall strike to the heart, like an arrow from the bow of God himself, after quivers of the most pointed and polished shafts have been exhausted in vain, though such shafts were most skilfully aimed, and most vigorously discharged.—In other instances, a word dropped in conversation, and that perhaps no way remarkable either for its spirit and propriety, shall do that which the most solemn ordinances have not been capable of doing: an important encouragement, by the way, to abound in religious discourse, which God has sometimes been pleased to honour as the happy means of saving a soul from death, and laying a foundation for the delights of an everlasting friendship with those who have been so recovered.

4. Sometimes this great work is accomplished "by secret and immediate impressions from God upon the mind," without any visible means, instruments, or occasions at all.

These things do not frequently happen; nor does it seem fit they should, lest any should be encouraged to expect them in the neglect of the appointed means. Nevertheless it is plain, in fact, that God is sometimes pleased to go out of the common way; and his mighty hand is to be acknowledged in it. The reasons are known to himself; and the praise is humbly to be ascribed to him, who giveth not an account of any of his matters.

It is not, to be sure, so common now as it was in the days of Elihu, that God should speak to men in a dream, or seal instructions to them in slumberings on their bed: yet I have myself known several who have ascribed their first religious awakenings to some awful dream, in which the solemnity of the judgment-day, or a view of the invisible world, has been represented to them with unspeakable terror; and others to whom, when they have waked in the night, some words of Scripture have occurred with such power, that they have not been able to divert their thoughts to any thing else; and that, when they themselves have not certainly known whether they were in the Bible or not.

I have known those that, in the circle of their vain companions, and in the midst of their sensual delights, have been struck to the very heart with some such scripture as this; To be carnally minded is death: or such a text as this has on a sudden darted into their minds; The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. Such passages have seemed to ring and thunder in their ears, till the sound of their music, and the noise of their mirth, have been quite overpowered, so that they have been driven from their revels to their knees, and have returned no more into the paths of the destroyer.

Yea, to add no more instances of this kind, I have known those of distinguished genius, polite manners, and great experience in human affairs, who, after having outgrown all the impressions of a religious education; after having been hardened, rather than subdued, by the most singular mercies, even various, repeated, and astonishing deliverances, which have appeared to themselves no less than miraculous; after having lived for years without God in the world, notoriously corrupt themselves, and labouring to the utmost to corrupt others, have been stopped on a sudden in the full career of their sin, and have felt such rays of the divine presence, and of redeeming love, darting in upon their minds, almost like lightning from heaven, as have at once roused, overpowered, and transformed them, so that they have come out of their secret chambers with an irreconcilable enmity to those vices, to which, when they entered them, they were the tamest and most abandoned slaves; and have appeared from that very hour the votaries, the patrons, the champions of religion; and after a course of the most resolute attachment to it, in spite of all the reasonings or the railleries, the importunities or the reproaches, of its enemies, they have continued to this day some of its brightest ornaments; a change which I behold with equal wonder and delight, and which, if a nation should join in deriding it, I would adore as the finger of God.

In mentioning these things thus publicly, I do indeed take an uncommon freedom, which some may perhaps censure; but so far as human testimony can give an assurance of truth, I may justly say that I speak what I know, and testify what, in its genuine and powerful effects, I have myself seen. And since the possibility of abusing such condescensions of divine mercy did not prevent their being granted, I cannot think it ought to engage me to be silent, when so natural an opportunity offered of declaring them, to the glory of him who worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will. Yet I must repeat the caution which I before suggested, that it would be madness for any to neglect God's appointed means of operation, on presumption that they shall be added to the small list of those who have been such uncommon and astonishing trophies of the efficacy and sovereignty of divine grace.

These remarks must for the present suffice, with regard to the various occasions by which God works upon men's minds; and I hope you will excuse me, if, in illustrating some of them, I have a little anticipated some things which might have been mentioned under the third head, in which I proposed,

III. To consider some varieties observable in "the manner in which divine grace operates on the mind."

And this variety, by the way, will be observable in many instances where the occasions are in general the same. Thus among those that are awakened by the word of God, or by his providence,—some are shaken by strong terrors;—some are melted down into deep sorrow;—others are astonished, as it were, and captivated at once, by the discovery of the love of God in Christ;—and others are led on by such gentle and gradual impressions, that they can hardly recollect any remarkable circumstance at all relating to the manner in which this blessed work was begun or conducted in their souls.

1. Some converts are "awakened by strong terrors."

It is obvious, that conviction of sin, in some degree or another, is absolutely necessary to make way for the entrance of the gospel into the soul. But the degrees are various in different persons; and as for those of whom we now speak, God reproves them aloud, and sets their sins in order before them, marshals them in dreadful array, as the expression imports; so that they seem like defenceless creatures surrounded with a whole host of enemies, whose weapons are raised for their destruction. Yea, God himself, the great, the terrible, the eternal, and omnipotent God, seems to set them up as a mark for those arrows, the poison of which drinketh up their spirits; and, as he himself expresses it, He is unto them as a bear, or a lion, ready to tear and rend the very caul of their heart. They come, as it were, to the trembling and terrifying mountain of Sinai, to blackness, and darkness, and tempest. The conviction of guilt is attended with such a sense of the demerit of sin, as fills them with horror and astonishment, and engages them to wish, in the bitterness of their souls, that they had never been born. They are left for a time, and that perhaps for weeks and months, to be, as it were, deafened with the loud thunders of the law: a dreadful sound, as Eliphaz expresses it, is in their ears, even the sentence of their own damnation; and the awful curse of an almighty sin-avenging God comes into their bowels like water, and like oil into their bones. They are filled with such deep remorse for their past sins, that they verily think no iniquity was ever like theirs, and that no punishment will be like theirs. They hardly see a glimmering of hope that they shall obtain deliverance, but expect, in a very little while, to be sealed up under wrath, if they are not already so. When they hear the offers and the promises of the gospel, they can apply none of them to themselves, and find comfort in none: but every threatening and every curse of the book of God seems to have been written as their intended portion. And thus, perhaps, they continue for weeks or for months together, expecting every day and every night that destruction from God, which is now a terror to them, should utterly swallow them up, and leave them neither root nor branch, neither comfort nor hope. The law is a schoolmaster to bring them to Christ, and it scourges them with most rigorous discipline: yea, the infernal lion roars over them, though he is not permitted to devour them: he particularly terrifies them when they think of approaching God, as if they were to meet with some peculiar danger there, where alone they can find their relief: or, if they do in broken accents utter their prayer before God, it seems to be shut out, and they are apprehensive that it is turned into sin. Yet there is one thing to be observed in the midst of this scene of horror, and it is a circumstance of great importance; "that they justify God when he seems most inexorable, and subscribe to that sentence as righteous which dooms them to eternal ruin."

2. Others are "melted into deep sorrows."

Their eyes run down with tears; and they are ready to wish that their head were waters, and their eyes fountains, that they might continue to weep day and night. They see the evil of sin, and the misery to which it has reduced them, in a most deplorable view; and it may be, while those described under the former head are ready to tremble because they cannot weep, these are ready to weep because they cannot tremble. They lament, among other things, the want of those strong horrors which some have felt: they cry out, "Woe is me, for I am undone; I have destroyed myself, and in myself is not my help found:" and it may be, they are a considerable time before they can persuade themselves there is any help for them, even in God. They know there is help in him through Christ for penitent and believing sinners: but they cannot easily be convinced that they believe, because they do not feel that confident trust which some others have much sooner been brought to; and they are afraid, lest whatever they experience, which looks like repentance, should be only the false appearance of it, proceeding from mere self-love, and a natural dread of future misery. They dwell perpetually on the dark side of things; they read over the catalogue of their iniquities again and again, and attend to those passages in which the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against every kind and degree of sin; while they are slow of heart to admit those reviving consolations which the various rich and precious promises of the gospel are so admirably well calculated to administer.

The state of such souls, when they are first savingly enlightened, is like that of the earth, when fogs and mists have veiled the face of the sun after it is risen. But it very often happens, with respect to such souls, that when these mists are at length dispersed, a very bright and cheerful day opens; they are comforted by the warmer beams of the Sun of righteousness, according to the hours in which they have been beclouded, and are made glad according to the days in which they were afflicted; and going on to fear the Lord, and to obey the voice of his servant, though they have long walked in darkness, and seen no light, they are at length encouraged by his Spirit enforcing the exhortations of his word, to trust in the name of the Lord, and stay themselves upon their God.

3. Some are "captivated with astonishing and delightful views of the love of God in Christ."

There is always, as we observed before, in the awakened soul some conviction of sin and apprehension of danger; nevertheless, there are instances in which God heals almost as soon as he wounds, and speaks peace almost as soon as he speaks trouble. He graciously shortens, to some souls, the pangs of the new birth, and gives them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. The news of salvation by the blood, and righteousness, and grace of Christ, is received with so thankful a sense, with so joyful a compliance, that the soul, feeling beyond all doubt the cordial sincerity with which it embraces the offer, is filled with joy unspeakable and full of glory; the heart does magnify the Lord, and the spirit rejoices in God its Saviour.

This was remarkably the case of the jailer, who in the very night in which he was converted, that same night in which the foundation of his house had been shaken, and his own soul too shaken, by an earthquake, so that he had endeavoured to lay violent hands upon himself: yet, I say, that very night, before the day appeared, having been directed to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, that he might be saved, and been enabled, by divine grace, to comply with the exhortation, it is added concerning him, that he rejoiced, believing in God, with all his house.—Thus too the Thessalonians, though they received the word in much affliction, and ran the risk of losing their possessions and their lives in adhering to it, yet received it with joy of the Holy Ghost. And though I cannot say this is God's most ordinary way of dealing, and though I fear the counterfeit appearance of such a work as this often leaves men in the number of those whom our Lord represents by stony-ground hearers; yet it is certain, some instances of this kind are still to be found. But then I must observe, this is a joy attended with the deepest humility, and animates the soul to the most ardent and affectionate resolution of walking worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing: being strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, unto all patience, and long-suffering with joyfulness.

4. Others, and these perhaps the greatest part of such as are religiously educated, are "led on by such gentle and insensible degrees, that they can hardly recollect any remarkable circumstances that have attended their conversion, nor can certainly fix on the particular time of it."

God is sometimes, as in the preceding instances, in the whirlwind, the earthquake, and the fire; but he is also frequently in the still small voice. The operations of the Holy Spirit on the soul are often, and perhaps generally, of such a nature, that it is difficult exactly to distinguish them from the rational exercise of our own thoughts, because the Spirit operates by suggesting rational views of things, and awakening rational affections. For whatever some have vainly and dangerously insinuated, nothing is so rational as the sentiments and temper which prevail in renewed souls, and to which it is the work of God's regenerating Spirit to bring them.

These operations, where there is a religious education, often begin very early; but then, in some degree, the impressions wear off from the weak and flexible mind; and perhaps there are various instances in which they alternately revive and decay again. And this vicissitude of affectionate applications to religion, (under moving ordinances, afflictions, or deliverances,) and of backslidings and remissness in it, may be permitted, with respect to many, to continue for a long time. At length, under the various methods of providence and grace, the soul arrives to greater steadiness, and a more habitual victory over the remainders of indwelling sin: but it may be exceeding hard, and perhaps absolutely impossible, to determine concerning some remarkable scenes through which it has passed, whether such a one in particular, perhaps the last which strikes the memory, were the season of its new birth; or whether it were merely a recovery from such a degree of negligence and remissness, as may possibly be consistent with real religion, and be found in a regenerate soul.

These balancings of backsliding and recovery often occasion very great perplexity; and such sort of converts are frequently much discouraged, because they cannot give the history of their religious experiences in so clear and distinct a manner as others; and particularly, because they have not passed through such violent terrors and agitations of mind as many, who were perhaps once sunk into much deeper degeneracy, have done. Nevertheless, where there is a consciousness of an undissembled love to God, an unreserved devotedness to his service, a cordial trust in the Lord Jesus Christ, and a sincere affection to mankind in general, and especially to those of the household of faith, a man ought not to perplex himself on this account. For as every man knows he was born into the world, by a consciousness that he now lives and acts here, though it is impossible he should remember any thing of the time or circumstances in which he was first produced into it; so may a Christian be assured that, some way or another, he was born of the Spirit, if he can trace its genuine fruits and efficacious influences in a renewed heart and life.

I have thus laid down several particulars which appeared to me important, in order to illustrate that diversity which is observable in the methods of the divine operation on the heart; and they will naturally lead us to these three reflections, with which I shall conclude my present discourse.—Let us not make our own experiences a standard for others;—nor the experiences of others a standard for ourselves;—nor let us be unwilling, in a prudent manner, to communicate our spiritual experiences to each other.

[1.] Let us not make our own experiences a standard for others.

Let us remember that there is, as we have heard, a diversity of operations; and that many a person may be a dear child of God, who was not born just with those circumstances which attended our own regeneration. Others may not so particularly have discerned the time, the occasion, the progress of the change; they may not have felt all that we felt, either in a way of extraordinary terror or extraordinary comfort; and yet, perhaps, may equal, or even exceed, us in that holy temper, to which it was the great intention of our heavenly Father, by one method or another, to bring all his children. Nay, I will add, that Christians of a very amiable and honourable character may express themselves but in a dark, and something of an improper, manner, concerning the doctrine of regeneration; and may, in conscience, scruple the use of some phrases relating to it, which we judge to be exceeding suitable; and yet, that very scruple which displeases us may proceed from a reverence for God and truth, and from such a tenderness of heart as is the effect of his renewing grace. We should therefore be very cautious how we judge each other, and take upon us to reject those whom perhaps God has received.

I remember good Dr. Owen, whose candour was, in many respects, very remarkable, carries this so far, as somewhere to say, "that some may, perhaps, have experienced the saving influences of the Holy Spirit on their hearts, who do not in words acknowledge the necessity, or even the reality, of those influences." Judging men's hearts, and judging their states, is a work for which we are so ill qualified, that we have reason to be exceeding thankful it is not assigned to us. And when we are entering into such an examination of their character as our duty may in some particular circumstances seem to require, we should be very solicitous that we do not lay down arbitrary and precarious rules. It seems, indeed, that so far as we can learn it, we may more safely judge by their present temper and conduct, than by the history of any thing which has formerly passed in their minds.

And let me add it as a necessary caution here, that they who never felt any of the extraordinary emotions of the mind, which have been described under some former heads, but have been brought to religion by less observable methods, perhaps by calm rational views of it, (of whom I believe there are great numbers,) should be very cautious that they do not rashly censure such things as I have now been representing, as if they were mere enthusiasm. I cannot but think this a criminal limiting the Holy One of Israel, and fear it will be found a boldness highly displeasing to him, and very injurious to the souls of those who allow themselves in it, and of others too, if they be such as are employed in the ministerial work: not now to insist on what, in comparison of this, is but a small matter, the apparent rudeness and petulancy of contradicting facts so well attested as many of this kind have been, and running counter to the solid effects which such impressions have produced. The rashness which prevails under different forms among men of the most opposite sentiments is too obvious; but if we would give ourselves leave calmly to weigh and consider matters, our spirits would be rendered on all sides more moderate, and many harsh and hasty censures would be suspended, which at present prove very little more than the ignorance, pride, and folly of those that pass them.

[2.] Let us not make the experiences of others a standard for ourselves.

This is frequently the case, and especially with those who are naturally of a humble and tender temper; for whose peace and comfort therefore one cannot but be peculiarly solicitous. Having heard of some extraordinary experiences of others, they are ready to imagine, because they can trace nothing correspondent to these in their own minds, that they are utter strangers to real regeneration, and have nothing more than such religious notions and forms, as natural men may easily learn of each other.

But what I have now been saying of the variety of the divine operations on the heart, affords a solid answer to such scruples, when they arise in a pious mind. Reflect, on this occasion, how it is in the works of nature: there we know that God works in all, so that he is the life and existence of the whole creation; and yet, as an excellent writer expresses it, "He alone seems not to work:" his agency is so invisible and secret, that, did not reason and Scripture join to teach it, one might live a great many years in the world without knowing any thing more, than that such and such effects are produced by correspondent second causes: though in strict propriety of speech they are no causes at all, but owe all their efficacy to the divine presence and operation. Sense tells us that the sun enlightens the earth, and warms it; that the rain waters it, the seeds produce vegetables, and the animals continue their proper race: but that God is the Father of lights; that he has prepared the light and the sun; that he visits the earth, and causes rain to descend into the furrows thereof, so as to make the grass to grow for cattle, and corn and herb for the service of man; that he sends forth his Spirit, and the animal race is created, and the face of the earth renewed; this, I say, is what multitudes of the human race are not aware of; because in all these things he acts in a gentle, stated, and regular manner, and employs inferior agents as the instruments of his providence. And just thus gentle, silent, and regular, are the influences of his Spirit upon men's souls; and it is often impossible exactly to distinguish them from the teachings of parents and ministers, and from those reflections which seem to spring from our own minds, though it is he that gives us counsel, while our reins instruct us in our secret musings, and that teaches us to profit by the lessons which others give us.

Be not therefore surprised, and be not dejected, though you cannot assign the place, the time, the manner, in which your conversion began; and though you are strangers to the terrors, the sorrows, or the transports of joy, which you have heard one and another express. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and the Spirit dispenses his influences where and when, and in what measure and degree, he pleases: but while the way and manner of his operation may be secret and unknown, the effects of it are sensible and evident; and as with regard to the wind, thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth, so is every one that is born of the Spirit. You may not certainly know when to fix the precise time of your conversion, or how to trace the particular steps by which it has been brought to pass; for as thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child; even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all. But though you cannot trace the process of the operation, the effects of it are such as you may feel within you, and by its fruits it will be known. It is indeed desirable to be able to give an account of the beginning and the progress of the work of God upon your souls, as some that are regenerate can do; but this is not necessary to evidence the truth of grace. Happy is he who in this case can say, as the blind man in the gospel, One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see. For as you know that there is fire, when you see the flame, though you know not how or when it began; so also it may be discerned, that you have really undergone a saving change, though you know not how or when it was wrought in your hearts. If you answer the characters I laid down in the preceding Discourses, as essential to the truly regenerate, (which are all comprehended in repentance and faith, producing an unfeigned love and uniform obedience,) you may trace the cause from the effect with far greater certainty than you could have traced such an effect, as what would infallibly follow from any cause which you could have perceived in your minds previous to it. There may be great awakenings, violent terrors, and ecstatic joys, where there is no saving work of God on the soul: but where the divine image is produced, and the soul is actually renewed, we are sure (as was before observed) that grace has been working, though we know not when, or where, or how.—And therefore on the whole, guarding against both these extremes, and to cure them both,

[3.] Let Christians, in a prudent and humble manner, be ready to communicate their religious experiences to each other.

God undoubtedly intended that the variety of his operations should be observed and owned in the world of grace, as well as in that of nature; and as these things pass in the secret recesses of men's hearts, how should they be known, unless they will themselves communicate and declare them? And let me caution you against that strange averseness to all freedoms of this kind, which, especially in persons of a reserved temper, is so ready to prevail. Let not any think it beneath them to do it. You well know that David, who was not only a man of an admirable genius, but a mighty prince too, was far from thinking it so; on the contrary, deeply impressed with the divine condescension in all the gracious visits he had received from him, he calls, as it were, the whole pious world around him, that they might be edified and comforted by the relation: "Come," says he, "and hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul." He proclaimed it, not with his voice and harp alone, but with his immortal pen: and many other noble and excellent persons concurred with him; and the invaluable treasure of their experiences, in as great a variety of circumstances as we can well imagine, is transmitted to us in the book of Psalms. Can any just reason then be assigned, why they who live under a nobler dispensation, and a more abundant communication of the Spirit, should be entirely silent on this subject?

There may, indeed, be an over-forwardness, which is the apparent effect of pride and self-conceit, and which, with thinking people, may bring even the sincerity of the speaker into question, or put his indiscretion beyond all possibility of being questioned. But it would be very unreasonable to argue, that because a thing may be done ill, it cannot possibly be done well.

Why may not intimate friends open their hearts to each other on such delightful topics? Why may not they, who have met with any thing peculiar of this kind, communicate it to their minister? And though I must in conscience declare against making it absolutely and universally a term of communion, yet I am well assured, that, in some instances, a prudent and serious communication of these things to a Christian society, when a person is to be admitted into fellowship with it, has often answered very valuable ends. By this means God has the honour of his own work; and others have the pleasure of sympathizing with the relater, both in his sorrows and his joys: they derive from hence too, additional satisfaction as to his fitness for an approach to the Lord's table; they learn with pleasure the divine blessing which attends the administration of ordinances among them; and make observations and remarks which may assist them in offering their addresses to God, and in giving proper advices to others who are in circumstances like those related. To all which we may add, that the ministers of Christ do, in particular, learn what may be a means of forming them to a more experimental manner of preaching, as well as in many instances discover those, before unknown, tokens of success which may strengthen their hands in the work of their great Master.

It is by frequent conversations of this kind, that I have learnt many of the particulars on which I have grounded the preceding discourse. I hope therefore you will excuse me, if, on so natural an occasion, I have borne my public testimony to what has been so edifying to me, both as a minister and a Christian. And the tender regard which I have for young persons training up for the work of the ministry, and my ardent desire that they may learn the language of Sion, and have "those peculiar advantages which nothing but an acquaintance with cases, and an observation on facts, can give," has been a further inducement to me to add this reflection, with which I conclude my discourse; humbly hoping that what you have heard upon this occasion will, by the divine blessing, furnish out agreeable matter for such conversation as I have now recommended, to the glory of God, and to the advancement of religion among you. Amen.

SERMON XXX.

DIRECTIONS TO AWAKENED SINNERS.

Acts ix. 6.

And he, trembling and astonished, said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?

These are the words of Saul, who also is called Paul, when he was stricken to the ground as he was going to Damascus: and any one who had looked upon him in his present circumstances, and known nothing more of him than that view, in comparison with his past life, could have given, would have imagined him one of the most miserable creatures that ever lived upon earth, and would have expected that he should very soon have been numbered amongst the most miserable of those in hell. He was engaged in a course of such savage cruelty, as can, upon no principle of common morality, be vindicated, even though the Christians had been as much mistaken, as he rashly and foolishly concluded they were. After having dragged many of them into prison, and given his voice against some that were put to death, he persecuted others into strange cities; and had now obtained a commission from the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem to carry this holy, or rather this impious, war into Damascus, and to bring all the proselytes to the religion of the blessed Jesus bound from thence to Jerusalem; probably that they might be there animadverted upon with greater severity than could safely have been attempted by the Jews in so distant a city, under a foreign governor.

But behold, as he was in the way, Jesus interposes, clothed with a lustre exceeding that of the sun at noon. He strikes him down from the beast on which he rode, and lays him prostrate on the ground, calling to him with a voice far more dreadful than that of thunder, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?

Any one would have imagined, from the circumstances in which he now beheld Saul, that divine vengeance had already begun to seize him, and that full execution would quickly have been done. But God's ways are not as our ways, nor are his thoughts as our thoughts. Christ laid him almost as low as hell, that he might raise him as high as the third heaven; of which he afterwards gave him a view in vision, to anticipate his reception into it. This day of his terror and astonishment was, in a nobler sense than any other, the day of his birth; for he is brought to bow himself at the foot of an injured Saviour, to offer him, as it were, a blank upon which to write his own terms of peace: and as soon as he heard that this glorious person was Jesus, whom, in his members, he had so long persecuted, he makes his submission in these lively comprehensive words, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"—This was not a time for a long speech; but he that discerns all the secret recesses of the Spirit, knew these few words were full of a most important meaning, and expressed not only a grief of heart, for all that he had before been doing against Christ and his kingdom, but the sincerest resolution for the future to employ himself in his service, waiting only the intimations of his wise and gracious will, as to the most proper and acceptable manner of beginning the attempt.

There is, methinks, a poignant kind of eloquence in this short expression, far beyond what any paraphrase upon it can give: and our compassionate Lord accepted this surrender. All his former rebellions were no more remembered against him; and before he rose from the ground, to which he fell on so terrible an occasion, Christ gave him an intimation, not only that his forfeited life should be spared, so that he should get safe into the city to which he was bound, but that he should there be instructed in that service which Jesus, whom he had persecuted, would now condescend to receive at his hands.

I represent the case thus largely, because I hope it is a case which, in some measure, suits the experience of some that hear me this evening. Paul tells us, it was for this reason, among others, that he himself obtained mercy, though he was the chief of sinners, that in him, as the chief, Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them who should afterwards believe.

Is there then, in this assembly, any awakened and convinced sinner; any one that, apprized of his folly, and sensible of his misery, is desirous to fall at the foot of Christ, and say with Saul, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? That which I see not, teach thou me; and wherein I have done iniquity, I will do so no more!"—To such would I now especially address: and while I put the question, Is there any such among us? I would fain persuade myself, there are several: for I humbly hope, that all the labours that have been bestowed in the preceding Discourses are not in vain, nor all the prayers that have been offered for their success in vain; prayers which, I doubt not, have been carried by many of you into your families and your closets, as well as jointly presented to God in this public assembly. Trusting therefore that it is thus with some, and praying that it may be a more frequent case, I proceed,

Sixthly, To give some directions to such who are awakened by divine grace to a sense of their misery in an unregenerate state, and are brought to desire recovery from it.

To such I propose to give directions: and to what purpose would it be to undertake to offer them to any others? Who would pretend to teach those who are unconcerned about their salvation, what methods they are to take in order to their becoming truly regenerate? This, methinks, would be like giving directions how those might learn to write who do not desire it, and will not take a pen into their hands. All I could say to such, while they continue in this character, would vanish into empty air: it would not, probably, be so much as observed and remembered. I speak therefore to awakened souls, and to such it is pleasant to address on this head. Ananias undoubtedly undertook this message to Saul with cheerfulness, to tell him what Christ would have him to do: and I would with pleasure and cheerfulness engage in the like work, humbly hoping, that some will hear with observation and attention, will hear for themselves, and so hear for their good. And to this purpose let me advise you, —to attend to the impressions that have been made upon you with great seriousness,—to break off every thing that is contrary to them,—to seek for further knowledge in religious matters,—to pour out your souls before God in earnest prayer,—to communicate the state of your case to some experienced Christian,—to acquaint yourselves with such as are much in your own circumstances,—to fly immediately to Christ, as ready to receive all that come to him,—to dedicate yourselves to him, and to his service, in the most solemn manner,—to arm yourselves to encounter with the greatest difficulties in your Christian course,—and finally, to take every step in this attempt with a deep sense of your own weakness, and a humble dependence upon divine grace to be communicated to you as the matter requires. These are the several directions I would offer to you: and may they be impressed in such a manner on your souls, that none of you may lose the things that have been wrought, but by the effectual working of the mighty power of God, such as he graciously has been pleased to bring to the birth, may be brought forth, and such as are awakened may be savingly renewed!

1. I would advise you to "attend to the impressions made upon you with great seriousness."

They may perhaps take you a little off the world and its concernments; and some will blame you for suffering such an interruption: but regard not that censure. The time will come, if you pursue these things aright, when renewed diligence, prudence, and the divine blessing, will amply make amends for any present hinderance which these impressions may occasion. And if it should be otherwise, were there not a cause? If a man seized with a threatening distemper should choose, for a little while, to lay aside his usual business, that he might attend to the care of his health, before the symptoms grew incurable, would any body blame him for this? On the contrary, would it not be looked upon as acting a very wise, prudent, and necessary part? Much more may it be said here—It is not a light thing for you, because it is your life: and if the life is more than meat, and the body than raiment, then surely the soul is more to be regarded than either. And therefore, what you do in your worldly affairs, do moderately; and do not grudge that retirement which is so necessary in such a tender circumstance as this.—I may apply to you, on this occasion, those words of Solomon; Through desire a man having separated himself, seeketh and intermeddleth with all wisdom. If you desire to attain divine wisdom, you must separate yourself from all other things to pursue it.—And it is the more necessary to attend to this now, because the tempter may probably contrive to lay some more than ordinary avocation in your way, at a time when the interest of his kingdom requires you should be diverted from prosecuting those views which are presenting themselves to you, and by which you may so probably be rescued out of his hands, and put for ever out of his power.

2. Let me advise you to "break off every thing which is contrary to such impressions as these."

Sin will immediately appear to have been your disease and your ruin: and therefore, if ever you hope for recovery, you must resolutely break with that; not merely with this or that particular evil, but with every sin; and that not only for a little while, but entirely and for ever. A mortal irreconcilable war must be declared against it. Every fleshly lust must be denied, every immoral practice, for which your heart may at any time smite you, must be reformed; and if ever you expect to reap mercy and life, you must, as the prophet expresses it, break up your fallow ground, and not sow among thorns. For righteousness has no fellowship with unrighteousness, and light no communion with darkness. And you may be assured, that as all sin grieves the Spirit of God, and strengthens the heavy fetters which lie upon the soul; so those sins which are committed after these awakenings and convictions, have a peculiar guilt attending them, and do greater despite to the Spirit of grace, in proportion to the degree in which his motions on the soul have been vigorous and warm.

3. "Seek further knowledge," especially from the word and ordinances of God.

The influences of divine grace are not to be considered as a blind impulse; but God's Spirit works on the spirit of man, as one rational being on another. The apostle, therefore, puts the question with great reason, How shall they believe in him, of whom they have not heard? And as some knowledge is the foundation on which the Spirit of God ordinarily operates in men's hearts: so in proportion to the degree in which you attain further light into the scheme of the gospel, and of salvation by Christ, it may be expected you will be more impressed by it. The mention of this is so much the more necessary, as mistaken notions of religion often expose people, on the one hand, to great perplexities, and on the other, betray them into a false peace, which one way or another will be bitterness in the end. Come therefore to the house of God, and attend spiritual preaching. The question is not about forms, but things. Be not, therefore, over-scrupulous about what is merely circumstantial in religion, on the one hand or the other; but where you find most spiritual light and improvement, there choose generally to attend; not confining religion to any particular party, nor judging those who differ from you in their sentiment or practice; but calmly and humbly seeking your own edification, leaving others to seek theirs where they are persuaded, in the sight of God, they may most probably find it.—Above all, remember, in this circumstance, to make the word of God the man of your counsel, and to judge of what you read and hear by the tenor of that, as the oracle of eternal truth; always attending the reading of it with earnest prayer to God for the illumination of his Spirit, as I shall afterwards more particularly direct.—No other books are to be set up in opposition to this, or in comparison with it; yet let it be your care, in subordination to Scripture, to study the writings of those faithful servants of God in latter ages, who themselves manifest a sense of practical religion. Especially endeavour to find out and peruse those writings which treat of conversion and regeneration, and which contain advice suited to your case. Blessed be God, our language abounds with such; and every truly Christian minister will be glad to direct you to them, and so far as he has a convenient opportunity, to furnish you with them.

4. "Pour out your soul before God in earnest prayer."

You cannot be unacquainted with the many promises God has made in Scripture, for the encouragement of those who desire to pray to him in the sincerity of their hearts. You know into how little a compass Christ has crowded together three equivalent promises;—Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: and you cannot but remember the three-fold encouragement, from the success of those who have recourse to this expedient, which he has added in the most express and general terms;—For every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened. Go, therefore, in a cheerful dependence upon this promise; go, and try the truth of it. Whither should a creature in such circumstances go, but to that God, who has the hearts of all in his hand as the rivers of water, and turns them whithersoever he will? And who should go to him, rather than you? And in what circumstances should a distressed creature rather think of looking and crying to him, than in these; where it sees itself surrounded with so much danger, and yet feels an inward earnest desire, not only of deliverance, but of holiness too?—Go, therefore, and cast yourself at the feet of God this very evening; do it as soon as you return to your habitations: and if you cannot put your thoughts and desires into words, at least sigh and groan before the Lord. Mourn, if you cannot pray; and mourn that you cannot; or rather be assured, that unutterable groanings have sometimes the greatest efficacy, and prove the most prevailing eloquence.

It will be no wonder at all, if, in these circumstances, Satan should endeavour to terrify you. It is his common practice. So many souls have vanquished him, upon their knees, that he dreads and hates the posture; but draw an argument from that very opposition to make you so much the more eager and importunate: when your heart is overwhelmed within you, fly unto the Rock that is higher than you.

I will add, be not discouraged, though help be not immediately imparted. Though you may seem to be cast out of God's sight, yet look again towards his holy temple: though you seem to cry from the deeps, and almost from the belly of hell, the bowels of a heavenly Father will yearn over you as returning prodigals; and I doubt not you will meet with the reception that Ephraim found, when God saw him bemoaning and humbling himself, because he had been as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke; when he cried, Turn thou me, and I shall be turned; for thou art the Lord my God: his heavenly Father answers him in these most affectionate words; attend to them, O thou returning sinner, for thy comfort in this hour of distress! Is Ephraim my dear son? is he a pleasant child? for since I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still; therefore my bowels are troubled for him, and I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord.

5. I would advise you further, that you "immediately communicate the state of your case to some experienced Christian."

I know there is a backwardness in persons of your circumstances to do it; and it has been surprising to me, to learn from the converse of some, who, in this respect, have afterwards grown wiser, how long they have been pining away in their sorrows before they could be persuaded to consult their ministers or Christian friends. It is a stratagem of Satan, against which I would by all means caution you. And one would think your own reason should suggest some very obvious advantages attending the method I propose, of opening your case freely to those whom you think to be more experienced in these things. The impression may be revived upon your own souls, even by the account you give them; and their advice may be exceeding useful to you, to guard you against the wiles of the enemy which they have known, though hitherto you are strangers to them; and to guide you into such methods as, by the divine blessing, may further promote that good work which seems, in any measure, to have been begun within you. You may also depend upon it, that it will engage their prayers for you, which, in this case, may have great prevalency. And it will also naturally lead them to inspect your conduct; and if they see you afterwards in danger of being drawn aside, they may remind you of the hopes once entertained, and the impressions once made upon your mind.—In this respect you may hope, that by walking with wise men you will be yet wiser; and will soon find how happy an exchange you make, when you give up your vain, and perhaps wicked, companions, that you may become the companion of them that fear God, and that keep his precepts; and may have your delight in them, who, in the judgment of God, are the excellent of the earth, however they may be despised and derided by men.

6. I would also advise that you "endeavour to search out those, if there be any such about or near you, who are much in your own circumstances."

Observe, especially among young people, whether there are any that seem of late to have grown more serious than ordinary; and particularly more constant in attending the ordinances of God, and more cautious in venturing on occasions and temptations to sin: and if you can discover such, endeavour to form an acquaintance with them. Try, by proper hints, how far their circumstances resemble yours; and as you find encouragement, enter into a stricter friendship with them, founded on religion, and intended to promote it in each other's hearts. Associate yourselves in little bands for Christian converse and prayer; and by this means you will quicken and strengthen the hearts of each other. For, on the one hand, what they tell you of their own experience, will much confirm you in a persuasion that what you find in yourselves is not a mere fancy, but is really a divine work begun on your hearts, and will give you encouragement to pursue it as such; for, as face answers to face in water, so does the heart of man to man: and, on the other hand, the observation of your pious zeal will quicken others, and may occasion the revival of religion in the hearts of elder Christians; as, I bless God, I have found some things of this kind have done, and hope (and through the divine blessing expect) to find it more and more. Therefore, exhort one another daily, while it is called to-day, lest any of you should be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees; and be assured that, while you are endeavouring to help others, you will find in yourselves the first fruits of this happy attempt, and while you water others, you will be watered also yourselves.

7. It is an advice of the highest importance, that, "whoever you are, you should immediately fly to Christ, and repose the confidence of your souls upon him."

Observe that I urge you, whoever you are, to fly immediately to Christ; and this I do to guard against a strange notion which some are ready to entertain, as if we were to bring something of our own righteousness and obedience to him, to render us worthy of being accepted by him. But this is a grand mistake. The blessings of the gospel are not to be considered as matter of bargain and sale: no, if we come to buy wine and milk, it must be without money and without price; and whoever will take of the water of life, must do it freely. If he pretend to offer an equivalent, he forfeits his share in the invitation, and must be made to know, that the price he offers is a great affront to the value of the blessings for which he would thus barter.—Let this then be your language, "Lord, I have undone myself, and in me is no help: I see nothing in myself which makes me worthy of thy regard; but this I know, that where sin has abounded, grace does much more abound, and reigns through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ; through whom thou hast assured me in thy word that eternal life is the gift of God. As such let me receive it; and by how much the more undeserving I have been, by so much the more will I celebrate the riches of thy grace in making me a vessel of mercy, and a monument of love, throughout all eternity.—Blessed Jesus, thou hast said, that him who comes unto thee thou wilt in nowise cast out: behold, I come and cast myself at thy feet; receive me, and put me among the children, though I deserve not the very crumbs that fall from thy table."

You will not I hope imagine, that when I give such advice as this, I mean to insinuate that a person, purposing to continue in his sins, may nevertheless come and receive the blessings of the gospel; for that would be no other than in the grossest manner to pervert and contradict the whole tenor of it. But this I say, and repeat it, that when once a sinner finds himself by divine grace disposed to turn from his sins to God, and made willing to accept the mercy tendered in the gospel, of which a deliverance from sin and a renovation of nature are a great, important, and essential, part; he may with cheerfulness apply himself to the great Redeemer, as one of those whom he came on purpose to deliver; and in proportion to the degree in which he can discern the sincerity of his sentiments, he may open his heart to comfort, how great soever his former unworthiness has been, and how lately soever such impressions may have been made upon his heart.

8. "Make the dedication of yourselves to Christ and his service as solemn a thing as you can."

We read in the Acts of some that were baptized, and publicly received into the church the very same day in which they were converted: and though a change of circumstances may at present render it convenient to defer doing it for some time with the solemnity of the ordinance of the Lord's supper, which is peculiarly intended for that purpose; because it is proper that the efficacy of your repentance and conversion should first of all be so far seen, as in the judgment of charity to approve the sincerity of it: yet I think, when you feel your hearts absolutely determined for God, you should in a solemn manner lay hold of his covenant, in secret at least, as soon as possible; and declare, as before him that searcheth all hearts, the sincerity of that acceptance.—Some have recommended the doing this in a written engagement; and there are several very affecting forms of this kind in books on this subject, which may very profitably be used. But I hope the fulness of your heart will dictate something of this kind, if such helps should be wanting, or if any peculiar considerations should prevent their being used.—And surely, if you feel the love of the blessed Jesus glowing in your hearts as you ought, you will need no other engagement to yield yourselves to him: that love will be instead of ten thousand arguments; and you will see a secret charm in the view of serving him, which will engage your very soul to spring forward with vigour and eagerness to every proper instance of it. The dread of future punishment has certainly its use to restrain from the commission of sin, especially in an hour of pressing temptation; and the hope of that exceeding and eternal weight of glory which the gospel promises, will have a greater efficacy upon a generous mind: yet I will venture to say, that a heart powerfully impressed with the love of Jesus, will have a yet stronger influence than either of these. Cordial friendship needs not to be hired to perform its proper office. Love is a law to itself; it adds a delightful relish to every attempt for the service of its object; and it is most evidently thus in the present case. "Lord," will the Christian say, "wilt thou do me the honour to accept any feeble attempt for thy service which I can form? I thank thee for it, and bow my head before thee in the most grateful acknowledgments, that thou favourest me with an ability to discharge, in any degree, the fulness of my grateful heart in presenting them: O that my whole soul might daily rise before thee as an acceptable sacrifice in the flame of love! O that I might always feel my heart enlarged to run the way of thy commandments! Were the degree of my future happiness from this moment invariably fixed, I would still pursue this delightful business; for there is no other in which my soul could find a pleasure equal or comparable to it." If you feel such thoughts as these rising in your mind, breathe them out before the throne from day to day; and when you have done it, recollect frequently the vows of God that are upon you; and see, that having sworn, you perform it, and maintain in the whole of your lives a conduct agreeable to such a profession as this.

9. "Gird up the loins of your mind, to encounter with a great deal of difficulty in your Christian course."

Many are the difficulties that you must expect; great, and possibly for a while increasing, difficulties. It is commonly said indeed, that those difficulties which attend the entrance on a religious life, are the greatest; and in themselves considered, no doubt but they are so: they arise from many quarters, and unite all together in the same design of keeping you from a believing application to Christ, and a resolute closure with him. In this respect, evil sometimes arises to a man in his own house: and those whose near relation should rather engage them to give the young convert the best assistance, where his most important interests are concerned, are, on the contrary, ready to lay a stumbling-block in his way; and perhaps act as if they had rather he should have no religion at all, than change a few circumstances in the outward profession of it. Worldly interest too is perhaps to be sacrificed; and conscience cannot be preserved without giving up the friendship of those whom at any other expense but conscience a man would gladly oblige. And it is no wonder if Satan make his utmost efforts, and those very unwearied too, that he may prevent the revolt of these subjects, or rather the escape of his prisoners. The Christian is, therefore, called upon by the apostle, to arm himself as for a combat, and that at all points; to put on the whole armour of God, that he may be able to withstand in the evil day; and having done all, to stand.

Nor must you, my friends, though as soon as you have put on your harness you gain some important victory, boast as if you might securely put it off. Your whole life must be a series of exercise. Through much opposition, as well as much tribulation, you must enter into the kingdom of God; and though your difficulties may generally be greatest at first, yet your encouragements then may perhaps be so peculiarly great, and your spirits under their first religious impressions so warm, that other difficulties, in themselves smaller, may press more sensibly upon you. Endeavour therefore to keep yourselves in a prepared posture: put on a steady resolution; and to support it, sit down and count the cost, lest having begun to build, you shamefully desist, and be not able to finish it; or having put your hand to the plough, you should look back, and become unfit for the kingdom of God. And therefore,

10. "Let every step in this attempt be taken with a deep sense of your own weakness, and a humble dependence upon divine grace to be communicated to you as the matter requires."

Recollect seriously what I was telling you in a former Discourse, of the necessity of the divine agency and interposition; and remember, it depends upon God, not only to begin the good work, but also to carry it on, and perform it until the day of Jesus Christ. If we trust in our own hearts, especially after this solemn admonition, this plain instruction, added to such frequent experience, we are fools indeed. Let us therefore trust in the Lord, and not lean to our own understanding. And do you, my friends, who have but just listed yourselves in this holy war, every one of you say, with a humble, yet cheerful, heart, In the name of our God will we set up our banners. And if thus you wait on the Lord, you shall renew your strength; and even the feeblest soul shall be enabled by divine grace to mount up with wings as eagles, and to press on from one degree of religious improvement to another; while the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall. The apostle expresses, in the liveliest manner, his dependence on the divine Redeemer to communicate this grace in a proper degree, when he says, "Let us come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need;" plainly implying, that it may be obtained if we have but hearts to seek for it; which, as on the one hand, it effectually takes off all idle excuses for the neglect of our duty, pleaded from our own acknowledged weakness any further than we are supported by the divine power; so on the other hand, it animates the heart, that, sensible of its various infirmities, desires nevertheless to go forth to the work of God, and to consecrate all its faculties to his service; using them, such as they are, for God, and humbly seeking from him the enlargement of them.

Go therefore, my friends, into the divine presence; and, while under a sense of this, be not discouraged, though mountains of opposition may lie in your way. Those mountains shall be made low, and spread themselves into a plain before you; while you go forth under the influences of the Spirit of the Lord, who is able to make all grace abound to his people. Of this Paul in our text was a most celebrated instance, who not only received, as was here promised, directions what he should do, but had strength also given him to perform it; a strength which was made perfect and illustrious in his weakness: and when, in consequence of this, he had attained to a very distinguishing improvement in religion, and had been enabled to act up in the most honourable manner, not only to the Christian character in general, but to that of a minister and an apostle, he acknowledges, in all his abundant labours, that it was not he, but the grace of God that was with him.

If it be thus with you, my brethren, you will be established and built up in your most holy faith. The most agreeable hopes we form concerning you, when we see you under such serious impressions as this discourse supposes, will be answered, and they who have spoken to you the word of God, on such occasions as these, will have the pleasure to think that they have not run in vain, nor laboured in vain.

And now, if these directions, which I have offered to you with great plainness and freedom, but with the sincerest desire of your edification and establishment in religion, be seriously pursued, I shall have the satisfaction of thinking, that, though I might find you in the number of the unregenerate when I began these Lectures, I shall carry you on along with me through the only head that yet remains to be handled; and shall indeed address myself to you, as those who were sometimes darkness, but are now light in the Lord, when I proceed to address those who have been renewed by divine grace, which I promised as my last general, and with which shall conclude my discourses on this important subject.

SERMON XXXI.

AN ADDRESS TO THE REGENERATE FOUNDED ON THE PRECEDING DISCOURSES

JAMES i. 18.

Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.

I INTEND the words, which I have now been reading, only as an introduction to that address to the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, with which I am now to conclude these Lectures; and therefore shall not enter into any critical discussion, either of them, or of the context. I hope God has made the series of these Discourses, in some measure, useful to those for whose service they were immediately intended: but if they have not been so to all, and if with relation to many I have laboured in vain from sabbath to sabbath, I cannot be surprised at it. What am I better than my fathers? It has, in every age, been their complaint, that they have stretched out their hands all the day to a disobedient and gainsaying people; that the bellows have been burnt, and the lead consumed of the fire, but the dross has not been taken away: such reprobate silver have multitudes been found. Yea, the Lord Jesus Christ himself, who spake with such unequalled eloquence, with such divine energy, yet met with multitudes, who were like the deaf adder, that would not hearken to the voice of the wisest charmer: and surely the disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord.

When indeed we consider the infinite importance of the message we address to you, O ye perishing sinners! we hardly know how to give over, or to take a denial. We feel a strong impulse on our hearts to give line upon line, and precept upon precept: as a physician that loves his patient, when he sees the distemper prevailing, and has run through the whole range of medicines, is ready, while life yet remains, not entirely to give over, but to repeat again what he had prescribed unsuccessfully before. And if God spare our lives, no doubt many of those things which I have before been urging, must, in substance, be repeated. But at present I will desist: I know not what more or further to say; and if you are utterly unimpressed with what I have already laid before you, especially with regard to the character of the unregenerate,—the nature of regeneration,—the absolute necessity of it,—and of the divine agency in producing it;—I know not what further to urge, and must leave you either to the grace or the judgment of God. The time will certainly come, when you will see and own the importance of these things. The word of God will, in one sense or another, take hold of every soul that hears it, and perhaps on some of you in a very terrible manner, and in a very little time. But if it do, I may say with the apostle Paul, when, in token of the solemnity with which he spoke, he shook his raiment, and took leave of his obstinate hearers, I am clean from your blood; and since you refuse to be instructed, I turn to those who will regard what I say. And thus, according to the method I at first proposed, I proceed,

Seventhly, To conclude these discourses with an address to those who, by divine grace, are experimentally acquainted with this great work of regeneration; to show them how they ought to be affected with the consideration of the truths that have been offered, and what improvement they should make of such a course of sermons as you have lately been attending.

Out of a general regard to the glory of God, and the good of souls, you have attended on what has hitherto been spoken to persons of a very different character; and I hope not altogether without some sensible refreshment and advantage: but now hear more immediately for yourselves, and suffer a word of exhortation in such particulars as these,—Be thankful to God for what you have experienced;—improve it as an engagement to behave in a suitable manner,—study to promote the work of God upon the hearts of others;—and long for that blessed world where the change that is now begun, and is gradually advancing, in your souls, shall be universal and complete.—Your own wisdom and piety have, no doubt, prevented me in each of these particulars; but you will be glad to enter more fully into the reflection than you could do, while it was intermingling itself with other thoughts.

[1.] "Return the most affectionate acknowledgments of praise to the God of all mercy, for the experience you have had of a regenerating change."

I would now address this exhortation and charge to every one of you, who, through divine grace, hope you can say, that you are born again; to all who can say, that God has, of his own will, begotten you with the word of truth, that you may be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures. To you I would say, "Sing unto the Lord, O ye saints of his, and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness and goodness." "Give thanks to the Father, who has made you meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light." Join your voices and your hearts in the most cheerful hymns of praise, whatever your different circumstances are. Let the young and the old, the rich and the poor, the honourable and the mean, rejoice together; if any may be called poor, who are thus enriched; if any may be accounted mean, who are thus honoured. Bless the Lord at all times, let his praise be continually in your mouths; and endeavour to carry along with you, through the darkest road you travel, and the bitterest sorrows you taste, cheerfulness in your hearts, and praise on your tongues; considering—how important the blessing is with which the Lord has favoured you;—how few there are who partake of it;—and in the midst of how much opposition the divine grace has taken hold of your souls, and wrought its wonders of love there.

1. Consider, my Christian friends, "how important this favour is which God has bestowed upon you, in thus begetting you as a kind of first-fruits of his creatures."

Justly indeed may I say, Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be regenerated by his grace, and so be called, and that with propriety, the sons of God! Justly may I say to you, now you are assembled in the courts of the Lord, in those emphatical words of David, O come, let us worship, and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord our Maker: for it is he that has made us, and not we ourselves, with regard to this second, as well as the first, creation; and we, in consequence of it, are in the noblest sense his people, and the sheep of his pasture. Enter therefore, into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise; be thankful unto him, and bless his name.

My brethren, it is a favour in which the salvation of your souls is concerned; and can that be small? or ought it ever to be thought of but with the highest emotion and enlargedness of heart? The gracious purposes of God towards his children are, to make every one of them higher than the kings of the earth, to give them more solid satisfaction than crowns and kingdoms can afford, and at length to raise them to a diadem of immortal glory. O what reason have you, with the apostle, to say, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, has begotten us again to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, even to the hope of an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation! Survey this great privilege which God has already given you, this high security, these glorious hopes. Has he not brought the beginning of glory already into your souls? Has he not wrought you to a filial temper, and taught you to cry, Abba, Father? Has he not, in some measure, formed and fashioned your minds to a meetness to dwell with angels and perfected spirits in heaven? So that you can now say, even with relation to that which you already feel, that you are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. You are even now the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what you shall be; but there is enough appears, and enough known, at present, of what you shall be, and of what you are, to revive, to delight, to transport the heart.

And is not this too, O thou afflicted soul, who art called to encounter with the most painful difficulties, enough to be the means of thy support, and to afford thee matter for thy strong consolation? You that are tossed with tempests, and obliged to struggle under various and long-continued burthens, have you not here a joy that the world can neither bestow nor impair, a pleasure in public and in secret duties, and a hope which is, as the anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast, entering into that within the veil, and so enabling you to outride these storms and tempests? How glorious does your lot appear when viewed in the light of Scripture? You are expressly told, All things are yours: the Lord will give grace and glory, and no good thing will he withhold from you: all the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth to you; and ere long you shall see how they are so. You have a sight by faith of the inheritance appointed for his children; but he does not intend merely a distant prospect for you: you shall go in, and possess that good land, and shall ere long be absent from the body, and present with the Lord: yea, the Lord Jesus Christ, ere long, shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe, to be glorified and admired, in and by you in particular; when bearing the image of your heavenly Father, you shall rise far beyond this earth, and all its vain anxieties, and vainer amusements, to dwell for ever in his presence. And what is there in this world that you imagine you want, which is by any means to be compared with these enjoyments and hopes? Surely, Sirs, in such a view, you should be much more than content; and should feel your inward admiration, love, and joy, bursting the bonds of silence, and tuning your voices, that have been broken by sighs, into the most cheerful and exalted anthems of praise: especially when you consider,

2. "How few there are that partake of this important favour, which God has extended to you."

I hope I need not, after all I have said, remind you at large, that I intend not by any means to speak, as excluding those of different forms and different experiences; as if, in consequence of that diversity, they had neither part nor lot in this matter. I hope that many who are not so ready, as it were to be wished, to receive one another, are nevertheless, in this respect, received by Christ to the glory of God. Yet the temper and conduct of the generality of mankind, even under a Christian profession, too plainly shows, that they have the marks of eternal ruin upon them: and one can form no hope concerning them, consistent with the tenor of the whole word of God, any other than this, that possibly they may hereafter be changed into something contrary to what they are, and in that change be happy.

Now, that you are not left among the wide extended ruins of mankind, but are set as pillars in the building of God, is what you have been taught by the preceding Discourses to refer to the grace of God, which has taken and polished you to the form you now bear: or, as the evangelist expresses it, in language more suitable to the subject before us, The power, or privilege, to become the sons of God, is what he gives to as many as receive him; and it is manifest as to your regeneration, that you are born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God; for we love him because he first loved us: and whatsoever our attainments be, there is no true believer but will be ready, with the apostle Paul, to say, By the grace of God I am what I am.

And now, when these two thoughts are taken in this comparison with each other, how deeply should they impress our minds! and how should it excite us to the most lively gratitude, to consider, that when so many of our fellow-creatures perish, even under the sound of the gospel; that when they live and die under the power of a corrupt and degenerate nature, despising all the means which God has given them of becoming better, and turning them into the occasion of greater mischief; God should graciously incline our hearts to a wiser and better choice! It is indeed a melancholy reflection, that the number of those who are made wise to salvation should be so small; yet it is an endearing circumstance in the divine goodness to us, that when it is so small we should be included in it: as no doubt it would appear to every truly religious person in the ark, that when but eight souls were saved from the deluge, he should be one. There is now a remnant, says the apostle, according to the election of grace: to that grace therefore should we render the praise. We have indeed chosen him; but it is in consequence of his choosing us. We have said, The Lord is my portion; but let us remember to bless him, that he has given us that counsel, in consequence of which we have been inclined to do it. Again,

3. Consider, "in the midst of how much opposition the grace of God has laid hold on your souls, and wrought its wonders of love there."

Christians, look into your own hearts; yea, look back upon your own lives, and see whether many of you have not reason to say, with the great apostle, It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief: and yet to me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should be a regenerate adopted child of God, begotten to an inheritance of eternal glory.

"O," may one Christian say, "how obstinately did I strive against my own happiness! like a poor creature, that having received some dangerous wound, and being delirious with a fever attending it, struggles with the hand that is stretched out to heal him. How did I draw back from the yoke of God! How did I trifle with convictions, and put them off from one time to another! So that God might most righteously have awakened any heart rather than mine. He admonished me by his word, and by his providence; he sent afflictions; he wrought out deliverances for me; and yet I went on to harden my heart, as if I had been afflicted, and delivered, that I might work greater abominations; till the Lord being merciful unto me, laid hold upon me, and drew me out of Sodom."

And here another Christian will be ready to say within himself, "If the grace of God wrought sooner upon me when my soul was more pliant, when my heart was comparatively tender, in infancy or childhood, or in early youth; yet what ungrateful returns have I since made for his mercy! How defective have I been in those fruits of holiness which might reasonably have been expected from me, who have so long a time been planted in the house of the Lord! Alas for me! that I have flourished no more in the courts of my God. How often have I forgotten and forsaken him, how cold and negligent has my spirit been, how inconstant my walk, how indolent my behaviour, for these many years that have passed since I was first brought into his family! How little have I done in his service in proportion to the advantages I have enjoyed! All this he foresaw; all the instances in which my goodness would be as a morning cloud, and as the early dew; all the instances in which this perverse, heart of mine, so prone to backslide, should turn aside, and start back from him like a deceitful bow: and yet he has mercy upon me, I know not why: I cannot pretend to account for it any otherwise than by saying, Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight: thou hast mercy on whom thou wilt have mercy, and thou hast compassion on whom thou wilt have compassion. I have revolted deeply from thee again and again; yet thou sufferest me not to be lost to this very day, nor wilt thou ever suffer it: Thou restorest my soul; thou leadest me in the paths of righteousness for thy name's sake. Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue to this day: and surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and unworthy as I am so much as to enter into thy house below, I shall dwell in the house of the Lord for ever above. Thus, Lord, thou makest me, as it were, a wonder to myself; and I hope to express my admiration and my gratitude throughout eternal ages: and if I can vie with the rest of thy redeemed ones in nothing else, I will at least do it in bowing low before thy throne, and acknowledging that I am of the number of the most unworthy, in whom my Lord has been pleased to glorify the riches of his mercy, and the freedom of his grace."

In the mean time, Christians, I call you, often to entertain yourselves with such views as these, often to excite your hearts by such lively considerations: I call you, in the name of your Father and your Saviour, to a whole life of gratitude and praise. And this leads me to add,

[2.] "Improve those experiences you have had of divine grace, as an engagement to behave in a suitable manner."

Remember the lively admonition of the text, that you were begotten by him for this very purpose, that you should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures. See, therefore, that you be entirely consecrated to him, and behave as becomes the children of God in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation; being not only harmless and blameless among them, but shining as lights in the world, and holding forth that word of life, by which he has begotten you to himself, and quickened you when you were dead in trespasses and sins. God has now brought you into a most honourable relation: he may, therefore, well expect more, much more, from you than from others. He has made you priests to himself, and you are therefore to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. You were darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk therefore as children of light. Remember you are not your own; your time, your possessions, and all your capacities for service, are the property of your heavenly Father.—And permit me to remind you, that if you desire to see this doctrine of regeneration prevail, you, who pretend to be experimentally acquainted with it, must take care that your behaviour may not only be innocent, but exemplary: otherwise many will be ready to blaspheme the holy name of that God, whom you call your Father; and you are like to bring a reproach upon the household of faith, which probably you will never be able to roll away.

Christians, the dignity of our birth and our hopes is too little considered and regarded: and the reason why the world thinks so meanly of it, is because we ourselves are so insensible of its excellency. Did we apprehend it more, we should surely be more solicitous to walk worthy of that calling wherewith we are called, that high and holy calling. Let me therefore exhort you to endeavour to loosen your affections more from these entanglements of time and sense, which so much debase our minds, and dishonour our lives. Yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead; employing with a growing zeal, to the honour of God, that renewed life which he has given you. Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your minds: and let your conversation and behaviour be like those who feel the constraining influences of divine love; who are, not in form, but in reality, devoted to God; and who would be continually waiting for his salvation, with that temper in which you could most desire that salvation to find you when it comes.

[3.] Let those who have experienced the power of divine grace themselves, "study to promote the work of God upon the hearts of others."

Labour, as much as possible, to spread this temper which God has wrought in your hearts; for you cannot but know that with it you spread true happiness, which alone is to be found in that intercourse with the great Author of our being, for which this lays a foundation, and in the regular exercise of those powers which are thus sanctified. No sooner was Paul converted himself, but he presently set himself to bring others to Christ, and to preach the faith which once he destroyed. And David speaks of it as the effect of God's pardoning love to him, Then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee.

If, therefore, God has called us to the office of the ministry, as the experience of this change on our own hearts will be our best qualification for our public work, (and indeed such a qualification that nothing else can supply the want of it,) so it will surely excite us in a very powerful manner to apply vigorously to this care. That which we have not only heard, but seen with our eyes, and looked upon, and handled of the word of life, let us declare to others; that their fellowship also may be with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. Let us declare it in our public discourses, and never be ashamed to bear our testimony to that grace to which we are so much indebted, to that grace by which we are what we are. Let us warn every man, and teach every man the absolute necessity of regeneration; and expose the vanity of all those hopes which are built upon any fair outside, on any moral decency of behaviour, on any humane turn of temper, on any warm flight of imagination or emotion of passions, while the soul continues unrenewed and unsanctified. Let us endeavour to save men with fear, pulling them out of the fire, which, if they are yet unregenerate, is just ready to kindle upon them. And let us be often reviewing our respective flocks, that we may see who they are, concerning whom there is reason to entertain this fear; that proper applications may be made to them in private, as well as in public; that joining our admonitions to our sermons, and our prayers and examples to both, we may at least deliver our own souls, if we cannot deliver theirs. But, in proportion to the degree that such a spirit prevails in us, there is very great encouragement to hope it will be propagated to them, and that our labour shall not be in vain in the Lord.

And let me beseech you, my beloved hearers in other stations of life, that you would not imagine the work is so entirely ours, that you have nothing to do with it. Are we alone redeemed by the blood of the Son of God? Are we alone renewed and sanctified by his grace? Are we alone the brethren and friends of mankind, that the generous care and endeavour to promote their eternal happiness should be entirely devolved upon us? We wish so well to the world, and permit us to say, we wish so well to you, to your own religious consolation and establishment, to your comfortable account, to your eternal reward, that we cannot but earnestly exhort you all, even as many as have tasted that the Lord is gracious, that in this respect you join, not only, as I trust you do, your prayers with ours, but that you also join your endeavours.

Let me particularly address this exhortation to those of you who bear any distinguished office in the society, to whom therefore its religious interests are dear by additional ties. Let me address those of you whose age and experience, in the human and the divine life, give you something of a natural authority in your application, and command a distinguished regard. Look round about you, and observe the state of religion in your neighbourhood; and labour to the uttermost to propagate not so much this or that particular opinion, or form of worship, but real vital Christianity in the world. Bear your testimony to it on all proper occasions: be not ashamed of it in your familiar discourse; and above all, labour to adorn it by your actions. And when you see any under serious impressions, as it is certain they will have a great deal discouraging and difficult to break through; and as the devil and his instruments, among whom I must necessarily reckon licentious company, will be doing their utmost to draw them back into the snare of the fowler; let me exhort and charge you to be as solicitous to save as others are to destroy. I know how many excuses our cowardly and indolent hearts are ready to find out upon such an occasion; but I think those words of Solomon are a sufficient answer to all, and I beg you would seriously revolve them; If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain; if thou sayest, Behold, we knew it not; doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? and he that keepeth thy soul (thine, O Christian, with such peculiar and gracious care,) doth not he know it? and shall not he render to every man according to his works? He will assuredly remember, and will abundantly reward, every work of faith, and every labour of love; and we are insensible of our own truest interest, if we do not see how much it is concerned here.

Let me especially leave this exhortation with you, who are parents and heads of families. And one would imagine there should need but little importunity in such a case as this; one would think your own hearts should speak to you, upon such an occasion, in very pathetic language. Look upon your dear children, to whom you have conveyed a nature which you know to be degenerate and corrupt; and be earnest in your prayers before God, and your endeavours with them, that it may be renewed. And take care that you do not in this sense despise the soul of your man-servant, or of your maid-servant. God has brought them under your care, it may be, in those years of life in which, on the one hand, they are most capable of being instructed and seriously impressed; and in which, on the other hand, they are also most in danger of being corrupted. Perhaps their relation to you, and abode with you, is the most advantageous circumstance which may occur in their whole lives: see, therefore, that you seize it with a holy eagerness; and amidst all the charges you give them relating to your own business, neglect not that of the one thing needful; and labour heartily to bring them to the honour and happiness which is common to all God's servants, and peculiar to them alone.

Let me conclude this part of my address with entreating you all to express your concern for the souls of others, by your importunate prayers to God for them. Pray for the success of gospel ordinances; and for a blessing on the labours of all God's faithful servants throughout our whole land, of one or another denomination in religion. Yea, pray that throughout the whole world, God would revive his work in the midst of the years; that the religion of his Son, by which so many souls have been regenerated, refined, and saved, may be universally propagated; and that all who are vigorously engaged in so important, though so self-denying, a work, may find that the hand of the Lord is with them, and so multitudes believe and turn unto the Lord; so that his sons may be brought from far, and his daughters from the ends of the earth; that the barren may rejoice, and she that did not travail with child, may break forth into singing, and cry aloud; that the children of nations now strangers to Christ, may be more than of those that are already espoused to him. And then,

[4.] Let all that are born again, "long for that blessed world, where the work of God shall be completed, and we shall appear with a dignity and glory becoming his children."

As for God, his work is perfect; and the time, the happy time, is approaching, when we shall know, and the whole world shall know, in another manner than we now do, what our heavenly Father has intended for us in begetting us to himself.—Whatever our attainments here may be, we know at present but in part; and with whatever integrity of soul we now walk before God, we are sanctified but in part: and hereupon we find, and must expect to find, the flesh striving against the Spirit, as well as the Spirit against the flesh; so that, in many respects, we cannot do the things that we would: and in proportion to the degree in which our nature is refined and brightened, we are more sensible of the evil of these corruptions that remain within us; so that though we are not, in a strict propriety of speech, carnal and sold under sin, but do indeed delight in the law of God after the inward man, yet in the humility of our hearts we are often borrowing that pathetic complaint, "Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!"—But let it be remembered, Christians, as the matter of your joy, that the struggle shall not be perpetual, that it shall not indeed be long. Look up with pleasure then, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh: the time is approaching, when that which is perfect shall come, and that which is in part shall be done away. You are now the children of God: but it does not appear to every eye that you are so: the world knows us not, nor are we to wonder at it; for even Christ our Lord was once unknown, and appeared in so much meanness, and so much calamity, that an undiscerning and carnal eye could not have discovered who and what he was. But there is a day appointed for the manifestation of the sons of God, (as the apostle Paul most happily expresses it,) when he will manifest them to each other, and manifest them also to the whole world. They shall not always live thus at a distance from their Father's house, and under those dispensations of Providence, that look so much like disregard and neglect; but he will take them home, and gather them to himself. Ere long, Christians, he will call these heaven-born spirits of yours, that are now aspiring towards him, to dwell in his immediate presence: he will receive you to himself; and you shall stand where no sinner shall have a place, in the congregation of the righteous, and shall have an inheritance among the saints in light, the saints in holiness and glory. O happy day! when dropping this body into the grave, we shall ascend pure and joyful spirits to that triumphant assembly, where there is not one vitiated affection, not one foolish thought, to be found among the thousands and ten thousands of God's Israel! O blessed period of a regenerate state! Though all the schemes of the divine love were to rest here, and these bodies were for ever to be laid aside, and utterly to be lost in the grave; the rejoicing soul might say, "Lord, it is enough!" And it might be indeed enough for us; but it is not enough to answer the gracious purposes of God's paternal love. God will show, in the most conspicuous manner, what a family he has raised to himself among the children of men; and therefore he will assemble them all in their complete persons, and will do it with solemn pomp and magnificent parade. He will, for this purpose, send his own Son, with all his holy angels, and will cause the bodies of millions of his children, that have long dwelt in the dust, to spring out of it at once in forms of beauty and lustre, worthy their relation to him. This therefore is, with beautiful propriety, called by the apostle the adoption, even the redemption of our body; alluding to the public ceremony, with which adoptions among the ancients were solemnly confirmed and declared, after they had been more privately transacted between the parties immediately concerned.

O Christians, how reasonable is it that our souls should be rising with a secret ardour towards this blessed hope, this glorious abode!—It is pleasant for the children of God to meet and converse with one another upon earth; so pleasant, that I wonder they do not more frequently form themselves into little societies, in which, under that character, they should join their discourses and their prayers.—It is delightful to address to those that, we trust, through grace are born of God. No discourses are more pleasant than those that suit them; and could we, that are the ministers of Christ, reasonably hope, that we had none but such to attend our labours, we should joyfully confine our discourses to such subjects.—Yet, while we are here, we see imperfections in others, we feel them yet more painfully in ourselves; and as there is no pure unmixed society, no fellowship on earth that is completely holy and without blemish, so there is now no pure delight, no perfect pleasure, to be met with here.—O, when shall I depart from this mixed society, and reach that state where all is good, all glorious? where I shall see my heavenly Father, and all my brethren in the Lord; and shall behold them all for ever acting up to their character! All giving thanks to the Father, who has made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light! All for ever blessing and serving the great Redeemer; and without one ungenerous action, one reflecting word, one suspicious thought, for ever serving each other in love, rejoicing in each other's happiness, and with the most prudent and stedfast application for ever studying and labouring to improve it!

With the most earnest desire that you, my dear brethren and friends, may at length attain to this state of perfection and glory; and with a cheerful expectation, through divine grace, that I shall, ere long, meet many of you in it; I close this Sermon, and these Discourses: not without a humble hope, that when we arrive at this blessed world, these hours which we have spent together in the house of God in attending them, will come into a pleasant remembrance; and that the God of all grace, to whose glory they are faithfully devoted, and to whose blessing they are humbly committed, will honour them as the means of increasing his family, as well as of feeding and quickening those who are already his regenerate children! Amen.

SINGLE SERMONS,

AND

DISCOURSES ON PARTICULAR OCCASIONS.

PRACTICAL SERMONS.

SERMON I.

THE CARE OF THE SOUL THE ONE THING NEEDFUL.

ADVERTISEMENT.

As I would not willingly incur the censure of being over-forward in publishing so plain a Sermon on so common a subject, I beg leave to inform the reader of the occasion that determined me to do it.

The following Discourse was first preached to a very numerous auditory at the funeral of a young person, who being seized on a sudden with a violent and mortal illness, which nevertheless did not destroy the exercise of her reason, was deeply impressed with a sense of her eternal interest, and expressed that sense in a manner which affected me as much as any thing of that nature which I had ever seen; not only recommending the text to me, but also charging this one thing needful on her brother and sisters in my hearing, with a solemnity and earnestness, which I hope neither they nor I shall ever forget. But I imputed the remarkable attention with which the Sermon was heard, and the kind notice which was afterwards taken of it by many, to that awful circumstance, rather than to any thing in the Discourse itself.

I had afterwards the honour to preach it, with some proper alterations, before some worthy and excellent persons of considerable rank and eminence in life, who are not ashamed publicly to own, that religion is their greatest concern. They were pleased to express such satisfaction in the seriousness and plainness with which this important subject was handled, that they urged me, with an earnestness which I did not at all expect, to let them have some printed copies of it, that they might disperse them amongst their tenants and servants. I think too highly of these valuable friends to prefix their names to so inconsiderable a performance, which would do a great honour to a book, far superior to any I can ever hope to present them with. But as I am well assured of their continued candour towards me, so I hope the authority of their command will be allowed as a sufficient apology for this publication.

We are so near the eternal state, and must so soon be silent in the dust, that methinks nothing which looks like a call of Providence, directing to any opportunity of doing good to the souls of men, should be neglected. And if these obvious but weighty truths may, through the concurrence of divine grace, be made useful for the conversion of one of the lowest of those for whose service this Discourse was asked and transcribed, I shall think this little labour abundantly repaid, even though many others should say, as they probably will, that I have made a little addition to the number of unnecessary books with which the world is already encumbered.

LUKE x. 42, former part.

One thing is needful.

It was the amiable character of our blessed Redeemer, that he went about doing good. This great motive, which animated all his actions, brought him to the house of his friend Lazarus, at Bethany, and directed his behaviour there. Though it was a season of recess from public labour, our Lord brought the sentiments and the pious cares of a preacher of righteousness into the parlour of a friend; and there his doctrine dropped as the rain, and distilled as the dew, on the little happy circle that were then surrounding him. Mary, the sister of Lazarus, with great delight made one amongst them; she set herself down at the feet of Jesus, in the posture of a humble disciple; and we have a great deal of reason to believe, that Martha, his other sister, would gladly have been with her there but domestic cares pressed hard upon her, and she was cumbered with much serving, being, perhaps, too solicitous to prepare a sumptuous entertainment for her heavenly Master, and the train that attended him. Happy are they, that in a crowd of business do not lose something of the spirituality of their minds, and of the composure and sweetness of their tempers! This good woman comes to our Lord with too impatient a complaint; insinuating some little reflection, not only on Mary, but on himself too. Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? Bid her therefore that she help me. Our Lord, willing to take all opportunities of suggesting useful thoughts, answers her in these words, of which the text is a part, Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things, but one thing is needful, and Mary has chosen that good part which shall not be taken away from her, q. d. Alas, Martha! the concerns of the soul are of so much greater importance than those of the body, that I cannot blame your sister on this occasion: I rather recommend her to your imitation, and caution you, and all my other friends, to be much on your guard, that in the midst of your worldly cares, you do not lose the sight of that which so much better deserves your attention.

I shall consider the words, one thing is needful, as a kind of aphorism, or wise and weighty sentence, dropped from the mouth of our blessed Redeemer, and evidently worthy of our most serious regard. In handling them I shall,

I. Consider what we are to understand by the one thing here spoken of.

II. Show you what is intended when it is represented as the one thing needful.

III. I will show how justly it may be so represented, or prove that it is indeed the one thing needful.

IV. Conclude with some reflections and application.

My friends, the words which are now before us are, to this day, as true as they were seventeen hundred years ago. Set your hearts to attend to them. O that you might, by divine grace, be awakened to hear them with a due regard, and might be so impressed with the plain and serious things which are now to be spoken, as you probably would, if I were speaking by your dying beds, and you had the full exercise of your reason, and the near and lively view of eternity!

I. I am briefly to consider what we are to understand by the one thing needful.

Now I answer, in a few words, It is the care of the soul, opposed, as you see in the text, to the care, i. e. the excessive care, of the body, for which Martha was gently admonished by our Lord. This is a general answer, and it comprehends a variety of important particulars, which it is the business of our ministry often to open to you at large. The care of the soul implies a readiness to hear the words of Christ, to set ourselves, with Mary, at his feet, and to receive both the law and the gospel from his mouth. It supposes, that we learn from this divine Teacher the worth of our souls, their danger, and their remedy; that we become above all things solicitous about their eternal salvation; that, heartily repenting of all our sins, and cordially believing the everlasting gospel, we receive the Lord Jesus Christ for righteousness and life, resting our souls on the value of his atonement, and the efficacy of his grace. It imports the sincere dedication of ourselves to the service of God, and a faithful adherence to it, notwithstanding all the oppositions arising from inward corruptions, or outward temptations, and a resolute perseverance in the way of gospel dependence, till we receive the end of our faith in our complete salvation. This is the one thing needful, represented indeed in various Scriptures by various names. Sometimes it is called regeneration, or the new creature, because it is the blessed work of God's efficacious grace; sometimes the fear of God; and sometimes his love, and the keeping his commandments: and very frequently in the New Testament it is called faith, or receiving Christ, and believing on him, which therefore is represented as the great work of God, i. e. the great thing which God in his glorious gospel requires, as well as by his Spirit produces in us: each of these, if rightly understood and explained, comprehends all that I have said on this head. On the whole, we may say, that, as the body is one, though it has many members, and the soul is one, though it has many faculties; so, in the present case, this real, vital religion is one thing, one sacred principle of divine life, bringing us to attend to the care of our souls, as of our greatest treasure. It is one thing, notwithstanding all the variety of views in which it may be considered, and of characters under which it may be described. I proceed,

II. To consider what may be intended in the representation which is here made of it, as the one thing needful.

Now I think it naturally includes these three particulars: It is a matter of universal concern,—of the highest importance,—and of so comprehensive a nature, that every thing which is truly worthy of our regard may be considered as included in it, or subservient to it. Let me a little illustrate each of these particulars, reserving the proof of what I now assert to the third general, where it will abundantly appear.

1. The care of the soul may be called the one thing needful, "as it is matter of universal concern."

Our Lord, you see, speaks of it as needful in the general. He says not for this or that particular person; or for those of such an age, station, or circumstance in life, but needful for all. And indeed, when discoursing on such a subject, one might properly introduce it with those solemn words of the Psalmist, Give ear, all ye people, hear, all ye inhabitants of the earth, both high and low, rich and poor together. For it is the concern of all, from the king that sits upon the throne, to the servant that grindeth at the mill, or the beggar that lieth upon the dunghill. It is needful for us that are ministers, for our own salvation is concerned. And woe, insupportable woe will be to our souls, if we think it enough to recommend it to others, to talk of it in a warm, or an awful, manner, in public assemblies, or in our private converse; while it does not penetrate our hearts as our own greatest care. Our case will then be like that of the Israelitish lord in Samaria, who was employed to distribute the corn when the siege was raised, seeing it with our eyes, and dispensing it with our hands, we shall ourselves die miserably, without tasting the blessings we impart. It is needful to all you that are our hearers, without the exception of one single person. It is needful to you that are rich, though it may on some accounts be peculiarly difficult for you; even as difficult, comparatively speaking, as for a camel to go through the eye of a needle: yet if it be neglected, you are poor in the midst of all your wealth, and miserable in all your abundance; and a wretch starving for hunger, in a magnificent palace and a rich dress, would be less the object of compassion than you. It is needful for you that are poor; though you are distressed with so many anxious cares, what you shall eat, and what you shall drink, and wherewithal you shall be clothed. The nature that makes you capable of such anxieties as these, argues your much greater concern in the bread which endures to eternal life, than in that by which this mortal body must be supported. It is needful for you that are advanced in years, though your strength be impaired so that the grasshopper is a burthen; though you have by your long continuance in sin rendered this great work so hard, that were it less important, one would in pity let you alone without reminding you of it: yet, late as it is, it must be done, or your hoary heads will be brought down to the grave with wrath, and sink under a curse aggravated by every year and every day of your lives. It is needful to you that are young, though solicited by so many gay vanities to neglect it; though it may be represented as an unseasonable care at present, yet I repeat it, it is needful to you; immediately needful, unless you who walk so frequently over the dust of your brethren and companions, that died in the bloom and vigour of their days, have made some secret covenant with the grave for yourselves, and found out some wonderful method, hitherto unknown, of securing this precarious life, and of answering for days and months to come, while others cannot answer for one single moment.

2. The care of the soul is "a matter of the highest importance;" beyond any thing which can be brought into comparison with it.

As Solomon says of wisdom, that it is more precious than rubies, and that all things which can be desired are not to be compared with her; so may I properly say of this great and most important branch of wisdom, whatever can be laid in the balance with it, will be found altogether lighter than vanity. This is strongly implied when it is said, in the text, One thing is needful; q. d. one thing, and one thing alone, is so. Just as the blessed God is said to be only wise, and only holy, because the wisdom and holiness of angels and men is as nothing, when compared with his. What seems most great and most important in life, what kings and senates, what the wisest and greatest of this world, are employing their time, their councils, their pens, their labours upon, are trifles, when compared with this one thing. A man may subsist, he may in some considerable measure be happy, without learning, without riches, without titles, without health, without liberty, without friends, nay, though the life be more than meat, and the body than raiment, yet may he be happy, unspeakably happy, without the body itself. But he cannot be so in the neglect of the one thing needful. I must therefore bespeak your regard to it in the words of Moses, It is not a light thing, but it is your life.

3. The care of the soul is of so comprehensive a nature, that "every thing truly worthy of our regard may be considered as included in it, or subservient to it."

As David observes, that the commandment of God is exceeding broad, so may we say of this one thing needful; and, as Solomon very justly and emphatically expresses it, to fear God and to keep his commandments is the whole of man; his whole duty, and his whole interest; and every thing which is wise and rational does in its proper place and connexion make a part of it. We should judge very ill concerning the nature of this care, if we imagined, that it consisted merely in acts of devotion, or religious contemplation; it comprehends all the lovely and harmonious band of social and humane virtues. It requires a care of society, a care of our bodies, and of our temporal concerns; but then all is to be regulated, directed, and animated, by proper regards to God, Christ, and immortality. Our food and our rest, our trades and our labours, are to be attended to, and all the offices of humanity performed in obedience to the will of God, for the glory of Christ, and in a view to the improving the mind to a growing meetness for a state of complete perfection. Name any thing which has no reference at all to this, and you name a worthless trifle, however it may be gilded to allure the eye, however it may be sweetened to gratify the taste. Name a thing which, instead of thus improving the soul, has a tendency to debase and pollute, to enslave and endanger it, and you name what is most unprofitable and mischievous, be the wages of iniquity ever so great; most foul and deformed, be it in the eyes of men ever so honourable, or in their customs ever so fashionable. Thus I have endeavoured to show you what we may suppose implied in this expression of one thing being needful. I am now,

III. To show you with how much propriety the care of the soul may be represented under this character, as the one thing needful, as a matter of universal and most serious concern, to which every thing else is to be considered as subservient, if at all worthy of our care and pursuit. Now let me appeal to the sentiments of those who must be allowed most capable of judging,—and to the evident reason of the case itself, as it must appear to every unprejudiced mind.

1. Let me argue "from the sentiments of those who must be allowed most capable of judging in such an affair," and we shall quickly see that the care of the soul appears to them the one thing needful.

Is the judgment of the blessed God according to truth? How evidently and how solemnly is that judgment declared! I will not say merely in this or the other particular passage of his word, but in the whole series of his revelations to the children of men, and the whole tenor of his addresses to them. Is not this the language of all, from the early days of Job and Moses to the conclusion of the canon of Scripture? If wisdom be hid from the eyes of all the living, surely God understandeth the way thereof, he knoweth the place thereof; and if he does, it is plainly pointed out; for unto man he still saith, Behold the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil, that is understanding. By Moses he declared to the Israelites, that to do the commandments of the Lord would be their wisdom and their understanding in the sight of the nations, who should hear his statutes, and say, Surely this is a wise and an understanding people. When he had raised up one man on the throne of Israel, with the character of the wisest that ever lived upon the face of the earth, he chose to make him eminently a teacher of this great truth. And now all that he spoke on the curious and less concerning subjects of natural philosophy is lost, though he spoke of trees, from the cedar to the hyssop, and of beasts, and of fowls, and of creeping things, and of fishes: that saying is preserved in which he testifies that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and those proverbs, in almost every line of which they who neglect God and their own souls are spoken of as fools, as if that were the most proper signification of the word: while the religious alone are honoured with the title of wise. But in this respect, as attesting this truth in the name of God and in his own, a greater than Solomon is here.

For if we inquire what it was that our Lord Jesus Christ judged to be the one thing needful, the words of the text contain as full an answer as can be imagined; and the sense of them is repeated in a very lively and emphatical manner, in that remarkable passage wherein our Lord not only declares his own judgment, but seems to appeal to the consciences of all, as obliged by their own secret convictions to subscribe to the truth of it. What is a man profited, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? If it were once lost, what would he not be willing to give to redeem it? But it depends not on the words of Christ alone. Let his actions, his sufferings, his blood, his death, speak what a value he set on the souls of men. Is it to be imagined that he would have relinquished heaven, that he would have dwelt upon earth, that he would have laboured by night and by day, and at last have expired on the cross, for a matter of light importance? Or can we think that he, in whom dwell all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, was mistaken in judgment so deliberately formed, and so solemnly declared?

If after this there were room to mention human judgment, and testimonies, how easy would it be to produce a cloud of witnesses in such a cause, and to show that the wisest and best of men in all ages of the world have agreed in this point, that amidst all the diversities of opinion and profession, which succeeding generations have produced, this has been the unanimous judgment, this the common and most solicitous care of those, whose characters are most truly valuable, to secure the salvation of their own souls, and to promote the salvation of others.

And let me beseech you seriously to reflect, what are the characters of those who have taken the liberty, most boldly and freely, to declare their judgment on the contrary side? The number of such is comparatively few; and when you compare what you have observed of their temper and conduct, I will not say with what you read of holy men of old, but with what you have yourselves seen in the faithful, active, and zealous servants of Christ, in these latter ages, with which you have conversed, do you on the whole find that the rejectors and deriders of the gospel, are in other respects so much more prudent and judicious, so much wiser for themselves, and for others that are influenced by them, as that you can be in reason obliged to pay any great deference to the authority of a few such names as these, in opposition to those to which they are here opposed?

But you will say, and you will say it too truly, though but a few may venture in words to declare for the neglect of the soul and its eternal interest, the greater part of mankind do it in their actions. But are the greater part of mankind so wise, and so good, as implicitly to be followed in matters of the highest importance? and do not multitudes of these declare themselves on the other side, in their most serious moments? When the intoxications of worldly business and pleasures are over, and some languishing sickness forces men to solitude and retirement, what have you generally observed to be the effect of such a circumstance? Have they not then declared themselves convinced of the truth we are now labouring to establish? Nay, do we not sometimes see that a distemper which seizes the mind with violence, yet does not utterly destroy its reasoning faculties, fixes this conviction on the soul in a few hours, nay, sometimes in a few moments? Have you never seen a gay, thoughtless creature, surprised in the giddy round of pleasures and amusements, and presently brought not only to seriousness, but terror and trembling, by the near views of death? Have you never seen the man of business and care interrupted, like the rich fool in the parable, in the midst of his schemes for the present world? And have you not heard one and the other of them owning the vanity of those pleasures and cares, which but a few days ago were every thing to them; confessing that religion was the one thing needful, and recommending it to others with an earnestness, as if they hoped thereby to atone for their own former neglect? We that are ministers frequently are witnesses to such things as these, and I believe few of our hearers are entire strangers to them.

And once more, what if to the testimony of the dying we could add that of the dead? What if God were to turn aside the veil which separates between us and the invisible world, and to permit the most careless sinner in the assembly to converse for a few moments with the inhabitants of it? If you were to apply yourself to a happy spirit, that trod the most thorny road to paradise, or passed through the most fiery trial, and to ask him, "Was it worth your while to labour so much, and to endure so much, for what you now possess?" Surely, if the blessed in heaven were capable of indignation, it would move them to hear that it should be made a question. And on the other hand, if you could inquire of one tormented in that flame below, though he might once be clothed in purple and fine linen, and fare sumptuously every day, if you could ask him, "whether his former enjoyments were any equivalent for his present sufferings and despair?" What answer do you suppose he would return? Perhaps an answer of so much horror and rage, as you would not be able so much as to endure. Or if the malignity of his nature should prevent him from returning any answer at all, surely there would be a language even in that silence, a language in the darkness, and flames, and groans of that infernal prison, which would speak to your very soul what the word of God is with equal certainty, though less forcible conviction, speaking to your ear, that one thing is needful. You see it is so in the judgment of God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ; of the wisest and best of men; of many, who seemed to judge most differently of it, when they come to more deliberate and serious thought; and not only of the dying, but of the dead too, of those who have experimentally known both worlds, and most surely know what is to be preferred. But I will not rest the whole argument here, I add therefore:

2. I appeal "to the evident reason of the case itself, as it must appear to every unprejudiced mind," that the care of the soul is indeed the one thing needful.

I still consider myself as speaking not to Atheists, or to Deists, but to those who not only believe the existence and providence of God, and a future state of happiness and misery, but likewise who credit the truth of the Christian revelation, as many undoubtedly do, who live in a fatal neglect of God and their own souls. Now on these principles a little reflection may be sufficient to convince you,—that it is needful to the present repose of your own mind;—needful if ever you would secure eternal happiness;—if ever you would avoid eternal misery, which will be aggravated, rather than alleviated, by all your present enjoyments.

(1.) The care of the soul is the one thing needful, because "without it you cannot secure the peace of your own mind, nor avoid the upbraidings of your conscience."

That noble faculty is, indeed, as you are often told, the vicegerent of God in the soul. It is sensible of the dignity and worth of an immortal spirit, and will sometimes cry out of the violence that is offered to it, and cry so loud, as to compel the sinner to hear, whether he will or no. Do you not sometimes find it yourselves? When you labour most to forget the concerns of your soul, do they not sometimes force themselves on your remembrance? You are afraid of the reflections of your own mind, but with all your artifice, and all your resolution, can you entirely avoid them? Does not conscience follow you to your beds, even if denied the opportunity of meeting you in your closets, and there, with an unwelcome voice, there warn you, "that your soul is neglected, and will quickly be lost!" Does it not follow you to your shops and your fields, when you are busiest there? Nay, I will add, does it not sometimes follow you to the feast, to the club, to the dance, and perhaps, amidst all resistance, to the theatre too? Does it not sometimes mingle your sweetest draughts with wormwood, and your gayest scenes with horror? So that you are like a tradesman, who, suspecting his affairs to be in a bad posture, lays by his books and his papers, yet sometimes they will come accidentally in his way. He hardly dares to look abroad for fear of meeting a creditor or an arrest; and if he labours to forget his cares and his dangers, in a course of luxury at home, the remembrance is sometimes awakened, and the alarm increased, by those very extravagances in which he is attempting to lose it. Such, no doubt, is the case of some of your minds, and it is a very painful state; and while things are thus within, external circumstances can no more make you happy, than a fine dress could relieve you under a violent fit of the stone. Whereas if this great affair were secured, you might delight in reflection, as much as you now dread it; and conscience, your bitterest enemy, would become a delightful friend, and the testimony of it your greatest rejoicing.

(2.) The care of the soul is the one thing needful, "because without it you cannot possibly secure your eternal happiness."

A crown of everlasting glory is not surely such a trifle as to be thrown away on a careless creature, that will not in good earnest pursue it. God doth not ordinarily deal thus, even with the bounties of his common providence, which are comparatively of little value. As to these, the hand of the diligent generally makes rich, and he would be thought distracted, rather than prudent, who should expect to get an estate merely by wishing for it, or without some resolute and continued application to a proper course of action for that purpose. Now, that we may not foolishly dream of obtaining heaven in the midst of a course of indolence and sloth, we are expressly told in the word of God, that the kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force; and are therefore exhorted to strive, with the greatest intenseness and eagerness of mind, as the word properly signifies, to enter in at the strait gate, for this great and important reason, because many shall another day seek to enter in, and shall not be able. Nay, when our Lord makes the most gracious promises to the humble petitioner, he does it in such a manner as to exclude the hopes of those who are careless and indifferent. Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. If therefore you do not ask, seek, and knock, the door of mercy will not be opened, and eternal happiness will be lost.

And, surely, if I could say no more as to the fatal consequences of your neglect, than this, that eternal happiness will be lost, I should say enough to impress every mind that considers what eternity means. To fall into a state of everlasting forgetfulness might indeed appear a refuge to a mind filled with the apprehension of future misery. But oh, how dreadful a refuge is it! Surely, it is such a refuge as a vast precipice, from which a man falling would be dashed to pieces in a moment, might appear to a person pursued by the officers of justice, that he might be brought out to a painful and lingering execution. If an extravagant youth would have reason to look round with anguish on some fair and ample paternal inheritance, which he had sold or forfeited merely for the riot of a few days, how much more melancholy would it be for a rational mind to think, that its eternal happiness is lost for any earthly consideration whatever! Tormenting thought! had I attended to that one thing which I have neglected, I might have been great and happy, beyond expression, beyond conception. Not merely for the little span of ten thousand thousand ages, but FOR EVER. So that the moment would have come, when, if it had been asked concerning me, "How long has that glorious spirit been an inhabitant of heaven? how long has it been enjoying God and itself in that state of perfection?" —the answer would have been such, that a line reaching even to the remotest star, would not have been able to contain the number of ages, nor would millions of years have been sufficient to figure them down. This is eternity, but I have lost it, and am now on the verge of being. This lamp, which might have outlasted those of the firmament, will presently be extinguished, and I blotted out from amongst the works of God, and cut off from all the bounties of his hand. Would not this be a very miserable case, if this were all? And would it not be sufficient to prove this to be the better part, which, as our Lord observes, can never be taken away? But God forbid that we should be so unfaithful to him, and to the souls of men, as to rest in such a representation alone. I therefore add, once more,

(3.) The care of the soul is the one thing needful, because "without it you cannot avoid a state of eternal misery, which will be aggravated, rather than alleviated, by your present enjoyments."

Nothing can be more evident from the word of the God of truth. It there plainly appears to be a determined case, which leaves no room for a more favourable conjecture or hope. The wicked shall be turned into hell, even all the nations that forget God. They shall go away into everlasting punishment, into a state where they shall in vain seek death, and death shall flee from them. O Sirs, it is a certain, but an awful, truth, that your souls will be thinking and immortal beings, even in spite of themselves. They may indeed torment, but they cannot destroy, themselves. They can no more suspend their power of thought and perception, than a mirror its property of reflecting rays that fall on its surface. Do you suspect the contrary? Make the trial immediately. Command your minds to cease from thinking but for one quarter of an hour, or for half that time, and exclude every idea and every reflection. Can you succeed in that attempt? Or rather, does not thought press in with a more sensible violence on that resistance; as an anxious desire to sleep, makes us so much the more wakeful. Thus will thought follow you beyond the grave; thus will it, as an unwelcome guest, force itself upon you, when it can serve only to perplex and distress the mind. It will for ever upbraid you, that, notwithstanding all the kind expostulations of God and man, notwithstanding all the keen remonstrances of conscience, and the pleadings of the blood of Christ, you have gone on in your folly, until heaven is lost, and damnation incurred; and all for what?—a shadow and a dream.

O think not, sinners, that the remembrance of your past pleasures, of your success in your other cares, whilst that of the one thing needful was forgotten, think not that this will ease your minds. It will rather torment them the more. Son, remember that thou in thy life-time receivedst thy good things. Bitter remembrance! Well might the heathen poets represent the unhappy spirits in the shades below, as eagerly catching at the water of forgetfulness, yet unable to reach it. Your present comforts will only serve to give you a livelier sense of your misery, as having tasted such degrees of enjoyment; and to inflame the reckoning, as you have misimproved those talents lodged in your hands for better purposes. Surely, if these things were believed, and seriously considered, the sinner would have no more heart to rejoice in his prosperity, than a man would have to amuse himself with the curiosities of a fine garden, through which he was led to be broke upon the rack.

But I will enlarge no further on these things. Would to God that the unaccountable stupidity of men's minds, and their fatal attachment to the pleasures and cares of the present life, did not make it necessary to insist on them so frequently and so copiously!

IV. I proceed to the reflections which naturally arise from hence, and shall only mention two.

1. How much reason have we to lament the folly of mankind in neglecting the one thing needful.

If religion be indeed the truest wisdom, then surely we have the justest reason to say, with Solomon, that folly and madness is in men's hearts. Is it the one thing needful? Look on the conduct of the generality of mankind, and you would imagine they thought it the one thing needless; the vainest dream and the idlest amusement of the mind. God is admonishing them by ordinances, and providences, sometimes by such as are most awful, to lay it to heart; he speaks once, yea twice, yea a multitude of times, but man regards it not. They profess perhaps to believe all that I have been saying, but act as if the contrary were self-evident; they will risk these souls, and this eternity, for a thing of nought, for that for the sake of which they would not risk so much as a hand, or a finger, or a joint, no, nor perhaps a toy that adorns it. Surely this is the wonder of angels, and perhaps of devils too, unless the observation of so many ages may have rendered it familiar to both. And can we, my Christian brethren, behold such a scene with indifference? If some epidemical madness had seized our country, or the places where we live, so that as we went from one place to another, we should every where meet with lunatics, and see, among the rest, some perhaps of the finest genius and improvements, and in the most eminent stations in life, amusing themselves with straws and bubbles, or wounding themselves and others; surely were we ever so secure from the danger of infection or assault, the sight would cut us to the heart. Surely a good-natured man would hardly be able to go abroad, or even be desirous to live, if it must be amongst so many sad spectacles. Yet these poor creatures might, notwithstanding this, be the children of God, and the higher their phrenzy rose, the nearer might their complete happiness be. But alas, the greater part of mankind are seized with a worse kind of madness, in which they are ruining their souls: and can we behold it with indifference? The Lord awaken our compassion, our prayers, and our endeavours, in dependence on divine grace, that we may be instrumental in bringing them to their right mind, and making them wise indeed, that is, wise to salvation.

2. How necessary is it that we should seriously inquire how this one thing needful is regarded by us!

Let me entreat you to remember your own concern in it, and inquire—Have I thought seriously of it?—Have I seen the importance of it?—Has it lain with a due and an abiding weight on my mind?—Has it brought me to Christ, that I might lay the stress of these great eternal interests on him?—And am I acting in the main of my life as one that has these convictions?—Am I willing in fact to give up other things, my interests, my pleasures, my passions, to this?—Am I conversing with God and with man as one that believes these things, as one that has deliberately chosen the better part, and is determined to abide by that choice?

Observe the answer which conscience returns to these inquiries, and you will know your own part in that more particular application, with which I am to conclude my discourse.

1. Let me address those that are entirely unconcerned about the one thing needful.

Sirs, I have been stating the case at large, and now I appeal to your consciences. Are these things so, or are they not? God and your own hearts best know for what the care of your soul is neglected: but be it what it will, the difference between one grain of sand and another, is not great, when it comes to be weighed against a talent of gold. Whatever it is, you had need to examine it carefully. You had need to view that commodity on all sides, of which you do in effect say, For this will I sell my soul, for this will I give up heaven, and venture hell, be heaven and hell whatever they may. In the name of God, Sirs, is this the part of a man, of a rational creature? To go on with your eyes open towards a pit of eternal ruin, because there are a few gay flowers in the way! Or what if you shut your eyes? will that prevent your fall? It signifies little to say, I will not think of these things, I will not consider them. God has said, In the last days they shall consider it perfectly. The revels of a drunken malefactor will not prevent nor respite his execution. Pardon my plainness; if it were a fable, or a tale, I would endeavour to amuse you with words; but I cannot do it where your souls are at stake.

2. I would apply to those who are convinced of the importance of their souls, yet are inclined to defer that care of them a little longer, which in the general they see to be necessary.

I know, you that are young are under peculiar temptations to do this; though it is strange that the death of so many of your companions should not be an answer to some of the most specious and dangerous of those temptations. Methinks, if there were the least degree of uncertainty, the importance is too weighty to put matters to the venture. But here the uncertainty is great and apparent. You must surely know that there are critical seasons of life for managing the concerns of it, which are of such a nature, that, if once lost, they may never return. Here is a critical season. Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation. To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. This language may not be spoken to-morrow. Talk not of a more convenient season; none can be more convenient; and that to which you would probably refer it, is least of all so,—a dying time. You would not choose then to have any important business in hand, and will you of choice refer the greatest business of all to that languishing, hurrying, amazing hour! If a friend were then to come to you with the balance of an intricate account, or a view of a title to an estate, you would shake your fainting head, and lift up your pale trembling hand, and say perhaps, with a feeble voice, "Alas! is this a time for these things!" And is it a time for so much greater things than these? I wish you knew, and would consider, into what a strait we that are ministers are sometimes brought, when we are called to the dying beds of those who have spent their lives in the neglect of the one thing needful. On the one hand we fear, lest if we palliate matters, and speak smooth things, we shall betray and ruin their souls; and on the other, that if we use a becoming plainness and seriousness in warning them of their danger, we shall quite overwhelm them, and hasten the dying moment which is advancing by such swift steps. O let me entreat you, for our sakes, and much more for your own, that you do not drive us to such sad extremities: but that, if you are convinced, as I hope some of you may now be, that the care of the soul is that needful thing we have represented, let the conviction work, let it drive you immediately to the throne of grace, that from thence you may derive that wisdom and strength which may direct you in all the intricacies which entangle you, and animate you in the midst of difficulty and discouragement.

3. I would in the last place address myself to those happy souls who have in good earnest attended to the one thing needful.

I hope when you see how commonly it is neglected, neglected indeed by many, whose natural capacities, improvements, and circumstances in life, appear to you superior to your own, you will humbly acknowledge, that it was distinguishing grace that brought you into this happy state, and formed you to this most necessary care. Bless the Lord therefore who hath given you that counsel, in virtue of which you can say that He is your portion.—Rejoice in the thought that the great concern is secured; as it is natural for us to do, when some important affair is despatched which has long lain before us, and which we have been inclined to put off from one day to another, but have at length strenuously and successfully attended.—Remember still to continue acting on those great principles which at first determined your choice; and seriously consider, that those who desire their life may at last be given them for a prey, must continue on their guard, in all stages of their journey through a wilderness where daily dangers are still surrounding them. Having secured the great concern, make yourselves easy as to others of smaller importance. You have chosen the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, other things therefore shall be added unto you; and if any which you desire should not be added, comfort yourselves with this thought, that you have the good part which can never be taken away. And, not to enlarge on these obvious hints, which must so often occur, be very solicitous that others may be brought to a care about the one thing needful. If it be needful for you, it is so for your children, your friends, your servants. Let them therefore see your concern in this respect for them, as well as for yourselves. Let parents, especially, attend to this exhortation, whose care for their offspring often exceeds in other respects, and fails in this. Remember that your children may never live to enjoy the effects of your labour and concern, to get them estates and portions. The charges of their funerals may perhaps be all their share of what you are so anxiously careful to lay up for them. And oh! think what a sword would pierce through your very heart, if you should stand by the corpse of a beloved child with this reflection, "this poor creature has done with life before it learnt its great business in it, and is gone to eternity, which I have seldom been warning it to prepare for, and which perhaps it learnt of me to forget."

On the whole, may this grand care be awakened in those by whom it has been hitherto neglected, may it be revived in each of our minds. And that you may be encouraged to pursue it with greater cheerfulness, let me conclude with this comfortable thought, that in proportion to the necessity of the case, is the provision which divine grace has made for our assistance. If you are disposed to sit down at Christ's feet, he will teach you by his word and Spirit. If you commit this precious jewel, which is your eternal all, into his hand, he will preserve it unto that day, and will then produce it richly adorned, and gloriously improved to his own honour, and to your everlasting joy. Amen.

SERMON II.

SALVATION BY GRACE THROUGH FAITH.

DEDICATION.

To the Church and Congregation of Protestant Dissenters at Rowell, to whom the substance of these [illegible] Sermons was preached, and at whose desire they are published.

My dear brethren and friends, beloved in our common Lord,

When I first preached these plain Sermons to my own congregation, which I here offer to your perusal, I was much surprised at the request which several of them made, that they might be printed: but I was yet more surprised, when after having delivered the substance of them in one discourse at Rowell some time after, you so unanimously and affectionately made that request your own. I apprehend, that though the many excellent treatises we have on this subject already, might excuse my backwardness to comply with the first motion of this kind, yet absolutely to have refused your repeated solicitation might have appeared disrespectful to my good friends, and perhaps have looked like some unwillingness to bear my testimony to this great and important doctrine, in an age in which the credit of many evangelical truths seems to be fallen very low.

I am really sorry I have delayed this little service so long; but it was chiefly owing to my desire of finishing my Sermons on Regeneration, which indeed cost me more labour than I at first apprehended. That seemed a business of such importance, that I know not how to interrupt it: but as they are now almost printed off, I send out these Discourses as a kind of supplement to them, and therefore they are printed in a form very fit to bind up with them. The delay is more excusable, as Salvation by Grace is not a subject which grows out of date in a few months. This glorious doctrine has been the joy of the church in all ages on earth; and it will be the song of all that have received it in truth throughout the ages of eternity, and be pursued in the heavenly regions with ever growing admiration and delight.

I cannot conclude this short address, without congratulating you on the abundant goodness of God to you as a church, in bringing among you that worthy and excellent person,* under whose pastoral care you are now so happily placed. I know, he is a faithful witness to the truths of the gospel, and rejoice in that rich abundance of gifts and graces, which render him so fit to state and improve them, in the most advantageous, as well as most agreeable and delightful, manner. I hope, and believe, that the grace he so humbly owns his dependence upon, will add happy success to his labours; and I heartily pray, that you and neighbouring churches may long be happy in him; and that God, who has by such various and gracious interpositions in your favour expressed his paternal care of you, may still delight to dwell among you. May he multiply you with men like a flock, daily adding to his church among you such as shall be saved! May your souls continually rejoice in his salvation! And may you ever walk worthy of the Lord, and prove by the integrity and purity, the spirituality and usefulness, of your whole behaviour, that this grace of God which brings salvation has entered with power into your hearts; and that it is your care and delight, to improve it, as well as to hear of it! To contribute to this blessed end, by this or any other attempt of cordial love and faithful respect, will be an unspeakable pleasure to,

* The Reverend Mr. Jonathan Saunderson.

My dear friends, your very affectionate servant, in the bonds of our common Lord,

Northampton, Sept. 1, 1741. P. DODDRIDGE.

Ephesians ii. 8.

For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God.

You are often, my dear brethren and friends, hearing of the duties of a religious life: and it cannot but be a pleasure to every faithful minister of Christ to observe, how willing, nay, how glad, you are to hear of them; and, with respect to many of you, how ready you are to practise them. But I am now coming to you with a renewed admonition on another head, which is always to be taken in connexion with the former; and which, I persuade myself, will in that view be welcome to you all. I am to inculcate it upon you, that when you have done your utmost, how much soever that be, you should still say, that you are unprofitable servants: and endeavour to maintain a deep sense of it upon your hearts, that, as the apostle admonishes the believing Ephesians in the words of the text, By grace ye are saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God.

The apostle, in his preceding discourse, speaks of the happy change which the gospel had made in the state of these poor heathens. He freely acknowledges on this occasion, that the Jews were likewise in a very bad state, and if not entirely sunk into the same enormities, yet were by nature children of wrath, even as others. So that on the whole, both were (as it might be expressed by an easy and very proper figure) dead in trespasses and sins, indisposed for any religious sensations and actions, and far more odious to God, than a putrid carcass is to men. But he adds, that God by his grace had saved them; that his unmerited goodness had begun their salvation, and having thus far carried it on, would undoubtedly complete it: and that he might impress their minds the more deeply with it, he repeats it again, By grace ye are saved. So much was the apostle Paul concerned to inculcate a doctrine, which some are ready to look upon as unnecessary, and others perhaps as dangerous. But the apostle's authority is abundantly enough to outweigh all that can be laid in the opposite scale. And it will appear from what I have further to offer, that if it had not in this view so direct a sanction from his express testimony, the conclusion would follow by the justest deduction of argument from principles so fundamental to the gospel, that they cannot be denied without subverting its whole superstructure.

And here, if I would treat the subject in its full extent, I might consider what we mean by gospel-salvation. But I content myself at present with telling you in a few words, that it implies "a deliverance from that ruinous and calamitous condition, into which, by our apostasy from God, we are fallen;" and it also includes "our being restored to the divine favour, and all the happy effects of it, as extending, not only to time, but to eternity."

I might also consider at large the nature of that faith to which the promises of salvation are made. But that is a subject you have heard so frequently explained, that I shall only remind you of that general account of it, which has often been illustrated among you. "Saving faith," for of that we are now speaking, "is such a persuasion, that Christ is the great Messiah, the Son of God, and the Saviour of men; and such a desire and expectation of the blessings he has procured under that character; as shall engage us cheerfully to commit our souls to him in his appointed method of salvation, with a disposition cordially to devote ourselves to his service in all the ways of holy and evangelical obedience." The several branches of this definition are to be taken in their connexion with each other; and then there would be no difficulty in showing, from the whole tenor of Scripture, that, as nothing short of this can be acceptable to God, so wherever such a principle really is, the soul in which it is found is entitled to all the blessings of the covenant of grace, and has all the security for eternal happiness which the promise and oath of God can give. I might also easily show you, that this is such a description of faith as effectually secures the interest of practical religion, and guards against every presumptuous hope, which may be formed in a soul destitute of a principle of universal holiness.

But waving the further prosecution of these preliminaries to our subject, which we have occasion so often to dilate upon, I shall make it my present business,

I. To consider how we may be said to be saved through faith.

II. How it appears, that in consequence of this, we are saved by grace.

III. I shall examine the force of the apostle's additional argument, which is drawn from the consideration, that faith is the gift of God. And then,

IV. I shall collect some inferences from the whole. And may God write on our hearts, as with the point of a diamond, them and the premises on which they are founded!

I. We are to consider in what sense it may be said, that Christians are saved through faith.

Ye are, says the apostle, [σεσωσμενοι] the saved ones,—the persons who have already received the beginnings of salvation, and the certain pledge of its complete accomplishment—[δια της πιστεως] through, or by means of, faith.

Now, I apprehend, we shall take in the full sense of the apostle's assertion, and of all that is most necessary to believe and know on this subject; if we acknowledge and remember,—that faith is absolutely necessary in order to our salvation, so that we cannot possibly be saved without it;—and also, that every one who hath this faith, shall undoubtedly obtain salvation:—but yet, that after all, a Christian is not to ascribe his salvation to the merit of his faith, but entirely to that of the Lord Jesus Christ, the great author and finisher of it. These are three very obvious remarks: none is so weak but he may easily understand them; and yet I speak very seriously when I say, they seem to me to contain the sum of all that is most important in the many large volumes which have been written on the subject.

1. "Faith is so absolutely necessary to our salvation, that we cannot possibly be saved without it."

So our Lord tells us, in the most express and emphatical forms of speech: If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins; which most certainly implies the loss of salvation, and indeed much more. And elsewhere the incarnate wisdom and truth of God saith, He that believeth not, shall be damned. He shall not, as the Baptist says, see life: nay, as our Lord himself expresses it in the strongest terms, He that believeth not, is condemned already; not only on account of all those other sins, for which the wrath of God, to which he became immediately obnoxious, still abideth upon him; but for this additional reason of dreadful provocation, because he hath not believed in the venerable and majestic name of the only-begotten Son of God.

Without this faith, there is no knowledge that will save a man; though it should be the most various and the most exact knowledge, of the most divine and important subjects, which ever entered into a human mind. So far is it from this, that one need not scruple to say, a man might as reasonably expect to be saved by skill in the mathematics, or in music, as by skill in polemical divinity, though it were in its most essential branches, if after all it were no more than mere speculation.

And it is no less certain, that without this faith, morality will not save a man; be it ever so unexceptionable, be it ever so exemplary. This is indeed much better than the former; but if there be nothing more, it will be fatally ineffectual to the great purpose which we have now in view. I speak not now, as you may easily imagine, of such a continual and uniform obedience to the divine will, as perfectly answers the demands of God's original law; for no man ever has attained to this, or will ever in fact attain to it in this world: but I speak of what the world generally calls morality, a freedom from gross impiety and scandalous vice, yea, though attended with the practice of the humane and the social virtues. This is indeed amiable and honourable, so far as it goes; and will undoubtedly have its reward, in the pleasure of such conduct, in the esteem and love of mankind, and in the possession of many temporal advantages and blessings, which in the common course of providence are connected with it. But alas, it is after all a very partial and imperfect thing: and as a man may be temperate in himself, just, faithful, and benevolent to men, without having any appearance of religion towards God, or making any pretence to it; so he may have some sense of God upon his spirit, which one would think none but an atheist could entirely avoid, while for the neglect, or it may be the rejection, of the gospel, he stands exposed to its sentence of condemnation. If Christ be not regarded as the Rock on which we build our hopes, the foundation is sandy, and will be ruinous: and if we do not receive Christ by such a faith as I described above, we offer him a most insolent affront, by pretending to put our unsanctified and rebellious hearts under his patronage.

We see then, that without this faith we cannot possibly be saved. It is the counterpart of this important truth which we now add, when we observe,

2. That "every one who hath this faith, shall undoubtedly be saved."

You will here be sure to observe, that I say, "Every one who hath this faith," meaning the faith described above, which includes in it our devoting ourselves to Christ in the way of holy obedience, as an essential part of it; and consequently, there can be no reason to say, as some have wildly represented the matter, "a believer shall be saved, let him live as he will;" which is either a most notorious and mischievous falsehood, or an express contradiction in terms. If the word believer be supposed to signify one who merely assents to the truth of the gospel in speculation, nothing can be more false; and the whole epistle of James, to omit a thousand particular passages of other scriptures, is a demonstration of the contrary: but if it be meant, as I suppose it generally is, of a true believer, it is an express contradiction; and is as absurd as it would be to say, a really good man shall be saved, though he should at the same time be a very bad one. For no one can, in the sense described above, which is the Scriptural sense, be a true believer, but one who wills to live in a holy manner; since the same operation of God upon the soul, which disposes it to believe, sanctifies the will, and though freely, yet effectually, leads it into a prevailing determination to make the service of God the business of life: or, in other words, it is plain from the whole tenor of Scripture, that a saving faith is also a sanctifying faith: but there cannot be a sanctifying faith in an unholy heart; neither can there be a holy heart, where there is a wicked life; for the tree is known by its fruit: and when we speak of the heart, we mean not merely the affections, but the will, the determinations of which are indeed the very actions of which we speak, so far as they are properly ours. There cannot therefore be a more insolent falsehood, than the pretence to holiness of heart, where that of the life is wanting, or to saving faith in the absence of both. There may indeed be an error in the understanding as to some precepts of Christ, or a false judgment as to some circumstances attending ourselves; and that may produce some error in practice. There may be instances in which the infirmity of human nature, and the surprise or force of a temptation, may betray a man into particular miscarriages, contrary to the general bent and tenor of his heart and life: but there cannot possibly be, in the conduct of any true believer, an habitual, allowed, and customary disobedience to any one commandment of our blessed Redeemer.

Thus you must first admit as a necessary preliminary; and, when it is admitted, you may very securely build upon it this great truth, that "whosoever hath such a faith as this, shall certainly be saved." Whatever his former guilt may have been, though ever so various, ever so long continued, ever so aggravated, though crimes had been committed, from which he could never have been justified by the law of Moses, but would have been doomed by it to an infamous death without mercy; yet, on exerting such an act of faith in Christ, the believer immediately stands a justified person before God previous to any good works of his own: yea, though he should die before he have an opportunity of performing any, in this case, (which, if ever it happen, is by the way the only case in which good works are not, according to the gospel covenant, necessary to an actual admission into heaven,) an omniscient God calls the things that are not as if they were, and accepts those fruits of holiness which he discerned in their root, or their bud, though he did not afford time for their coming to maturity. And if life be spared, the believer continuing such, continues in a state of favour and acceptance with God, though there may be remaining imperfections in him; and though he may see reason to complain, that he cannot do the things which he would, but that the law in his members struggles against the law of his mind, yet he shall finally be saved; whatever difficulties are to be broken through, and how long soever his trials may continue: and his salvation as a believer is as certain, from the whole current of the word of God, as the condemnation of the unbeliever; which we proved above. He that believeth on the Son of God hath everlasting life; he hath it already in its beginnings and earnests, and he shall ere long rise to the complete possession of it. For Christ gives unto his sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of his hand. But it is of importance that I add,

3. That "after all, a believer is not to ascribe his salvation to the merit and excellency of this faith itself, but entirely to the merit and righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the free grace of God, as manifested in it."

We know it is the constant doctrine of the New Testament, that God hath made us accepted in the Beloved; and that of him we are in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: so that we are justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in him. And if we should pretend to say, that we are accepted of God for faith, as the meritorious cause of that acceptance, we must contradict the whole course of the apostle Paul's argument, especially in the fourth chapter of his epistle to the Romans, where he strongly contends that Abraham was not justified by works, because if he were he would have something to glory in before God. Now if he had been justified by faith as his own meritorious act, there would have been as much room for him to have gloried in that, as in any work, whether of ceremonial or moral obedience. And in the same epistle he declares again, where he is speaking of the salvation of God's chosen remnant, that if it be of works, then it is no more grace, otherwise work is no more work: the meaning of which plainly is, that no man can at once be justified by grace and by works: and on the same principles we may also say, no man can be justified by the merit of faith, and yet by grace. If therefore it evidently appear from the text, and our further reasonings upon it, that our justification and acceptance with God is to be ascribed to grace, all pretence of merit in the act of believing must of course be given up.

This will indeed further appear, if we consider what it is that faith does in order to our being justified. You very well know, it is represented in Scripture as receiving Christ. To as many as received him, to them gave he power (or privilege) to become the sons of God, even to them that believe in his name. Now it must be flagrantly absurd to talk of resting upon an act, whereby we do indeed receive and rest upon another. And therefore however inaccurately some may have expressed themselves on this head, I cannot suppose that any wise and considerate Christian ever meant to assert the contrary to what I am now endeavouring to prove. We do indeed find the apostle speaking of faith, as imputed for righteousness; but it seems to me, that the most natural sense of that expression may be fixed, and the propriety of it may be admitted, upon the principles I have now been laying down.

All manner of imputation seems to be a metaphor taken from books of account between creditor and debtor.* To impute any act of sin, or of obedience, is therefore properly no other than to set it down to his account. The great God of heaven and earth is represented in Scripture, with humble condescension to our manner of acting and conceiving of things, as keeping a most exact book of records and accounts, in which those things are registered concerning every one of us which he will bring into that solemn review and survey, by which our characters and states shall finally be determined. And as the most exact and perfect obedience is a debt which we owe him, as our great Creator, Benefactor, and Governor; so, on the breach of his law, we owe him some proper satisfaction for it. In this view we are all charged as debtors, poor miserable insolvent debtors, in the book of God: innumerable sins are imputed, or set down to our account: and were things to go on in this course, we should ere long be arrested by the divine justice, and being found incapable of payment, should be cast into the prison of hell, to come out no more. But God, in pity to this our calamitous state, has found out a surety and a ransom for us, and has provided a satisfaction in the obedience and sufferings of his Son; which is what we mean by the righteousness of Christ, or his active and passive obedience. It is with a gracious regard to this, to express his high complacency in it, and (if I may so speak) his pleasing remembrance of it, that all who are finally justified and saved, meet with divine acceptance and favour: or, to pursue the metaphor opened above, the righteousness of Christ is in the book of God imputed, or set down, to their account, as that by which the debt is balanced, and they are entitled to such favours as righteous persons might expect from God. But then, it is an invariable rule in the divine proceedings, that this righteousness, or this atonement and satisfaction, of Christ, (for I think it matters but little by which of these names it shall be called,) be a means of delivering those, and only those, that believe. Pursuant therefore to the aforesaid metaphor, when any particular person believes, this is set down to his account, as a most important article, or as a memorandum (if I may so express it) in the book of God's remembrance, that such a one is now actually become a believer, and therefore is now entitled to justification and life by Christ. In this sense, his faith is imputed for righteousness. Yet it is not regarded by God, as the grand consideration which balances the account, or indeed as paying any of the former debt, which it is impossible it should; but only as that which, according to the gracious constitution of the gospel, gives a man a claim to that which Christ has paid, and which God has graciously allowed as a valuable consideration, in regard to which he may honourably pardon and accept all who shall apply to him in his appointed way, or in the way of humble believing, as faith was described above.

This appears to me a just and easy view of the gospel doctrine on this head; and it is so important distinctly to understand it, that I hope you will excuse my having represented it in so many words. And this is, on the whole, the sense in which we may be said to be saved through faith.—None can be saved without it, and every one who has it is entitled to salvation; but not in virtue of the merit and excellency of faith itself, but entirely for the sake of what Christ has done and suffered; or, in other words, by the imputation of his perfect righteousness, the merit of which is graciously applied to this or that particular person upon his believing: so that upon this he is justified; and by the general tenor of the gospel, is to be looked on as a righteous person; or as one, who shall on the whole be treated as such, and shall ere long be publicly declared righteous before the assembled world, and be freed from all the remainders of that penalty which sin has brought upon us: and though, for wise and good reasons, he be for a while continued under some of them, the time of that continuance is so short, and his succeeding happiness so lasting, that the former being as it were swallowed up by the latter to the all-comprehending views of God, he is spoken of by him as if his justification and salvation were already complete: "Ye are saved through faith." But having stated this, the method I proposed leads me,

* From mercantile affairs the metaphor is sometimes applied to unlawful, as crimes to be accounted to or to others sometimes called to lay; but when the matter is well understood in one view, it is easy to apply it to the other.

II. To show, that in consequence of our being thus saved through faith, we may properly be said to be saved by grace.

Now the connexion between these will appear very evident, if we consider,—that faith cannot make any atonement to the offended justice of God, so as to give us any legal claim even to the pardon of our sins upon the account of it:—much less can it confer any obligation upon God to bestow on us eternal blessedness:—nor would there indeed have been any room to mention faith in this whole affair, if God had not contrived such a method of salvation, and done that to effect it which none but himself could have done.

1. "Faith cannot make any atonement to the offended justice of God, so as to give us any legal claim even to the pardon of our sins upon the account of it;" so that if we are saved through faith, we must in this view acknowledge it to be by grace.

The law of so wise, so great, and so venerable a sovereign, as the blessed God is, must of course suppose some awful sanctions, some solemn denunciations of wrath and vengeance on those who presumptuously transgress it. And it is certainly the part of God, as a wise, holy, and gracious legislator, to maintain its honour when it has been violated, and not to treat an offending creature as innocent and righteous, without some provision made for the satisfaction of his injured justice. In the demand of which satisfaction, God does not express any thing of a sanguinary and revengeful disposition: far be so blasphemous a thought from us! but he displays a steady regard to that order, which as the great Sovereign it becomes him, for the benefit of his subjects, as well as for the glory of his own name and government, to preserve in the moral world, i. e. among his reasonable creatures. Some ample and honourable amends must therefore be made, in order to the discharge of a guilty and condemned criminal. And is faith such an amends? Take it in its utmost extent, as an assent to whatever he proposes, and a submission to whatever he demands, to the very utmost of our capacity, this in our present circumstances is but our duty, and would have been so had we never offended him; and the performance of it, with whatever readiness, exactness, and constancy, cannot possibly atone for the violation of it in times past; as the payment of what for the future becomes due to any creditor, cannot discharge a debt formerly contracted, and remaining unbalanced upon account. Therefore it is, that we read of Christ's being made a sin-offering for us, though he himself knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him; i. e. that we might be accepted of God as righteous, being considered as by faith united to him, and interested in his righteousness and grace. In testimony of which, God expressly requires, that every sinner should sue out his pardon in Christ's name, and should present himself before him as one that has obtained redemption through Christ's blood, and is accepted in the Beloved, who of God is made unto us righteousness. A scheme utterly inconsistent with that of our being justified and saved by any merit or excellence in faith, considered as an act of atonement made by us, by which the guilt of our offences is cancelled, and our pardon bought by us. It is yet more apparent,

2. That "faith can confer no obligation upon God to bestow on us eternal blessedness;" in which view also our salvation through it must appear to be by grace.

That eternal blessedness is designed for every believing soul, is, through the divine goodness, as apparent as that faith itself is ever required in Scripture. But can we say of eternal life, that it is the wages of faith? I much question, whether it could have been claimed as wages due to us on account of our obedience, had that obedience been perfect in its kind and degree. Nor do I think it could with any confidence have been expected, unless God had been pleased by a gracious covenant to promise it: otherwise, all that the completest obedience could have claimed, would only have been favour continued, or at most favour increasing, during the time in which we continued to behave ourselves well. Much less then can we imagine, that when we had once broken the law of God, faith, though for the future attended with the most perfect efficacy, and productive of the most steady course of obedience in all after-instances, could give us any such claim. Least of all, then, can we have any room to pretend it, on account of a faith which operates in so imperfect a manner, and produces a holiness so sadly defective in many instances, as we must acknowledge our own to be. That we should be admitted into the glorious presence of God, and be fixed in a state of immutable security and felicity, where sin and sorrow shall no more invade us, but where God will appoint for us salvation itself for walls and bulwarks, is so glorious a triumph of the divine goodness; that the soul which knows itself, and attentively looks on this far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, is astonished and humbled in the views of it, and finds it no small stretch of faith to be able to believe, that God does indeed intend it for so sinful a creature: so far is the believer from arrogating any thing of this kind to himself, as if his own faith had any degree of merit or excellence proportionable to it. But we must observe once more, to complete the argument,

3. That "there had been no room to mention faith at all in this affair, had not God graciously contrived such a method of salvation, and done that to effect it which none but himself could do."

Faith receives our Lord Jesus Christ; it is its great office and its great glory to do it. But how could it have received him, unless he had been given? and how could he have been given in this view, but by the appointment of the Father, in concurrence with his own free and most gracious consent? Faith apprehends and submits to the gospel plan of salvation by the obedience and sufferings of the Son of God; yea, it not only submits to it, but rejoices and glories in it. But who could have exhibited, who could have contrived, who could have executed, such a plan, unless it had been formed and determined in the counsels of eternal love?—Admit faith to be ever so voluntary, and, so far as is possible to a creature, ever so independent, an act, can we any of us say, that there was so much merit and excellency in that act, or in any of its subsequent fruits, that God upon the foresight of it should say, "These creatures, guilty and condemned as they appear, will be so ready to receive the intimations of my will, that they will fully deserve that I should save them at any rate; they will deserve, even that my Son should become incarnate, and die as a sacrifice, to make way for their happiness." Can any of you, Sirs, imagine this to have been the case? Or can you hear it even supposed, without finding something shocking in the very representation of it? The blessed Paul, I am sure, had very different views, when he said, God hath predestinated us to the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved. And the apostle John had other notions of it, when he said, full as his gracious heart was of the most lively sentiments of gratitude and zeal, Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.

These arguments would prove, that our salvation through faith is by grace, even though it could not be added, that this faith is the gift of God. How much more convincing then must the conclusion be, when that consideration is added to the rest!

But as the illustration of this, which was the third general we mentioned, will require more time than can properly be allowed to the remainder of this Discourse, I will reserve it to another; and conclude for the present with exhorting you seriously to examine, whether you have this principle of faith in your hearts, without which your salvation is, in present circumstances, an impossible thing, and with which, it is inviolably secure.

It is a melancholy, but most obvious, truth, that all men have not faith. There are thousands and ten thousands under the gospel, with regard to whom its ministers have reason to complain, Who hath believed our report, and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed? On whom has his power been so exerted, as to conquer the natural incredulity and obstinacy of their hearts? Are you, Sirs, of that number, or of the number of those, who, as the Scripture expresses it, have believed through grace? It is the question on which your eternal state will turn at last, and therefore you would do well to examine it now. And I would beseech you to endeavour to trace it—in its production,—and in its effects; or, in other words, to inquire,—how it has been introduced into your minds,—and how it has wrought there.—You may surely discover it in the one or in the other, if it be your prevailing character; and I hope many of you will be able to discover it in both.

(1.) Can you trace faith "in its production and advance in your souls?"

Do you recollect any time in which you had no thoughts of the Lord Jesus Christ, and no workings of affection towards him? And has there been any alteration in your minds in this respect? All true faith in Christ is founded on a conviction of sin, and of the misery to which you are exposed by it. Have you indeed been brought to this conviction? Have you heard, and (if I may be allowed the expression) have you felt, yourselves condemned by the sentence of a righteous, a holy, yea, of a merciful, God? And have you by that apprehension been stirred up to cry for pardon and deliverance? You have heard of Christ under the character of a Saviour; but I put it to your consciences, have you seriously viewed him under that character? and, from a full persuasion of his correspondency, when considered in this view, to all the necessities of your case, and all the exigences of your souls, have you entered into any treaty with him? Recollect it seriously. Have you ever presented yourselves before God, with a humble and cordial regard to Christ? And do you know what it is, secretly and sincerely to repose your souls upon the merit of his obedience, and the efficacy of his blood, with humble acknowledgment of your own guilt, with entire resignation of your own righteousness, as utterly unworthy of being mentioned before God, and with a cordial and joyful resolution to devote yourselves to his service as long as you have any being, and through time and eternity to testify your gratitude by a constant series of obedience?

If you can trace such a process of thought and experience as this, you have great reason to conclude that you experimentally know what faith is; and that through faith you are in the way to salvation. Yet it is always to be remembered, that faith is to be shown by its works. Give me leave, therefore, to further to inquire

(2.) Whether you can trace "the genuine effects of it in your heart and lives?"

You believe in Christ: but has that faith in him produced a continued and habitual intercourse with him? I speak not of an intercourse absolutely uninterrupted; for that the present state of human life will not admit. But has it produced frequently repeated and direct acts of application to him, and converse with him? One can hardly imagine, how it is possible for a true believer to allow these to be long and often intermitted; especially to such a degree, that days, and weeks, and months should pass, as if all the business between Christ and his soul were quite finished, and he and his Lord were parted by consent, till death, or some very urgent and extraordinary circumstance, renewed the interviews between them. I would ask further, Has this faith to which you pretend, produced a resemblance to Christ's example, and an obedience to his precepts, in the course of your lives? You know, that true faith is operative; and you know, in the general, the genius and design of Christianity. I would demand of your consciences, how far you comply with it? Is your temper and conduct in the main, such as you well know our Lord intended that the temper and conduct of his people should be? Is it devout and spiritual, just and charitable, sober and temperate, humble and cautious? Is religion your care? and do you maintain a habitual watchfulness over yourselves, that your behaviour may be agreeable and honourable to your profession?—Once more, are you ardently pursuing greater attainments in the Christian temper and life, so that you may be spoken of as hungering and thirsting after righteousness?

If you can answer such inquiries as these in the affirmative, you have a great deal of reason to hope that faith is yours, and salvation is yours. But if you cannot so answer them, a confident assurance that you shall be saved is so far from being faith, that it is presumption and folly; and, far from being any security to you, will only prove adding sin to sin. That confidence, by whatever name you may affect to call it, is indeed unbelief; unbelief of God's threatenings, while it vainly pretends to trust his promises: for he hath not more expressly said, that He who believeth on the Son, hath eternal life; than he has added, that He who is disobedient to the Son, shall not see life. While sin reigns in your life, and hereby appears to reign in your heart, did you pretend a revelation from heaven as to the truth of your faith, every wise man would conclude that pretended revelation was a delusion; and that how solemnly soever it might be ascribed to the Spirit of truth and holiness, it really proceeded from the father of lies.

Excuse the plainness, with which fidelity to God and to you obliges me to speak on this head; and be assured, that it proceeds from a real concern to secure the honour of that glorious doctrine of salvation by grace, which I have now been labouring to establish, and the demonstration and improvement of which I shall further pursue in the ensuing Discourse.

SERMON III.

SALVATION BY GRACE THROUGH FAITH.

EPHES. ii. 8.

For by grace are ye saved through faith: and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God.

In the works of nature, many of those things which to a superficial eye may appear as defects, will, on a careful inquiry, be found to be marks of consummate wisdom and kind contrivance. And on the same principle, I confess, I have often thought there is reason to be thankful for the very inaccuracies of Scripture. The haste in which the apostle Paul was, by the multiplicity of his affairs, obliged to write, has given us an opportunity of viewing more of his heart in his epistles than we might perhaps have seen, if he had frequently reviewed and corrected them. Those parentheses, in particular, and those repetitions, which render the style less elegant, and the sense sometimes less conspicuous, do nevertheless show to greater advantage how deeply those thoughts were impressed upon his mind, which he introduces in such a manner. And of this, the words which I have now been reading are an instance. In the course of his preceding argument, a few verses before, while he is telling the Ephesians that God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved them, even when they were dead in sins, had quickened them together with Christ, he adds, by way of parentheses, By grace ye are saved. And when he goes on to say, they were raised up together, and made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, he further tells them, that this was with an intention That in the ages to come God might show the exceeding riches of his grace, in his Kindness towards us, through Christ Jesus. Nay, his heart was so full of the subject of grace, free and astonishing grace, that, if all this was not enough, by a most glorious and emphatic tautology, (if I may be allowed so to speak,) he inserts the words of my text. By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God.

I have already shown you from these words, in what sense we may be said to be saved through faith: and I have also proved, that in consequence of this it is evident we must be saved by grace; since faith being incapable of satisfying the demands of God's injured justice, can much less merit such a recompence as eternal life: nor can it indeed have any efficacy, or any place at all in this affair, otherwise than by God's free constitution and gracious appointment. I then concluded with observing, that this argument would have a convincing force, even though faith were ever so entirely an act of our own; or that we had no more support or assistance from God in forming and exerting it, than we have in any of the common actions of natural life. But I am now to show, that even this is not the case; but, that a new proof of our being saved by grace arises from considering,

III. The argument which the apostle suggests in the close of the text, that even this faith is not of ourselves, but it is the gift of God.

I am sensible that some endeavour to invalidate and supersede all this part of the argument, by giving another turn to this last clause, referring it in general to our salvation by faith, as if it had been said, "Our being thus saved by grace through faith, (as I have just now said,) is not of ourselves, but it is the gift of God." But I apprehend, that an impartial reader would not be willing to allow of this interpretation, which makes the latter clause a mere repetition of what was said before, and a repetition of it in less proper and expressive words. None could imagine, that our being saved through faith was of ourselves; or that we ever could ourselves constitute and appoint such a way of salvation, which was indeed fixed so long before we had a being. But faith being really our own act, it was highly pertinent to observe, that the excellency of this act is not to be arrogated to ourselves, but is to be ascribed to God. All that are acquainted with the genius of the original, must acknowledge this is a construction which it will very fairly admit. And we shall prove in the process of this argument, that other scriptures expressly declare the truth, which this interpretation makes to be the meaning of the words.

Faith may be called the gift of God,—as it is God that reveals the great objects of faith,—that brings the mind to attend to them,—that conquers our natural aversion to the gospel method of salvation, and so implants faith in the soul;—and also as it is he, that carries it on to more perfect degrees, and improves its vigour and activity.

1. Faith may be called the gift of God, "as it is God who reveals the great objects of faith."

Human reason is but weak and imperfect, and has indeed interwoven the traces of its own weakness, with many of the fairest monuments of its strength. Even in its most advanced state, among the most learned and polite nations of antiquity, it is deplorably evident, how far it was from discovering the several branches of natural religion in its purity, extent, and order. And to speak freely, it shone more brightly in almost every other view, than in that which is its noblest end; I mean, what relates to God, and immortality. It has indeed produced many admirable poems, and composed many moving orations: it has woven many exquisite threads of argument, with which the subtilest disputants have entangled each other, and have often entangled themselves: and much more useful it has been, in adorning the face of the earth, in subduing the sea, in managing the winds, and meting out the heavens. But this rich vein of knowledge, this mine of holy and divine treasure, lies too deep for human discovery.—If any ask, where shall this wisdom be found, and where is the place of this understanding? It must be granted, that it is a path, which the vulture's eye hath not seen: man knoweth not the price thereof, neither is it found in the land of the living. The depth of human science says, It is not in me: and the sea, with all the most improved countries that lie upon it, must say, It is not with me: for eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. There were no principles on which to proceed, in the investigation of this important knowledge: none could ever have learned, that God had formed counsels of mercy and peace towards apostate creatures: none could ever, on natural principles, have discovered the very existence of the Son, and the Spirit: how much less then could they have known, or imagined, that the Son of God should have undertaken to redeem us with his own precious blood, and the Spirit be sent to manage affairs, as the great agent of the Redeemer's kingdom; in consequence of whose gracious acts and influences the soul should be savingly renewed and transformed, and then carried on with a growing pace in the way to heaven, till it was received to the separate state of holy and triumphant spirits at death, and to complete glory at the resurrection of the dead? All the men upon earth could never by their own natural sagacity have discovered any of these particulars; how much less then could the whole system have been discovered!—But God himself has graciously revealed them by his Spirit: and as he was pleased miraculously to interpose to give this revelation to the world; so he has interposed by remarkable providences to send to us such clear notices of it; and to send these notices so early too, as to throw the prejudice of education among us this way, rather than the contrary. And considering how powerful those prejudices are, and how many have fallen into ruin by them, this will appear no small matter to a considerate person: especially when he surveys the state of the world in general, and considers how few nations and countries there are, in which this is the case; and in what various forms of most pernicious and destructive errors the generality of mankind are trained up from their tenderest infancy.—I would conclude this head with observing, that "whatever particular advantages we have enjoyed, they are all to be traced up to the distinguishing goodness of God to us." If wise and pious parents, if skilful, zealous, and faithful ministers, have been the instruments of working faith in our souls, this also cometh forth from the Lord of hosts; who taught their minds to conceive, and their lips to speak, and who opened our hearts to receive instruction. And this leads me to add,

2. That as God reveals the great objects of faith, so "it is he also, that inclines the mind to attend to them;" on which account faith may be further said to be the gift of God.

The great objects of faith are, and by their nature must be, to us invisible; while those of sense strike so strongly on the mind, that it is no wonder we are apt often to forget the other. And when a man is conscious to himself, that the first recollection and acquaintance with them must be painful, and must be attended with remorse and fear, how necessary soever that pain may be, it is too natural to draw back from it. And we may easily conceive that Satan, the great enemy of men's eternal happiness, will exert all his artifices, to prejudice them against it, and to divert them from it. Accordingly I make no doubt, but that many of you, and especially young persons, have experienced this. You have found, that when you first began to be sensible you were in a lost and miserable state; when you began first to hearken to the tidings of deliverance by Christ, and to inquire into the way of salvation exhibited in the gospel; many circumstances arose to take off your attention from them. You found Satan endeavouring to steal away the good seed out of your hearts, lest you should believe and be saved, and joining the efforts of various of his instruments, to allure or to terrify you from religion. To what then will you ascribe it, that you have been able to break through all these snares? To what will you ascribe it, that when you had perhaps laboured to stifle convictions in your own hearts, they have returned upon you with greater power than before? and though you have endeavoured all you could to shift them off, yet you have found them every where pursuing you; keeping your eyes from sleep during the watches of the night, or breaking in upon you in the morning with the returning light; or following you, perhaps, into those scenes of business, or of vain conversation, to which you have fled as a refuge from them? You must undoubtedly ascribe it to the God of the spirits of all flesh, that you have thus been taught to consider your ways; and that your spirits have been so deeply impressed with concerns, which multitudes whom the world reckons among the wisest of mankind, are entirely thoughtless about, and which perhaps you yourselves were once among the first to despise.

3. Faith may be further called the gift of God, as "it is he that conquers the natural aversion which there is in men's hearts to the gospel method of salvation, when it comes to be understood and apprehended."

That method is so wise, so rational, and so gracious, that one would imagine every reasonable creature should embrace it with delight. Yet the degenerate heart of man draws its strongest objections against it, from those things which are really its greatest glory.

It is the way of humility, and of holiness; and a haughty and licentious heart rises against it, in each of these views. To be stripped of all the pride of human nature, to stand guilty and helpless before God, and, in an entire renunciation of all self-dependence, to seek righteousness and strength in another, is, to spirits naturally so arrogant as ours, a hard saying scarcely to be borne: to give up our own wills to be checked and controlled in all things by the divine authority, to engage in an habitual course of self-denial, to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, is hard indeed. No wonder, therefore, if we are taught in Scripture to acknowledge the agency and interposition of a divine hand, when this is wrought in us; when we not only feel some tendency of soul towards it, some transient and ineffectual purpose, but when a permanent principle of this kind is implanted in our hearts, so that our lives are governed by it. Hence the Scripture speaks of those, to whom it is given, not merely to hear of Christ, but to believe in him; and pathetically describes the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, as an energy of mighty power, like that which wrought in Christ when God raised him from the dead. When he lay a cold corpse in the grave, his blood drained out, and his side pierced to the very heart, think of that mighty energy which then reanimated your Lord; and you see an emblem of that, which raises us to a divine life, and enables us to act that life, in faith on a crucified and a risen Redeemer. Thus, as it is said in one place, that God gave to the Gentiles repentance unto life; it is also said in another, that he purified their hearts by faith; plainly implying, that there is in both an interposition of divine power. Now certainly if he implants this principle in our hearts, that salvation which he has connected with it must be entirely of grace: which will further appear, if we consider.

4. That "it is God who carries on this blessed work, and maintains this divine principle."

It is through much tribulation and danger, through much opposition and difficulty, that the Christian must enter into the kingdom of God. When he begins to set sail heaven-ward, the prince of the power of the air endeavours to raise those storms, which shall, if possible, oblige him to make shipwreck of faith, and of a good conscience: nevertheless, he must endure to the end, or he cannot be saved. And how is he enabled thus to persevere? Surely it is through the continued communications of divine grace to him; or, as the apostle with admirable propriety expresses it, He obtains mercy of the Lord to be faithful. It is by this means that he obtains the victory: and while he overcomes the world, and conquers the remaining corruptions of his heart, he must still humbly own, that in the one and the other instance, he is more than a conqueror through him that loved him. In short, he will be ready to acknowledge, that having obtained help of God, he continues to this day: and will mark out, as it were, the several stages of his journey, by erecting at the end of each a stone of remembrance and thankfulness, and saying, Hitherto the Lord has helped me.

And now, my friends, you may see the evidence of this great truth, that by grace we are saved through faith, appearing in its complete light: and permit me once more to repeat the summary of the whole argument, that it may be more deeply, and more distinctly, impressed upon your minds.—How much soever faith may be supposed to be our own unassisted act, so far as the act of any creature is unassisted, it could make no atonement to the injured justice of God,—and much less confer any obligation upon him to bestow on us eternal life;—nor had there been any room to mention it at all in the whole affair, if God had not contrived such a method of salvation, and done that to effect it which none but himself could do:—much more will it appear to be of grace, when we add, that faith itself is the gift of God,—as he reveals the great objects of it;—as he brings the mind to attend to them;—as he conquers the natural aversion of the heart to the gospel method of salvation;—and carries on the work of faith in the soul, till it ends in complete salvation. It now remains,

IV. That I conclude with some obvious, but useful, inferences from the whole.

And here now, if it is by grace that we are saved through faith, then certainly we may infer from hence,—that we have no reason to glory,—but should be thankful for the grace by which we are saved;—that we must wholly be without excuse, if we neglect this method of salvation:—that we should labour, therefore, that our faith may be increased and strengthened:—that even the weakest have encouragement to seek and to hope for salvation in this way;—and finally, that we should take heed, that we do not bring a reproach upon this doctrine by an irregular and licentious behaviour.

1. If we are saved by grace through faith, then it is certain, that "we have no reason to glory."

If it were possible a person should perform the most complete and perfect obedience, and so were justified by works, it is but only in a limited sense he would have any thing of which to glory before God; since even he must acknowledge, that it is God who works in him, both to will and to do, and by his gracious influences renders him capable of both: however he, in such a case, may in some measure glory, that he has done his best, and that his behaviour has all that merit, or all that excellence, which the behaviour of a creature in his circumstances could possibly have. But when the ungodly are justified, when we who have been transgressors in ten thousand aggravated instances are saved by grace through faith, of what shall we glory? Shall any of us glory, that we are saved by another, when even our receiving that other is what God hath brought us to by the renewing and sanctifying influences of his grace upon our hearts? When we had corrupted and undone ourselves, and were under a sentence of condemnation and wrath, we have embraced the gospel, that is, we have accepted the riches of the divine liberality and goodness exhibited in it: but shall a beggar glory, in having stretched out his hand to receive an alms? especially if it were given him by a generous and skilful physician, who before he bestowed that alms, had cured him of a disease, by which that very hand, now stretched out to him, had been benumbed and disabled? Let us rather enter into that just and amiable reasoning of the apostle Paul, and say, as he does, Of him, i. e. of God, are we in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: let no flesh therefore glory in his presence; but he that glories, let him glory in the Lord. And this leads me to infer,

2. That we have a great deal of reason to "be thankful, and to adore the grace by which we are saved."

If it is God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, that has shined in our hearts, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, let us bless the Lord who has showed us this light, and with a cheerful gratitude let us bind the sacrifice, as it were, with cords unto the horns of the altar: let us bless the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, who has blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ; according as he has chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love. I would call upon you this day to do it; to join with me, and with each other, in it. Praise the Lord, all ye his saints; be thankful unto him, and bless his name! Praise him, who graciously purposed your salvation, and predestinated you to the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself! Praise him, who rendered this purpose effectual, and wrought it out by a high hand and outstretched arm! Praise him, who gave his own Son to be a sacrifice for you, and to bring in everlasting righteousness! Praise him, who sent his Spirit, as the great agent in his Son's kingdom, to bring the hearts of sinners to a subjection to the gospel, and gently to captivate them to the obedience of faith! Praise him, who has revealed this glorious gospel to you, at so great a distance of time and place! Praise him, who has impressed your hearts with a disposition to regard it! Praise him, who has subdued your prejudices against it! Praise him, who, having implanted faith in your souls, continues even to this day to animate and support it!—Let all ranks and ages join in this cheerful song! Praise ye the Lord, ye that are rich in temporal possessions, if you have been enabled to renounce the world as your portion, and to triumph over it by this divine principle! Praise him, you that are poor in this world, if you are rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God has promised to them that love him! Praise him, you that are cheerful and vigorous, and capable of rendering him that active service which may speak the gratitude of your hearts towards him! Praise him, you that are weak and languishing, since his strength is made perfect in your weakness, and your infirmities illustrate the force of that faith which he has wrought in you! Praise him, ye youths who, with this guide and companion of your way, are setting forth in the journey of life with courage, and lifting up your feet in his paths! Praise him, ye aged saints, who stand on the borders of eternity, and live in a daily expectation, that you shall receive the end of your faith in the salvation of your souls!—Begin that work now, in which you are all so soon to join! Break forth into one joyful anthem, and sing, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name be all the praise of that salvation, which thou hast already begun in our souls, and which thy faithfulness has engaged to complete." Again,

3. If we are saved by grace through faith, then certainly "they who neglect such a method of salvation are highly inexcusable."

To be not only delivered from everlasting condemnation and ruin, but raised to the presence and enjoyment of God above, is so glorious an exchange, so important a prize, that it would be worth while to secure it at any imaginable rate, whatever was to be resigned, whatever to be endured, for it. But it is certain, that the more gracious the proposal and offer is, the baser and more criminal will the refusal be. Had some hard matter been proposed, should we not have done it? and how much rather, when the divine oracle only says, Wash and be clean? Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.—To you, my brethren, even to all that hear me this day, is the word of this salvation sent, and brought: let me address you, therefore, in the language of the apostle, and say, Take heed that you receive not the grace of God in vain; and let me add, Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation. Dare not to trifle in a business of such consequence; lest if you should neglect it even till to-morrow, there should be no room to repeat that declaration then. That God should ever offer salvation at all, and especially in such a method, is astonishing condescension and love; and every instance in which that offer is renewed, is a renewed miracle of mercy. But the day of the divine patience has its limits; and if you trifle beyond those limits, and know not that the goodness and long-suffering of God lead to repentance, this injured mercy will plead against you, and it will appear you have treasured up to yourselves wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God.

4. If we are saved through faith, then surely "we should labour, that this blessed principle may be strengthened in our souls."

The greater evidence we have of the sincerity of our faith, the greater assurance may we justly have of our interest in the gospel salvation; and the stronger our faith is, the clearer will the evidence of its truth be. Let us therefore emulate the character of our father Abraham, and make it our care, like him, to be strong in faith, thereby giving glory to God.—To this purpose let me address you, my Christian brethren, to be diligent and serious in attending the ordinances of divine institution, and especially that of hearing the word; for as the apostle observes, Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. And it is certain, the better we are acquainted with the word of God, the more shall we trace of its evidence; and it is probable, we shall also feel so much the more of its energy, awakening and confirming those internal acts of faith, which it is our duty with increasing vigour daily to renew: and I doubt not, but the experience of many that hear me, attests the reasonableness of this address.—Let me also exhort you, to seek after greater strength of faith by fervent application to God in prayer; as the disciples that came unto Jesus, and said, Lord, increase our faith. Plead, that your faith, in its original, and in its progress, is the work of God; and earnestly entreat, that his work may be perfected.—And to add efficacy to all, labour to the utmost to bring forth the genuine fruits of true faith, in all the branches of a holy temper, and an exemplary life. Thus show to all that are about you, your faith by your works; walking worthy of the vocation wherewith you are called, worthy of him that has called you to his kingdom and glory. For in proportion to the degree with which these fruits appear, it will be evident, there is life at the root; and you will find, that as the vigour of our limbs, so also that of our virtues and graces, will grow by use and exercise. And in this view let me observe,

5. That if we are saved by grace through faith, then "there is encouragement even for the weakest soul, to seek after this gospel salvation, and to hope it shall obtain it."

Give me leave here to address myself to those, whose hearts are impressed with their eternal concerns, but then feel their own manifold weakness, and perhaps may be discouraged (as young persons very frequently are) with observing the difficulty of religion. My brethren, if your hopes of justification were by the works of the law, whether the ceremonial or the moral law, these discouragements were just: since were all the sins of your former life forgiven upon your return to God, yet through the infirmities of human nature, and the temptations of life, you would no doubt quickly fall into some new transgression; and this one, even the least, would be sufficient to ruin you, and to bring you into condemnation again. But the righteousness of faith speaks an easier and more gracious language, when it says, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. You know of whom it was said, A bruised reed will he not break, and smoking flax will he not quench: why should you not then enter into a treaty with so mild, so gracious, so compassionate a Saviour? Nay, I will add, why should you not be saved by him? Are you willing to accept his grace? Methinks, I hear one and another reply, "What do I desire so much, as to accept it? Feeble and guilty as I am, I would at least bow as low as any of thy servants, in a thankful acknowledgment of the riches and freedom of thy grace; and I would ascribe my salvation to it in as entire a renunciation of all self-dependence, as any of them all should do." And when I ask, (as it is necessary I should ask,) are you also willing to bow to his yoke? I persuade myself, there are those of you, whose conscience answers, "Lord, I would take it upon me, with a most thankful consent: I desire nothing so much, as to serve thee; but I suspect this treacherous and inconstant heart, that is so ready to forsake thee." My brethren, this desire of serving him, if you know what you say when you express it, is the effect of his grace; and it is a comfortable token, that he will give more grace. Set yourselves therefore, with a cheerful courage, to oppose those difficulties that lie in the way, and to work out your own salvation with hope and joy, as well as with fear and trembling; for it is God that even now is working in you, both to will and to do, of his good pleasure; and you have abundant reason to hope, he will not forsake the work of his own hands.

6. If the doctrine of salvation by grace through faith be so divine and important as we have heard, then "let us take heed that we do not bring a reproach upon it, by an irregular and licentious behaviour."

Let the holy apostle, who is the great asserter of this doctrine, be heard as the guardian of its honour, when he says, Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid! You plainly see, that this doctrine, when Scripturally explained as above, gives no rational foundation, no, nor even any plausible excuse, for such an inference, however the corruption of men's hearts may take occasion from it. And it would be far more reasonable, and much less detrimental to mankind, to endeavour to root up all the vines in the world, and destroy all the animals intended for food, because wine and flesh are sometimes the occasions and instruments of luxurious riot; than to deny this important doctrine, because it may be perverted to purposes unfriendly to practical religion. But see you to it, my friends, that you, if you are persuaded this is the doctrine of God, behave in such a manner as to show, that you perceive it to be, what indeed it is, a doctrine according to godliness. Woe to that man, by whom, in this instance, the offence comes! It had been better for him, that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea, than that he should occasion such dishonour to God, and bring such a reproach upon his truths and his ways. And give me leave to say, there is hardly any consideration in the world, that should cut deeper into the heart of the truly good man, of one who has tasted that the Lord is gracious, and has believed through grace, than the reflection of having made such unworthy and ungrateful returns to God, for that singular mercy which he has obtained from him, in the provision which the gospel has made for his salvation in so gracious and so endearing a way.

Let me therefore conclude, with charging you in the most solemn manner, before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the honour of that gospel you so strenuously profess, that you exercise a holy watchfulness over yourselves in this respect. Consider, my brethren, how many eyes are upon you for evil. It is true indeed, that charity, that boasted name, that divine principle, would teach men another lesson: it would teach them to mourn, rather than to triumph, over the faults of them that call themselves Christians. But there is very little of that to be found, and on the contrary, a great deal of that carnal, sensual, and diabolical zeal, which rejoices in iniquity, and takes the greatest pleasure in the irregularities of those whose failings ought most to be lamented, that is, of those who are most signalized by a Christian profession. Remember therefore, and consider, my friends, that it would be far better for you to die, than to lay a stumbling-block in the way of the souls of men; and to give them any just cause for representing the gospel as a doctrine of licentiousness, or speaking of Christ as the minister of sin.

You solemnly renounce all dependence upon your own righteousness before God; and in professing to do it, and to expect salvation by his grace alone, you do well. But give me leave to say, that if in the mean time you yourselves are found sinners, allowing yourselves habitually in any thing contrary to the divine will, the renunciation of such a righteousness as is consistent with that, will be a very unworthy kind of sacrifice before God, and do very little credit to your profession before men. And by these declarations, when compared with so bad a conduct, you will run a great risk of bringing your religious notions themselves into disgrace, and will probably build again that which you seem most solicitous to destroy. Let it therefore evidently appear, that the grace of God which appears unto all men, has effectually taught you to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. Let the whole world about you see, that the divine goodness to you, in which you rejoice and glory, has had its efficacy, to purify and humanize your hearts, to fill them with humanity and universal love, and to inspire them with a most friendly, benevolent, generous care for the happiness of all around you, as well as with a generous concern to make your own calling and election sure. Nothing will so powerfully plead for the gospel, as such a care to adorn it, and to seek that salvation which is entirely of grace, through sanctification of the Spirit, as well as the belief of the truth.

SERMON IV.

CHRIST'S INVITATION TO THIRSTY SOULS.

DEDICATION.

To the Reverend Mr. James Hervey.

Reverend and dear Sir,

It may perhaps surprise you, that amidst the familiarities of our intimate friendship I should, without any previous notice, address you thus publicly from the press. I am not without some apprehension that your modesty may be a little distressed on the occasion; but I am persuaded, you will on the whole forgive the desire I had, that all, to whom this little piece may come, should know, what most who are personally acquainted with us both already know, that I most highly esteem you, and most affectionately love you; and that no diversity in our professions and forms could prevent our entering into the strictest bonds of friendship, or make me unwilling most openly to profess it, and to perpetuate the memory of it, while this shall remain.

I am sorry to say, the temper that generally prevails is of such a nature, as to prohibit intimacies of this kind, and too frequently to occasion aversions, where there is no other cause of them than a variety of religious sentiments and practices. But it is our happiness, that we apprehend that temper to be as unreasonable as it is unlovely. And surely all thinking men would see it in the same view, if they would but seriously compare the importance of those things wherein we agree, with that of those in which we differ; especially if they would further reflect, that the very same principles under different views promote, in conscientious men, those different practices, which, forgetting those principles, fundamental as they are to all true religion, the professors of it are so apt to contend about.

You, my pious and honoured friend, being (I doubt not) in your own mind persuaded, that diocesan episcopacy is of divine original, and that the church hath authority to decree rites and ceremonies, and to determine controversies in matters of faith, have solemnly declared that belief: and in consequence of it, have obliged yourself to render canonical obedience to those, whom you thereby acknowledge as governing you by an authority delegated from Christ; that thus you may be subject to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake, and thereby approve your submission to him. I have declined that subjection, not from any disrespect to the persons of the established ecclesiastical governors, many of whom I hold in the highest esteem, and number among the most distinguished ornaments of our common Christianity,) and least of all from any unwillingness to yield subjection, where I apprehend Christ to have appointed it: for so far as I know my own heart, it would be my greatest joy, to bow with all humility to any authority delegated from him. But I will freely tell you and the world, my nonconformity is founded on this, That I assuredly believe the contrary to what the constitution of the Church of England requires me to declare, on the above-mentioned heads, and on some others, to be the truth: and I esteem it much more eligible, to remain under an incapacity of sharing its honours and revenues, than to open my way to a possibility of obtaining them by what would in me, while I have such apprehensions, be undoubtedly an act of prevarication, hypocrisy, and falsehood; reverencing herein the authority of God, and remembering the account I must shortly give up in his presence.

Thus, Sir, on the whole, we both choose what we apprehended God requires: we both adhere to that discipline, which we believe to have been primitive; or where you give it up in some instances, it is with an upright desire, I doubt not, of conforming to what you judge to be the leading and most important articles: but we both desire, that the communion of the church may be pure, and the form of its discipline and worship truly apostolical; and would exert the power, of which we each of us think ourselves regularly possessed, to make and keep it so; though we do not estimate our respective powers alike. We pray in different words and manners; we preach in different habits, we receive the sacred supper in different postures: but we both preach repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, regeneration and sanctification by his Spirit, and subjection to his laws, and particularly to that distinguishing law of mutual love. We both address the same God, in the name of the same Mediator, and the great blessings we ask, are in the main the same. We both commemorate the death of Christ as our propitiatory sacrifice, resting our own souls, and directing our people to rest theirs, on the atonement he hath made, and the complete righteousness which he hath wrought. Thus joining in love to him as our common Saviour, and living the life which we live in the flesh by the faith of the Son of God, we are both waiting for his salvation; expecting that ere long our spirits will be joined, in the general assembly and church of those who die in the Lord; (that assembly where perfect knowledge and love cement in everlasting bands the souls that once differed, as widely as they could differ who were one in Christ;) where we hope, through divine grace, to share ages of delight, till our bodies shall be in the same moment borne from the dust, to inherit in our complete persons the everlasting kingdom of our heavenly Father. And in the mean time, why should it be thought strange, that amidst so many endearing bonds of union, our thoughts are hardly at leisure to recollect the little circumstances in which we differ? Surely the part we are acting under these different denominations, is far more pleasing to God, more comfortable to ourselves, and more edifying to the world, than if you, dear Sir, were to set at naught your brother for his nonconformity, or I to judge mine for his conformity: and we were to infect, not to say, poison the streams of God's sanctuary, where we respectively preside, with the bitterness of contention, censure, and reproach.

I assuredly believe, my worthy brother, that in what I have now been writing with so unusual a freedom, and in what I thought I might in this connexion write with some peculiar advantage, I have uttered your sentiments as well as my own. And surely, were they more generally to prevail, the face of our religious interests in Great Britain would wear a more pleasing and more hopeful aspect. Were our hearts thus filled with a desire of approaching to each other, and disposed on one hand and the other to sacrifice, as far as with a safe conscience we could, the circumstances that divide us, where we are divided, love might perhaps find means of union, at present unthought of by most. Or in the mean time, our worshipping in different places under different forms, might be no more pernicious to the peace and prosperity of the church, than our worshipping in different places, according to the same ritual, which the greatest imaginable uniformity cannot possibly prevent, till we all come to the general assembly, and join the innumerable multitude that surround the throne of the Lamb, in that celestial temple, to which, with all the people of God below, we daily aspire.

To this blessed end I trust, through divine grace, our prayers, our discourses, our writings, and our examples will still be tending; and blessed be God, that there are so many excellent persons in both communions, whose hands and hearts are joining with ours in the prosecution of it. May their numbers, their zeal, and their charity, be daily growing! And may God establish your health, dear Sir, which is now in so tender a state, that you may long be capable of bearing your important part in so noble a work; that the parish in which you labour, or some other that may afford you a yet larger sphere of usefulness, may be happy to distant years in your edifying sermons, and in those private instructions which you are, with so exemplary, and, O that I could not say, with so uncommon, a zeal, adding to those which you address to them from the pulpit! Be assured, Sir, that no man living can more sincerely rejoice in the acceptance of your labours, and particularly in that great and general admiration in which your pious and excellent Contemplations are so justly held, by persons of almost every rank and genius, education and profession; so that the warmest friendship can hardly dictate a higher wish relating to them, than that they may be as useful as they are delightful to all your readers.

As for the Sermon, with which I here present you, it was preached near twenty years ago, and has long lain by me transcribed among several others, which I have prepared for the press, that if surviving friends should desire it, they may be offered to the world after my death. It is now published at the importunate request of a worthy member of the established church, to whom in the intimacy of our friendship it had been communicated, and who has himself been very deeply impressed with the representation of the important truths which are handled in it. My obligations to him, and my regard for his judgment, would not permit me to dispute such a point with him: and I was the more ready to comply with his desire, as something of a peculiar blessing seemed to attend the Discourse, when delivered from the pulpit; and that to such a degree, as I do not know to have been equalled by any other sermon I ever preached. This encourages me to hope that, plain as it is, and destitute of almost every charm that might recommend it to a modern taste, the perusal of it may be useful towards promoting the great end of the Christian ministry; which undoubtedly is, to bring men to a proper application to that compassionate Saviour whose overflowing goodness is here celebrated, and by that means to lead them to every grace and virtue, as the genuine fruit of faith, and of that love which will naturally be connected with it. I will not call this the grand secret of reforming the world; for blessed be God, it is not a secret, but it is the mighty instrument, which divine mercy has put into the hands of the ministers of Jesus, to accomplish ends which all the wisdom of ancient and modern philosophers has attempted in vain: and God is to this day bearing testimony to the word of his grace. Yes, dear Sir, I will never be ashamed to confess it, that I have the joy to see, in your assemblies and in ours, that where these doctrines are faithfully and effectually preached, they rise, like the warm beams of the sun on the face of the earth, benumbed by the rigour of winter; and call forth into verdure, beauty, and fragrancy, a thousand excellent productions, the very seeds of which would otherwise have perished. Renew, my worthy friend, the ardour of your prayers, that the God of the spirits of all flesh may every where excite a multitude of enlightened and animated witnesses, to these vital truths of his everlasting gospel; and that his blessing may attend every effort for the advancement of this sacred cause: and particularly, that it may, notwithstanding all its imperfections, attend this humble attempt, from the hand of,

Reverend and dear Sir, your affectionate brother in the work of the Christian ministry, and ever faithful friend and servant,

Northampton, Sept. 18, 1748 P. DODDRIDGE.

JOHN vii. 37.

In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink.

ALL the words of our blessed Redeemer deserve our very serious regard; for, his enemies themselves being judges, never man spake as he did. But there is something in the words now before us, which may justly challenge a peculiar attention; as they were not spoken in ordinary converse, or to a little circle of domestic friends, but delivered in the temple, with a loud voice, on a solemn day, and in the midst of a very numerous assembly. In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, or made proclamation, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink.

It is plain from the second verse, that the feast here spoken of is the feast of tabernacles; which was instituted in commemoration of God's giving the law to Israel, and conducting them through the wilderness, where they dwelt in tents. The feast lasted eight days; most of the former of them were spent in tabernacles or arbours made up of branches of the most shady trees, and adorned with the finest flowers and fruits which that delightful country afforded in the month of September. It is not improbable, but on all these days the pious worshippers would sometimes quit these pleasant retreats, to attend the services of the temple: but it was the express command of God that the whole eighth day should be spent there, that being a holy convocation, on which, besides other institutions then to be attended, the whole law was to be read over in the audience of all the people, from the original copy which was laid up in the holy of holies. This was the last day, that great day of the feast, which the evangelist mentions in the words before us.

The Jewish writers assure us, that towards the latter end of their commonwealth, they had a peculiar ceremony on this day, to which our Lord may probably here refer. After they had surrounded the altar seven times, with palm branches in their hands, and hosannas of praise, some of the Levites used to pour out, in the court of the temple, a considerable quantity of water, drawn from the fountain of Siloam; the people in the mean time singing those words of Isaiah, With joy shall they draw water out of the wells of salvation. It is very probable they did this as a token of their expectation and desire of the Messiah's appearance, who was to sprinkle many nations, to pour water on him that was thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground.

It was probably during the time of this ceremony, or immediately after it, that our Lord stood up, perhaps on some eminence, (as the priest who made his libation did,) and cried or proclaimed with a loud and distinct voice, these gracious and important words, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink, q. d. "You all believe the promises of the Messiah, and you have invented this rite as a token that you expect his coming, and long for the effusion of the Spirit, which is then to be bestowed. Behold in me the person whom you profess so eagerly to expect. He that believeth in me, as the Scripture hath in effect said in many places,* (or he who has that faith in me which the Scripture requires,) out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water, i. e. he shall receive the communications of the Spirit in such abundant degrees, as shall not only be refreshing to himself, but shall render him capable of administering, in the freest and most plentiful manner, to the comfort and edification of others. So richly shall he be furnished with its gifts and graces, that spiritual instructions and consolations shall flow from him † like water from a fountain, which branches itself out into mighty rivers." Thus the evangelist himself teaches us to expound these words, when he says, verse 39, This he spake of the Spirit which they who believed on him should receive.

Our Lord speaks of the Spirit here: but we must remember that it is not in an abstracted view, as separate from, but as in conjunction with, the other blessings of his gospel, and as preparatory to a state of eternal happiness. And therefore these words, in which the blessed Jesus expresseth his ability and readiness to bestow the Spirit, do evidently imply that he is both able and willing to impart all the blessings of this gospel, to all those who do sincerely desire them; and this without any exception. A glorious truth! The epitome of the gospel, and the hope and life of our souls! Which, in a humble dependence on divine influences, I shall now endeavour to illustrate and confirm. I will,

I. Show you that the springs of the most valuable blessings are in Christ.

II. Prove that he is not as a fountain sealed, but diffuses these streams with a divine freedom, and in the richest abundance, for the relief of every thirsty soul.

III. I shall add some practical reflections.

I. I am to show you, that the springs of the most valuable blessings are in Christ; so that he is abundantly able to refresh the thirsty soul.

My brethren, I may say in the name of my great Master, as was said to Israel of old, Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it. Extend your desires to the utmost boundaries that are consistent with reason and piety, and from him you may receive the most copious supply; for he is able to do exceedingly abundantly above all that we can ask or think.

I will not enlarge on the general proof of this fundamental truth, which so often occurs. I will not speak particularly of the fulness of Godhead which dwells in him bodily; nor of that communicated fulness which is treasured up in him as Man and Mediator, by the pleasure of the Father, of which we have all received even grace for grace, i. e. an abundance of grace. I aim, in my present Discourse, not so much at enlightening the understanding, in the evidence of a doctrine so universally allowed amongst all professing Christians; as at affecting your heart and my own, with a sense of what, even while we acknowledge, we are all so prone to forget.

Let me entreat you then to reflect, on this occasion, what are those blessings which a rational soul would most eagerly desire, most ardently thirst after. You will immediately reply, if you know God and yourselves, "We are guilty creatures, and we need a pardon; so need it, as to be for ever undone without it. We are naturally indigent and dependent, and we need an interest in the constant paternal care of the great Author of our being. We are polluted, weak, and disconsolate, and we need the energy of the divine Spirit, to purify, to strengthen, and to revive us. We are immortal creatures, on the borders of the grave, through which we are shortly to enter on the eternal world; and therefore we need, and cannot but earnestly desire, an interest in that future and unchangeable happiness." My friends, if this be your judgment, it is according to truth: may these desires be continually growing in your souls! for, be the thirst ever so impatient, the streams which flow from this living fountain are abundantly sufficient to relieve it.

1. Do you thirst for the pardon of sin? From the Lord Jesus Christ you may receive a supply.

Inconsiderable as this may seem to the careless sinner, whose eyes are sleeping the sleep of death, to the enlightened soul it cannot but appear of infinite importance. When once convictions take hold of the heart; when the sacred law of the eternal God is thrown open in all its extent and all its purity, and conscience charges us with our violations of it, when that awful hand appears to write Tekel against us, Thou art weighed in the balance, and found wanting, no wonder if trembling and astonishment seize us: no wonder if even our joints are loosed, and our knees smite one against another, when angry Omnipotence appears, as it were, rising against us in all its terrors, and hell seems to open its mouth to devour us. Well may other cares and passions be lost in this, as the rustling of a leaf in the report of thunder. Accordingly, the awakened sinner is represented as inquiring, not after a blessing out of the corn-floor and the wine-press, not saying, What shall I eat,

* For I do not apprehend, with Mr Whiston, that our Lord refers to some passage that is lost.

† Out of his belly, i. e. from within him—Heart, mind, conscience. Comp. Job xx. 35. Their belly, i. e. mind, prepareth deceit. Job xx. 20. He shall not feel quietness in his belly, i. e. his conscience. Prov. xx. 27. The candle of the Lord searcheth the inward parts of the belly, i. e. mind. Ibid ver. 30. Stripes cleanse the inward parts of the belly, i. e. Afflictions may be the means of purifying the soul.

and what shall I drink, and wherewithal shall I be clothed? but as possessed by other thoughts, which now appear of infinitely greater moment. Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the most high God? He is represented as willing, if possible, to purchase a pardon, not only at the expense of the most costly offerings, with thousands of rams, and ten thousands of rivers of oil, were they at his disposal, but with a sacrifice abundantly more precious than these; Shall I give, says he, my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? David speaks of himself as thirsting for pardon, when he says, under a sense of guilt, Whilst I kept silence my bones waxed old, through my roaring all the day long; for day and night thy hand was heavy upon me, my moisture was turned into the drought of summer. It was like an envenomed arrow shot into his soul, the poison of which diffused itself through all his veins, and even drank up the vital spirits.

Now if any of you have felt, or do now feel, this raging thirst, if you experimentally know that restlessness of mind which is the inseparable attendant of such a circumstance, it must be matter of joy to hear that the blessed Jesus can allay these eager desires, can sweetly compose the soul in the midst of these painful agonies, by that blood of sprinkling which speaks better things than the blood of Abel. We are expressly told, that in him we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of our sins; that God hath exalted him to be a prince and a Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins; and that by him we may be justified, not only from the slighter irregularities of life, but from the greatest enormities of it, even from all those things from which we could not be justified by the law of Moses; for which that dispensation appointed no expiatory sacrifices, but condemned the offender to die without mercy.

2. Do you thirst for the favour of God? Our Lord Jesus Christ is able to introduce you to it.

It is most evident, that this is in its own nature infinitely desirable; and when the eyes of a man's understanding are enlightened, it will undoubtedly appear so. "And is there," will he immediately cry out, "is there indeed a Being of infinite perfection and glory, the overflowing eternal fountain of happiness? And will he communicate of himself to mortal and to sinful creatures? Will he not only sheathe the flaming sword of his vengeance, but extend the golden sceptre of his grace? Will he not only sign the pardon of such ungrateful rebels, but even adopt them into the number of his children? How does my soul long to look upwards, and call him my Father! Happy creatures, whom he admits into such a relation! to whom he reveals himself under so endearing a character! Happy creatures indeed, that can go out and come in, that can lie down and rise up, under the impression of this glorious transporting thought, God is ever surrounding us with his favourable presence, is ever with us as a father and a friend! O that this happiness were mine! How rich should I be in such a portion, though I were stripped of my earthly all, and sent out hungry and hardly bestead, to seek my bread in desolate places! Let unthinking wretches say, Who will show us any temporal good; but while I have a voice to express, and a soul to form, a desire, this shall be its language, Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon me!"

This, my friends, is the tendency of the soul to its proper centre; and as it is of all others the most natural, so in a sanctified heart it is of all others the most forcible and lively. Therefore this kind of desires is represented in Scripture, by the most eager and impatient thirst, even that of a hunted deer after refreshing streams: As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God: my soul thirsteth for God, for the living God; when shall I come and appear before God! And elsewhere, My soul thirsteth for God; my flesh longeth for thee, as in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is: "The thirsty pilgrim cannot long more for cooling streams, when parched up in a sandy desert, than I for thee." Nay, the ardour of his desire is represented as extorting a passionate cry, My heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God.

Do you, my friends, feel any such holy breathings? Can you adopt these pathetic words of David, as expressive of the inward sentiments of your soul? Blessed be God, they are not hopeless desires? The Lord Jesus Christ is the sacred channel, through which the waters of life flow, from the everlasting, inexhaustible fountain! It was the very business which he came into the world about, to establish a friendship between God and his apostate creatures. Therefore we are expressly told, that God hath made us accepted in the Beloved: and our Lord assures us, that he can introduce us to so great an intimacy with him, that it may properly be said, that he even dwells in our souls; If any man love me, he will keep my word; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him.

3. Do you thirst for the communications of the Spirit? The Lord Jesus Christ can abundantly relieve you.

Are you sensible of those pollutions, which have overspread your souls, and have sullied the original beauties of them? Are you mourning over a law in your members, which wars against that of your minds? Are you complaining of the weakness of your degenerate natures, that when to will is present with you, how to perform that which is good you find not? Are gloomy apprehensions arising in your minds in consequence of such disorders? Do you tremble under the fears of divine displeasure, already suspecting the safety of your state, or fearing lest you should lose what you have attained? It is evident you need the influences of the Spirit, whose office it is to purify, to invigorate, and to cheer the soul. Now it is from the Lord Jesus Christ that this Spirit is to be communicated, and therefore it is called the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ; and it is said, that of his fulness we have all received, even grace for grace, as I before observed. And for this very reason, because the Spirit was purchased by his blood, is treasured up in his hand, and dispensed by him; all the blessed operations produced by his agency are ascribed to Christ, by whom it is declared that the soul is sanctified, strengthened, and comforted. Christ of God is made unto us sanctification. I, says the apostle, can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth me. Our consolations abound through Christ. It was the more proper and necessary to insist on this, as the text doth so immediately relate to the supplies of the Spirit.

4. Do you thirst for the joys and glories of the heavenly world? The Lord Jesus Christ is able to relieve you.

One would think, it were absolutely impossible to believe them, and not ardently to desire a share in them. One would think, that when we have been taking the most transient survey of the land of promise, as delineated in the word of God, we should immediately cry out, as Moses in the views of an earthly Canaan, I pray thee let me go over, and see that pleasant land, which is beyond Jordan, even that goodly mountain and Lebanon. "It is delightful to view it from hence; but, O when shall I enter upon it! When shall I taste those pleasures of which I now hear, and drink of those refreshing streams which shine so beautiful in the distant prospect!" We, says the apostle, who are in this tabernacle, do groan being burthened, not that we may be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality may be swallowed up of life. And if we are thus thirsting for expected glory, to whom should we go but to that Redeemer, who has the words of eternal life. He is the Lord of both worlds, and heaven as well as earth is subject to his command. All power is given unto him, both in heaven and upon earth. Let him but give forth the sovereign word, and the golden gates, the everlasting doors, shall be lifted up to admit us, and a throne of glory erected, radiant and exalted, as he shall ordain. He therefore speaks of it as his peculiar office, and certain care, to prepare seats and abodes of felicity for his people in the invisible world, and at length to translate them thither. "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you: I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you to myself, that where I am there you may be also."

I hope this may be sufficient to prove, that the Lord Jesus Christ is able to satisfy the most important desires of the soul, and to allay its most eager thirst,—for the pardon of sin,—the favour of God,—the communications of the Spirit,—and the happiness of the future state. "It is true," will the humble soul say, "I firmly believe the springs of the most valuable blessings are in him; but have I any encouragement to hope that he will open them for the relief of so mean and so unworthy a creature as I?" This is the business of my second general, viz.

II. To prove, that the Lord Jesus is willing to communicate of these living streams with a divine freedom, for the refreshment of every humble soul who sincerely thirsts after them.

Blessed be God, there is a cloud of witnesses to attest a truth in which our hopes for time and for eternity are so nearly concerned. I appeal to the invitations, to the Spirit, to the tears, to the blood of the great Redeemer, and to the experience of every pious soul in heaven and on earth.

1. Let the invitations of Christ witness, that he is ready to relieve thirsty souls.

The gospel times are described in the prophetic writings, as times of extraordinary plenty, in which the most nourishing and delightful provision should be offered to all, in the most generous and liberal manner. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy wine and milk without money and without price." And if we look into the history of the evangelists, we shall see the prophecy accomplished in its fullest extent. For we shall there find our blessed Redeemer publishing the free and unlimited offers of his grace, to all that were willing to accept it. You cannot be strangers to the passages I refer to:—Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest: Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise, or on no account whatsoever, cast out: and in the text it is proclaimed, before the most numerous assembly, on a most public occasion, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink. Can any invitation be more general, more intelligible, more affecting, than these? Hardly should we have imagined it possible, unless we had in some respects seen yet more pathetic declarations than even those I have now recited. Yes, my friends, our Lord Jesus Christ knew the weakness of our minds, and seems to have been aware of a foolish scruple which might possibly arise in them. We might, perhaps, have been ready to say, "the blessed Jesus was indeed in a surprising degree tender and compassionate, whilst he dwelt on earth, and was himself surrounded with all the innocent infirmities of our nature: but can we be sure that he retains the same overflowing tenderness now he is returned to the regions of glory, and surrounded with all the dignity and pleasures of so exalted a station, and all the employments which attend so high an administration?" To obviate even this suspicion, ungrounded as it is, he has been pleased, since his ascension and exaltation, to send us repeated messages of love; and he speaks from the throne of his glory in as condescending and endearing language as he ever appears to have used in his humblest abasement. And to awaken our attention, and to confirm our faith, he introduces the declaration with a very solemn preface, of which the beloved disciple takes care to give us a particular account. He said unto me, Write, q. d. Let it be recorded for the instruction and consolation of the remotest ages; for these words which I am now about to utter, are true and faithful, and therefore may be entirely depended upon, as the foundation of the most cheerful confidence. And what are these important words? And he said, It is done: the great work is now accomplished, the redemption is complete: I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end, whose nature and promises are for ever the same; and in consequence of all this, I will give to him that is athirst, of the fountain of the water of life freely. To the same purpose are those remarkable words in the next chapter, so near the close of the canon of Scripture, I, Jesus, have sent mine angel, or messenger, to testify these things unto the churches, as things in which all the churches are most intimately concerned; and to give the greater weight to them, let it be remembered, I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star. And observe, whither so pompous an introduction tends, and where it centres: The Spirit and the bride say, Come: and let him that heareth say, Come; for whoever he be, he may join in proclaiming the invitation: Let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely. My brethren, had our Lord allowed us, as it were, to choose for ourselves, and to dictate to him in what words he should express himself to us, to silence every doubt, and to banish every fear, I cannot imagine that we could have found any more expressive form of speech than this, Whosoever will, let him come, and take of the water of life freely. And can we suspect, that the Lord of truth and of glory would speak a language foreign to his heart? that he would mock and delude unhappy mortals with insincere proposals and airy hopes! That be far from him, and the thought be far from us! Hath he spoken, and shall he not do it? Hath he promised, and shall he not make it good? But further,

2. Let the Spirit of Christ witness his readiness to relieve thirsty souls.

I know there is a great deal of difference betwixt the common operations of the Spirit on the minds of those who continue obstinate and impenitent, and those special influences by which he sweetly, but powerfully, subdues the hearts of those who are chosen in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world. Yet I am persuaded, that none to whom the gospel comes are utterly neglected by that sacred agent. It is observable to this purpose, that Stephen charges it upon the Jews, that they and their fathers had always resisted the Holy Ghost. Now, this charge of resisting him plainly supposed, that he had still been striving with them; for, if there had been no attempt on the one hand, there could have been no resistance on the other. If, then, the Spirit of God wrought in some degree on all the Jews, throughout every age and period of their state, it seems highly reasonable to believe, that he works on those who enjoy the gospel now; since this dispensation, with special reference to the extraordinary effusions of the Holy Ghost, is called by the apostle, The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus.

For the further confirmation of this, I question not but I might appeal to the experience of every one that hears me this day. Surely none of you that are come to years of discretion, have always been unaffected with divine things. Some impressions have been made, some convictions awakened, some purposes formed: and in all these instances God is drawing you, and the Spirit says, Come. Now, as the Spirit operates under the direction of the Lord Jesus Christ, these calls of the Spirit are to be considered as evidences of that readiness in Christ to bestow the blessings of the gospel, which I am now endeavouring to prove.

3. Let the tears of Christ witness his readiness to relieve those who hunger and thirst after righteousness.

If we have not some very inveterate suspicion of a person's insincerity and artifice, we readily believe, that his heart is touched when we see the tears flow from his eyes. Behold then the tears of a Redeemer over perishing souls, and judge by them of the compassions of his heart! You know that celebrated instance, when he beheld Jerusalem and wept over it. Our Lord was then in a triumphant procession, attended by acclamations of the people, who were shouting, Hosanna to the Son of David: and as for Jerusalem, which he beheld from the mount of Olives, it was a city polluted with enormous crimes, and the abode of his most implacable enemies, who were then actually conspiring his murder, which he knew they would in a few days effect. Justly might he have triumphed in that approaching ruin, which he knew a righteous God would bring upon them, for that as well as their other provocations. But behold his compassion! Instead of insulting, he weeps over them, and says, If thou hadst known, even thou, in this thy day, which even yet is continued, the things that belong to thy peace!—but now they are hid from thine eyes. The natural broken language of genuine and overflowing sorrow! Surely nothing can be more melting, than such tears, falling from such eyes, and in such circumstances. And if our Lord could not give up the impenitent sinners of Jerusalem without weeping over them, surely he will not despise the humble and penitent soul, who is, perhaps with tears, seeking his favour, and flying to his grace as his only refuge.

4. Let the blood of Christ witness, that he is ready to impart the blessings of his gospel.

The tears of our blessed Redeemer must needs be convincing and affecting, if the mind be not sunk into an almost incredible stupidity; but his blood is still more so. View him, my brethren, not only in the previous scenes of his abasement, his descent from heaven, and his abode on earth; but view him on mount Calvary, extended on the cross, torn with thorns, wounded with nails, pierced with a spear; and then say, whether there be not a voice in each of these sacred wounds, which loudly proclaims the tenderness of his heart, and demonstrates beyond all possibility of dispute or suspicion, his readiness to relieve the distressed soul, that cries to him for the blessings of the gospel. He died to purchase them, not for himself, but for us; and can it be thought he will be unwilling to bestow them? We may well conclude that he loved us, since he shed his blood to wash us from our sins; for greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends; but he hath commended his love towards us, hath set it off by this illustrious and surprising circumstance, that while we were strangers and enemies, he hath died for us.

5. Let the experience of every pious soul, whether on earth or in heaven, witness the readiness of Christ to communicate the blessings of his gospel for the relief of those who thirst for them.

Could we lift up our eyes to the regions of glory, and count all the happy spirits which are arrived there from these abodes of darkness and sorrow, we should find in each of them an everlasting witness, and monument, of the great truth I am now labouring to assert. Should we behold them in their robes of majesty, with their golden crowns, and their victorious palms, and inquire, as the apostle did, Who are these that are clothed in white robes, and from whence do they come? The answer would be the same: These are they who are come out of great tribulation, and they have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. They have found him both a powerful and a compassionate Saviour, and therefore they are fixed in a state of undecaying felicity. And some of them could confess even the blackest crimes, committed before they were brought to an acquaintance with him; but they were no bars in the way of that grace, which is extended and magnified, even to the chief of sinners.

The experience of the saints in heaven witnesseth this; and the experience of the saints on earth doth as it were echo back their testimony. Would you have living and visible witnesses? Blessed be God, they are not wanting: I hope, I may add, they are not far distant; and with regard to many of you that hear me this day, I hope and trust, that you have the witness within you. I doubt not, but several in this assembly may say, As we have heard, so have we seen and felt: many a one, that may lay his hand on his breast, and cry out in the words of the Psalmist, This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and delivered him from all his trouble, from that which was incomparably more than all the rest. "Oppressed with a burthen of grief and of fear, I threw myself at the feet of a Redeemer, and he gently raised me; he kindly embraced me; he smiled upon my soul, and said, by the voice of his blessed Spirit, Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee." What can we oppose to such a cloud of witnesses? Let us cheerfully admit the evidence. Let us joyfully trust the power and the grace of him, who this day renews his compassionate invitation, and says, and crieth, as in the text, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink.

III. I conclude with a more particular application.

And here I would address myself,—to those who do not yet thirst after gospel-blessings,—to those who are now thirsting after them,—and to those who have already received some refreshment.

1. Let me apply myself to those who do not yet thirst after the blessings of the gospel.

And are there none of that character among you? Are there none in this assembly, who hear me with negligence and coldness, and know in their own conscience that the bent of their desires and pursuits is directed quite another way? My friends, I have a message from God to you; and I would entreat you, that you would suffer your consciences to answer these two questions, plain indeed, but of infinite importance,—Are not the blessings which Christ offers, worth thirsting for?—And is not the time approaching, when, if you persist in your present neglect, you will thirst for them in vain?

Are your souls sunk into so degenerate a taste, and are you so divested of the common reason of men, as not to see, that the blessings proposed are highly excellent, and well worthy the most ardent desire, and the most vigorous pursuit, of every guilty yet immortal creature! Is it not truly desirable, that our guilt should be cancelled, that the displeasure of God should be averted, and his favour secured! and that our souls should be purified, strengthened, and supported by divine consolations, now, until they are conducted to a state of everlasting happiness? Is it not desirable, that a creature made for a perpetual duration, should have some more stable and permanent happiness than this mortal life?

You know in your own consciences, that these things are truly desirable: and would to God you would seriously compare them with those vain cares, and those sordid pleasures, for the sake of which you neglect and despise them. How utterly contemptible would those cares and pleasures appear! How unworthy even of a mention or a thought when brought into such a comparison!

But let me further inquire, is not the time approaching, when you will thirst for these blessings in vain? You are now insensible of your need of them, and lose yourselves in a variety of amusing dreams, in which you fancy you are possessed of some considerable happiness. But, wretched creatures, in a few years at most death will awaken you; and then you will know the value of those blessings which you now despise; then you will feel an insatiable thirst after them. Your case will then appear exactly like that described by the prophet, As when a hungry man dreameth, and behold he eateth; but he awaketh, and is not satisfied; or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold he drinketh; but he awaketh, and behold he is faint, and his soul hath appetite. The appetites of your souls after those valuable refreshments will then be excited; but, alas! they will be excited only to torment you. It is a most melancholy case which is represented in the parable, of a poor creature, who, after he had passed his life in the midst of the most overflowing plenty, was at length plunged into a state of indigence and misery, from which he beheld Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom; and he cried, saying, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus that he may dip the tip of his finger in water and cool my tongue, for I am tormented in this flame. It seemed a very modest petition; he could hardly have asked a smaller favour than a drop of water, and there seemed something peculiarly mortifying, in receiving it from the finger of Lazarus; and yet you know, by the sequel of the story, that even this was denied him. This is the representation, which our Redeemer himself hath given us, of the condition of sinners in the eternal world: and will it not be a dreadful condition to you, especially when aggravated by those rivers of living water which once surrounded you, and by this gracious proclamation, so often repeated, and so often despised: If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink.

2. I would address myself to those who are now thirsting for the blessings of the gospel.

I hope, through grace, there are some such amongst you; some, whose thirst is excited by what hath now been spoken, and are borrowing the words of David, in a sublimer sense than that in which they were originally intended; O that one would give me to drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem! O that I might taste of those delightful streams which flow from the Rock of ages! To you, my friends, I would briefly say,—Consider the thirst you feel as a token for good,—and be importunate in your addresses to him who is so able and willing to grant a supply.

You may consider the thirst which you feel as a token for good. The generality of mankind despise these blessings: and why do you desire them? Surely you may consider these desires as of a heavenly original. It is the voice of Christ that is now speaking; it is the Spirit of Christ that is now pleading with your heart; so that I may say to you, as was said to the blind man in the gospel who was so earnestly begging a cure, Be of good comfort, rise, he calleth thee. What can therefore remain, but that you should immediately apply yourselves to him. Go directly, and plead the case with him. Prostrate thyself, O humble penitent; prostrate thyself before his throne, and say, "Blessed Jesus, thou that knowest all things, knowest that I thirst after the blessings of thy gospel. Thou seest that I most ardently long for the pardon of sin, the favour of God, the influences of thy Spirit, and the glories of thine heavenly kingdom. I am fully persuaded, that with regard to all these thou art able to do for me abundantly above all I can ask or think. And wilt thou not relieve me? Wilt thou not give me to drink? Wherefore, then, are thine invitations published in the gospel? Wherefore didst thou proclaim those gracious words, which have been this day so frequently repeated in thine house? Why does thy Spirit even now work upon my heart, and raise there this fervency of desire? Wherefore didst thou weep? Wherefore didst thou bleed? Wherefore didst thou die, if thou hadst no compassion for perishing sinners? But thou hast compassion; thou hast already extended it to thousands on earth and millions in heaven. Lord, I believe; help thou my unbelief! I throw myself at thy feet; nor can I fear I shall perish there, unless infinite power be weakened, and infinite love be exhausted." If but one soul return from the assembly with these sentiments, and these resolutions, all the labours of this day, and many former days, will be abundantly repaid; for that soul will surely be relieved, and God in Christ be glorified and exalted. And now,

3. I would conclude, with addressing myself to those who have already tasted these refreshments. With regard to such I would offer the following exhortations.

Be thankful for the refreshments you have already received. Bless God, that such merciful provision is made in the gospel, for the relief and comfort of necessitous creatures; and above all, be thankful, that you have been engaged to seek and to prize it, while so many are, as it were, dying for thirst, in the midst of these overflowing streams. It is said of Hagar, that when she was almost perishing in the wilderness, the Lord opened her eyes, and she saw a fountain of water. So it is in your case: the Lord hath opened your eyes, and therefore you have seen this fountain.

Be solicitous, that others may taste those refreshments which have been imparted to you. It is said of Hagar, in the passage cited above, that when God had discovered this supply, she not only drank herself, but gave to her child, and he also drank. So should you, my friends, be charitably concerned for the happiness of others as well as for your own. You that are parents should be concerned, that your children may drink; and you that are masters, that your servants may drink; and all, that your friends and neighbours may be refreshed. For, blessed be God, there is no danger of sinking this river by repeated plentiful draughts: still would it flow on, still would it overflow its borders, though not only we, but all the inhabitants of the earth, should not merely taste it, but live upon it. Which leads me to add,

Continue your application to Christ for further supplies. We are told, that the miraculous stream which flowed from the rock attended the Israelites in their various removes. They still drank of the Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ. Such are the waters that flow from the Rock of Ages; they do not only refresh the soul on its first conversion, but they afford it daily comfort and support. Be constant therefore in your applications to Christ, and diligent in the use of all appointed means for deriving influences from him.

To conclude all, long after the heavenly world, where you shall receive a more abundant supply. The waters which followed Israel through the wilderness, failed when they came into an inhabited land: but this river of life will never forsake the believer; it will flow with him sweetly through the dark valley of the shadow of death, till it spreads itself into wider and deeper streams, in the lovely regions of the heavenly Canaan. Thus are we told, that in the New Jerusalem the river of the water of life proceedeth from the throne of God and of the Lamb. And thus our Lord assures the woman of Samaria, Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but it shall be in him as a well of water springing up into everlasting life. What then remains, but that we each of us cry out, as she did, Lord, give us of this living water, that we may thirst no more, nor come, as now, to these ordinances to draw! Amen.

A HYMN

I.

THE Lord of life exalted stands,
Aloud he cries, and spreads his hands:
He calls ten thousand sinners round,
And sends a voice from every wound.

II.

"Attend, all ye that thirst, draw near,
And satiate all your wishes here!
Behold the living fountain flows
In streams as various as your woes!

III.

"An ample pardon here I give,
And bid the sentenced rebel live;
Show him my Father's smiling face,
And lodge him in his dear embrace.

IV.

"I purge from sin's detested stain,
And make the crimson white again;
Lead to celestial joys refined,
And lasting as the deathless mind.

V.

"Must I anew my pity prove?
Witness the words of melting love,
The gushing tear, the labouring breath,
And all these scars of bleeding death."

VI.

Blessed Saviour, I can doubt no more;
I hear, and wonder, and adore:
Panting I seek that fountain-head,
Whence waters so divine proceed.

VII.

Clear spring of life! flow on, and roll
With growing swell from pole to pole,
'Till flowers and fruits of paradise
Round all thy winding current rise!

VIII.

Still near thy stream may I be found
Long as I tread this earthly ground!
Cheer with thy wave death's gloomy shade,
Then through the fields of Canaan spread!

SERMON V.

THE GUILT AND DOOM OF CAPERNAUM

PREFACE.

Relative to the awful event of the second shock of an Earthquake, in London, March 8, 1749-50. The Sermon was preached at Salters Hall, August 20, 1749.

THIS plain sermon which I now offer to the public, was preached to a very large and attentive auditory, the last Lord's day that I spent in London, from such hints as my many engagements in town would permit me to prepare; and it was delivered, with those genuine marks of deep impression on my own mind, which often do more to command regard to a preacher, than any accuracies of composition. It was judged so suitable to the state of things in that city, by some who had long enjoyed opportunities of knowing it much better than myself, and for whose judgment I had a great regard, that I was immediately desired with some importunity to send it to the press: but I thought I had then sufficient reasons for putting a negative upon that request; especially arising from my desire of despatching, with all convenient speed, the remaining volumes of the Family Expositor; a work which, having finished in short hand, I am now transcribing for the press, and which I never intermit for one day. But what has so lately passed in London, has renewed such a solicitous concern in my mind for its inhabitants, amongst whom I have so large a number of valuable friends, that it has suggested to me the thought, and after a little deliberation the resolution, of doing that unasked, which before I had resolutely declined.

Considering the lethargic state of so many souls, I have long thought it the prudence of Christian ministers, to improve those public alarms, which remarkable providences may excite in the minds of considerable numbers, by renewing those plain and earnest remonstrances, which in calmer hours men are so ready to neglect. I doubt not, but whilst I was yesterday representing these things to my own congregation, that many of my brethren in the city (and I look on all the ministers of Christ as my brethren) were wisely availing themselves of the consternation into which so many were thrown on Thursday morning; and that very suitable things were said, of which some will soon be made public. Yet I cannot but hope, that the perusal of what so many hundreds heard, before an earthquake was thought of by them or by me, and when there was nothing uncommon to awaken an attention, may have its peculiar weight. I hope it will renew the impressions which were formerly made on the hearers, and communicate (as such truths are now so evidently suitable) the like impressions to many more. I know not, what I have myself been more awfully affected with any sermon I have published or preached: I may say, in a literal sense, that I have transcribed it with tears and trembling, and that horror hath taken hold upon me in the review of what is here represented. I am not aware of having made any material alteration in the substance of the Discourse, especially in its most interesting parts, though I cannot pretend to answer for it, that every sentence is just as it was delivered. But I hope that I shall be excused, if in the remainder of this Preface, I add a kind of supplement to the Sermon, and address myself to the inhabitants of London, (for whom I am under so many obligations to be tenderly concerned,) in such a manner as I might have done, had this Discourse been delivered among them immediately after that shock, by which I assuredly know that many were thrown into such great and just consternation.

You have now, Sirs, very lately had repeated and surprising demonstrations of the Almighty power of that infinite and adorable Being, whom, in the midst of your various harms and amusements, you are so ready to forget. His hand hath once and again within these five weeks lifted up your mighty city from its basis, and shook its million of inhabitants, in all their dwellings. The palaces of the great, yea, even of the greatest, have not been exempted; that the princes of the land might be wise, and its judges and lawgivers might receive instruction. And is not the voice of this earthquake like that of the angel in the Apocalypse, flying in the midst of heaven, and having the everlasting gospel, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him, and worship him that made heaven and earth? Who would not indeed fear him, who looketh on the earth and it trembleth, and in whose hand are its deep places?

I suppose what you have so lately felt to be the result of natural causes, but remember, they were causes disposed by Him, who, from the day in which he founded our island, and laid the foundations of the earth, knew every circumstance of their operation, with infinitely more certainty, than the most skilful engineer the disposition and success of a mine, which he hath prepared and directed, and which he fires in the appointed moment. And do not your hearts meditate terror? Especially when you consider how much London hath done, and even you yourselves have done, to provoke the eyes of his holiness, and awaken the vengeance of his almighty arm! The second shock was it seems more dreadful than the first; and may not the third be yet more dreadful than the second? So that this last may seem as a merciful signal to prepare—for what may with the most terrible propriety be called an untimely grave indeed; a grave that shall receive the living with the dead. Have you never read of streets, and towns, and cities, overthrown in a few moments, and of many thousands of inhabitants, great and small, who have gone down alive into the pit? And can you be secure, because these horrible devastations have hitherto happened chiefly in more southern climates, that they shall be confined entirely to them? Can any of you be secure, even while you are reading these lines, that the ground may not tremble and reel under you; that the houses already twice shaken within these few weeks, may not now fall and crush you beneath their ruins? And will any of you go on to forget God, and to make light of that eternal salvation which has so awful a counterpart in eternal destruction? Oh, think of what you have lately felt! And think, whether in that amazing moment you could have done any thing material to prepare for another world, if eternity had depended upon that momentary preparation! A shriek of wild consternation, a cry as you were sinking, "the Lord have mercy upon us!" would probably have been of very little significancy to those that have so long despised mercy, and would not have thought of asking it but in the last extremity; and yet nothing more could have been expected in the circumstance we have been supposing.

Let me then beseech those that have neglected religion, to think more attentively of it; and those that trifle in it, more seriously to lay it to heart. Let me beseech the families that call not upon God's name, to think how righteously judgment might be commissioned to enter the houses, where prayer cannot (after all the importunity so often used) be admitted as a guest. While yet you seem as it were to feel your whole city moving, let me take so uncommon an opportunity of reminding you all, how important it is to secure a kingdom that cannot be moved, to secure everlasting habitations to receive you there, since your dwellings here, how strong and magnificent soever, are thus evidently precarious. I am well aware, that terrors alone are not sufficient to introduce the Lord Jesus Christ, and the efficacy of his gospel, into your hearts; but like the awful ministry of John the Baptist, they may prepare his way. An external reformation they may more probably produce; and whatever some may have incautiously asserted to the contrary, I cannot but think that is one considerable step towards the other. If therefore this alarming convulsion of the earth, which has made your houses totter, may so far shake your hearts, as to procure a remedy to the most crying evils, I shall hope, not only that the further judgments of God on so sinful a nation may be diverted, but that many who have been disobedient to the wisdom of the just may be found, in the noblest and most important sense, a people prepared unto the Lord. We may cheerfully hope it, —if the great will exert themselves to remedy the visible contempt of public and domestic worship, the undisguised violation of the sabbath both at home and abroad, and that licentiousness of behaviour so common among their servants, which generally renders those profligate creatures the shame of their masters' houses, the nuisance of the neighbourhood around them, and the scourge and ruin of the families they afterwards form; —if magistrates maintain the decorum of their own characters, and vigorously exert themselves to chastise, and, so far as the strenuous execution of the law may effect it, to eradicate, those audacious enormities, which seem to glory in a superiority to it, enormities so affronting to God and to our rulers, so infamous to our country, and so pernicious to public order and private safety, —if ministers, laying aside those subtle trifles, which so soon evaporate into air, and sometimes generate very noxious vapours, will deal plainly and earnestly with their hearers, as with persons who are daily upon the borders of eternity, and will carry that ardent concern for their salvation, which should always breathe from their pulpits, into the families they visit; —if the rising generation be diligently instructed in the genuine principles of religion, guarded against the effeminacy, luxury, and vanity of the age, and inured from tender years to habits of frugality, sobriety, and patience; —in a word, if that eager resort to places of public entertainment, in which so many heads of families are shamefully consuming their time, squandering away their substance, (if it be indeed theirs,) and daily increasing their disinclination to business, and servitude to pleasure, be forborne by themselves, be forbidden to their dependents.

Would men be persuaded to live like rational creatures, we should be encouraged in our hope of their becoming sincere Christians; would they practise the rules of prudence and virtue, christian-like religion would fall off like withered leaves, tumultuous as its favour would be heard with attention, and our winter would soon be changed into a delightful spring. It is for this purpose that the voice of the Lord crieth to the city, by these repeated earthquakes, which have so powerfully affected it, and the sound of which has been so terrible: for this doth it cry to the country, in the pestilence and distemper that continues to rage among our cattle; in consequence of which so many pastures are desolate, so many industrious families of the poor ruined, and the rich themselves greatly distressed, while their estates are thrown untenanted upon their hands, and consequently Landholders in some of the breeding counties, know not where to get beasts for them money to stock them. For these purposes indeed doth the voice of the Lord in each of these dispensations cry to us all; for neither is the city unconcerned in the interests of the country, nor the country in those of the city: the man of wisdom will hear it, the man of true piety and benevolence will be willing in his proper sphere to echo it back.

The connexions in which Providence has placed me, and I would mention it with all humble thankfulness) the unexpected blessing with which God has been pleased to crown some of my weakest labours, have led me to think it my duty to concur with my brethren in this attempt, and to hasten what both I and I could do in it as much as possible. It may be, that this commotion of the waters may bring some souls under the net of the gospel: it seems at least a time for the fishers of men to be active, and if in a day of such general insensibility, peradventure one soul may be caught by this labour of a night, (as it is very little more,) I shall not esteem it a small matter; for no everlasting interest is small. My work at least is with the Lord, to whom I trust my motives are approved; and my mind could not have been easy, had so remarkable a crisis been entirely neglected by me. I commit it with all humility to the blessing of God, and the prayers of my Christian friends, especially of those resident in the city, for whose benefit it was peculiarly intended.

Northampton, March 12, 1749-50. P. DODDRIDGE.

MATTHEW xi. 23, 24.

And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee.

Do any of you, Sirs, ask who it is that speaks in this awful, in this majestic language? who it is, that menaces a city of Israel with judgments more tremendous than those of Sodom? You may on a little reflection answer yourselves, It is a prophet mighty in word and in deed, the greatest, beyond all comparison the greatest, of all the prophets, even the Son of God, whose peculiar prerogative it was to take the book of the divine decrees, and to open its seals. It was he, to whom authority was given to pronounce and to execute judgment; from whom Sodom and Capernaum were to receive their final doom, and from whom we also are to expect ours. Let us hear him, as their judge, and as our own: and O that this tremendous message may awaken us, to implore his favour; may awaken as many of us as are in danger of the wrath to come, to flee to him that we may be delivered from it, before the word be gone forth in righteousness, before the sentence be sealed!

You can none of you imagine the subject I am now proposing to your meditations, unsuitable to the age in which we live, unsuitable to the circumstances of our native country in general, or of the place in which I now stand: but you may perhaps be more fully aware of the suitableness of it, before I come to the close of my Discourse.

If a very attentive inquiry has not deceived me, these words were spoken by our Lord towards the close of the second year of his ministry, that is, between the second and third of the passovers which occurred during the course of it; a little before he set out on that circuit, for which he sent out the twelve to prepare his way. A very considerable part of his time before this period had been spent in Galilee, and especially in those parts of it which were near the Sea of Tiberias. On this occasion Chorazin and Bethsaida had been frequently blessed with his presence; but Capernaum had been distinguished from all the rest by this inestimable privilege, as you will afterwards hear. It is no wonder therefore, that he thought proper to upbraid all these cities for their continued unbelief and impenitency; and that Capernaum, which had been so distinguished by the favours he had conferred upon it, should be threatened with distinguished calamity and ruin. He began to upbraid the cities in which most of his mighty works were done, because they repented not: Woe unto thee, Chorazin, woe unto thee, Bethsaida; for if the mighty works which were done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes: but I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the day of judgment, than for you. This was saying much; but as the privileges of Capernaum had been still greater, its doom is yet more awful: "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell; for if the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day: but I say unto you, that it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee." In which words it may be proper for us to consider,

I. The privileges Capernaum had enjoyed, and the distinctions which had been made in its favour.

II. Its ungrateful abuse of these distinguished favours of providence and of grace.

III. The dreadful doom which it righteously incurred by that abuse. And after the survey of these particulars, we shall Conclude with a few hints of plain and serious application.

And you, men of Britain, and inhabitants of London, judge I pray you this day between Christ and Capernaum; and say, whether there was any unjust severity in the sentence he passed upon it. Hear attentively, and judge impartially; but take heed, lest while you judge others you condemn yourselves. Let us consider,

I. The privileges Capernaum had enjoyed, and the distinctions which had been made in its favour.

And here I would observe, it had been distinguished by temporal advantages,—but much more, by spiritual privileges and opportunities.

1. It had been distinguished by the temporal advantages of a rich and flourishing city.

Such we are told it was; and in this sense it was exalted unto heaven; a phrase, by which the greatness of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom is described.

The land of Israel in general was a rich and pleasant land, which the all-surveying eye of God had spied out, as he himself expresses it, for his favourite people: and this elegant city lay upon the confines of Zebulun, and of Naphtali; concerning the former of which tribes it was foretold, that it should suck of the abundance of the sea, and of treasures hid in the sand; and concerning the latter, that it should be satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord; possessing by this situation the west and the south, though it lay towards the north-east part of the land: a prophecy remarkably verified by those advantages, which Jordan and the Sea of Galilee gave it, for maintaining a commerce with those parts. It lay also in the near neighbourhood of Asher, of whom it was predicted, that his bread should be fat, that he should yield royal dainties, and dip his feet in oil.

And what is particularly worthy of our present notice, Capernaum was situated in the land of Gennesareth, one of the most delicious spots of ground in the whole Jewish territories. Josephus has given us a very particular description of it, which shows how properly that tract of land had the name of Gennesareth, which may well signify the garden of a prince; (according to the import of Gen Sar, from whence it seems to be derived;) for he tells us,* "that it was plentifully watered by a most delicious spring, that went by the name of Capernaum, and every thing flourished about it: the air seemed, not only to nourish, but to preserve, the fruits produced there; so that there were figs and grapes for ten months in the year, and other kinds of fruits all the year round; and by a very peculiar felicity, nuts, palms, and figs, and olives, though they required generally a very different situation, all abounded there in great plenty."

To this we may add, that it had also some particular advantages for commerce, being situated (according to the most accurate geographers) near that mouth of Jordan, by which it emptied itself into the sea of Galilee; the city of Capernaum lying on its western shore, as Chorazin its opposite neighbour did on its eastern. In consequence of this, it would lie directly in the way of those who came from Damascus and Cæsarea Philippi to Jerusalem, and the southern parts of the country; or of those that went from thence, to those very celebrated cities, and others in their much frequented neighbourhood.

* Joseph. de Bell. Jud. lib. iii. cap. 10. § 8.

It is therefore no wonder, if with all these advantages it became a very flourishing place; no wonder, if its buildings were magnificent, its inhabitants rich, its gardens delicious, and its manners polite; no wonder, if they that dwelt in Capernaum thought, the lines were fallen to them in pleasant places. They had special reason to do so, if we consider,

2. How much more eminently it was distinguished by spiritual privileges.

It had, we find, its synagogues for public worship; but, what was its peculiar glory, it had Jesus to preach in them, and to confirm his doctrine by wonderful works. There is hardly a place in the whole land, except it be Jerusalem, of which we read so much in the account which the evangelists have given us of our Saviour's life. He went down to Capernaum, with his mother and brethren and disciples, and continued there awhile, in the very opening of his ministry, after he had turned the water into wine at the neighbouring town of Cana in Galilee. It is not improbable, he took it in his way from Judea to Nazareth, when he was returning from his first passover; and we are expressly told, that leaving Nazareth, when so base and ungrateful an attempt was made upon his life there, he came and dwelt in Capernaum. And though he left that place quickly after, (when importuned to stay,) that he might pursue his business in other parts of Galilee; yet when that circuit was done, he returned thither again, continuing there, as it seems, till his second passover. We find him in that neighbourhood again, presently after that passover; and such was his love to it, that notwithstanding the impenitence he here laments, he afterwards visited it again and again.

During these repeated sojournings amongst them, we may assure ourselves, that he gave them the most excellent instructions, preaching repentance, as the kingdom of heaven was approaching. We know, that he spake as never man spake; and here no doubt, as every where else, his words were as awful as they were gracious and endearing. We likewise know, that his instructions were every where illustrated by the commanding force of a most amiable, and in him a most perfect, example. And to all this, to the discourses he delivered, and the consummate pattern which he gave of universal goodness, was added the weight of many most astonishing miracles; with reference to which it seems, that no other place was equally distinguished.

The wonderful works which Christ had done at Capernaum, are spoken of by himself, as known to all the inhabitants of Nazareth; who were therefore ready to say, Whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do also here in thine own country: and many more were done after that. At Capernaum he healed the nobleman's son, while he was himself at a distance in Cana: at Capernaum he cast out a devil in the public synagogue on a sabbath-day: at Capernaum he cured Peter's wife's mother of a fever: at Capernaum they brought to him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils; yea, all that had any sick with divers diseases brought them unto him; and he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them: at Capernaum it was, that the power of the Lord was present to heal great numbers, before the Pharisees and doctors of the law, who were come thither out of every town of Galilee and Judea to a place which was become so illustrious: and it was here, and in the midst of this assembly, that he cured the paralytic, who was let down by cords into the place, to which they could get no other access but from the top of the house. It was here also, at Capernaum, that he cured the centurion's servant, before he came under the roof where he was; and in another visit, some time after these words in the text were spoken, it was here that he cured the woman by the touch of his garment, and raised the daughter of Jairus to life.

This is a brief and imperfect view of the advantages Capernaum enjoyed: how justly therefore with respect to these might it be said, it was exalted unto heaven! How reasonably might it have been expected then, that Capernaum, thus divinely taught, thus miraculously relieved, should have been remarkable for its diligent attention to the doctrines of our Lord, and its ready obedience to his gospel! But alas, we cannot forget the connexion in which these advantages have been surveyed; and it must be the business of our next general, to consider,

II. The abuse of these privileges; for wretchedly abused they were.

It is expressly said here, that they repented not: which implies,—that many sins were to be found among them;—and that they would not be reformed under all the endeavours which the Son of God himself thought proper to use for that purpose.

1. It is certain, that many sins were to be found among them.

They could not otherwise have stood in such need of repentance, as to have been obnoxious to so dreadful a sentence for their impenitence. Guilty they undoubtedly were of many evils, but we cannot certainly pronounce as to the particulars: probably they were such as are commonly to be found in opulent and elegant cities, where the materials of luxury abound, and temptations to it are multiplied.

We may reasonably suppose, that irreligion led on the train here, as it does wherever iniquity abounds. Perhaps the worship of God might be neglected, and that neglect lay at the door of every other evil and enormity. The synagogues might be unfrequented, especially by the rich and the great, unless when curiosity drew them thither, on the same principles as those on which it might have drawn them to a theatre: and though the terrors of the law, that hung over their heads, might prevent that breach of the sabbath, which it pronounced a capital offence, yet it is highly probable, that it might be a day of idleness and diversion, and in no other view might be called a delight; so that being perverted from its original purpose, it turned into an occasion of mischief, rather than of benefit, and left them more sensual and vicious than it found them.

Perhaps amidst their many merchants the balances of deceit might be in their hands; the arts of dishonest gain might be practised, till every sense of their infamy was lost, amidst the numbers by which they were countenanced; till their palaces were cemented by the tears of oppressed widows and orphans, "the stone crying out of the wall, and the beam from the timber answering it."

More certainly still may we reckon upon it, that the fatal arts of luxury reigned in Capernaum: ostentatious ornaments of dress and furniture, exquisite food, rich wines, and not improbably, concerts of music and other theatrical entertainments, (which we know Herod introduced into some of their cities,) drawing the world after them, and employing the great when their minds should have been occupied about the affairs of the public; perhaps too intoxicating those in common life, and leading them to forget the cares, and interrupt the labours, upon which their own subsistence and that of their families depended, and so bringing upon their families a ruin that would not have so much as the consolation of being pitied; at once exhausting the substance and corrupting the taste of the rising generation. Wretched offspring of cruelly-indulgent parents! who instead of being trained up in the fear of the Lord, in the methods of a wise, virtuous, and pious education, might have their minds broken by effeminacy, and a thousand artificial wants created, when perhaps there might hardly be enough left from the ravages of luxury to supply the necessities of nature. They would no doubt grow up exorbitant, petulant, and audacious; ignorant of every art but that of corrupting and injuring others, of every science but that of deriding the little remainder of religion and virtue, that might be found in the midst of so general a wreck. Alas, what an inheritance laid up for them! But whatever the offences of Capernaum were, it is to be remembered,

2. That they would not reform under all the efforts which Christ used with them for that purpose.

The Son of God himself was among them; a wise reprover, but it was on disobedient ears. Neither his remonstrances, nor his example, nor his miracles, would make any lasting impression upon them. Perhaps there were those, who would not condescend to give him the hearing; they thought themselves wise and polite in looking with contempt upon the man of Nazareth, and would not give themselves the trouble of inquiring into what seemed to them so incredible a tale, as that of his miracles; or if the evidence forced itself upon their minds, had laid down certain favourite maxims to themselves, and resolved to reject every thing inconsistent with them, whatever wretched shifts they might make to do it: nay, it seems manifest, that here that blasphemous suggestion was advanced, that he cast out devils by the prince of the devils. There might be others more decent, who yet heard in vain: if they wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth, those words were to them but as the lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument; they heard them, but they would not do them: or if any impressions were made, they quickly wore them off again, and were enchanted back into the same circle of pleasure or business. So that on the whole, they rejected the gospel which was so well calculated to reform them, and grew more hopeless under it than ever. If he had not come and spoken unto them, they would in comparison have had no sin; but now they had no cloak for their sin: and the interpretation that he himself, with all his unequalled candour, was obliged to pass upon their conduct, with whatever indignation they might reject the charge, was this, "that they had both seen, and hated, both him and his Father." What could be expected then from such aggravated and incorrigible wickedness, but,

III. The doom pronounced upon them; that dreadful doom, which we are next to consider, that having been exalted unto heaven, they should be brought down to hell; and it should be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for them.

You will easily observe a strong and beautiful opposition in the former clause of the sentence; and both that and the latter may express—their temporal ruin, but much more certainly—their future condemnation.

1. It may perhaps express their temporal ruin.

We know, that this is sometimes signified by this expression, being brought down to hell. The destruction of Babylon is foretold by Isaiah by this very phrase, to show how the oppressor should cease, and the golden city cease: Thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: yet thou shalt be brought down to hell; that is, thou shalt be utterly destroyed, and buried in thy own ruins. And such, we know, was the doom of Capernaum. Many of the vices which we have naturally enough supposed to have abounded in it, would in their own consequences have led it on to certain, though to slower, ruin; but God, as is frequently his method, interposed to execute this fair yet abandoned criminal, before she died of her own debaucheries.

I do not remember that we read any thing particular concerning the circumstances of the ruin of Capernaum: but as all the country about the Galilean sea was overrun by the Roman army in the war that quickly happened, it undoubtedly shared the fate of its neighbours, of whose terrible destruction Josephus gives a most affecting description in the third and fourth books of the Jewish War. It was then plundered of its wealth, and in all probability its streets and palaces were filled with the dead bodies of its slaughtered inhabitants; as the historian says expressly, "that the lake on which the city stood, after a terrible sea-fight there, was covered with the floating corpses of the slain, which almost poisoned all the country round by the insufferable stench they omitted, while they remained unburied." The country being thus subdued and trodden down by the Gentiles, who became its absolute lords, Capernaum must have soon lost all its glory; so soon, indeed, that many of the young people, who had been present while Christ preached in their synagogues, and wrought miracles among them, must in a course of nature have lived to share the desolation. Thus the sword of the enemy entered into those hearts, which had been impenetrable to that two-edged sword that went out of the mouth of the Son of God. And so entire was the ruin of the place, that, as we learn from Jerom, in his time, which was less than four hundred years after Christ, "all that remained of the magnificence and glory of Capernaum, was six or seven poor fishermen's cottages;" and modern travellers can hardly find a trace of it: so literally is it grown, like the much more celebrated city of Tyre, like the top of a rock, a place to spread nets upon. Such is the ancient Tyre; such, after all the privileges it enjoyed, Capernaum now is; and such the proudest city upon earth shall be, if God but mark it out for the like ruin. But more than this, these awful words of our blessed Redeemer did certainly express,

2. Their future and final condemnation.

It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, in the great day of final retribution, than for thee. You see, the day of judgment is introduced, that great and terrible day of the Lord. And it is very necessary that the memory of it should be kept up in the world, that men, knowing the terror of the Lord, may, if possible, be awakened and persuaded. Our blessed Redeemer himself, who was anointed to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, considered it also as a part of his commission to declare the day of vengeance of our God: and nothing is so awful as the language in which he describes it. But we are here to observe, it is implied, that Sodom and Gomorrah should have a part in it, but that their part should be less dreadful than that of the people of Capernaum.

It is implied, "that Sodom and Gomorrah should have a part in the day of judgment." You well know, that God executed his vengeance upon them in the most tremendous manner, for those detestable crimes, which have rendered the name of Sodom so infamous to these very distant ages: and the history of their ruin is so circumstantially described, that it is evident God intended it should never be forgot. Let me call you all, let me call especially the impenitent sinners that hear me this day, to pause for a few moments on the case of these wretched men. When the rising sun in all its beauty and glory was on a sudden obscured to them, fatally and for ever obscured, by that storm of wrath; when the awful moment came, in which God had determined to rain upon them snares, fire, and brimstone, and a horrible tempest; snares, indeed, that took them, wherever they might attempt to fly: endeavour to conceive, as you can, though you can but imperfectly conceive, what must be the consternation of these wretches, that felt the earth reeling under them, and saw at the same time the heavens thundering upon them, and pouring a vast shower of burning brimstone instead of rain, firing their habitations, and torturing with far more than the agonies of common flame, the bodies they had so delicately pampered, so infamously abused. For a few minutes they remained, either stupid and dumb with amazement, or shrieking out in torment and despair, and blaspheming the God of heaven because of their pain; (the most lively image of hell that earth ever saw, or shall see;) till down they sunk into the opening ground; the city and its inhabitants vanished in a moment, and nothing remained of their country, which just before was like the garden of the Lord, but a smoking sulphureous lake: for so it is expressly said, that Abraham beheld, and lo, its smoke went up as the smoke of a furnace. Thus they became a sign and a proverb, for when God would describe the most entire destruction that can be conceived, it is by this emblem, as the Lord overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.

Their memorial is now perished, except it be that memorial which is preserved of them in the book of God, where they are marked out in so dreadful a manner; and yet, all their punishment is not over. Our Lord tells us, that in the day of judgment they shall be remembered and visited, and we may assure ourselves, that their doom then shall be more terrible, than that which they suffered from the sulphureous rain, the earthquake, and the pit, into which many of them no doubt went down alive. Whatever their anguish and their terror then was, it shall in the great day be far exceeded: for we can never imagine that God would bring them into final judgment, to punish them less in that tremendous solemnity, than they had formerly been punished; and we may be confident that to depart accursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels, to be cast into that lake which burns for ever with fire and brimstone, must be infinitely more terrible than the momentary pain, under the anguish of which they would soon have expired, and from which suffocation would probably much sooner deliver them.

But is this the sentence of Sodom and Gomorrah only! and shall this dreadful climate be inhabited only by them? Nay, but it is the doom of Capernaum too; and what is most terrible of all, it is expressly said, It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for Capernaum. And thus,

It is implied, "that their part shall be less dreadful in the day of judgment, than that of the people of Capernaum." And it is reasonable that it should be so. Sodom and Gomorrah were righteously condemned: they abused the light of nature, which strongly witnessed against wickedness monstrous like theirs: they rejected the preaching of Lot, by whom they might have learnt the knowledge of the true God, and the way to serve him with acceptance: but though they violated the dictates of reason, though they abused the bounties of Providence, though they despised the preaching of Lot; yet they heard not the gospel of the Son of God. A much greater than Lot was in the midst of thee, O Capernaum! Justly therefore are thy children, who would not receive his doctrine, who would not obey his charge, who would not regard his miracles, doomed to a severer vengeance, to a more intolerable condemnation; so as to look with envy upon the milder tortures inflicted upon those egregious sinners against their own souls.

But this is not said of them only: it touches us nearly, and O that, as we are so often reminding you of it, you may all seriously consider it! What our Lord asserts concerning Capernaum, he elsewhere says concerning all, who will not receive, embrace, and obey the gospel; for these are his words to the first messengers of it, Whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city; and by a parity of reason, for every city, for every town, for every village, for every soul, by whom the gospel shall be rejected, after having been plainly and faithfully laid before them. Oh! hear it again! It shall be more tolerable for

Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for them.

And now, methinks, I am ready to interrupt my Discourse, and could rather, were I sure you would attend me in it, sit down, and cover my face, and weep. For if these are indeed the words of the Son of God, they are big with a terrible tempest, and it hangs over what we call the Christian world, it hangs over this island, which is in many respects the glory of it. And have we no forebodings, where the heaviest part of it might justly fall? Is there no city that rises to our thoughts, far superior to Capernaum in its wealth and magnificence, and in some respects more than equal to it in its guilt? O London! London! dear city of my birth and education, seat of so many of my friends, seat of our princes and senators,—centre of our commerce,—heart of our island; which must feel and languish, must tremble, and (I had almost said) die, with thee!—How art thou lifted up to heaven! How high do thy glories rise, and how bright do they shine! How great is thy magnificence! How extensive thy commerce! How numerous, how free, how happy, thy inhabitants! How happy, above all, in their religious opportunities! in the uncorrupted gospel, so long, so faithfully, preached in thy synagogues! displayed in so many peculiar glories, which were but beginning to dawn when Jesus himself dwelt in Capernaum, and preached repentance there! But while we survey these heights of elevation, must we not tremble, lest thou shouldst fall so much the lower, lest thou shouldst plunge so much the deeper in ruin?

My situation, Sirs, is not such, as to render me most capable of judging concerning the moral character of this our celebrated metropolis. But who can hear what seem the most credible reports of it, yea, I will add, who can walk its streets but for a few days with any other observation, and not take an alarm, and be ready to meditate terror? Whose spirit must not (like that of Paul at Athens) be stirred, when he sees the city so abandoned to profaneness, luxury, and vanity? Is it indeed false, all that we hear? Is it indeed accidental, all that we see? Is London wronged, when it is said,—that great licentiousness reigns among most of its inhabitants, and great indolence and indifference to religion even among those that are not licentious?—that assemblies for divine worship are much neglected, or frequented with little appearance of seriousness or solemnity; while assemblies for pleasure are thronged, and attended with such an eagerness, that all the heart and soul seems to be given to them rather than to God?—that most of its families are prayerless, wanting time it seems, or rather wanting heart, for these social devotions; while many hours of every day can be given to recreations and amusements at home, if by any accident it is impracticable to seek them abroad!—that the sabbath, instead of being religiously observed, is given to jaunts of pleasure into neighbouring villages, or a stool on beds of sloth, or at tables of excess?—that not only persons in the highest ranks of life, but that the trading part of its citizens, affect such an excessive gaiety, and grandeur, and delicacy, the very reverse of that frugality of our ancestors, who raised the city to what it is?—that men in almost every rank are ambitious of appearing to be something more, than those who stand in the next rank above them could conveniently allow themselves to appear; and in consequence of this, are grasping at business they cannot manage, entering into engagements for what they cannot answer, and so, after a vain and contemptible blaze, drawing bankruptcy upon themselves, and exposing to the danger of it, honest, industrious persons, who are won by that suspicious face of plenty which they put on, to repose a confidence in them, on that very account so much the less reasonable and safe?—that the poorer sort of the people are so grossly ignorant, as to know hardly any thing of religion, but the sacred names, which they continually profane; so wretchedly depraved, as to consume their time and strength in reaching at those low and pernicious luxuries which they may hope to attain; and so abandoned, as to sink unchastised into the most brutal sensualities and impurities; while those who would exert any remarkable zeal to remedy these evils, by introducing a deep and warm sense of religion into the minds of others, are suspected and censured as whimsical and enthusiastical, if not designing, men?—in a word, that the religion of our divine Master is by multitudes of the great and the vulgar openly renounced and blasphemed; and by others but coldly defended, as if it were grown a matter of mere indifference, which men might, without any great danger of mischief, reject at their pleasure: yea, as if it were a matter of great doubt and uncertainty, whether men's souls were immortal, or whether they were extinguished with so empty and insignificant a life? Men and brethren, are these things indeed so? I take not upon me to answer absolutely, that they are; but I will venture to say, that if they are indeed thus, London, as rich, and grand, and glorious as it is, has reason to tremble, and to tremble so much the more for its abused riches, grandeur, and glory.

There is indeed, as has often and justly been observed, one token for good amongst these symptoms of danger; I mean, a variety of charitable foundations and institutions amongst you, so far as I know, unequalled through the whole world; as well as a freedom from persecution and oppression, those detestable evils, which wherever they are to be found, cry so loud for vengeance, and for which it is expressly said, that Babylon, Nineveh, and Jerusalem, were destroyed. There are also, blessed be God, not a few inhabitants of this city, who reverence God; who believe, and obey, and adorn his gospel; who dare, in the midst of so many contrary examples, to stand up for the honour of Christianity with resolution and zeal; and who are solicitous to infuse a deep sense of its excellency and importance, into the minds of their rising offspring, and of others whom Providence has placed under their care and influence: these, of whatever denomination, and with whatever modesty and silence their designs are conducted, are the salt of the earth, that hinder the corruption from becoming universal; they are the guardians of the city in which they dwell, and stand in that breach, at which judgment would otherwise pour in like a torrent. Let such be established, encouraged, and quickened, by representations like those I have now been making. The eyes of the Lord are upon them, especially at a crisis like this; and his ears will be open to their cry. Let them be exhorted, to exert themselves with a growing zeal for a general reformation, so far as their influence may extend. Let them by their examples go on to plead this important cause; and let every art and labour of pious education be attended to, that the minds of youth may be rescued from the growing contagion, and stored with those seeds of virtue and piety, which may make the next generation much happier than the present: and to these labours of love let such join their fervent prayers, which have already, I doubt not, been in some cases efficacious, and which, in proportion as they grow more frequent and importunate, may be yet more so. All that love Zion, will say Amen to them; and may the Lord our God say so too!

To the rest, who swim with the stream, who follow the multitude, and who argue themselves into security, either from Epicurean principles, or from not having yet felt those scourges of God, under which so many other cities and nations have fallen; —to those who disregard providence, as well as neglect and despise the gospel;—I shall only at present address that awful oracle of God by Zephaniah, which ought to have its weight wherever circumstances resemble what are there supposed: It shall come to pass, saith the Lord, that I will search Jerusalem with candles, and punish the men that are settled on their lees, that say in their heart, the Lord will not do good, neither will he do evil: therefore their goods shall become a booty, and their houses a desolation. So it may really be, peaceful as the present appearances are. God can raise up enemies, where we least expect them; nor does he need the weapons of war to chastise, or its engines to overthrow, a guilty city. But however its impenitent inhabitants may escape such temporal judgments, concerning the probability of which we can but very uncertainly denounce; I will take up the parable, and say, in the sublimest sense the following words can admit, and in such a light as the awful denunciation of my text throws upon them, The great day of the Lord is near, it is nearer and hasteth greatly, even the voice of the day of the Lord; which shall be ushered in by the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; when the heavens as well as the earth shall be shaken, and pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat: the day, in which the mighty man, the boldest and the haughtiest sinner, shall cry bitterly: that day of wrath, that day of trouble and distress, that day of wasteness and desolation, that day of darkness and gloominess, that day of clouds and thick darkness, which no description even of a prophet's pen can paint in colours sufficiently terrible; that day of the trumpet and alarm, that shall bring distress upon men, because they have sinned against the Lord. They may trust in their strength, they may boast in their riches: but the fenced cities and the high towers shall be brought down; neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them in the day of the Lord's wrath, when the whole land, when the whole earth, shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy. This alarm I leave with you; and O that it may operate to produce that great effect, in which all our ministry, if we understand our own true interest and yours, ought to centre, even that of leading you to him, whose great prerogative and office, whose glory and joy, it is, to deliver from the wrath to come! Amen.

FUNERAL SERMONS.

SERMON VI.

SUBMISSION TO DIVINE PROVIDENCE, IN THE DEATH OF CHILDREN.

PREFACE.

THE Discourse which I now offer to the public was drawn up on a very sorrowful occasion; the death of a most desirable child, who was formed in such a correspondence to my own relish and temper, as to be able to give me a degree of delight, and consequently of distress, which I did not before think it possible I could have received from a little creature who had not quite completed her fifth year.

Since the Sermon was preached, it has pleased God to make the like breaches in the families of several of my friends; and with regard to some of them, the affliction hath been attended with circumstances of yet sorer aggravation. Though several of them are removed to a considerable distance from me, and from each other, I have borne their afflictions upon my heart with cordial sympathy, and it is with a particular desire of serving them, that I have undertaken the sad task of reviewing and transcribing these papers; which may almost be called the minutes of my own sighs and tears, over the poor remains of my eldest and (of this kind) dearest hope, when they were not as yet buried out of my sight.

They are, indeed, full of affection, and to be sure some may think they are too full of it; but let them consider the subject, and the circumstances, and surely they will pardon it. I apprehend, I could not have treated such a subject coldly, had I written upon it many years ago, when I was unstaught in the school of affliction, and knew nothing of such a calamity as this, but by speculation or report: how much less could I do it, when God had touched me in so tender a part, and (to allude to a celebrated ancient story) called me out to appear on a public stage, as with an urn in my hand, which contained the ashes of my own child!

In such a sad situation parents, at least, will forgive the tears of a parent, and those meltings of soul which overflow in the following pages. I have not attempted to run through the common-place of immoderate grief, but have only selected a few obvious thoughts which I found peculiarly suitable to myself; and, I bless God, I can truly say, they gave me a solid and substantial relief, under a shock of sorrow which would otherwise have broken my spirits.

On my own experience, therefore, I would recommend them to others in the like condition. And let me entreat my friends and my fellow sufferers to remember, that it is not a low degree of submission to the divine will, which is called for in the ensuing Discourse. It is comparatively an easy thing to behave with external decency, to refrain from bold censures and outrageous complaints, or to speak in the outward language of resignation. But it is not so easy to get rid of every repining thought, and to forbear taking it, in some degree at least, unkindly, that the God whom we love and serve, in whose friendship we have long trusted and rejoiced, should act what, to sense, seems so unfriendly a part: that he should take away a child; and if a child, that child, and it that child, at that age, and it at that age, with this or that particular circumstance; which seems the very contrivance of Providence, to add double anguish to the wound: and all this, when he could so easily have recalled it; when we know him to have done it for so many others: when we have so earnestly desired it; when we sought it with such importunity, and yet, as we imagine, with so much submission too: that, notwithstanding all this, he should tear it away with an inexorable hand, and leave us, it may be for a while, under the load, without any extraordinary comforts and supports, to balance so grievous a trial. In these circumstances, not only to justify, but to glorify, God in all,—cheerfully to subscribe to his will, cordially to approve it as merciful and gracious,—so as to be able to say, as the pious and excellent archbishop of Cambray did, when his royal pupil, and the hopes of a nation, were taken away,* "If there needed no more than to move a straw to bring him to life again, I would not do it, since the divine pleasure is otherwise"—This, this is a difficult lesson indeed: a triumph of Christian faith and love, which I fear many of us are yet to learn.

* The Duke of Burgundy. See Cameray's Life, page 329.

But let us follow after it, and watch against the first rising of a contrary temper, as most injurious to God, and prejudicial to ourselves. To preserve us against it, let us review the considerations now to be proposed, as what we are to digest into our hearts, and work into our thoughts and our passions. And I would hope, that if we do in good earnest make the attempt, we shall find this Discourse a cooling and sweetening medicine, which may allay that inward heat and sharpness, with which, in a case like ours, the heart is often inflamed and corroded. I commend it, such as it is, to the blessing of the great Physician, and could wish the reader to make up its many deficiencies, by Mr. Flavel's Token for Mourners, and Dr. Grosvenor's Mourner: to which if it suit his relish, he may please to add Sir William Temple's Essay on the Excess of Grief: three tracts which, in their very different strains and styles, I cannot but look upon as in the number of the best which our language, or, perhaps, any other, has produced upon this subject.

As for this little piece of mine, I question not but, like the generality of single sermons, it will soon be worn out and forgotten. But in the mean time I would humbly hope, that some tender parent, whom Providence has joined with me in sad similitude of grief, may find some consolation from it, while sitting by the coffin of a beloved child, or mourning over its grave. And I particularly hope it, with regard to those dear and valuable friends, whose sorrows on the like occasion have lately been added to my own. I desire that though they be not expressly named, they would please to consider this Sermon as most affectionately and respectfully dedicated to them; and would, in return, give me a share in their prayers, that all the vicissitudes of life may concur to quicken me in the duties of it, and to ripen me for that blessed world, where I hope many of those dear delights, which are now withering around us, will spring up in fairer and more durable forms. Amen.

Northampton, January 31, 1736-7.

POSTSCRIPT.

I could easily show, with how much propriety I have called the dear deceased an amiable and hopeful child, by a great many little stories, which parents would perhaps read with pleasure, and children might hear with some improvement: yet as I cannot be sure that no others may happen to read the Discourse, I dare not trust my pen and my heart on so delicate a subject. One circumstance I will however venture to mention, which may indeed be considered as a specimen of many others. As she was a great darling with most of our friends that knew her, she often received invitations to different places at the same time: and when I once asked her, on such an occasion, what made every body love her so well; she answered me, (with that simplicity and spirit which, alas! charmed me too much,) "Indeed, papa, I cannot think, unless it be because I love every body." A sentiment obvious to the understanding of a child, yet not unworthy the reflection of the wisest man.*

2 Kings iv. 25, 26.

And it came to pass, when the man of God saw her afar off, that he said to Gehazi his servant, Behold, yonder is that Shunammite: run now, I pray thee, to meet her; and say unto her, Is it well with thee? is it well with thy husband? is it well with the child? And she answered, It is well.

When the apostle would encourage our hope and trust in the tenderness of Christ as the great High Priest, and convince us that he is capable of being touched with a sympathetic sense of our infirmities, he argues at large from this consideration, that Jesus was in all points tempted like us; so that as he himself has suffered, being tempted, he knows how more compassionately to succour those that are under the like trials. Now this must surely intimate, that it is not in human nature, even in its most perfect state, so tenderly to commiserate any sorrows, as those which our own hearts have felt; as we cannot form a perfect idea of any bitter kind of draught, by the most exact description, till we have ourselves tasted it. It is probably for this reason, amongst others, that God frequently exercises such, as have the honour to be inferior shepherds in the flock of Christ, with a long train of various afflictions, that we may be able to comfort them who are in the like trouble, with those consolations with which we have ourselves been comforted of God. And, if we have the temper which becomes our office, will greatly reconcile us to our trials, to consider, that from our weeping eyes, and our bleeding hearts, a balm may be extracted to heal the sorrows of others, and a cordial to revive their fainting spirits. May we never be left to sink under our burthen, in such a manner, that there should be room, after all we have boasted of the strength of religious supports, to apply to us the words of Eliphaz to Job, Thou hast strengthcued the weak hands, and upheld him that was ready to fall; but now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest; it touches thee, and thou art troubled! May we never behave, as if the consolations of God were small; lest it should be as when a standard-bearer fainteth, and whole companies of soldiers are thrown into confusion and distress!

* Tibi monstrabo amatorium sine medicamentis, sine herbis, sine ullius veneficæ carmine; si vis amare, ama. — Seneca.

My friends, you are witnesses for me, that I have not stood by, as an unconcerned spectator amidst the desolations of your respective families, when God's awful hand hath been lopping off those tender branches from them, which were once common hope and delight. I have often put my soul in the stead of yours, and endeavoured to give such a turn to my public as well as my private discourses, as might be a means of composing and cheering our minds, and forming you to a submissive temper, that you might be subject to the Father of Spirits, and live. In this view I have, at different times, largely insisted on the example of Aaron, who held his peace, when his two eldest sons were struck dead in a moment by fire from the Lord, which destroyed them in the very act of their sin; and I have also represented that of Job, who, when the death of ten children by one blow was added to the spoil of his great possessions, could say, The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord. The instance which is before us, is not indeed so memorable as these; but to present circumstances it is, in many respects, more suitable: and it may the rather deserve our notice, as it shows us the wisdom, composure, and piety of one of the weaker and tenderer sex, on an occasion of such aggravated distress, that had Aaron or Job behaved just as she did, we must have acknowledged, that they had not sunk beneath the dignity of their character, nor appeared unworthy of our applause and our imitation.

Indeed there may be some reason to imagine, that it was with design to humble those who are in distinguished stations of life, and who have peculiar advantages and obligations to excel in religion, that God has shown us in Scripture, as well as in common life, some bright examples of piety, where they could hardly have been expected in so great a degree; and hath, as it were, perfected praise out of the mouths of babes and sucklings. Thus when Zacharias, an aged priest, doubted the veracity of the angel which appeared to assure him of the birth of his child, which was to be produced in an ordinary way; Mary, an obscure young virgin, could believe a far more unexampled event, and said, with humble faith and thankful consent, Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word. Jonah the prophet, though favoured with such immediate revelations, and so lately delivered, in a miraculous way, from the very belly of hell, was thrown into a most indecent transport of passion, on the withering of a gourd; so that he presumed to tell the Almighty to his face, that he did well to be angry even unto death: whereas this pious woman preserves the calmness and serenity of her temper, when she had lost a child, a son, an only child, who had been given beyond all natural hope, and therefore to be sure was so much the dearer, and the expectation from him so much the higher. Yet these expectations were dashed almost in a moment; and this, when he was grown up to an age when children are peculiarly entertaining; for he was old enough to be with his father in the field, where no doubt he was diverting him with his fond prattle; yet he was not too big to be laid on his mother's knees, when he came home complaining of his head; so that he was probably about five or six years old. This amiable child was well in the morning, and dead by noon; a pale corpse in his mother's arms! and he now lay dead in the house; and yet she had the faith and the goodness to say, "It is well."

This good woman had found the prophet Elisha grateful for all the favours he had received at her house; where she had from time to time accommodated him in his journeys, and thought it an honour rather than an encumbrance. She had experienced the power of his prayers, in answer to which the child had been given; and it is extremely probable, that she also recollected the miracle which Elijah had wrought a few years before, though till that time the like had not been known in Israel, or on earth; I mean, in raising from the dead the child of that widow of Sarepta, who had nourished him during the famine. She might therefore think it a possible case, that the miracle might be renewed; at least, she knew not how to comfort herself better, than by going to so good a friend, and asking his counsels and his prayers, to enable her to bear her affliction, if it must not be removed.

Accordingly she hasted to him; and he, on the other side, discovered the temper of a real friend, in the message with which he sent Gehazi his servant to meet her, while she was yet afar off. The moment she appeared, the concerns of her whole family seem to have come into his kind heart at once, and he particularly asks, Is it well with thee? is it well with thine husband? is it well with the child? A beautiful example of that affectionate care for the persons and families of their friends, which Christian ministers (who, like the prophets of old, are called men of God) should habitually bear about in their hearts; which should be awakened by every sight of them, and expressed on every proper occasion.

Her answer was very remarkable: she said, It is well. Perhaps she meant this, to divert the more particular inquiry of the servant; as she had before made the same answer to her husband, when he had examined into the reason of her intended journey, as probably not knowing of the sad breach which had been made: she said, It is well; which was a civil way of intimating her desire that he would not ask any more particular questions. But I cannot see any reason to restrain the words to this meaning alone: we have ground to believe, from the piety she expressed in her first regards to Elisha, and the opportunities which she had of improving in religion by the frequent converse of that holy man, that when she used this language, she intended thereby to express her resignation to the divine will in what had lately passed; and this might be the meaning of her heart, (though one ignorant of the particulars of her case might not fully understand it from such ambiguous words,) "It is well, on the whole. Though my family be afflicted, we are afflicted in faithfulness; though my dear babe be dead, yet my heavenly Father is just, and he is good in all. He knows how to bring glory to himself, and advantage to us, from this stroke. Whether this application do or do not succeed, whether the child be or be not restored, it is still well; well with him, and well with us; for we are in such wise and such gracious hands, that I would not allow one murmuring word, or one repining thought." So that, on the whole, the sentiment of this good Shunammite was much the same with that of Hezekiah, when he answered to that dreadful threatening which imported the destruction of his children, Good is the word of the Lord which he hath spoken; or that of Job, when he heard that all his sons and his daughters were crushed under the ruins of their elder brother's house, and yet (in the fore-cited words) said, Blessed be the name of the Lord.

Now this is the temper to which, by divine assistance, we should all labour to bring our own hearts, when God puts this bitter cup into our hands, and takes away with a stroke those dear little ones, which were the desire of our eyes, and the joy of our hearts. Let us not content ourselves, in such circumstances, with keeping the door of our lips, that we break not out into any indecencies of complaint; let us not attempt to harden ourselves against our sorrows by a stern insensibility, or that sullen resolution which sometimes says, "It is grief, and I must bear it;" but let us labour (for a great labour it will indeed be) to compose and quiet our souls, calmly to acquiesce in this painful dispensation, nay, cordially to approve it, as in present circumstances every way fit.

It will be the main business of this Discourse, to prove how reasonable such a temper is, or to show how much cause Christian parents have to borrow the language of the text, when their infant offspring is taken away, and to say, with the pious Shunammite, in the noblest sense that her words will bear, —It is well.

And here I would more particularly show, it is well in the general, because God does it;—it is surely well for the pious parents in particular, because it is the work of their covenant God:—they may see many respects in which it is evidently so, by observing what useful lessons it has a tendency to teach them:—and they have reason to hope, it is well with those dear creatures whom God hath removed in their early days.

These are surely convincing reasons to the understanding; yet who can say, that they shall be reasons to the heart? Arise, O God, and plead thine own cause in the most effectual manner! May thy powerful and gracious voice appease the swelling billows of the passions, and produce a great and delightful calm in our souls, in which we may yet enjoy thee and ourselves, though a part of our treasure be for the present swallowed up!

I. There is surely reason, in such a case, to say it is well,—because God doth it.

This passed for an unanswerable reason with David, I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it; and with good old Eli, under a severer trial than ours, It is the Lord, let him do as seemeth good in his sight. And shall we object against the force of it? Was it a reason to David, and to Eli, and is it not equally so to us? or have we any new right to reply against God, which those eminent saints had not?

His kingdom ruleth over all; and there is not so much as a sparrow that falls to the ground without our Father's notice, but the very hairs of our head are all numbered by him. Can we then imagine that our dear children fall into their graves without his notice or interposition? Did that watchful eye that keepeth Israel, now, for the first time, slumber and sleep, and an enemy lay hold on that fatal moment to bear away these precious spoils, and bury our joys and our hopes in the dust? Did some malignant hand stop up the avenues of life, and break its springs, so as to baffle all the tenderness of the parent, and all the skill of the physician? Whence does such a thought come, and whither would it lead? Diseases and accidents are but second causes, which owe all their operations to the continued energy of the great original cause. Therefore God says, I will bereave them of children. I take away the desire of thine eyes with a stroke. He changeth their countenance, and sendeth them away. Thou, Lord, turnest man to destruction, and sayest, Return, ye children of men. And what shall we say? Are not the administrations of his providence wise and good? Can we teach him knowledge? Can we tax him with injustice? Shall the most high God learn of us how to govern the world, and be instructed by our wisdom when to remove his creatures from one state of being to another? Or do we imagine that his administration, in the general right and good, varies when he comes to touch our bone and our flesh? Is that the secret language of our soul, "that it is well others should drink of the cup, but not we; that any families but ours should be broken, and any hearts but ours should be wounded?" Who might not claim the like exemption? And what would become of the divine government in general? or where would be his obedient homage from his creatures, if each should begin to complain, as soon as it comes to his own turn to suffer? Much fitter is it for us to conclude, that our own afflictions may be as reasonable as those of others; that amidst all the clouds and darkness of his present dispensation, righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne; and, in a word, that it is well, because God hath done it. It suits the general scheme of the divine providence, and, to an obedient submissive creature, that might be enough; but it is far from being all. For,

II. Pious parents, under such a dispensation, may conclude it is well for them in particular,—because he who hath done it is their covenant God.

This is the great promise, to which all the saints under the Old and New Testament are heirs,—I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: and if we are interested in it, the happy consequence is, that we being his, all our concerns are his also; all are humbly resigned to him,—and graciously administered by him,—and incomparably better blessings bestowed and secured, than any which the most afflictive providence can remove.

If we have any share in this everlasting covenant, all that we are or have, must, of course, have been solemnly surrendered to God. And this is a thought peculiarly applicable to the case immediately in view. "Did I not," may the Christian in such a sad circumstance generally say, "did I not, in a very solemn manner, bring this my child to God in baptism, and in that ordinance recognise his right to it? Did I not, with all humble subjection to the Father of spirits, and Father of mercies, lay it down at his feet, perhaps with an express, at least to be sure with a tacit, consent, that it should be disposed of by him, as his infinite wisdom and goodness should direct, whether for life or for death? And am I now to complain of him, because he has removed not only a creature of his own, but one of the children of his family? Or shall I pretend, after all, to set up a claim in opposition to his? A heathen parent, even from the light of nature, might have learned silent submission; how much more then a Christian parent, who hath presented his child to God in this initiatory ordinance; and perhaps also many a time, both before and since, hath presented himself at the table of the Lord! Have I not there taken that cup of blessings, with a declared resolution of accepting every other cup, how bitter soever it might be, which my heavenly Father should see fit to put into my hand? When I have perhaps felt some painful forebodings of what I am now suffering, I have, in my own thoughts, particularly singled out that dear object of my cares and my hopes, to lay it down anew at my Father's feet, and say, Lord, thou gavest it to me, and I resign it to thee; continue or remove it, as thou pleasest. And did I then mean to trifle with God? Did I mean in effect to say, Lord, I will give it up, if thou wilt not take it?"

Reflect further, I beseech you, on your secret retirements, and think, as surely some of you may, "How often have I there been on my knees before God on account of this child; and what was then my language? Did I say, Lord, I absolutely insist on its recovery; I cannot, on any terms or any considerations whatsoever, bear to think of losing it?" Surely we were none of us so indecently transported with the fondest passion, as to be so rash with our mouths as to utter such things before the great God. Such presumption had deserved a much heavier punishment than we are now bearing, and, if not retracted, may perhaps still have it. Did not one or another of us rather say, "Lord, I would humbly entreat, with all due submission to thy superior wisdom and sovereign pleasure, that my child may live; but if it must be otherwise, not my will, but thine, be done.—I and mine are in thy hand, do with me, and with them, as seemeth good in thy sight." And do we now blame ourselves for this? Would we unsay it again, and, if possible, take ourselves and our children out of his hands, whom we have so often owned as all-wise and all-gracious, and have chosen as our great guardian and theirs?

Let it further be considered, it is done by that God who has accepted of this surrender, so as to undertake the administration of our affairs: "He is become my covenant God in Christ," may the Christian say; "and, in consequence of that covenant, he hath engaged to manage the concerns and interests of his people so, that all things shall work together for good to them that love him. And do I not love him? Answer, O my heart, dost thou not love thy God much better than all the blessings which earth can boast, or which the grave hath swallowed up? Wouldst thou resign thine interest in him to recover these precious spoils, to receive this dear child from the dust, a thousand times fairer and sweeter than before? Rather let death devour every remaining comfort, and leave me alone with him; with whom when I indeed am, I miss not the creatures, but rather rejoice in their absence, as I am then more entire with him whom my soul loveth. And if I do indeed love him, this promise is mine, and all things, and therefore this sad event in particular, shall work together for my good. Shall I not then say, It is well? What if it exceeded all the stretch of my thoughts to conceive how it could in any instance be so? What are my narrow conceptions, that they should pretend to circumscribe infinite wisdom, faithfulness, and mercy? Let me rather, with Abraham, give glory to God, and in hope believe against hope."

Once more, let us consider how many invaluable blessings are given us by this covenant, and then judge whether we have not the utmost reason to acquiesce in such an event of providence. "If I am in covenant with God," may the believer say, "then he hath pardoned my sins, and renewed my heart, and hath made his blessed Spirit, dwelling in me, the sacred bond of an everlasting union between him and my soul. He is leading me through the wilderness, and will, ere long, lead me out of it to the heavenly Canaan. And how far am I already arrived in my journey thither, now that I am come to the age of losing a child! And when God hath done all this for me, is he rashly to be suspected of unkindness? He that spared not his own Son; he that gave me with him his Spirit and his kingdom, why doth he deny, or why doth he remove, any other favour? Did he think the life of this child too great a good to grant, when he thought not Christ and glory too precious? Away with that thought, O my unbelieving heart, and with every thought which would derogate from such rich amazing grace, or would bring any thing in comparison with it. Art thou under these obligations to him, and will thou yet complain? With what grace, with what decency, canst thou dispute this, or any other matter, with thy God? What right have I yet to cry any more to the King?" Would any of my brethren venture to say, "What though I be a child of God, and an heir of glory, it matters not, for my gourd is withered; that pleasant plant, which was opening so fair and so delightful, under the shadow of which I expected long to have sat, and even the Rock of ages cannot shelter me so well? I can behold that beloved face no more, and therefore I will not look upward to behold the face of God, I will not look forward to Christ and to heaven?" Would this, my friends, be the language of a real Christian? Nay, are there not many abandoned sinners who would tremble at such expressions? Yet is it not in effect the language of our tumultuous passions, when, like Rachael, we are mourning for our children, and will not be comforted, because they are not? Is it not our language while we cannot, like the pious Shunammite in the text, bring our afflicted hearts to say, It is well.

III. Pious parents, in such a circumstance, have further reason to say, It is well, as they may observe an apparent tendency in such a dispensation to teach them a variety of the most instructive and useful lessons, in a very convincing and effectual manner.

It is a just observation of Solomon, that the rod and reproof give wisdom, and it is peculiarly applicable to such a chastisement of our heavenly Father. It should therefore be our great care to hear the rod and him that hath appointed it, and so far as it hath a tendency to teach us our duty, and to improve the divine life in our souls, we have the highest reason to say, that it is indeed well.

Every affliction hath in its degree this kind of tendency, and it is the very reason for which we are thus chastened, that we may profit by our sorrows, and be made partakers of God's holiness. But this dispensation is particularly adapted, in a very affecting manner,—to teach us the vanity of the world,—to warn us of the approach of our own death,—to quicken us in the duties incumbent upon us, especially to our surviving children,—and to produce a more entire resignation to the divine will, which is indeed the surest foundation of quiet, and source of happiness.

I shall insist a little more particularly on each of these, and I desire that it may be remembered, that the sight and knowledge of such mournful providences as are now before us should, in some degree, be improved to these purposes, even by those parents whose families are most prosperous and joyful: may they learn wisdom and piety from what we suffer, and their improvements shall be acknowledged as an additional reason for us to say, It is well.

1. When God takes away our children from us, it is a very affecting lesson of the vanity of the world.

There is hardly a child born into it, on whom the parents do not look with some pleasing expectation that it shall comfort them concerning their labour. This makes the toil of education easy and delightful: and truly it is very early that we begin to find a sweetness in it, which abundantly repays all the fatigue. Five, or four, or three, or two years, make discoveries which afford immediate pleasure, and which suggest future hopes. Their words, their actions, their very looks, touch us, (if they be amiable and promising children,) in a tender, but very powerful, manner; their little arms twine about our hearts; and there is something more penetrating in their first broken accents of endearment, than in all the pomp and ornament of words. Every infant year increases the pleasure, and nourishes the hope. And where is the parent so wise and so cautious, and so constantly intent on his journey to heaven, as not to measure back a few steps to earth again, on such a plausible and decent occasion, as that of introducing the young stranger into the amusements, nay perhaps, where circumstances will admit it, into the elegances, of life, as well as its more serious and important business? What fond calculations do we form of what it will be from what it is! How do we in thought open every blossom of sprightliness, or humanity, or piety, to its full spread, and ripen it to a sudden maturity! But, oh! who shall teach those that have never felt it, how it tears the very soul, when God roots up the tender plant with an inexorable hand, and withers the bud in which the colours were beginning to glow! Where is now our delight? where is our hope? Is it in the coffin? Is it in the grave? Alas! all the loveliness of person, of genius, and of temper, serves but to point and to poison the arrow, which is drawn out of our own quiver to wound us. Vain, delusive, transitory joys! "And such, O my soul," will the Christian say, "such are thine earthly comforts in every child, in every relative, in every possession of life; such are the objects of thy hopes and thy fears, thy schemes and thy labours, where earth alone is concerned. Let me then, once for all, direct mine eyes to another and a better state. From these broken cisterns, the fragments of which may hurt me indeed, but can no longer refresh me, let me look to the fountain of living waters. From these setting stars, or rather these bright but vanishing meteors, which make my darkness so much the more sensible, let me turn to the Father of lights. O Lord, what wait I for? my hope is in thee, my sure abode, my everlasting confidence! My gourds wither, my children die; but the Lord liveth, and blessed be my Rock, and let the God of my salvation be exalted. I see, in one instance more, the sad effects of having over-loved the creature; let me endeavour for the future, by the divine assistance, to fix my affections there where they cannot exceed; but where all the ardour of them will be as much my security and my happiness, as it is now my snare and my distress."

2. The removal of our children by such awful strokes may warn us of the approach of our own death.

Hereby God doth very sensibly show us, and those around us, that all flesh is as grass, and all the glory and loveliness of it like the flower of the field. And when our own habitations are made the houses of mourning, and ourselves the leaders of that sad procession, it may surely be expected that we should lay it to heart, so as to be quickened and improved by the view. "Have my children died in the morning of their days, and can I promise myself that I shall see the evening of mine? Now perhaps may I say, in a more literal sense than ever, the graves are ready for me. One of my family, and some of us may add, the first-born of it, is gone, as it were, to take possession of the sepulchre in all our names; and ere long I shall lie down with my child in the same bed; yea, perhaps, many of the feet that followed it shall attend me thither. Our dust shortly shall be blended together; and who can tell but this providence is chiefly be intended as a warning blow to me, that these concluding days of my life might be more regular, more spiritual, and more useful, than the former?"

3. The providence before us may be further improved, to quicken us in the duties of life, and especially in the education of surviving children.

It is, on the principles I hinted above, an engagement, that whatever our hand findeth to do, we should do it with all our might, since it so plainly shows us that we are going to the grave, where there is no device, nor knowledge, nor working: but permit me especially to observe, how peculiarly the sentiments we feel on these sad occasions, may be improved for the advantage of our dear offspring who yet remain, and quicken us to a proper care in their religious education.

We all see that it is a very reasonable duty, and every Christian parent resolves that he will ere long apply himself to it; but I am afraid, great advantages are lost by a delay, which we think we can easily excuse. Our hands are full of a variety of affairs, and our children are yet very young: we are therefore ready to imagine it is a good husbandry of time to defer our attempts for their instruction to a more convenient season, when they may be able to learn more in an hour, than the labour of days could now teach them; besides that we are apprehensive of danger in overloading their tender spirits, especially when they are perhaps under indisposition, and need to be diverted, rather then gravely advised and instructed.

But I beseech you, my friends, let us view the matter with that impartiality which the eloquence of death hath a tendency to produce. "That lovely creature that God hath now taken away, though its days were few, though its faculties were weak, yet might it not have known a great deal more of religion than it did, and felt a great deal more of it too, had I faithfully and prudently done my part? How did it learn language so soon, and in such a compass and readiness? Not by multiplied rules, nor laboured instruction, but by conversation. And might it not have learned much more of divine things by conversation too, if they had been allowed a due share in our thoughts and our discourses, according to the charge given to the Israelites, to talk of them going out and coming in, lying down and rising up? How soon did it learn trifles, and retain them, and, after its little way, observe and reason upon them, perhaps with a vivacity that sometimes surprised me! And had I been as diligent as I ought, who can tell what progress it might have made in divine knowledge? Who can tell but, as a reward to these pious cares, God might have put a word into its dying lips which I might all my life have recollected with pleasure, and out of its feeble mouth might have perfected praise."

My friends, let us humble ourselves deeply before God under a sense of our past neglects, and let us learn our future duty. We may perhaps be ready fondly to say, "O that it were possible my child could be restored to me again, though it were but for a few weeks or days! how diligently would I attempt to supply my former deficiencies!" Unprofitable wish! Yet may not the thought be improved for the good of surviving children. How shall we express our affection to them? Not surely by indulging all the demands of appetite and fancy, in many early instances so hazardous, and so fatal; not by a solicitude to treasure up wealth for them, whose only portion may perhaps be a little cotton and shroud. No; our truest kindness to them will be to endeavour, by divine grace, to form them to an early inquiry after God, and Christ, and heaven, and a love for real goodness in all the forms of it which may come within their observation and notice. Let us apply ourselves immediately to this task, as those that remember there is a double uncertainty in their lives, and in ours. In a word, let us be that with regard to every child that yet remains, which we proposed and engaged to be to that which is taken away, when we pleaded with God for the continuance of its life, at least for a little while, that it might be further assisted in the preparations for death and eternity. If such resolutions be formed and pursued, the death of one may be the means of spiritual life to many; and we shall surely have reason to say it is well, if it teach us so useful a lesson.

4. The providence before us may have a special tendency to improve our resignation to the divine will; and if it does so, it will indeed be well.

There is surely no imaginable situation of mind so sweet and so reasonable, as that which we feel when we humbly refer ourselves in all things to the divine disposal, in an entire suspension of our own will, seeing and owning the hand of God, and bowing before it with a filial acquiescence. This is chiefly to be learned from suffering; and perhaps there is no suffering which is fitter to teach it, than this. In many other afflictions there is such a mixture of human interposition, that we are ready to imagine, we may be allowed to complain and to chide a little. Indignation mingles itself with our grief, and when it does so, it warms the mind, though with a feverish kind of heat, and, in an unnatural flow of spirits, leads the heart into forgetfulness of God. But here it is so apparently his hand, that we must refer it to him, and it will appear bold impiety to quarrel at what is done. In other instances we can at least flatter ourselves with hope, that the calamity may be diverted, or the enjoyment recovered; but here, alas! there is no hope. "Tears will not," as * Sir William Temple finely expresses it, "water the lovely plant so as to cause it to grow again; sighs will not give it new breath, nor can we furnish it with life and spirits by the waste of our own." The sentence is finally gone forth, and the last fatal stroke irrecoverably given. Opposition is vain: a forced submission gives but little rest to the mind: a cordial acquiescence in the divine will is the only thing in the whole world that can ease the labouring heart, and restore true serenity. Remaining corruption will work on such an occasion, and a painful struggle will convince the Christian how imperfect his present attainments are: and this will probably lead him to an attentive review of the great reasons for submission; it will lead him to urge them on his own soul, and to plead them with God in prayer; till at length the storm is laid, and tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience a hope which maketh not ashamed, while the love of God is so shed abroad in the heart, as to humble it for every preceding opposition; and to bring it even to a real approbation of all that so wise and good a friend hath done; resigning every other interest and enjoyment to his disposal, and sitting down with the sweet resolution of the prophet, Though the fig-tree do not blossom, and there be no fruit in the vine, &c. yet will I rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of my salvation. And when we are brought to this, the whole horizon clears, and the sun breaks forth in its strength.

Now I appeal to every sincere Christian in this assembly, whether there will not be reason indeed to say It is well, if by this painful affliction we more sensibly learn the vanity of the creature; if we are awakened to serious thoughts of our own latter end; if by it we are quickened in the duties of life, and formed to a more entire resignation of soul, and acquiescence in the divine will. I will only add once more, and it is a thought of delightful importance,

IV. That pious parents have reason to hope, it is well with those dear creatures who are taken away in their early days.

I see not that the word of God hath any where passed a damnatory sentence on any infants: and if it has not, I am sure we have no authority to do it, especially, considering with how much compassion the Divine Being speaks of them in the instance of the Ninevites, and on some other occasions. Perhaps, as some pious divines have conjectured, they may constitute a very considerable part of the number of the elect; and, as in Adam they all died, they may in Christ all be made alive. At least, methinks, from the covenant which God made with Abraham and his seed, the blessings of which are come upon the believing Gentiles, there is reason to hope well concerning the infant offspring of God's people, early devoted and often recommended to him, that their souls will be bound in the bundle of life, and be loved for their parents' sakes.

* Temple's Essays, Vol. I. p. 178.

It is, indeed, impossible for us to say how soon children may be capable of contracting personal guilt. They are quickly able to distinguish, in some degree, between right and wrong; and it is too plain, that they as quickly, in many instances, forget the distinction. The corruptions of nature begin early to work, and show the need of sanctifying grace; yet, without a miracle, it cannot be expected that much of the Christian scheme should be understood by these little creatures, in the first dawning of reason, though a few evangelical phrases may be taught, and sometimes, by a happy kind of accident, may be rightly applied. The tender heart of a parent may, perhaps, take a hint from hence to terrify itself, and exasperate all its other sorrows, by that sad thought, "What if my dear child be perished for ever!—gone from our embraces, and all the little pleasures we could give it, to everlasting darkness and pain!" Horrible imagination! and Satan may, perhaps, take the advantage of these gloomy moments, to aggravate every little infirmity into a crime, and to throw us into an agony, which no other view of the affliction can possibly give, to a soul penetrated with a sense of eternity. Nor do I know a thought, in the whole compass of nature, that hath a more powerful tendency to produce suspicious notions of God, and a secret alienation of heart from him.

Now for this very reason, methinks, we should guard against so harsh a conclusion, lest we at once injure the Divine Being, and torture ourselves. And, surely, we may easily fall on some reflections which may encourage our hopes, where little children are concerned; and it is only of that case that I am now speaking. Let us think of the blessed God, as the great parent of universal nature, whose tender mercies are over all his works; who declares that judgment is his strange work; who is very pitiful, and of tender mercy, gracious, and full of compassion, who delighteth in mercy, who waiteth to be gracious; and endureth, with much long-suffering, even the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction. He intimately knows our frame, and our circumstances; he sees the weakness of the unformed mind; how forcibly the volatile spirits are struck with a thousand new amusing objects around it, and borne away as a feather before the wind; and, on the other hand, how when distempers seize it, the feeble powers are overborne in a moment, and rendered incapable of any degree of application and attention. And, Lord, wilt thou open thine eyes on such a one, to bring it into strict judgment with thee? Amidst all the instances of thy patience and thy bounty to the most abandoned of mankind, are these little helpless creatures the objects of thy speedy vengeance and final severity?

Let us further consider, as it is a very considerable thought in these circumstances, the compassionate regard which the blessed Jesus expressed to little children. He was much displeased with those who forbade their being brought to him; and said, Suffer them to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God; and taking them up in his arms, he laid his hands upon them, and blessed them. In another instance we are told, that he took a little child, (who appears to have been old enough to come at his call,) and set him in the midst of his disciples, and said, Except ye become as little children, you shall in nowise enter into the kingdom of heaven. May we not then hope that many little children are admitted into it? And may not that hope be greatly confirmed from whatever, of an amiable and regular disposition, we have observed in those that are taken away? If we have seen* a tenderness of conscience, in any thing which they apprehend would displease the great and good God; a love to truth; a readiness to attend on divine worship, from some imperfect notion of its general design, though the particulars of it could not be understood; an open, candid, benevolent heart; a tender sense of obligation, and a desire, according to their little power, to repay it; may we not hope that these were some of the first fruits of the Spirit, which he would, in due time, have ripened into Christian graces, and are now, on a sudden, perfected by that great almighty Agent who worketh all, and in all?

Sure I am, that this blessed Spirit hath no inconsiderable work to perform on the most established Christians, to finish them in a complete meetness for the heavenly world; would to God there were no greater blemishes to be observed in their character, than the little vanities of children! With infinite ease then can he perfect what is lacking in their unfinished minds, and pour out upon them, in a moment, that light and grace, which shall qualify them for a state to compassion of which ours on earth is but childhood or infancy.

Now what a noble source of consolation we have! Then may the affectionate parent say, It is well, not only with me, but with the child too: incomparably better than if my [illegible] had been importunate prayers for its recovery had been answered. It is indeed well, if that beloved creature be fallen asleep in Christ; if that dear lamb be folded in the arms of the compassionate Shepherd, and gathered into his gracious bosom. Self-love might have led me to wish its longer continuance here, but if I truly loved my friend with a solid, rational affection, I should much rather rejoice, to think it is gone to a heavenly Father, and to the world of perfected spirits above. Had it been spared to me, how slowly could I have taught it! and in the full ripeness of its age, what had it been, when compared with what it now is! How is it shot up on a sudden, from the converse and the toys of children, to be a companion with saints and angels, in the employment and the blessedness of heaven! Shall I then complain of it as a rigorous severity to my family, that God hath taken it to the family above? And what if he hath chosen to bestow the distinguished favour on that one of my little flock, who was formed to take the tenderest hold of my heart? Was there unkindness in that? What if he saw that the very sprightliness and softness which made it to me so exquisitely delightful, might, in time, have betrayed it into ruin, and took this method of sheltering it from trials which had otherwise been too hard for it, and so fixing a seal on its character and happiness? What if that strong attachment of my heart to it, had been a snare to the child and to me? or what if it had been otherwise? Do I need additional reasons to justify the divine conduct, in an instance which my child is celebrating in the songs of heaven? If it is a new and untasted affliction to have such a tender branch lopped off, it is also a new honour to be the parent of a glorified saint." And, as good Mr. Howe expressed it on another occasion, "If God be pleased, and his glorified creature be pleased, who are we that we should be displeased!"*

* I [illegible]

"Could I wish, that this young inhabitant of heaven should be degraded to earth again? or would it thank me for that wish? Would it say, that it was the part of a wise parent, to call it down from a sphere of such exalted services and pleasures, to our low life here upon earth? Let me rather be thankful for the pleasing hope, that though God loves my child too well to permit it to return to me, he will ere long bring me to it. And then that endeared paternal affection, which would have been a cord to tie me to earth, and have added new pangs to my removal from it, will be as a golden chain to draw me upwards, and add one further charm and joy even to paradise itself." And O, how great a joy! to view the change, and to compare that dear idea, so fondly laid up, so often reviewed, with the now glorious original, in the improvements of the upper world! To borrow the words of the sacred writer, in a very different sense; "I said, I was desolate and bereaved of children, and who hath brought up these? I was left alone, and these, where have they been? Was this my desolation" this my sorrow" to part with thee for a few days, that I might receive thee for ever, and find thee what thou art?" It is for no language, but that of heaven, to describe the sacred joy which such a meeting must occasion.

* Howe's Life, page 49 (the end).

In the mean time, Christians, let us keep up the lively expectation of it, and let what has befallen us draw our thoughts upwards. Perhaps they will sometimes, before we are aware, sink to the grave, and dwell in the tombs that contain the poor remains of what was once so dear to us. But let them take flight from thence to more noble, more delightful, scenes. And I will add, let the hope we have of the happiness of our children render God still dearer to our souls. We feel a very tender sense of the kindness which our friends expressed towards them, and think, indeed very justly, that their affectionate care for them lays a lasting obligation upon us. What love then, and what service, do we owe to thee, O gracious Father, who hast, we hope, received them there into thine house above, and art now entertaining them there with unknown delight, though our former methods of commerce with them be cut off! "Lord," should each of us say in such a case, "I would take what thou art doing to my child as done to myself, and as a specimen and earnest of what shall shortly be done." It is therefore well.

It only remains, that I conclude with a few hints of further improvement.

1. Let pious parents, who have lost hopeful children in maturer age, join with others in saying, It is well.

My friends, the reasons which I have been urging at large, are common to you with us; and permit me to add, that as your case has its peculiar distress, it has, I think, in a yet greater degree, its peculiar consolations too.

I know you will say, that it is inexpressibly grievous and painful, to part with children who were grown up into most amiable friends, who were your companions in the ways of God, and concerning whom you had a most agreeable prospect, that they would have been the ornaments and supports of religion in the rising age, and extensive blessings to the world, long after you had quitted it. These reasonings have, undoubtedly, their weight; and they have so, when considered in a very different view. Must you not acknowledge it is well, that you enjoyed so many years of comfort in them? that you reaped so much solid satisfaction from them? and saw those evidences of a work of grace upon their hearts, which give you such abundant reason to conclude that they are now received into that inheritance of glory, for which they were so apparently made meet? Some of them, perhaps, had already quitted their fathers' house; as for others, had God spared their lives, they might have been transplanted into families of their own; and if, instead of being removed to another house, or town, or country, they are taken by God into another world, is that a matter of so great complaint; when that world is so much better, and you are yourselves so near it? I put it to your hearts, Christians, would you rather have chosen to have buried them in their infancy, or never to have known the joys and the hopes of a parent, now you know the vicissitude of sorrow, and of disappointment? But perhaps you will say, that you chiefly grieve for that loss which the world has sustained by the removal of those, from whom it might reasonably have expected so much future service. This is, indeed, a generous and a Christian sentiment, and there is something noble in those tears which flow on such a consideration. But do not so remember your relation to earth, as to forget that which you bear to heaven: and do not so wrong the divine wisdom and goodness, as to suppose, that when he takes away from hence promising instruments of service, he there lays them by as useless. Much more reasonable is it to conclude, that their sphere of action, as well as happiness, is enlarged, and that the church above hath gained incomparably more, than that below can be supposed to have lost by their death.

On the whole, therefore, far from complaining of the divine conduct in this respect, it will become you, my friends, rather to be very thankful that these dear children were spared so long, to accompany and entertain you in so many stages of your short journey through life, to answer so many of your hopes, and to establish so many more beyond all fear of disappointment. Reflect on all that God did in and upon them, on all he was beginning to do by them, and on what you have great reason to believe he is now doing for them; and adore his name, that he has left you these dear memorials, by which your case is so happily distinguished from ours, whose hopes in our children withered in the very bud; or from theirs, who saw those who were once so dear to them, perishing, as they have cause to fear, in the paths of the destroyer.

But while I speak thus, methinks I am alarmed, lest I should awaken the far more grievous sorrows of some mournful parent, whom it will not be so easy to comfort. My brethren and friends, what shall I say to you, who are lamenting over your Absaloms, and almost wishing you had died for them? Shall I urge you to say it is well? Perhaps you may think it a great attainment, if, as Aaron, when his sons died before the Lord, you can hold your peace under the awful stroke. My soul is trembled for you; my words are almost swallowed up. I cannot unsay what I have elsewhere said at large on that melancholy subject.* Yet let me remind you of this, that you do not certainly know what almighty grace might do for these lamented creatures, even in the latest moments, and have therefore no warrant confidently to pronounce that they are assuredly perished. And if you cannot but tremble in the too probable fear of it, labour to turn your eyes from so dark a prospect to those better hopes which God is setting before you. For surely you still have abundant reason to rejoice in that grace, which gives your own lives to you as a prey, and has brought you so near to that blessed world, where, hard as it is now to conceive it, you will have laid aside every affection of nature, which interferes with the interests of God, and prevents your most cheerful acquiescence in every particular of his wise and gracious determinations.

2. From what we have heard, let us learn not to think of the loss of our children with a slavish dread.

It is to a parent indeed such a cutting stroke, that I wonder not if nature shrink back at the very mention of it: and, perhaps, it would make those to whom God hath denied children more easy, if they knew what some of the happiest parents feel in an uncertain apprehension of the loss of theirs: an apprehension which strikes with peculiar force on the mind, when experience hath taught us the anguish of such an affliction in former instances. But let us not anticipate evils: perhaps all our children, who are hitherto spared, may follow us to the grave: or, if otherwise, we sorrow not as those who have no hope. We may have reason still to say, It is well; and through divine grace, we may also have hearts to say it. Whatever we lose, if we be the children of God, we shall never lose our heavenly Father. He will still be our support, and our joy. And therefore let us turn all our anxiety about uncertain, future events, into a holy solicitude to please him, and to promote religious impressions in the hearts of our dear offspring; that if God should see fit to take them away, we may have a claim to the full consolations which I have been representing in the preceding discourse.

3. Let us not sink in hopeless sorrow, or break out into clamorous complaints, if God has brought this heavy affliction upon us.

A stupid indifference would be absurd and unnatural. God and man might look upon us as acting a most unworthy part, should we be like the ostrich in the wilderness, which hardeneth herself against her young ones, as if they were not hers; because God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding. Let us sorrow like men, and like parents; but let us not, in the mean time, forget that we are Christians. Let us remember how common the calamity is; how few parents are exempt from it, some of the most pious and excellent have lost amiable children, with circumstances perhaps of peculiar aggravation. It is a trial which God hath chosen for the exercise of some who have been eminently dear to him, as we may learn from a variety of instances both ancient and modern. Let us recollect our many offences against our heavenly Father, those sins which such a dispensation may properly bring to our remembrance; and let that silence us, and teach us to own, that it is of the Lord's mercies we are not consumed, and that we are punished less than our iniquities deserve. Let us look round on our surviving comforts; let us look forward to our future, our eternal, hopes; and we shall surely see, that there is still room for praise, still a call for it. Let us review the particulars mentioned above, and then let conscience determine whether it doth not become us, in this particular instance, to say it steadily, and cheerfully too, Even this is well. And may the God of all grace and comfort apply these considerations to our mind, that we may not only own them, but feel them as a reviving cordial, when our heart is overwhelmed within us! In the mean time, let me beseech you whose tabernacles are in peace, and whose children are yet about you, that you would not be severe in censuring our tears, till you have experimentally known our sorrows, and yourselves tasted the wormwood and the gall, which we, with all our comforts, must have in a long and bitter remembrance.

* In the sixth of my Sermons to Young Persons, entitled, The Reflections of a pious Parent on the Death of a well-behaved Child.

4. Let those of us who are under the rod, be very solicitous to improve it aright, that in the end it may indeed be well.

Hear, my brethren, my friends and fellow-sufferers, hear and suffer the word of exhortation. Let us be much concerned, that we may not bear all the smart of such an affliction, and, through our own folly, lose all that benefit which might, otherwise, be a rich equivalent. In proportion to the grievousness of the stroke, should be our care to attend to the design of it. Let us, now God is calling us to mourning and lamentation, be searching and trying our ways, that we may turn again unto the Lord. Let us review the conduct of our lives, and the state and tenor of our affections, that we may observe what hath been deficient, and what irregular; that proper remedies may be applied, and those important lessons more thoroughly learnt, which I was mentioning under the former branch of my Discourse. Let us pray, that through our tears we may read our duty, and that by the heat of the furnace we may be so melted, that our dross may be purged away, and the divine image instamped on our souls in brighter and fairer characters. To sum up all in one word, let us endeavour to set our hearts more on that God, who is infinitely better to us than ten children, who hath given us a name better than that of sons and daughters, and can abundantly supply the place of all earthly enjoyments with the rich communications of his grace: nay, perhaps, we may add, who hath removed some darling of our hearts, lest to our infinite detriment it should fill his place there, and, by alienating us from his love and service, have a fatal influence on our present peace and our future happiness.

Eternal glory, my friends, is so great a thing, and the complete love and enjoyment of God so unutterably desirable, that it is well worth our while to bear the sharpest sorrows, by which we may be more perfectly formed for it. We may even congratulate the death of our children, if it bring us nearer to our heavenly Father; and teach us, (instead of filling this vacancy in our heart with some new vanity, which may shortly renew our sorrows,) to consecrate the whole of it to him who alone deserves, and can alone answer, the most intense affection. Let us try what of this kind may be done. We are now going to the table of the Lord;* to that very table where our vows have often been sealed, where our comforts have often been resigned, where our Isaacs have been conditionally sacrificed, and where we commemorate the real sacrifice which God hath made, even of his only-begotten Son, for us. May our other sorrows be suspended, while we mourn for him whom we have pierced as for an only Son, and are in bitterness as for a first-born. From his blood consolations spring up, which will flourish even on the graves of our dear children; and the sweetness of that cup which he there gives us, will temper the most distasteful ingredients of the other. Our houses are not so with God, as they once were, as we once expected they would have been, but he hath made with us an everlasting covenant, and these are the tokens of it. Blessed be his name, we hold not the mercies of that covenant by so precarious a tenure as the life of any creature: it is well ordered in all things and sure: may it be all our salvation, and all our desire; and then it is but a little while, and all our complaints will cease. God will wipe away these tears from our eyes; our peaceful and happy spirits shall, ere long, meet with those of our children which he hath taken to himself. Our bodies shall sleep, and, ere long, shall also awake, and arise with theirs. Death, that inexorable destroyer, shall be swallowed up in victory, while we and ours surround the throne with everlasting hallelujahs, and own, with another evidence than we can now perceive, with another spirit than we can now express, that all was indeed well. Amen.

* N. B. This sermon was preached October 3, 1756, it being sacrament-day. The child died October 1.

SERMON VII.

PRACTICAL REFLECTIONS ON THE CHARACTER AND TRANSLATION OF ENOCH.*

GENESIS v. 24.

And Enoch walked with God, and he was not; for God took him.

THE apostle gives it in charge to the believing Hebrews, that they should remember those who had presided over them, and had spoken to them the word of the gospel, well knowing it would be one sweet and powerful engagement, to follow their faith, especially when they considered the end of their conversation.

I persuade myself, that it will be a very easy matter for you, my friends, to remember that dear and faithful servant of Christ, who, for so many years,† had the pastoral care of you, guiding you, at once, in the integrity of his heart, and in the skilfulness of his hands. You who have grown up, and, as to some I may add, have grown old too, under his ministry, will surely find the recollection, notwithstanding all the sorrow that must now attend it, both too edifying and too delightful to be neglected. You must, no doubt, find some memorials of him, in various places and circumstances of life; but none more numerous, and none more pleasing, than your Bibles will afford you. How many awakening exhortations, how many comprehensive precepts, how many precious promises, have you, from sabbath to sabbath, heard him unfold! How many instructive and amiable examples have you not only heard, but seen him illustrate! It was the care and joy of his life, to form himself on those great models; and beholding them in the glass of Scripture, he was changed into the same image. In those originals therefore you will often trace him, and in which of them is not the resemblance beautifully conspicuous! Yet perhaps in few of the miniatures which are there drawn, is it more remarkably so, than in the account given of Enoch. He walked with God, and he was not, for God took him. As soon as you heard me read the words, you with pleasure saw how well they expressed, both the distinguished piety of your late minister's character, and the ease and suddenness of his removal from us.

It is impossible for me to express the tender sympathy, with which I undertake this melancholy office, which my honoured father was pleased to assign me. But I will attempt to break through the difficulty, and to suppress the fulness of my heart, so far as it would obstruct what I have to say, in humble hope, that, through the divine blessing, that which was the great end of his life and labours among you, may in some measure be promoted by this Discourse, occasioned by his death. And, I am persuaded, nothing will so nobly support your hearts under this sad separation, or so effectually secure and promote the pleasure of your future meeting with him, as a diligent care to be followers of him, as he was a follower of Enoch, and all the saints, in that holy course of walking with God, which is now to be the subject of our meditation. And that you may be both directed and animated in it, we will,

First, Explain the view given us of Enoch's life and character. He walked with God.

Secondly, Consider the happy close of this pious course. He was not, for God took him.

When I have handled these heads as fully as the time will admit, I shall,

Thirdly, Conclude with some practical reflections, and an address peculiarly suited to that awful providence which hath brought me among you this day.

And permit me to remind you, that your serious attention to what shall now be spoken, is one part of the respect which you owe to the memory of that worthy and excellent man, in whose place I stand.

First, Let us attentively survey the account which is here given us of the life and character of Enoch.

It is said, that he walked with God; a phrase which the same sacred historian useth concerning one of Enoch's descendants, i. e. Noah: He was a just man, and perfect in his generation, and Noah walked with God. And when it is said of other good men, that they walked before the Lord, it seems to be an expression much of the same import, and implies, that in the main series of their lives they maintained a firm persuasion of the being and per-fections of God, and of the other important principles of religion; and that in consequence of this they were careful to behave as in the divine presence; and on the other hand, that they were honoured with some gracious and comfortable tokens of the divine acceptance and favour; in a word, that there was a mutual friendship established and exercised between God and them. Blessed character, and happy state! May we be formed to it, and improved in it, while we more particularly review it in this instance of Enoch.

* Preached at Welford, in Northamptonshire, March 9, 1737-8, on occasion of the much lamented death of the late Rev. Mr. John Norris.

† N. B. Mr. Norris died Feb. 8, 1737-8, in the 68d year of his age, having been near 38 years minister at Welford.

1. When it is said that Enoch walked with God, it evidently implies, that he had a firm persuasion of the divine being and perfections, and the other important principles of true religion.

Of this the apostle expressly assures us, and argues it from the account here given of him. He had before his translation this testimony, that he pleased God; but without faith it is impossible to please him; for he that cometh to God, must believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

Enoch had undoubtedly this faith, by which he believed, that the worlds were made by God, and that he is the great supporter of all. He certainly traced him in his works of creation and providence, and considered him both as the greatest and the best of beings. He was firmly persuaded of his immutable existence, his almighty power, and unsearchable wisdom; and he also considered him as the wise, the righteous, and gracious governor of his rational creatures; the father, the guide, and the portion, of his people. Without these reverential and these fiducial regards, what foundation or what encouragement could there have been for his walking with God?

On these principles Enoch would easily infer the certainty of a future state of rewards and punishments; considering how little the present administrations of Providence bear the face of a final retribution. We are also assured by St. Jude, that he, by divine revelation, prophesied of the judgment-day, and may from that hint probably conjecture, that other important articles of religion might in such an extraordinary way be discovered to him. We may especially conclude, that being thus divinely instructed in the certainty and pomp of Christ's second coming, he was not left entirely ignorant of the purposes of his first appearance. And no doubt Adam, who was for the last three hundred years of his life contemporary with Enoch, would not fail to acquaint him with that first important promise relating to the seed of the woman, as the noblest support to the hopes of a guilty creature.

It is indeed impossible for us to determine, how far his views of the Messiah reached; but it is highly congruous to the rest of his character, to conclude, that he traced every intimation of this glorious Deliverer with pleasure, and joyfully accepted him, so far as he was made known, as the great medium of his reconciliation to God, and converse with him.

2. In consequence of this persuasion of the great truths of religion, Enoch made it his care to behave as in the divine presence.

He walked with God, i. e. he habitually conducted himself as one that was with God. And, as it is said of Moses, he endured and acted as seeing him who is invisible. It may be worth our while, more particularly to consider, how this would influence his secret, his domestic, and his public conduct.

We may assure ourselves that it had a great influence upon him in secret, not only to restrain him from secret sins, but to excite him to the discharge of those secret duties which a present Deity so reasonably requires, and which they that have a suitable sense of his presence cannot omit. This certainly led him to spend many an hour in devout retirement, meditation, and prayer: and we may reasonably conclude, that the good man was never less alone than when he was alone. He probably never made nearer approaches to heaven before his translation thither, than when he had got rid of other cares, other amusements, and other company; that he might be all at leisure for his God.

It is also very evident, that this sense of the divine presence must have influenced Enoch in his domestic life. Short as the Mosaic history of this holy man is, we learn from it, that he was the master of a family, and stood in the relation of a husband and a parent; and, which is something remarkable, we do not find that any of the patriarchs married younger than he; for his son Methuselah was born in his sixty-fifth year; which, considering the age of men in the antediluvian world, must be the bloom of his father's youth. With this family he lived three hundred years, governing himself, no doubt, by a resolution like that of pious Joshua, That he and his house would serve the Lord. His care would be, like that of Abraham in after-ages, to command his household after him to keep the way of the Lord.

He would probably often call them together to join in sacrifice and prayer; when perhaps his children, as we read of Job's, were remembered, according to the number of them all. He could not but be solicitous to train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, that they might learn to know the God of their fathers, and be inclined to serve him with a perfect heart and a willing mind.

And he would be sure to enforce all his precepts by a good example. A soul so habitually near to God, and so constantly sensible of his presence, must be open to all the tenderest sentiments of humanity and benevolence. He would, of course, study to make every body about him easy and happy, and, like your venerable and beloved pastor now with God, would wear a constant smile on his countenance, which he probably saw reflected from the face of every child and servant in the family. Happy were they that resided in it! for surely they might have continued there from one century to another with growing improvement and delight.

And could we have traced Enoch into public life, we should undoubtedly have found that part of his character agreeable to the rest. Like Jesus, he went about doing good, his head still full of wise schemes, and his heart overflowing with benevolent affections; so that whatever advantages his rank and circumstances gave him, were faithfully employed for the common good. We may conclude, that such a person was approved by men, as well as accepted of God, that, "when the eye saw him it blessed him, and when the ear heard him it gave witness to him."

There is great reason to believe, that his lips as well as his hands fed many; and so much the rather, as he was a prophet commissioned by God to teach the people, and to bring them some extraordinary revelations from him. Thus we read, in words which I hinted at above, That Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with myriads of his saints, or holy ones, to execute judgment upon all; and to convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds which they have impiously committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him. From whence it plainly appears, that he lived in a very degenerate age, when impiety and immorality abounded, when insolent sinners, as in our days, set their mouths against the heavens, and gave their tongues an unbridled licence of walking through the earth. But he bore his undaunted testimonies to the truth of God in the midst of all their opposition and contempt. He resolutely set his face like a flint, as he well knew that in such a cause he should never be ashamed. His heart, humane and tender as it was, could not but we warmed with a generous indignation at the dishonours which were done to the divine Majesty, and knowing the terrors of the Lord, he endeavoured to persuade men. We would hope his endeavours were not entirely in vain, but that, through the concurrence of divine grace, he was the happy instrument of stemming the torrent for a while, or at least of recovering and preserving a few, who might be the companions of his walk with God here, and are now his associates in glory.

Such a governing care to approve the main series of his private, domestic, and public conduct to the Being in whose presence he always knew himself to be, must surely be comprehended in the phrase before us; and it will be pleasant to consider,

3. That the expression further intimates his being honoured with corresponding tokens of the divine acceptance and favour.

Enoch walked with God; and can two walk together, except they be agreed? It plainly implies, that he lived in a state of friendship with God; or, as the apostle expresseth it, even before his translation had a testimony that he pleased him. Thou meetest, saith the prophet, him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness, even such as remember thee in their ways. Thus did Enoch remember God, and thus was he visited by him. The high and lofty One who inhabiteth eternity, who dwelleth in the high and the holy place, condescended to dwell with this holy man, as he was humble, and of a contrite spirit.

Public assemblies for divine worship were, no doubt, seasons of delightful converse with God; and Enoch would on that account honour and love them, whoever might forsake them, whoever might despise them. And in his house and his retirements, his journeys, and his converse with his friends, he had God still with him. He walked in the light of God's countenance, and was surely looking up often in a day, often in an hour, and saw by faith the most delightful sight on this side heaven, or even in heaven itself, the smiling face of a reconciled God and Father. He felt the gentle elapses of the divine love shed abroad in his heart by the Spirit given unto him, which, no doubt, though under a darker dispensation, witnessed with his spirit, that he was a child of God, and an heir of eternal glory.

As piety was the source of all his social and personal virtues, the fragrancy of it, as a sacred perfume, would mingle itself delightfully with all his social and personal enjoyments, and heighten them to a degree unknown to those who have not thus tasted the joys which a stranger intermeddleth not with. In every advantageous circumstance of life he saw and observed the hand of the divine bounty; and discerning also the interposition of the same providence in all his afflictions, (for afflictions he undoubtedly had,) he not only submitted to them in humble silence, but cordially acquiesced in them all, as the means which infinite wisdom and goodness had chosen to carry on his own kind designs, for his final everlasting happiness.

And such universally are the ways, and such the supports and pleasures, of those who walk with God. Happy the men that are in such a case, yea, happy the men whose God is the Lord; happy they by whom he is thus constantly owned and regarded, honoured and enjoyed. I persuade myself, that after such a description, I need not insist largely on the dignity, the security, and the delights of such a life, especially as it is to be the business of my second general head.

Secondly, To consider the happy close of this pious course. He was not; for God took him.

For the further illustration of which, you will observe, that he was early and suddenly removed from our world,—that he was taken to dwell with God,—and that he was received to that happy state in a miraculous and unparalleled way. All these particulars evidently appear from the account which Moses gives of this important fact, as illustrated by the writers of the New Testament.

1. Enoch was early and suddenly removed from our world.

He was not, i. e. he was no longer here. You may perhaps wonder that I should speak of his early remove, when you recollect that he was then three hundred and sixty-five years old. But you will not blame the expression, when you consider the long lives of men in those antediluvian ages, to which this period bore but a small proportion. As his son Methuselah lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years, so his father Jared attained to nine hundred and sixty-two years; and therefore, being one hundred and sixty-two years old at his birth, continued in the world four hundred and thirty-five years after Enoch had left it; whose age at the time of his translation answered to about the thirty-first or thirty-second year of life at present, which you know is just the vigour and prime of it. But he had undoubtedly lived much in a little time, and had done more for God before he had reached what was then accounted the meridian of life, than many who had outstripped him in age by several centuries. On this a gracious God excused him from the trouble of passing through a longer pilgrimage, and of drooping under the burthen of declining years. And surely so wise and good a man would have been thankful for the favour, though it had not been bestowed in so extraordinary a way; especially as this removal was not only early, but sudden too.

This suddenness the words do beautifully express: He was not, i. e. he disappeared at once; as riches sometimes do, when they take their wings, and fly away, as an eagle towards heaven: on which account they are called things that are not. The apostle renders it, He was not found; perhaps intimating, that some diligent search was made after him, as after Elijah, when in a very distant succeeding age he was in an extraordinary manner received into glory.

Let us pause a little on this delightful thought. What a sudden transition this good man had from earth to heaven! He was not; for God took him. He probably rose in the morning in perfect health, and went forth with his usual composure and sweetness of temper to the appointed duties of the day; and while he was perhaps conversing with his pious friends, which was the case with Elijah, or while, like Christ, he was praying with and for them, or engaged in some other act of social worship, he was suddenly called away. No tedious illness, no sad farewell to those that were at home. This happy man was in the way of his duty one moment, and in the regions of immortality the next. He was not; for God took him; which further implies,

2. That he was taken to dwell with God.

He had walked with him in this house of his pilgrimage, yet still his faith and hope had been waiting for a more noble and more perfect state, and that hope did not make him ashamed. Having guided him by his counsels, God received him to glory. And this was to him the crown of all his honour and joy, that he was received to God. Divine grace had long since taught him to say, Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none on earth that I desire beside thee: and God treated him as a friend that loved him, and was beloved by him. As if he had not been satisfied with visiting him below, he called him to dwell above. He showed him the path of life, and conducted him to his presence, where there is fulness of joy; and to his right hand, where there are pleasures for evermore.

And that holy soul, which hath been trained up for heaven by so long a course of devotion and virtue, would find itself most happily attempered and connaturalized to the world to which it was received. He changed his place indeed, but his employments and pleasures were in the main the same. He still walked with God, but with a steadier pace, more unwearied ardour, and more exquisite delight. How gladly would he have obeyed this divine call to that world, though death in its most dreadful forms had stood to meet him in his passage thither! But through the peculiar favour of God to him, we are informed,

3. That he was received to this happiness in a miraculous, and, till that time, an unparalleled, way.

For his sake God was pleased to create a new thing on the earth, and permit a child of Adam to enter the gates of his glory, without taking the road appointed to the best of men in the course of nature, in passing through the valley of the shadow of death.

I cannot say that we could with any certainty have inferred this from the words of Moses alone: He was not; for God took him. That phrase might have been interpreted of a sudden death; as Rachel is said to lament, because her children were not; and Job expressed his apprehension of immediate death, by saying, Thou shalt seek me in the morning, and I shall not be. Now had Enoch passed out of life thus, it might have been said that God took him, as Asaph speaks of being received into glory. And our Lord promises his apostles, who were to go the way of all flesh, that he would come, and receive them to himself. But St. Paul, who was guided by an unerring spirit, which would sufficiently secure him from being imposed upon by any fanciful comment, or precarious tradition, has fixed the matter beyond all reasonable doubt, by saying, That through faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him.

This was a case hitherto unequalled, nor hath the like happened even to the present day, excepting only the rapture of Elijah, and the ascension of Christ.

We are at large told in the book of Kings, that the pious Elijah, who like Enoch had signalized his zeal for God in a very degenerate age, was favoured with an extraordinary remove like his. He was fetched up to heaven by a detachment of angels, who brought along with them a splendid vehicle, which is called a chariot of fire prepared for that purpose, and which might possibly by some unknown operation be the means of purifying and refining the mortal part of his nature,* to such a degree as was necessary in order to its inhabiting that kingdom of God, which flesh and blood cannot enter, and which corruption cannot inherit.

I speak also of the ascension of our blessed Redeemer, as a parallel instance, because, though he died, yet he rose again from the dead, and continued a while upon earth, eating and drinking, and travelling from place to place, as he had done in the days of his flesh; so that his flight to the regions of glory was as miraculous, and might as properly be called a translation, as if he had not died at all.

And in this respect the saints which are found alive at the general judgment, shall be conformed to these great examples. For we are expressly told by St. Paul, who mentions it as a mystery till then kept secret, and now but imperfectly revealed, that we shall not all die, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. And he illustrates it, when he tells the Thessalonians, that after the resurrection of those that sleep in Jesus, they who are alive shall be caught up with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, in order to our being for ever with him. Words with which we may justly comfort ourselves, and each other, for those consolations of God are not small.

And it is exceeding probable this would have been the stated manner of passing from earth to heaven, had not sin made its fatal inroads upon us, and death entered in its train. For nothing can be more certain than that, had not the increasing numbers of mankind been one way or another thinned and diminished, earth would several thousand years ago have been too small to nourish, or even to receive, its inhabitants.

It would be great presumption in me to pretend to describe the change made in the body of Enoch, by this translation, or to give an account of the circumstances that attended it; since the sacred historian hath not thought fit to record them. I will not pretend to say how much reason a learned and ingenious writer of our own† might have to conjecture, that all the antediluvian patriarchs whom Moses mentions, (except Adam, who was now dead, and Noah, not yet born,) might be assembled, perhaps with multitudes more, to see this great sight; yet I cannot think it passed without any witness at all. When Elijah was to be taken up, it is very evident, that not only he himself had some intimations of the time and manner, but that it was divinely revealed to the prophets of Bethel and Jericho, as well as that Elisha was permitted to be an eye-witness of it. And when Christ ascended, it was in the presence of all the apostles, while he spake with them, and they beheld, and looked stedfastly upon him. And there is the greater reason to believe that something like this might be the case with Enoch, because his translation might probably be intended to answer many valuable and important purposes, which required at least some competent number of witnesses, if not a large and public assembly.

So far as this important fact was known, it would be the most glorious testimony the world had ever received of God's regard to singular and distinguished piety. His permitting righteous Abel to fall by the hand of his cruel and wicked brother, might have been a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, and that career of prosperous tyranny and violence, with which the giants of those ages were then filling the earth, might have tempted men to suspect that the Lord had forsaken it. This no doubt imboldened ungodly sinners in their hard and impious speeches, as well as their ungodly deeds. But when Enoch, that holy prophet, who had so long been the object of their profane mockery and derision, was thus singled out from the whole race of men, as the friend of God, and taken to dwell with him, it would evidently appear, there was a reward for the righteous, and a God who judged in the earth.

It would also be a sensible demonstration of the reality of an invisible world, and would, by a train of easy consequences, confirm men's natural apprehensions of the immortality of the soul, and of the existence of some nobler orders of beings in the upper world, with whom wise and righteous men

* ——— Corpus mortale per auras
Dilapsum tenues, credita plumbea fundæ
Missa solet medios glans volitabile cœlo,
Pulchra subit facies.—Ovid. Met. Lib. xiv. v. 824, &c.

† Dr. Hunt, of Div. Rep. p. 44.

are at length to be incorporated, as members of the same blessed society.

And as the body of Enoch was thus translated, it would naturally appear an intimation, that God had prepared a future happiness for the bodies of his people, as well as their souls, and consequently that the trophies of the grave should at length be recovered, and the sleeping dust of the saints raised and animated anew. And a future state of punishment for the wicked, is so evident a counterpart to this doctrine, that few could be so stupid as not to infer it, from the fact here under consideration.

Such important lessons as these might the world have learnt from the translation of any persons of distinguished piety; but there were some peculiar purposes to be answered by that of Enoch, considered not only as a preacher of righteousness, but as a prophet too, and as one who had foretold the coming of the Lord with ten thousand of his saints, to take vengeance on rebellious and impenitent sinners; and a day of vengeance to them, must surely imply a day of reward and glory to those men whom they had despised, reviled, and oppressed. Now if Enoch in his life on earth wrought no miracles, as we find not that he did, his ascension would be a most convincing proof of his divine mission; and indeed, as many of the miracles of Christ also were, it would be a specimen, as well as a seal, of the truth of the doctrine which he taught.

On all these accounts I think I may venture to say, the translation of Enoch would be a more important favour to others, than it was even to himself, and consequently it is reasonable to believe, that the same goodness which induced the Divine Being to perpetuate the memory of this fact for the instruction and encouragement of future ages, would likewise induce him to make it so public and visible, that there should be at least a few credible eye-witnesses to attest it.*

And thus, my brethren, you have heard of the piety of Enoch, and you have seen, as James expresses it, the end of the Lord. I shall conclude,

Thirdly, with a few hints, by way of improvement, which I shall leave you further to prosecute in your own meditations.

You will naturally fix on such reflections as these:

1. How pleasant it is to think of this friendly intercourse, which through a Redeemer is established between heaven and earth!

It is strongly illustrated in this great instance, Enoch walked with God, and God took him. Is it not at once a delightful and a surprising thought? That the great Sovereign of universal nature, who humbleth himself to behold the angels, when they stand around him, vailing their faces, and covering their feet in his presence, should form such a friendship with human, yea with sinful, creatures, that they may be said to walk with him; even they whose guilt might cause them to flee from his presence, like our fallen parents, and from whose pollutions he might justly turn away his holy eyes with abhorrence. Yet we see all these obstacles overcome; and hear of it not as the privilege of Enoch alone, but of all his true Israel, that he will dwell in them, and walk with them; that they shall be his people, and that he will be their God.

And in consequence of this, we are also raised to the blessed hope of being at length taken to him, though not in so immediate a manner, yet as surely, and at length as completely, as Enoch was. A mortal creature may say, Thou wilt guide me by thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory. Yea, the lowest real Christian has the security of his word and covenant, that he shall at last have a yet more solemn and more abundant entrance administered to him into the kingdom of his Father and his God.

And whence are these privileges and these hopes, my brethren? Let us often ask our own hearts the question, when we are enjoying God's presence, and waiting for his salvation. And let us answer it in those words of the apostle, "We that were once afar off, are brought near by the blood of Christ." By Christ hath God reconciled us to himself; by Christ have we now access to him as our Father: and as Christ, who hath the keys of death and the unseen world, is the person who is to call us from hence into that which is within the vail; so he is at length to complete the purposes of divine love to us, by coming again, and receiving us to himself, that we, like triumphant Enoch, yea, and with him too, in that day of his greatest triumph, may in our entire persons ascend to the regions of immortal holiness and perfect joy: Let us labour continually to feel the greatness of our obligations to this blessed Redeemer, and with daily dependence on his atonement and righteousness, his intercession and grace, let us, in every remaining step of this pilgrimage, be walking humbly with our God.

2. How solicitous should we be that we may have our lot, both in time and eternity, with those who, like Enoch, have walked with God!

I have now been describing the character and temper of a truly good man, a character common to all the children of God, whatever their particular denomination or profession may be. But must I not reasonably fear, that some among you are so much strangers to it, that you find this an unintelligible language? Let me address myself to such of you with a word of expostulation, and to all with a serious exhortation. O that it might penetrate each of our hearts!

* I have taken no notice of that singular account which the ingenious Author of the Essay on Divine Dispensation, &c. gives of Enoch's Translation; which he supposes was not being taken to dwell with the Shekinah, in the terrestrial paradise. I have waved the mention of this, because it depends on a very precarious conjecture, that the Shekinah had so stated abode there: and also because were this to be allowed, since this author doth not pretend to say, that Enoch was with the Shekinah in the ark, it cannot be supposed that to have been during the deluge, he must grant that he ascended into heaven some time before the flood. So that I cannot see my end at all to be answered, by supposing his translation was any thing different from that ascension.

Why are you strangers to walking with God? Is it an imaginary thing, even this which Scripture so honourably records, which God himself so singularly owned, and through the riches of his grace rewarded too? O Sirs, there was surely as much reality and solidity in it, as in the heavenly world, in which it ended.

And let conscience answer; Is it not an honourable, is it not a pleasant, way of passing through life? Do you think that while Enoch was thus employed, and entertained, he had indeed any reason to envy the richest, the greatest, the most prosperous, or the most luxurious sinner? Do you not in your hearts believe that it must be a very comfortable thing to converse daily with God as a friend and a father, to conduct ourselves before him in such a manner as to be assured of his approbation, and to be able to rejoice that he knows every most secret thought of our soul? Do you not think it must sweeten solitude, to think of him as always near us, and increase the pleasures of society too, when our converse with others is made subservient to our communion with him? And above all, do you not really apprehend that reflections on a life like this would greatly soften the approach of death, and quite transform the very appearance of it?

And I beseech you to consider, that this is not a light thought. However you may neglect God now, you must have one awful interview with him; and if you do not and will not walk with him, he will, in another and very different sense of the word, take you. He will arrest your fugitive souls in the midst of these thoughtless ungrateful wanderings, and your spirits must return to God that gave them. Now doth not your own reason, as well as the divine word, tell you, that there will be an unspeakable difference between the manner in which different souls are received by him on that return; a difference between the reception of those who have lived in a holy friendship with him, and those who, like yourselves, have always been strangers to him; whose language it hath in effect been, "Let them walk with God that will, but I for my part have other company, and pleasures, and business, to attend." Is there not an apparent fitness that the former should be taken into a state of everlasting nearness to God, and the latter driven to a perpetual distance from him, whom they have chosen to forget and forsake? And with all your self-partiality, would it not appear an indecency and irregularity in the divine administration, to treat such different persons upon a foot of equal friendship?

See to it, my friends, that you are not self-condemned. See to it that you do not pass a sentence against your own souls, and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life. Acquaint yourselves with God now, and be at peace with him, lest he resent the injury done to his offered friendship, and turn away from you in the day of your final distress, with a righteous disdain; for it is an everlasting, most obvious, but most important, truth, that they who are far from God shall perish.

Let me also address a solemn exhortation to those that have experimentally known what such converse with God means, and who by his good Spirit have been led into a holy walk with him. Pursue it, I beseech you, with greater resolution and care; for surely it is well worth your pursuit. I appeal to you, Christians, with pleasure on this head: Have not those been your most comfortable days in which you have most constantly attended to it? Days which have passed with the greatest delight, and which have been reflected upon with the greatest satisfaction? Is not this and that place recommended to you, by the dear remembrance, that you have walked with God there? this and that book and friend endeared, as having been instrumental in promoting that converse? Say then whether it be not worth your while, with the most attentive reflection, to concert measures for improving and cultivating this divine friendship! Whether, when you have fixed upon them, it will not be your wisdom diligently to pursue them, though some considerable difficulties may be in your way! Let not any estrangedness grow between God and your souls, but review the various branches of Enoch's character as your own model, if you would live with joy, and die with courage. Let your conduct be such, especially in secret, and then we may reasonably conclude, that your domestic and public behaviour will not be much unlike it. And then you may enter into the spirit of our next reflection, which is all I shall add.

3. With how much pleasure should we look up after those holy souls, who, having walked with God upon earth, are now taken by him to a heavenly abode!

Can any of us apprehend, that if the nearest relatives of Enoch were witnesses of his translation, they beheld it with weeping eyes, or sent out a gale of sighs or peal of groans after him; how tenderly soever they loved him, and how much soever of the support or delight of their lives might seem to depend on his continuance with them? Or if their fondness thus prevailed over their reason and their faith, can we imagine that their ascending triumphant friend would have approved of such a conduct? Would he not rather have beheld it with a mixture of compassion and displeasure; if displeasure could have been felt in so happy a circumstance? But we will rather hope, that they hailed his flight to the paradise of God, and bore it away with them, as a long and a powerful cordial, under all the sorrows and distresses of life, that Enoch was so comfortably and so honourably delivered from them, and secured by adamantine walls from every invasion of sorrow and of sin; yea, from the sight of those crimes and miseries which had formerly tormented his righteous and tender spirit.

And why should not we in like manner congratulate our dear deceased friends, who are not any longer here with us, because God hath taken them? You will perhaps have a ready answer, and immediately say, Enoch was translated, but the friends we lament are dead, and our tears flow from that consideration. But let me further ask, Is there not a passage to the presence of God through the valley of the shadow of death? And do we not firmly believe they have found that passage? In some cases, especially in a case like this now before us, we should think it a kind of impiety to doubt it. And if so, methinks there is not so much difference between the temper with which we should regard the deceased and translated saints, as we may be ready at first to imagine.

It is true, the persons of whom we now speak have dropped their bodies in the grave; but that is no pain to them, nor any such important loss, as that for their sakes we should greatly regret it.

If we saw them after the labour of a fatiguing day, or after a long fit of painful and languishing illness, fallen into a gentle slumber, and knew that their minds were, during that interval, entertained with the visions of God, like those which the prophets saw, and raised to sublime and elevated devotion, beyond what they had ever before felt, should we mourn over them because their senses were locked up, and they did not, for that time, see the light of the sun, nor hear such poor conversation as ours? Should we not rather rejoice, and be tenderly solicitous to guard their sleeping moments, and watch that nothing might break in upon them, and call them down to earth and vanity too soon? And are not their slumbers now as sweet? and are not their visions as bright and glorious? What though they do not breathe? what though their blood does not circulate, and the curtains of the grave be drawn around them? Is there so much in these circumstances, to give us anxiety and distress?

O but, you will say, we should have a secret hope that our sleeping friends would awake again, and renewing the interrupted converse, relate to us what had passed in that interval; and we could with pleasure wait weeks and months in expectation of that. Nay, but shall we not ourselves ere long awake, if we are Christians indeed? if we are walking with God, shall we not ere long be taken by him, not to the amusements of a pleasing dream, but to those solid, substantial, everlasting pleasures, which his saints above are drinking in with unutterable delight.

Lord, we are hoping for thy salvation, may we in the mean time be doing thy commandments! While we walk with thee, we will not complain of the length or the roughness of the way; nor will we be inconsolable for the loss of the most pleasant companion, or most able guide. For thy name's sake do thou lead us and guide us, and we will wait thy call to enter into thy rest.

Such were the sentiments, and such the temper, of that truly reverend and excellent person, whose death was the occasion, the very mournful occasion, of my appearing this day amongst you; on whose character it would be easy for me to dilate much more largely than my time will now admit, or than I judge it proper to do in a funeral Discourse, where flattery is so often introduced, that the simplicity of most obvious truth is ready to be suspected. I shall only say, in a few words, that what I said of Enoch in the first head of my Discourse, (excepting only what was peculiar to his circumstances as a patriarch and a prophet,) is what, by long observation, I had seen in Mr. Norris. And I appeal to those of his family, and to you his people, whether there was not in almost every sentence a visible resemblance, and whether it might not very properly be repeated here with a mere alteration of the name. So evident was it that he walked closely with God; and firmly believing the great doctrine both of natural and revealed religion, made it his constant care to behave as in the divine presence, and lived under the sensible tokens of divine acceptance and favour: which diffused over his heart, and even over his countenance, an habitual joy, which is no where to be found on earth, but in Christians of such distinguished attainments in piety.

But though I must not allow myself to dwell on this pleasing subject, I hope I may be permitted publicly to acknowledge the sense I have of the favour of Divine Providence to me, in leading me so early into the acquaintance of this excellent person, and blessing me with so great a share of his friendship: with which I was honoured from my first entrance into the ministry, and which his singular humanity and condescension, wisdom and piety, have rendered exceeding delightful and improving to me in all the succeeding years of life.

And surely I should be greatly deficient in the duty of this day, if I did not solemnly charge it upon you frequently to recollect your obligations to the divine goodness, in giving you so able and so tender a shepherd, and in continuing him amongst you for so long a time with such cordial love, that repeated, unanimous, and earnest solicitations from the most considerable congregations in the neighbouring counties,* could not prevail upon him to remove from you. So evident was it that he took the oversight of you, not by constraint, but willingly, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind.

It may eminently be said of you, my friends, in a spiritual sense, that you have been fed with the finest of the wheat, as the pure and uncorrupted truths of the gospel have been preached amongst you, with plainness and seriousness, and in the spirit of love. Your minds have not been amused with useless subtilties and barren speculations: you have not been vexed with strifes of words unprofitable and vain, nor grieved with passionate invectives against your brethren of any denomination: invectives which are never more criminal than when delivered in the name of the Lord, and which too often turn the food of souls into poison, and that which should have been for their welfare into a trap. This good man brought out of the good treasure of his heart good things. His generous and benevolent soul overflowed with sentiments of candour and love, and he was never more in his own element, than when he was telling you that the kingdom of God is not meat or drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. And I firmly believe, that in the eight and thirty years of his ministry among you, he never delivered a sermon, or a sentence, inconsistent with that great principle.

I join with you in lamenting that none of those elaborate and judicious discourses which he delivered among you, from sabbath to sabbath, are, or can be, published to the world. For though it is certain, that his graceful and venerable aspect, and his easy yet lively manner, gave a peculiar beauty to them, as delivered by himself; yet, when I consider how judiciously his thoughts were selected, how methodically they were disposed, and with what propriety, elegance, and spirit, they were expressed, I am well assured, they would generally have been esteemed a rich addition to that great number of practical writings, with which our age and country is already blessed, and with which I hope it will still abound.

But I trust, my friends, it is not in vain you have heard those discourses which you cannot review. I know they fell as soft as showers of snow on the ears of his hearers; and I hope they also penetrated your hearts, and left permanent and fructifying effects there, which will not pass away like snow before the sun. Let your profiting then appear unto all men. And so much the rather, as you have had the advantage of seeing his precepts illustrated by the most prudent, inoffensive, and amiable behaviour. You have seen him providing things honest and honourable in the sight of all men. You know how gentle, how benevolent, how cheerful, and how useful his conversation was. How open his hand and his heart were to every office of friendship, to every work of charity. Go ye, therefore, and do likewise.

As for what he was in the domestic relation of life, I had almost said I wish it may not be too long, but I will rather say, too tenderly, remembered. The loss of a husband so constantly obliging, so affectionately sympathizing, so well furnished as a prudent guide, and a pleasant companion, and so well disposed for the offices of both, will, I fear, be too deeply felt. May the sense of it be tempered with those divine consolations, which he was so eminently fit to administer, but which have not surely lost their value, and will not, I hope, lose their relish, though no longer administered by him! May the children, which were dear to him as his own, never forget with how much diligence he instructed them, with how much importunity and constancy he prayed for them, and with what tenderness he watched over all their interests! May they ever behave answerably to those advantages, that the numberless petitions which have been put up for them, may descend in the richest blessings on their head!

I know, my friends, that the loss must sit heavy on all your hearts, and as to those with whom I have personally conversed, since this breach was made, I have heard your lamentations, and seen your tears. But remember, I beseech you, how much you owe to the divine goodness in giving you such a minister and such a friend, in continuing him among you, with such vigour of health and cheerfulness of spirits, for so many years, a burning and shining light; I may add, even in the decline of life, growing brighter and brighter. And though his removal, while his capacities of usefulness were to the last so great,† must be very affecting to you, yet I cannot forbear saying, that you have some peculiar reason to be thankful for the manner and circumstances of his death.

Nature was not racked with tormenting pain, nor worn out by a tedious consuming illness; but the good man grew a little drowsy towards the evening of his long day, and having served his generation according to the will of God, gently fell asleep, as he was going from one apartment of his house to another; and all the business and struggle of dying was over, in less time than could have served him to get up the stairs, as he was attempting to do. It is a delightful thought, that God dismissed his servant in so peaceful a manner, that his death so much resembled a translation, and he was not; for God took him.

I doubt not, but every one of us is ready to say, "So

* Particularly Birmingham and Nottingham

† It is observable, that Mr. Nonconformity preached his last sermon, and conducted the public services of the day, in a most lively and affectionate prayer for his people, which could not have been more suitable if he had known he was then taking his last farewell.

may I live, and so may I die!" But while we live here, if we have any regard to our own comfort, or the public good, it must grieve us to see our breaches thus multiplied upon us, to see the lights of the sanctuary extinguished, and his people here, and in so many neighbouring flocks, even at the very same time, left as sheep having no shepherd. Yet I must hope the great Shepherd of Israel will continue to feed you, and as the residue of the Spirit is with him will raise up a suitable supply. To him I most cordially recommend you, and all my other friends, who are mourning your losses and their own. And under all that burthen of care and sorrow, in which my share is so peculiarly apparent, would exhort you to say, and join with you in saying, The Lord liveth, and blessed be our Rock, and let the God of our salvation be exalted!

SERMON VIII.

CHRIST'S MYSTERIOUS CONDUCT TO BE UNFOLDED HEREAFTER.*

John xiii. 7.

—What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter.

Our Lord Jesus Christ has in all ages taken care to exercise the faith, the patience, and submission of his people: and he has done it, while carrying on the kindest designs towards them, and while he has been acting in the strictest prosecution of those designs. He was now engaged in a work of astonishing condescension and goodness: the disciples saw it with amazement, that He, the Son of God, and the heir of all things, the promised Messiah, the King of God's church, should condescend to wash their feet. Peter could not bear the thoughts of permitting it: and that occasioned the words I have now been reading; in which we have a general truth delivered by our Lord, which it is profitable for us frequently to reflect upon, and the reflection is now peculiarly seasonable.

The words presented themselves to my mind, as soon as I heard, to my unspeakable surprise, the melancholy tidings of the death of my dear pupil, and friend, and brother, who but the very last sacrament day was with us at the table of the Lord, and who but a few days before had been speaking to us in his name. When I heard, that God had by a sudden stroke, which left his friends in a mixture of astonishment and distress, taken away one so richly adorned with gifts and graces, so well qualified for public usefulness, just as he was entering upon it, just as he was unanimously chosen to preside over a numerous and important congregation, and was within a few weeks more to have gone from us to have taken up his stated residence among them; struck with the surprise, I say, and with the anguish, of this unexpected blow, which yet it was natural to consider as coming from the hand of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the great Sovereign of his church, and holds the keys of the unseen world and of death, these words immediately presented themselves to me: and therefore I determined to offer you some plain and serious meditations upon them; and shall accordingly raise three observations from them, which I shall endeavour to illustrate and improve.

I. That there may be some things in the conduct of the blessed Redeemer towards his people, which they may not at present be able fully to understand.

II. That nevertheless the time will come, when they shall have much clearer views of the reasons of his dispensations.

III. That in the expectation of this, it is highly fit they should acquiesce in what he does, how unknown soever the reasons may at present be. These several observations I shall briefly speak to, and then,

IV. Apply all this to the present occasion.

I. There may be some things in the conduct of our blessed Redeemer towards his people, now, which they may not at present be able fully to understand. It is a supposable case,—and when we come to consider the thing, it is also evidently fact.

1. It is in the nature of things a very supposable case, as will appear, when we consider,—who the Lord Jesus Christ is,—who and what we are,—and the relation in which he stands to us as our Lord and Sovereign.

Consider who he is: no less a person than the only-begotten Son of God, in whom are hid all the treasures of divine wisdom and knowledge: and can it be thought wonderful, that the counsels of God are unsearchable? We know that his nature is so; for who can by searching find out God? who can find out the Almighty to perfection? And well may we conclude, his schemes must be so; and therefore say with the apostle Paul, Oh the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! The God of Israel, and the Saviour, is oftentimes a God that hideth himself. His way is in the sea, and his path in the deep waters.—The angels themselves cannot trace all his footsteps, and how much less can we poor frail mortals, so often perplexed in our own counsels, so often brought as it were to our wit's end, with difficulties and entanglements that arise from the management of our own little affairs, in this narrow and contracted circle! Can we expect then to fathom his depths? to comprehend his schemes? to form a perfect judgment of his royal, his imperial, plan? —How little a portion is it that is known of him, who is the King of all the world, and head over all things to the church! God has subjected to him all things visible and invisible: nor are we capable of discerning how one wheel touches another in this complex scheme; how the concerns of one province of his kingdom may be interwoven (as it were) with those of another; or what curious wheels may be within other wheels, and give them a motion which we know not of, and which it would be very unfit we should know. It is a labyrinth intricate in proportion to the art and design with which it is wrought up. We may in reason then expect it should be thus. And again,

* Preached at Northampton, May 15, on the death of the Rev. Mr. Jonas Shepherd, who died May 1, 1750, Ætat. 22.

2. It is also what we see in fact to be so. We know not in numberless instances what our Lord intends: we know not what the event will be. And we do in fact see, that though all things are under the government of Christ, yet many things happen, which we should have imagined his kindness and tenderness to his people would have prevented, as we are sure that his power could do it.

We often see his dearest children afflicted, we see the most holy, humble, watchful, spiritual souls often drooping and dejected; when yet we know, that he could in a moment pour in the oil of gladness to heal their wounds, and cause their faces to shine, and their hearts to overflow with a divine joy.

We see generous and public-spirited Christians, who could delight with a liberal hand to relieve his poor members, themselves poor, themselves perhaps after many a worthy service reduced to need that assistance from others, which they have once so readily imparted; though we know, that all riches are in the hand of Christ, that all events and all hearts are under his influence.

We see most useful and excellent persons removed and taken off, many of them in the prime of life, some in the midst of their usefulness, and some in the very beginnings of it; and these, not only persons amiable and exemplary in private life, but of public character, adorned by the hand of Christ himself with much of his own image, and with that rich furniture, which qualifies them for being (as we should imagine) most proper instruments to bring [illegible] souls to himself, and greatly to build up his languishing church and interest. We see some of them perhaps cut off before they have made any public appearance at all; and others, when they have just began to speak in the name of the Lord: and with regard to others, he weakens their strength in the midst of the way; diseases arrest them, and make them prisoners; and threaten perhaps in a little while longer to bring them down to the dust with their departed brethren: yet we know, Jesus is the universal Lord, to whom belong the issues from death; that he knows all the secret springs of life, and all the secret sources of disease, and could easily by one powerful word remove the causes of the complaint, or direct to means most efficacious for recovery.

We see churches made desolate by the enemy, whom we know he could restrain; we see them polluted with scandals, which we know he could prevent; we see their numbers diminished, though we know that he could easily send out his Spirit, and renew the face of them, and cause many to enter for one that he removes: yea, we see among those whom we must hope to be his little flock, many divisions, many errors, many imprudences and follies, that alienate the hearts of Christians one from another, and bring religion into disgrace, though Christ could easily let in beams of light which should guide into truth, beams of love which should sweetly unite and cement multitudes, so that they should sensibly be one in him.—So mysterious is his conduct, and so different the face of his poor church, as well as the state of many of its members, from what we should expect it to have been under the government of such a head. What he does, we know not now. But then it was observed,

II. That nevertheless the time will come, when we shall have much clearer views of the reasons of his dispensations,—Thou shalt know hereafter. And to illustrate this I would observe,—that sometimes these reasons open, even while we continue in this world;—but we may expect to know it in many other instances, when the present scenes are closed, and we enter on that which is within the veil.

1. Sometimes the reasons of Christ's mysterious dispensations open upon us, even while we are here in this world.

So in this instance that the text refers to, it was but a few minutes, and our Lord had cast the towel with which he was girded, and sat down and told them, why he had washed their feet: that it was to teach them to wash one another's feet; that is, to promote their humility, and their readiness to serve one another in love, even in the most condescending offices they might have an opportunity of performing. And thus in many other instances, though the great end of Christ's dispensations be in regard to the eternal world, yet there are subordinate ends which may be answered here; and when we come to find they are answered, we may learn the design of Providence in these means which we did not before understand. As when the disciples saw the honourable manner in which Christ dismissed the poor Canaanitish woman at last, they saw the reasons why he seemed to neglect her so long; it was, that her faith might be displayed by the trial, that they might see she was a more excellent woman than they could otherwise have imagined; and that the mercy might be sweeter to her in proportion to the delay.

And do I not now speak to the experience of some that hear me?—Cannot many of you reflect with me upon strange dispensations of Providence, which have at length produced the happiest effects? It is a known story of a person, who having lost all his wealth, was led to apply himself to philosophy, and in consequence of that, attained such a government of himself, such wisdom, and such reputation, as made him abundantly happier than he ever had been; so as to make him say, "I had been undone, if I had not been undone." And thus perhaps one and another of us may say, "The Lord took away my parents when I was young, and I thought I had lost my only friends: but he raised up those for me, who did more and better for me than my parents could have done, and showed his special love and care in taking me up when my father and mother forsook me."

Another may say, "In younger life he exercised me with many disappointments, he stripped me of many of my comforts, and withered many of my hopes; but I found it good to bear the yoke in my youth: and by unthought-of turns, it may be, in relative life he has done much better for me, than with my fond passions I should have done for myself."

"He has been pleased," may a third say, "to take away my dear children, perhaps several of them successively, and those of them that were peculiarly the delight of my eyes; but he has drawn my heart more powerfully to himself by it, and he is better to me than ten children."

"He has blasted the work of my hands," may another say, "I have insensibly lost, perhaps what I painfully got; or I have been stripped of some considerable part of my possessions at once: but my poverty has enriched me. I have learned the vanity of the world more, and have been more fully convinced that it cannot be my happiness."

"My constitution has been much impaired," may another say, "I have passed solitary sabbaths, I have known a great deal of pain and languishing: but it has taught me to submit to my Father's will; it has directed my eyes to that world, where the inhabitants shall not say, I am sick, and where I shall be fixed as a pillar in the temple of my God."

"I would not have been without afflictions," may they all say; "nor without this and that particular affliction," may each perhaps reply, "upon any terms. I know, O Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me: thou hast humbled me, thou hast taught me to know what was in my heart; and I know by my afflictions, more than prosperity might have taught me, of the love that is in thine heart to me." But then,

2. We may expect to know the reasons of Christ's dispensations in many other instances, when we shall come into the future world. "In thy light shall we see light:" and I doubt not, but in the heavenly state many circumstances will concur to give us a much better acquaintance with the methods of the divine dealings, than it is possible for us to attain upon earth:—our eye will be strengthened;—our prospect will be extended;—our company will be improved;—and our Lord may perhaps give us plainer lessons by immediate discovery from himself.

In heaven, the eye of the soul will be strengthened, and our faculties raised to unutterable degrees. All indolence will be done away, and we shall be awakened into everlasting attention. All prejudices will be quite removed; and we shall be willing to admit truth in all its lustre, and to follow it wherever it may lead us.

Our prospect there will be enlarged, and we shall have much more extensive views of things: for we shall see the conduct of Christ, in its influence upon scenes that lie at present quite out of our sight. We see Christ's administrations now, as they regard this earth alone; but then we shall see them as they regard heaven. We may then perhaps see, that there was a certain post of service to be filled above, which required just such a one as divine grace had made this or that young person, who might indeed have been very fit to have served the church below, but for whom God meant much higher and better things.

Our companions in glory may also very probably assist us by their wise and good observations, when we come to make the providence of God here upon earth, under the guidance and direction of the Lord Jesus Christ, the subject of our mutual converse.

And it is impossible for us to say, how immediately the Lord Jesus Christ may himself interpose in giving us plainer lessons, and clearing up his conduct to us. By direct and immediate revelation he may communicate to us what his schemes were, and show us how they were going on in a direct harmonious manner, as the planets in the visible heavens, when they seem to us to stand still, or to go backwards. In the mean time, let me observe,

III. That it is highly fit we should acquiesce in what Christ does, how unknown soever the reasons of it may be to us. And that, upon these two plain and certain principles,—that we know, that in all he does his ends are graciously directed,—and that his means are wisely chosen.

1. We know that his ends are graciously directed. We know that he intends, in all he does, the honour of God, and the good of all his people. Can we make any doubt of this? One would think, we really did: and yet we know, that he has given them the most gracious promises, even of a glorious resurrection, and of a blessed immortality: and that he has loved them so well, that he has died for them, has shed his own precious and invaluable blood for their redemption and salvation. And can we after this allow ourselves to suspect him? Can we doubt that he intends to make his people for ever happy? And intending this, can he fail to effect it in the properest manner?—Surely I may add,

2. We know that his means are wisely chosen.

Can we have any room to question this? Is he not the incarnate Wisdom of God? And can you entertain any suspicion of him? If you trust not faith alone, trust sense. Look up to the heavens; look down to the earth: behold, how wisely all is ordered, in the growth of such a variety of plants, in the provision that is made for such a multitude of animals of various kinds, in the subserviency of all to the subsistence and delight of human life; and then say, Does this look like any deficiency in wisdom? And are not these things the work of Christ? Did he not lay the plan, and execute it? Were not all things created by him, whether visible or invisible? And will you still doubt whether he who made, and who governs and preserves, all things, is wise enough to conduct your affairs, or not? Methinks our Lord may justly expostulate with the suspicious, with the complaining, Christian, "O thou of little faith, wherefore dost thou doubt? Whom wilt thou trust, if thou trustest not me? Will thou trust thine own wisdom? alas! how often has it deceived thee! Wilt thou trust thy self-love? alas! how utterly has it undone thee! Can my Father trust me with all the infinite concerns of his glory and kingdom; and canst thou not trust me with thy little all? Did I die for thee! did I pour out my blood for the redemption of thy immortal soul! and canst thou imagine I will not take care of it? And if I do, will it not be safe? Or if thou canst confide in me, that I will take care of thy soul, and make it both safe and happy, canst thou not trust thine estate with me, thy health, thy reputation, thy usefulness, thy children, thy friends? Are these things more than that soul, which I have so dearly purchased, which I have so tenderly received, which I have so constantly watched over, and in which I have already made such a change for the better, that if thou wouldst be just to thyself and me, thou needest but to look upon it, and mightest find an argument from what it is, in comparison of what it once was, to trust me for every thing else?"

"Lord," should each of us by this time say, "it is enough! It is more than enough! I am ashamed of my weakness and folly. Behold, here I am, do with me as thou wilt! Dispose of me and my concerns just according to thine own pleasure! I will not object one word, I will not indulge one thought of suspicion: I will say, It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good. I will keep mine eye upon thy hand; I will sometimes look back to thy cross, and sometimes look up to thy throne; and I will not only be contented, but thankful. Yea, Lord, I will see what I can do towards obeying in the midst of all my troubles that great command of thine, which, great as it is, was a command fit for such a Redeemer to give, Rejoice evermore: rejoice in the Lord always; and again, I say, rejoice."—And now, after what has been said, I would conclude,

IV. With applying all this to the present occasion, by hinting at some ends, which we may suppose our Lord to have had in view in this solemn transaction of his providence, which occasioned the discourse I have now been delivering.

Let us lay down this as the foundation, that it is the hand of Christ; that he has turned the key; that he has taken away his young servant, whom he raised up here, whom he called so early by his grace, whom he taught to pray when he was but a child; and to pray in such a manner, that I will take the liberty publicly to tell you, "that the account I had of a prayer of his, overheard when he little thought it, by a dear friend, almost seventeen years ago, that is, when he was but about five years old, had its influence in engaging me to come and settle in this place." It was from Christ that he received that steadiness, that tenderness, that ripe experience in the things of God, which made his private and his public labours so remarkably agreeable to the most judicious Christians of this society, and of other societies. It was the grace of Christ which bore him unhurt through so many temptations, by which others have been insnared and dishonoured, their characters sunk, and their usefulness diminished, if not [illegible]. And [illegible] us not imagine, that the messenger of death came to him without a commission from the great Lord of life. Let us not imagine, that his spirit was called out of time into eternity without the voice of a Redeemer, or that the important doors of the invisible world were opened without his hand. Christ has taken him away; and he had no doubt his reasons for it; reasons, many of them perhaps unsearchable to us, yet we may conjecture as to some of them: and it may be profitable for a few remaining minutes to dwell upon the view; the rather, as so many breaches have been made, so many of this kind too, which have fallen under the notice of many of us. Particularly,

1. Our Lord by such a providence might intend to teach us, how little he needs any of our services.

Our dear departed friend seemed indeed a vessel of honour fitted for his Master's use; but he is broken in pieces, and we are ready to say with the afflicted church of old, The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, how are they esteemed as earthen pitchers, the work of the hands of the potter! But herein our great Lord displays his royalty: he can form the most promising instruments of service; and can lay them aside, and carry on his cause without them. Let us not then any of us imagine ourselves, or each other, to be necessary to him. He will, if he pleases, do us the honour to use us; if not, he will immediately lay us by in the grave. We, and those who esteem us most, and who love us best, should submit, and say, Behold, as the clay is in the hand of the potter, so are we in the hand of the Lord our God. And it is fit it should be so: for we are weak as clay, and at the same time also are of as little value, and even less than the dust of the earth, when compared with him. Again,

2. It may be the design of our Lord by such a providence as this, to teach us to cease from man.

We are instructed by it, not to depend too much upon any of our surviving brethren and friends: for it is the language of this providence, Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils: for wherein is he to be accounted of? God changes our countenance, and sends us away. But a few months ago, who was more likely to have continued than dear Mr. Shepherd! But God sent a mortal distemper upon him in the night, and his friends in the morning found him senseless; and he spoke no more, and hardly moved any more, till he died. Such is every man in his best estate! Thus may we fall, and those on whom we most depend. Lord, what do we then wait for? with regard to ourselves, with regard to thy church, our hope is in thee. Further,

3. Our Lord might thus intend in a peculiar manner to exercise our submission and resignation to his wise and gracious will.

We should look upon the death of every friend in this view, as a call to us to acknowledge his sovereignty over life and death. Behold, he taketh away, and who can hinder him? or who shall say unto him, What doest thou? And the more touching the case is, the deeper ought our submission to be; because the greater is that natural tendency which we are ready to feel in our minds, to rise against and to dispute his determinations. Particularly, when God takes away from aged Christians a young friend who has been the delight of their eyes, whom they have tenderly nursed up from his infancy, just when they most needed his assistance, and he was most capable of giving it, as well as strongly inclined and determined to do it: when God takes away, not only a young minister of eminent and distinguished abilities, but one who even from his childhood had been bred up amongst us; one who had constantly attended with us every sabbath day on public worship, with that endearment of mutual respect and affection on his part and ours, which must be the result of so intimate a relation: one of whom we have so particularly thought when we have been acknowledging the divine goodness in "raising up of our sons for prophets, and of our young men for Nazarites;" it is then particularly seasonable, that we should struggle with our own hearts to say, Thy will be done! Once more,

4. It may be the design of such a providence as this, to quicken us all in our work, and especially his surviving brethren.

Had it been the death of a stranger in such circumstances, it might have quickened us: to see a young person taken thus away; going to bed at night tolerably well, (for that was the case, though with some complaint, yet in no such immediate danger as should give any peculiar alarm,) and then found in his bed the next morning speechless and senseless, and continuing without perception, and in a great measure without motion, till he expired. I repeat these circumstances again, that young inattentive minds may be struck with them.—But it is particularly striking, when we consider it is one, whom we so intimately knew; one, with whom so many of us have been conversing and praying almost every day for many years, as well as worshipping every sabbath, and communicating every sacrament day. May we all hear that voice, which cries, Be ye also ready! Especially, may we attend to it, who are forming for, or engaged in, the ministerial work!

My dear brethren, and much beloved charge, suffer the word of exhortation. You knew this amiable and excellent youth in a most intimate manner: let me briefly recommend to you the many things which you saw exemplary in him:—his constancy and reverence in attending divine worship, both in public and private;—his diligence in business;—his steadiness and regularity in conduct;—his prudent and honourable care to avoid silly and extravagant expenses;—his solicitude to take every opportunity of improving in every branch of learning, that was taught where he attended; especially what related most directly to his sacred profession;—his unwearied application to the study of the Scripture, and continued watchfulness for every opportunity of improving it; and above all, his zeal for the glory of God, and for the gospel of Christ, and its glorious and peculiarly distinguishing truths. I heartily wish each of you, who are to appear under such a public character, the like judgment and solidity in your compositions, the like grave, serious, unaffected, and experimental strain, the same solicitude to do good both to the bodies and souls of men, which made his work his pleasure. You see, how short his career of service here has been: yours may perhaps be as short, and yet shorter. However that be, I pray God, that you may fulfil it as worthily as he did. And then, should I also see your early deaths, I should congratulate rather than condole you; and esteem such a speedy removal, as a peculiar token of your Lord's favour to you, however I might lament it as an awful stroke on those of us who should survive.

I trust, that his dear aged relatives have that better world in too near a prospect, to stand in need of much condolence. May God sanctify every dark dispensation of his providence to them, and to us, and give us faith and patience to wait that day, when the last veil shall be taken off, and the terms on which we shall be restored to each other shall leave us no room to mourn, that we have been for a while separated, with whatever circumstances of surprise and distress that separation may have been attended! Amen.

A HYMN ON THE OCCASION.

I.

JESUS, we own thy sov'reign hand;
Thy faithful care we own:
Wisdom and love are all thy ways,
When most to us unknown.

II.

By thee the springs of life were formed,
And by thy breath are broke;
And good is every awful word
Our gracious Lord has spoke.

III.

To thee we yield our comforts up;
To thee our lives resign;
In straits and dangers, rich, and safe,
If we and ours are thine.

IV.

Thy saints in earlier life removed,
In sweeter accents sing;
And bless the swiftness of the flight,
That bore them to their King.

V.

The burthens of the lengthened day
With patience we would bear;
For evening's welcome hour shall show,
We were our Master's care.

SERMON IX.

THE CHRISTIAN WARRIOR ANIMATED AND CROWNED.*

DEDICATION.

To the Right Honourable the Lady Frances Gardiner.

MADAM,

THE intimate knowledge which I had of Colonel Gardiner's private as well as public character, and of that endeared friendship which so long subsisted between him and your ladyship, makes me more sensible than most others can be, both of the inexpressible loss you have sustained, and of the exquisite sense you have of it. I might, in some degree, argue what you felt, from the agony with which my own heart was torn by that ever to be lamented stroke, which deprived the nation, and the church, of so great an ornament and blessing: and indeed, Madam, I was so sensible of your calamity, as to be ready in my first thoughts to congratulate you, when I heard the report which at first prevailed, that you died under the shock. Yet cooler reflection teaches me, on many accounts, to rejoice that your ladyship has survived that dearest part of yourself; though after having been so lovely and pleasant in your lives, it would have been matter of personal rejoicing, in death not to have been divided. The numerous and promising offspring with which God hath blessed your marriage, had evidently the highest interest in the continued life of so pious and affectionate a mother: and I hope, and assuredly believe, there was a more important, and to you a much dearer, interest concerned, as God may be, and is, signally honoured, by the manner in which you bear this heaviest and most terrible stroke of his paternal rod.

* Preached at Northampton, October 13, on the heroic death of the Honourable Colonel James Gardiner, who was slain in the battle at Prestonpans, September 21, 1745.

God had been pleased, Madam, to make you both eminent for a variety of graces; and he has proportionably distinguished you both, in the opportunity he has given you of exercising those, which suit the most painful scenes that can attend a pious and an honourable life. But when I consider, what it is to have lost such a man, at such a time, and in such circumstances, I must needs declare, that brave and heroic as the death of the Colonel was, your ladyship's part is beyond all comparison the hardest. Yet even here has the grace of Christ been sufficient for you; and I join with your ladyship in adoring the power and faithfulness of him, who has here so remarkably shown, that he forgets not his promise to all his people, of a strength proportionable to their day; that they may be enabled to glorify him in the hottest furnace into which it is possible they should be cast.

To hear (as I have heard from several persons of distinguished character, who have lately had the happiness of being near your ladyship) of that meek resignation to the divine will, of that calm patience, of that Christian courage, with which, in so weak a state of health and spirits, you have supported under this awful providence, has given me great pleasure, but no surprise. So near a relation to so brave a man might have taught some degree of fortitude, to a soul less susceptible of it than your ladyship's. Nor is there any doubt, but the prayers he has so long been laying up in store for you, especially since the decay of his constitution gave him reason to expect a speedy remove, will assuredly at such a season come into remembrance before God. And above all, the sublime principles of the Christian religion, so deeply imbibed into your own heart as well as his, will not fail to exert their energy on such an occasion. These, Madam, will teach you to view the hand of a wise, a righteous, and a gracious God in this event; and will show you, that a friendship founded on such a basis, so very endearing, and so closely cemented, as that which has been here for many years a blessing to you both, can know only a very short interruption, and will soon grow up into a union infinitely nobler and more delightful, which never shall be liable to any separation.

In the mean time, Madam, it may comfort us not a little under the sense of our present loss, to think what religious improvement we may gain by it, if we are not wanting to ourselves: and happy shall we be indeed, if we so bear the rod, as to receive the instructions it so naturally suggests and enforces. Persons of any serious reflection will learn from this awful event, how little we can judge of the divine favour by the visible dispensations of Providence here: they will learn, (and it may be of great importance to consider it, just in such a crisis as this,) that no distinguished degree of piety can secure the very best of men from the sword of a common enemy: and they will see (written, alas, in characters of the most precious blood that war ever spilt in our island) the vanity of the surest protectors and comforters which mortality can afford, at a time when they are most needed.

These are general instructions, which I hope thousands will receive, on this universally lamented occasion: but to you, Madam, and to me, and to all that were honoured with the most intimate friendship of this Christian hero, his death has a peculiar voice. Whilst it leads us back into so many past scenes of delight, to the remembrance of which we now pour out our souls within us, it calls aloud, amidst all this tender distress, for a tribute of humble thankfulness to God, that ever we enjoyed such a friend, and especially in such an intimacy of mutual affection: and that we had an opportunity of observing, in so many instances, the secret recesses of a heart, which God had enriched, adorned, and ennobled with so much of his own image, and such abundant communications of his grace: it calls for redoubled diligence and resolution, in imitating that bright assemblage of virtues, which shone so resplendent in our illustrious friend: and surely it must, by a kind of irresistible influence, mortify our affections to this impoverished world; and must cause nature to concur with grace, in raising our hearts upwards to that glorious abode, where he dwells triumphant and immortal, and waits our arrival with an ardour of pure and elevated love, which it was impossible for death to quench.

Next to these views, nothing can give your ladyship greater satisfaction, than to reflect, how happy you made the amiable consort you have lost, in that intimate relation you so long bore to each other; in which, I well know, that growing years ripened and increased your mutual esteem and friendship. Nor will your generous heart be insensible of that pleasure, which may arise from reflecting, that the manner of his death (though in itself so terrible that we dare not trust imagination with the particular review) was to him, in those circumstances, most glorious, to religion highly ornamental, and to his country (great as his loss is) on various accounts beneficial. Far, very far, be it from us to think, that Colonel Gardiner, though fallen by the weapons of rebellion, has fought and died in vain. I trust in God, that so heroic a behaviour will inspire our warriors with augmented courage, now they are called to exert it in a cause, the most noble and important that can ever be in question, the cause of our laws, our liberty, and religion. I trust, all who keep up a correspondence with heaven by prayer, will renew their intercession for this bleeding land with increasing fervour, now we have lost one who stood in the breach with such unwearied importunity. And I am well assured, that of the multitudes who lay up his memory in their inmost hearts with veneration and love, not a few will be often joining their most affectionate prayers to God, for your ladyship, and the dear rising branches of your family, with those which you may, in consequence of a thousand obligations, always expect from,

Madam,

Your ladyship's most faithful
and obedient humble servant.

Northampton, November 27, 1745. P. DODDRIDGE.

Rev. ii. 10, latter part.

—— Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.

It is a glory peculiar to the Christian religion, that it is capable of yielding joy and triumph to the mind, amidst calamities, in which the strength of nature, and of a philosophy that has no higher a support, can hardly give it serenity, or even patience. Those boasted aids are but like a candle in some tempestuous night, which, how artificially soever it may be fenced in, is often extinguished amidst the storm, in which it should guide and cheer the traveller, or the mariner; whom it leaves on a sudden, in darkness, horror, and fear: while the consolation of the gospel, like the sun, makes a sure day even when behind the thickest cloud, and soon emerges from it with an accession of more sensible lustre.

The observation is verified in these words, considered in connexion with that awful providence, which has this day determined my thoughts to fix upon them, as the subject of my Discourse; the fall of that truly great and good man, Colonel Gardiner: the endearing tenderness of whose friendship would have rendered his death an unspeakable calamity to me, had his character been only of the common standard; as on the other hand, the exalted excellency of his character makes his death to be lamented by thousands, who were not happy in any peculiar intimacy or personal acquaintance with him.

While we mourn the brave warrior, the exemplary Christian, and the affectionate friend; lost to ourselves and our country, to the church and the world, at a time when we most needed all the defence of his bravery, all the edification of his example, all the comfort of his converse: struck with the various and aggravated sorrow of so sudden and so terrible a blow, methinks there is but one voice that can cheer us, which is this of the great Captain of our salvation, so lately addressing him, and still addressing us, in these comprehensive and animated words; Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.

With regard to the connexion of them, it may be sufficient to observe, that our Lord in all these seven epistles to the Asiatic churches represents the Christian life as a warfare, and the blessings of the future state as rewards to be bestowed on conquerors. "To him that overcometh will I give" such and such royal donatives. Pursuing the same allegory, he warns the church of Smyrna of an approaching combat, which should be attended with some severe circumstances. Some of them were to become captives; the "devil shall cast some of you into prison:" and though the power of the enemy was to be limited, in its extent as well as its duration, to the tribulation of ten days, it seems to be implied, that while many were harassed and distressed during that time, some of them should before the close of it be called to resist unto blood. But their great leader furnishes them with suitable armour, and proportionable courage, by this gracious assurance, which it is our present business further to contemplate: Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.

In which words you naturally observe a charge,—and a promise by which it is enforced.—I shall briefly illustrate each, and then conclude with some reflections upon the whole.

First, I am to open the charge here given: Be thou faithful unto death.

Concerning which I would observe, that though it is immediately addressed to the church at Smyrna, yet the nature of the thing, and numberless passages of the divine word, concur to prove, that it is common in its obligation, to all Christians, and indeed to all men.

I shall not be large in explaining the nature of faithfulness in general; concerning which I might show you, that the word here rendered faithful, has sometimes a relation to the testimony which God has given us, and sometimes to some trust that he has reposed in us. In the former sense, it is properly rendered believing, and opposed to infidelity: Be not faithless, but believing. In the latter, it is opposed to injustice: He that is faithful in that which is the least, is faithful also in much: whereas he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much. And it is in reference to this sense of it, that our Lord represents himself as saying to the man who had improved his talents aright, Well done, good and faithful servant! Our deceased friend was so remarkably faithful in both these senses, so ready to admit, and so zealous to defend, the faith once delivered to the saints, and so active in improving those various talents, with which in mercy to many others, as well as to himself, God had intrusted him; that it was very natural to touch upon these significations of the word, though it has here a more particular view to another virtue, for which he was so illustriously conspicuous, I mean, the courageous fidelity of a soldier in his warfare.

In this sense of the word, it is opposed to treachery or cowardice, desertion, or disobedience to military orders. And thus it is used elsewhere in this same book of the Revelation, when speaking of those who war under the banner of the Lamb, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, the inspired writer tells us, they are called, and chosen, and faithful, a select body of brave and valiant soldiers.

This hint will also fix the easiest and plainest sense in which the persons, to whom the text is addressed, are required to be faithful unto death: which, though it does indeed in general imply a patient continuance in well-doing, in whatever scenes of life Divine Providence may place us; yet does especially refer to martial bravery, and express a readiness to face death in its most terrible forms, when our great General shall lead us on to it. You well know this to be an indispensable condition of our being acknowledged by him in the day of his final triumph: and of this he warned those that gathered around him, when he was first raising his army, under the greatest disadvantages in outward appearance; expressly and plainly telling them, that they must be content to follow him to martyrdom, to follow him to crucifixion, when they receive the word of command to do it; or that all their profession of regard to him would be in vain. If any man, says he, will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me: for he that loveth his own life more than me, is not worthy of me; he does not deserve the honour of bearing my name, and passing for one of my soldiers, indeed he cannot on any terms be my disciple.

This therefore is in effect the language of our Lord, when he says, Be thou faithful unto death. It is as if he had said, "Remember, all you of Smyrna, or of any other place and country, that call yourselves Christians, throughout all generations, that you were by baptism enlisted under my banners: remember, that you have as it were sealed and subscribed your engagement to me, by every sacrament you have since attended;" (as indeed it is well known, the word sacrament originally signifies a military oath, which soldiers take as a pledge of fidelity to their general;) "remember, therefore, that you are ever to continue with me, and to march forward under my direction, whatever hardships and fatigues may lie in the way. And remember, that if I lead you on to the most formidable combat, you must cheerfully obey the word of command, and charge boldly, though you should immediately die, whether by the sword or by fire. Should you dare to flee, I am myself your enemy, and the weapons which I bear would justly be levelled at your own traitorous heads. But if you bravely follow me, I know how to make you ample amends, even in circumstances when no human power and gratitude can reach you; for it is my glorious prerogative to engage, that to those who are thus faithful unto death, I will give a crown of life." We are therefore,

Secondly, to consider the promise, by which the charge is enforced: I will give thee a crown of life.

And here I might observe, "a crown of life is the glorious reward proposed," and it is to be received from the hand of Christ.

1. A crown of life is the reward proposed: which we are sure in this connexion implies both grandeur and felicity; here, though rarely, connected together.

There is, no doubt, an allusion in these words to the ancient, and I think very prudent, custom of animating the bravery of soldiers by honorary rewards, and particularly by crowns; sometimes of laurel, and sometimes, in some extraordinary instances, of silver or gold; which they were permitted to wear on public occasions, and in consequence of receiving which they were sometimes entitled to some peculiar immunities. But here our Lord Jesus Christ, conscious of his own divine power and prerogative, speaks with a dignity and elevation, which no earthly prince or commander could ever assume; promising a crown of life, and that (as was observed before) even to those who should fall in the battle: a crown of life in the highest sense; not only one, which should ever be fresh and fair, but which should give immortality to the happy brow it adorned; and be for ever worn, not only as the monument of bravery and victory, but as the ensign of royalty too! a crown connected with a kingdom, and with what no other kingdom can give, perpetual life to enjoy it, perpetual youth and vigour to relish all its delights. And this is agreeable to the language of other scriptures, where we read of the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him; a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give; a crown of glory, which fadeth not away. We may also observe,

2. That it is said to be given by Christ.

This some pious commentators have explained as intimating, that it is the gift of the Redeemer's free and unmerited grace, and not a retribution due to the merit of him that receiveth it. And this is an undoubted truth, which it is of the highest importance to acknowledge and consider. The proper wages of sin, is death; but eternal life is (in opposition to wages) the gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. We should humbly own it every day, that there is no proportion between the value of our services, and the crown which we expect to receive: should own, that it is mercy that pardons our sins, and grace that accepts our services; much more, that crowns them. Grace, grace, shall (as it were) be engraven upon that crown, in characters large and indelible: nor will that inscription diminish its lustre, or impair the pleasure with which we shall receive it. I could not forbear mentioning this thought, as a truth of the utmost importance, which stands on the firmest basis of very many express scriptures; a truth, of which perhaps no man living had ever a deeper sense than our deceased friend. But I mention it thus obliquely, because it may be doubted whether we can justly argue it from hence; since the word μισθος is sometimes used for rendering a retribution justly due, and that in instances where grace and favour have, in propriety of speech, no concern at all.*

But it is certain, that this expression, "I will give thee a crown of life," is intended to lead our thoughts to this important circumstance; that this crown is to be received from the hand of Christ himself. And the apostle Paul evidently refers to the same circumstance, in terms which show how much he entered into the spirit of the thought, when he says, The Lord the righteous Judge shall give it me: he himself, the great Judge of the contest, whose eye witnesses the whole course of it, whose decision cannot err, and from whose sentence there is no appeal: alluding to the judge who presided in the Grecian games, who was always a person of rank and eminence, and himself reached forth the reward to him who overcame in them.

So that, on the whole, when our Lord Jesus Christ says, Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life; methinks our devout meditations may expatiate upon the words, in some such paraphrase as this. It is as if he had said to you, and to me, and to all his people, "O my faithful soldiers, fear not death in its most terrible array, for you are immortal. Fear not them that can kill the body; you have a nobler part, which they cannot reach, and I will undertake, not only for its rescue, but its happiness. I will answer for it, on the honour of my royal word, that it shall live in a state of noble enlargement, of triumphant joy. Think on me: I am he that liveth, though I was dead: and behold, I am alive for evermore: and because I live, you shall live also; shall exist in a state that deserves the great and honourable name of life, so that earth in all its lustre and pleasure, when compared with it, is but as a scene of death, or at best, as an amusing dream when one awaketh."

We may also consider him as pursuing this animating address, and saying, "My brave companions in tribulation and patience, you shall not only live, but reign. Think not, thou good soldier, who art now fighting under my banner, that thy general will wear his honours alone. If I have my crown, if I have my triumph, be assured that thou also shalt have thine. Thou mayst indeed seem to perish in the combat; and thy friends may mourn, and thine enemies insult, as if thou wert utterly cut off. But behold, true victory spreads over thee her golden wing, and holds out, not a garland of fading flowers or leaves, but a crown that shall keep its lustre, when all the costliest gems on earth are melted in the general burning; yea, when the luminaries of heaven are extinguished, and the sun and stars fade away in their orbs."

"Nor will I," does he seem to say, "send thee this crown by some inferior hand; not even by the noblest angel, that waits on the throne I have now ascended. Thou shalt receive it from mine own hand" (from that hand which would make the least gift valuable: what a dignity then will it add to the greatest!) "Nor will I myself confer this reward in private; it shall be given with the most magnificent solemnity. Thou shalt be brought to me before the assembled world; thy name shall be called over; thou shalt appear, and I will own thee and crown thee in public view. Thy friends shall see it with raptures of joy, and congratulate an honour in which they shall also share. Thine enemies shall see it with envy and with rage: to increase their confusion and misery, they shall see, that while by their malicious assaults they were endeavouring to destroy thee, they were only establishing thy throne, and brightening the lustre which shall for ever adorn thy brow; while theirs is blasted with the thunder of resistless wrath, and deeply engraven with the indelible marks of vengeance. This crown shall thou for ever wear as the perpetual token of my esteem and affection: nor shall it be merely a shining ornament, a rich ornament, a glorious authority, goes along with it. Thou shalt reign for ever and ever, and be a king, as well as a priest, unto God."

They who enter by a lively faith into the import of these glorious words, will (I doubt not) pardon my having expatiated so largely upon them. We have believed, and therefore have we spoken: and I question not, but that many of you have in the course of this representation prevented me in some of the reflections, which naturally arise from such a subject. Yet it may not be improper to assist your devout meditations upon them.

(1.) What reason have we to adore the grace of our blessed Redeemer, which prepares and bestows such rewards as these!

* Compare Matt. xx. 8. Give the labourers their hire. Col. iii. 1. Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal.

While we hear him saying, Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life; methinks it is but natural for each of our hearts to answer, "Lord, dost thou speak of giving a crown, a crown of life and glory to me! Too great might the favour seem, if I, who have so often lifted up my rebellious hand against thy throne, might be allowed to lay down this guilty head in the dust, and lose the memory of my treasons, and the sense of my punishment together, in everlasting forgetfulness. And is such a crown prepared, and wilt thou, my injured Sovereign, who mightest so justly arm thyself with vengeance against me, bestow this crown with thine own hand; with all these other circumstances of dignity, so as even to make my triumphs thine own!—What is my strictest fidelity to thee? Though I do indeed (as I humbly desire that I may) continue faithful unto death, I am yet but an unprofitable servant; I have done no more than my duty. I have pursued thy work, in thy strength; and in consequence of that love which thou hast put into my heart, it hath been its own reward: and dost thou thus crown one favour with another!—Blessed Jesus, I would with all humility lay that crown at thy feet, acknowledging before thee, and the whole world, (as I shall at length do in a more expressive form,) that it is not only the gift of thy love, but the purchase of thy blood. Never, never had I beheld it, otherwise than at an unapproachable distance, as an aggravation of my misery and despair, hadst not thou worn another crown, a crown of infamy and of thorns. The gems which must for ever adorn my temples, were formed from those precious drops, that once trickled down thine; and all the splendour of my robes of triumph is owing to their being washed in the blood of the Lamb." With what pleasing wonder may we pursue the thought! And while it employs our mind,

(2.) How justly may this awaken a generous ambition to secure this crown to ourselves!

Dearly as it was purchased by our blessed Redeemer, it is most freely offered to us, to the youngest, to the meanest, to the most unworthy. It is not prepared merely for those that have worn an earthly diadem or coronet; (would to God it were not despised by most of them, as a thing less worthy of their thoughts than the most trifling amusement, by which they unbend their minds from the weighty cares attending their station!) but it is prepared for you; even for every one, who thinks it worth pursuing, and accepting, upon the terms of the gospel covenant; for every one, who believing in Christ, and loving him, is humbly determined through his grace to be faithful unto death.—And shall this glorious proposal be made to you in vain? Were it an earthly crown that could lawfully be obtained, are there not many of us, notwithstanding all its weight of anxieties, and all the piercing thorns with which we might know it to be lined, that would be ready eagerly to seize it, and perhaps to contend and quarrel with each other for it? But here is no foundation for contention. Here is a crown for each; and such a crown, that all the royal ornaments of all the princes upon earth, when compared with it, are lighter than a feather, and viler than dust. And shall we neglect it? shall we refuse it, from such a hand too, as that by which it is offered? Shall we so judge ourselves unworthy of eternal life, as thereby indeed to make ourselves worthy of eternal death? For there is no other alternative.—But blessed be God, it is not universally neglected. There are (I doubt not) among you, many who pursue it, many who shall assuredly obtain it. For their sakes let us reflect,

(3.) How courageously may the heads which are to wear such a crown be lifted up to face all the trials of life and death!

Those trials may be various, and perhaps extreme; but if borne aright, far from depriving us of this crown, they will only serve to increase its lustre. It is the apostle Paul's express assertion; and he speaks as transported with the thought: For this cause we faint not, but though the outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day: for our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal. Surely, with this support, we may not only live, but triumph, in poverty, in reproach, in weakness, in pain: and with this we may die, not only serenely, but joyfully. O my friends, where are our hearts? Where is our faith? Nay, I will add, where is our reason? Why are not our eyes, our desires, and our hopes, more frequently directed upward? Surely one ray from that resplendent diadem might be sufficient to confound all the false charms of these transitory vanities, which indeed owe all their lustre to the darkness in which they are placed. Surely, when our spirits are overwhelmed within us, one glance of it might be sufficient to animate and elevate them, and might teach us to say, in the midst of dangers, sorrows, and death, In all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us. Thus have some triumphed in the last extremities of nature; and both the subject and the occasion also, loudly calls us to reflect,

(4.) What reason we have to congratulate those happy souls that have already received the crown of life!

When we are weeping over the cold, yea, the bleeding, remains of such, surely it is for ourselves, and not for them, that the stream flows. The thought of their condition, far from moving our compassion, may rather inspire us with joy and with praise. Look not on their pale countenance, nor on the wide and deep wounds, through which, perhaps, the soul rushed out to seize the great prize of its faith and hope; though even those wounds appear beautiful, when earned by distinguished virtue, by piety to their country and their God. Look not on the eyes closed in death, or the once honoured and beloved head, now covered with the dust of the grave; but view, by an internal believing eye, that different form which the exalted triumphant spirit already wears, the earnest of a yet brighter glory. Their great Leader, whose care of them we are fondly ready to suspect, or secretly to complain of, as deficient, in such circumstances as these, points (as it were) to the white robes, and the flourishing palms, which he has given them; and calls for our regard to the crowns of life which he has set on their heads, and to the songs of joy and praise to which he has formed their exulting tongues. And do we sully and dishonour their triumphs with our tears? Do we think so meanly of heaven, and of them, as to wish them with us again; that they might eat and drink at our tables; that they might talk with us in our low language; that they might travel with us from stage to stage in this wilderness; and take their share with us in those vanities of life, of which we ourselves are so often weary, that there is hardly a week, or a day, in which we are not lifting up our eyes, and saying, with a deep inward groan, O that we had wings like a dove! then would we flee away, and be at rest.

Surely with relation to these faithful soldiers of Jesus Christ, who have already fallen, it is matter of no small joy to reflect, that their warfare is accomplished; that they have at length passed through every scene in which their fidelity could be endangered; so that now they are inviolably secure. How much more then should we rejoice, that they are entered, not only into the rest, but into the joy, of their Lord; that they conquered, even when they fell, and are now reaping the fruits, the celestial and immortal fruits, of that last great victory!

A sense of honour often taught the heathens, when attending those friends to the funeral pile who had died honourably in their country's cause, to use some ceremonies expressive of their joy for their glory; though that glory was an empty name, and all the reward of it a wreath of laurel, which was soon to crackle in the flame, and vanish into smoke. And shall not the joy and glory of the living spirit affect us, much more than they could be affected with the honours paid to the mangled corpse?

Let us then think with reverence, and with joy, on the pious dead; and especially on those, whom God honoured with any special opportunities of approving their fidelity, in life, or in death: and if we mourn, (as who, in some circumstances, can forbear it?) let it be as Christians, with that mixture of high congratulation, with that erect countenance, and that undaunted heart, which becomes those that see by faith their exaltation and felicity; and burning with a strong and sacred eagerness to join their triumphant company, let us be ready to share in the most painful of their trials, that we may also share in their glories.

And surely, if I have ever known a life, and a death, capable of inspiring us with these sentiments in their subliment elevations, it was the life and the death of that illustrious Christian hero, Colonel Gardiner; whose character was too well known to many of you, by some months' residence here, to need your being informed of it from me; and whose history was too remarkable, to be confined within those few remaining moments, which must be allotted to the finishing of this discourse. Yet there was something so uncommon in both, that I think it of high importance to the honour of the gospel and grace of Christ, that they should be delivered down to posterity, in a distinct and particular view. And therefore, as the providence of God, in concurrence with that most intimate and familiar friendship with which this great and good man was pleased to honour me, gives me an opportunity of speaking of many important things, especially relating to his religious experiences, with greater exactness and certainty than most others might be capable of doing; and as he gave me his full permission, in case I should have the affliction to survive him, to declare freely whatever I knew of him, which I might apprehend conducive to the glory of God, and the advancement of religion; I purpose publishing, in a distinct tract, some remarkable passages of his life, illustrated by extracts from his own letters, which speak in the most forcible manner the genuine sentiments of his heart. But as I promise myself considerable assistance in this work from some valuable persons in the northern part of our island, and possibly from some of his own papers, to which our present confusions forbid my access, I must delay the execution of this design at least for a few months; and must likewise take heed, that I do not too much anticipate what I may then offer to the public view, by what it might otherwise be very proper to mention now.

Let it therefore suffice for the present to remind you, that Colonel Gardiner was one of the most illustrious instances of the energy, and indeed I must also add, of the sovereignty, of divine grace, which I have heard or read of in modern history. He was in the most amazing and miraculous manner, without any divine ordinance, without any religious opportunity, or peculiar advantage, deliverance, or affliction, reclaimed on a sudden, in the vigour of life and health, from the most licentious and abandoned sensuality, not only to a steady course of regularity and virtue, but to high devotion, and strict, though unaffected, sanctity of manners: a course, (in which he persisted for more than twenty-six years, that is, to the close of life,) so remarkably eminent for piety towards God, diffusive humanity, and Christian charity, lively faith, deep humility, strict temperance, active diligence in improving time, meek resignation to the will of God, steady patience in enduring afflictions, unaffected contempt of secular interest, and resolute and courageous zeal in maintaining truth, as well as in reproving and (where his authority might take place) restraining vice and wickedness of every kind; that I must deliberately declare, that when I consider all these particulars together, it is hard for me to say where, but in the book of God, he found his example, or where he has left his equal. Every one of these articles, with many more, I hope (if God spare my life) to have an opportunity of illustrating, in such a manner as to show, that he was a living demonstration of the energy and excellency of the Christian religion; nor can I imagine how I can serve its interests better, than by recording what I have seen and known upon this head; known to my edification, as well as my joy.

But oh, how shall I lead back your thoughts, and my own, to what we once enjoyed in him, without too deep and tender a sense of what we have lost! To have poured out his soul in blood; to have fallen by the savage and rebellious hands of his own countrymen, at the wall of his own house; deserted by those who were under the highest obligations that can be imagined to have defended his life with their own; and above all, to have seen with his dying eyes the enemies of our religion and liberties triumphant, and to have heard in his latest moments the horrid noise of their insulting shouts;—is a scene, in the view of which we are almost tempted to say, Where were the shields of angels? where the eye of Providence? where the remembrance of those numberless prayers, which had been offered to God for the preservation of such a man, at such a time as this? But let faith assure us, that he was never more dear and precious in the eye of his divine Leader, than in these dreadful moments, when, if sense were to judge, he might seem most neglected.

That is of all others the happiest death, which may most sensibly approve our fidelity to God, and our zeal for his glory. To stand singly in the combat with the fiercest enemies, in the best of causes, when the whole regiment he commanded fled, to throw himself with so noble an ardour to defend those on foot, whom the whole body which he headed were appointed to support, when he saw that the fall of the nearest commander exposed those brave men to the extremity of danger; were circumstances that evidently showed how much he held honour and duty dearer than life. He could not but be conscious of the distinguished profession he had made, under a religious character; he could not but be sensible, how much our army, in circumstances like these, needs all that the most generous examples can do to animate its officers and its soldiers; and therefore, although when his men would hear no voice but that of their fears, he might have retreated without infamy, he seems deliberately and rightly to have judged, that it was better he should sacrifice in such a cause the little remainder of his life, than attempt to preserve it, by a conduct which might leave the least room even for envy and prejudice to suggest, that the regard to religion and the public, which he had so remarkably professed on all occasions, was not strong enough to lead him to face danger and death, which natural bravery itself had in early youth taught him to despise. He had long since felt the genuine force of honour sanctified by piety, and consequently had too just a zeal for his king and country, to bear the thought of deserting the trust committed to him in such an important moment; too warm a love for the protestant religion, not to rejoice in a call of Providence to bleed in its defence. And therefore, that he might make the last and utmost opposition in his power to a rebellious crew, by whose success, (should it go on,) an inlet would be opened to the cruel ravages of arbitrary power, and to the bloody and relentless rage of popish superstition, "he loved not his life unto the death." And in this view his death was martyrdom, and has, I doubt not, received the applauses and rewards of it; for what is martyrdom, but voluntarily to meet death, for the honour of God, and the testimony of a good conscience?

And if it be indeed true, as it is reported on very considerable authority, that before he expired he had an interview with the leader of the opposite party, and declared in his presence "the full assurance he had of an immortal crown, which he was going to receive," it is a circumstance worthy of being had in everlasting remembrance: as in that case Providence may seem wonderfully to have united two seemingly inconsistent circumstances in the manner of his dying: the alternative of either of which he has spoken of in my hearing, as what with humble submission to the great Lord of life he could most earnestly wish; "that if he were not called directly to die for the truth," which he rightly judged the most glorious and happy lot of mortality, "he might either fall in the field of battle, fighting in defence of the religion and liberties of his country, or might have an opportunity of expressing his hopes and joys, as a Christian, to the honour of his Lord, and the edification of those about him, in his departing moments; and so might go off this earthly stage," as in the letter that relates his death, it is expressly said that he did, "triumphing in the assurance of a blessed immortality."

How difficult it must be in our present circumstances, to gain certain and exact information, you will easily perceive; but enough is known, and more than enough, to show how justly the high consolations of that glorious subject which we have been contemplating, may be applied to the present solemn occasion. From what is certain with relation to him, we may presume to say, that, after he had adorned the gospel by so honourable a life, in such a conspicuous station, God seems to have condescended, as with his own hand, to raise him an illustrious theatre, on which he might die a venerable and amiable spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men; balancing to his native land by such an exit, the loss of what future services it could have expected, from a constitution so much broken as his was, by the fatigues of his campaign in Flanders, where by his indefatigable services in a very extreme season he contracted an illness, from which he never recovered.

On the whole therefore, whatever cause we have (as indeed we have great cause) to sympathize with his wounded family, and with his wounded country; and how decent soever it may be, like David, to take up our lamentation over the mighty fallen, and the brightest weapons of our war perished; (and oh, how naturally might some of us adopt the preceding words too!) yet after all, let us endeavour to summon up a spirit like that with which he bore the loss of friends, eminent for their goodness and usefulness. And while we glorify God in him, as on so many accounts we have reason to do, let us be animated by such an example to a resolution of continuing, like him, stedfast in our duty, amidst desertion and danger, and all the terrors that can beset us around. As he, having been so eminently faithful unto death, has undoubtedly received a crown of life, which shines with distinguished lustre, among those who are come out of much tribulation; let us be courageous followers of him, and of all the glorious company of those who through faith and patience inherit the promises. Then may we be able to enter into the comfort and spirit of them all, and of this promise in particular, and shall not be discouraged, though we are called to endure a great fight of afflictions, or even to sacrifice our lives, in defence of our religion and liberties: since in this cause we know, if we should fall like him, even to die is gain. We are assured upon the best authority, that as he fought the good fight with so heroic a fortitude, and finished his course with so steady a tenor, and kept the faith with so unshaken a resolution, there is laid up for him a crown of brighter glory than he has yet received, which the Lord the righteous Judge will give unto him in that great expected day: and we know, that it shall be given, not unto him only, nor only to those who have had an opportunity of distinguishing themselves by the most heroic services or sufferings in the cause of their divine Leader, but unto all them that love his appearance. Amen.

A HYMN SUNG AFTER THE SERMON.

I.

Hark! 'tis our heavenly Leader's voice,
From his triumphant seat:
'Midst all the war's tumultuous noise,
How powerful, and how sweet!

II.

"Fight on, my faithful band," he cries,
"Nor fear the mortal blow:
Who first in such a warfare dies
Shall speediest victory know.

III.

"I have my days of combat known,
And in the dust was laid;
But thence I mounted to my throne,
And glory crowns my head.

IV.

"That throne, that glory, you shall share;
My hands the crown shall give;
And you the sparkling honours wear,
While God himself shall live."

V.

Lord, 'tis enough! our bosoms glow
With courage, and with love:
Thy hand shall bear thy soldiers through,
And raise their heads above.

VI.

My soul, while deaths beset me round,
Erects her ardent eyes;
And longs, through some illustrious wound,
To rush and seize the prize.

SERMON X.

MEDITATIONS ON THE TEARS OF JESUS OVER THE GRAVE OF LAZARUS.*

To Mrs. Sarah Clark.

The worthy relict of my ever honoured friend and father the Reverend Dr. Clark, this Sermon is most respectfully inscribed, as a sincere and affectionate, though inconsiderable, token of tender sympathy with her, and of indelible veneration for the exemplary character of the dear deceased.

By her most obliged and faithful humble servant,

Northampton, January 7, 1750-1. P. DODDRIDGE.

JOHN xi. 35.

Jesus wept.

THE only-begotten Son of God, while he sojourned in human flesh, passed through a sad variety of calamities, and on the whole bore all that a humane heart, untainted with guilt, and untouched with remorse of conscience, could suffer; that he might learn to pity us more affectionately under the like sorrows; that he might lay in for us a stock of divine consolations; and especially, that he might teach us by his sacred example to avoid the opposite and fatal extremes, of despising the chastening of the Lord, and fainting when we are rebuked by him. Let us learn of him; and while we feel our afflictions like men, we shall bear them as the children of God, and the heirs of glory.

We here view our blessed Redeemer in a circumstance, in which most of us have frequently, and alas! very lately, been; and in which, should our lives be prolonged, we may again and again be: a circumstance, which is the common lot of mortality, and must of course be the most frequent affliction of those who are richest in dear and valuable friends, and which will be most tenderly felt by those who best deserve to enjoy them. It is the sad tribute, and I had almost said, the sad equivalent, which in these regions of death we pay for loving and being beloved. We see Jesus approaching the new grave of a friend; of such a friend, as providence and grace had concurred to render, in some measure, worthy of those precious and honourable tears, which were now dropped upon his tomb. It was Lazarus of Bethany. We know the tender story too well, to need a large rehearsal of it in moments so precious as these. We know, that when Jesus drew near to Bethany soon after the interment of his deceased friend, and was going with his sisters and a train of other mourners to his grave, he wept.—We shall inquire into the cause of these tears,—shall consider the useful lessons we may naturally learn from them,—and then shall give the few remaining moments of our time to what is peculiar to the sad occasion of our present assembly, the death of the truly reverend, pious, and amiable Dr. Clark; concerning whom I think I may justly say, and your consciences will attest how justly, that we have personally known few, over whose tomb Christ would more probably have wept, had he stood near it in mortal flesh. May this seasonable review of his tears over Lazarus regulate and sanctify those, which so naturally flow from our eyes in the present circumstance, where almost every object we behold calls them up afresh!

I. Let us consider on what accounts we may probably suppose that our blessed Redeemer now wept.

All we can do to answer this inquiry is, to take an attentive survey of the circumstances of the case, so far as our information reaches, that we may observe what occurred in them proper to have impressed a wise and benevolent mind. For though we pretend not to limit the infinitely more capacious views of our divine Master, yet we may assure ourselves that nothing material and important was passed over by him without due regard.

* Preached at St. Albans Dec. 16, 1750, on the death of the Rev. Samuel Clark, D.D. who died the 11th of December, in the 63rd year of his age.

On these principles we may naturally observe, that our Lord was now near a grave, the grave of a pious and amiable friend,—surrounded with a train of affectionate mourners,—and with some obstinate sinners in his view, who were bringing upon themselves dreadful and final destruction.

1. Our Lord was now going to visit a grave; and that might awaken some meltings of compassion.

He was coming to a place where the king of terrors had lately erected a new trophy, and given a specimen of his universal triumph. Now, had Christ been a stranger to the person of Lazarus, it might have touched him to think of his untimely fate; (for untimely it seems to have been;) to have seen the sad monuments of mortality before his eyes, and have thought, "this is the sepulchre of Lazarus: he who, but a little while ago, was in the prime and vigour of his days, and in the ample enjoyment of what earth could afford to make him happy,* is now the prisoner of the grave. The residue of his days is cut off in the midst; and how many purposes are broken! how many hopes are blasted! How melancholy a change from yonder elegant and pleasant mansion, to this house of darkness and of silence, from the cheerful converse of his affectionate sisters, and these numerous friends who are fondly prolonging their attendance, though the rites of his funeral are ended! He, who was thus beloved and caressed, is already brought to say to corruption, Thou art my father; and to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister."

"Sad change!" might any of us naturally have said on such an occasion; "melancholy catastrophe! not of Lazarus alone, but of the whole human nature! For this is the end of all men; this the house appointed for all living." Here their magnificence and power, their beauty and vigour, their learning and wisdom, be they ever so remarkable, must, ere long, mingle with meanness and indigence, deformity and weakness, ignorance and folly. Here the human frame, that masterpiece of the divine contrivance, which wears so much of the image of its Maker, must, ere long, be thrown aside as a broken vessel, in which there is no pleasure: and all the present generation of men, and all that are to arise in future ages and most distant nations, shall in their turns lie as low as Lazarus. Such are the awful monuments of the divine displeasure for that first offence; when, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so the sentence of death passed upon all men, as all had sinned in him. Hither, even to the darkness, the abasement, the putrefaction of the grave, are they all travelling through a road of disappointment and vanity, of pain and sorrow. Thus are the original glories of man tarnished and withered, and his paradise turned into a Golgotha! And all this to the apostate creature is only the beginning of punishment and misery, did not sovereign grace interpose for his deliverance.

Who can say, that such natural and obvious thoughts as these, did not now arise in the mind of the blessed Jesus? Who can think it impossible, that he should thus, from the tomb of Lazarus, take a view of this wide ruin, and drop a compassionate tear over the various miseries of mortal man? But such reflections as these might have arisen from the funeral of one who had been an entire stranger to him: we are, therefore, further to consider,

2. That our Lord was now attending the grave of a pious and amiable friend; and on that account it would be very natural for him to weep.

The evangelist takes particular care to tell us, verse 5, that Jesus loved Lazarus, and Martha, and Mary; nor do we read of any family in which he more frequently lodged when he came up to Jerusalem, or where he conversed with more freedom and endearment. We may therefore assure ourselves, that, on the death of Lazarus, the remembrance of this intimate friendship would be recollected by the faithful and affectionate Jesus with due regard: and accordingly we see, that when he would inform his followers of this mournful providence, he uses this kind language, verse 11, Our friend Lazarus sleepeth. Where, by the way, we may observe, that he not only speaks of him by the appellation of friend, but represents his death as a sleep; as if there were something in the word dead so harsh and doleful that he hardly knew how to connect it with so dear a name.† Now, on the same principles, it is natural to conclude, that, when our Lord came to the house of his deceased friend, and saw the apartments or gardens, in which he had often conversed with him to their mutual delight; when he reviewed the places, in which they had taken sweet counsel together, and from which they had gone to the house of God in company; the recollection must naturally awaken a tender sorrow, not unlike what we feel on such an occasion.

Christ could not fail to recollect, what a friend

* I have here taken it for granted, that Lazarus was a young man, and in prosperous circumstances of life. We may probably conclude the former, as we only read of his sisters, but of no wife or children, and from his living so long after them, as travellers both to and from the latter seems very evident, not only from their names as mentioned at Jerusalem, John xi. 19; but also from the splendid entertainment afterwards mentioned, John xii. 2. † Compare Luke x. 38, et seq.

Lazarus had been to him and to his interests: and according to his ability to the village of Bethany, and the city of Jerusalem, whence so many came to pay their last office of respect to his remains. Had he been employed in the ministerial work, (as I think ecclesiastical history tells us, that after his resurrection he was,) his fidelity and zeal under that character would, no doubt, have been tenderly recollected. As it was, we may assure ourselves, that if Christ will another day acknowledge so cheap a kindness as a cup of cold water bestowed on a disciple in his name, he could not possibly forget, how hospitably he had himself been entertained by Lazarus; how cheerfully, and how thankfully, that generous man had opened, not only his house, but his heart to him, and to the least of his servants, who no doubt had been cordially welcome to him for his Master's sake. A tear over the grave of such a friend might have seemed but an equitable tribute, had it fallen from any other eye; and a common spectator would have thought of no further cause. Accordingly the Jews who were present, made this reflection upon it, verse 36, Behold, how he loved him! which by the way seems to intimate, that it was not only a drop or two, which silently stole down the cheeks of our Lord, but that it was a copious shower; and as before it is expressly said, that he groaned in spirit, so perhaps some strong gestures might concur to express his grief. And though the immediate prospect of the resurrection of Lazarus would administer a relief peculiar to this case; yet the thoughts of those agonies through which he had passed, of the melancholy situation in which the body now lay, and perhaps of the death he was again to encounter, and from which he should not arise till the heavens were no more, might all contribute to melt the compassionate heart of the blessed Jesus; especially in concurrence with what we are next to mention: for,

3. Our Lord certainly wept out of compassion to surviving relatives and friends, whom he saw almost overwhelmed with their sorrow.

This reason is expressly assigned in the 33d verse: When Jesus saw her (that is, Mary) weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, he groaned in spirit, and was troubled. The original expression* properly signifies, he troubled or afflicted himself; that is, he gave the reins in some measure to his grief, he allowed a set of sorrowful ideas to arise and lodge in his mind, which he could at pleasure have banished or exchanged: and thus he set himself to practise that lesson, which he afterwards taught by his apostle, of weeping with them that weep!

And indeed, it was in this respect a very moving scene, which may justly demand a tear from us in the review of it. Had the deceased left behind him an affectionate widow, who might have seemed but half to survive, while what she esteemed the better part of herself had been torn away; or had a train of lovely children appeared, in such various gradations of filial sorrow as their respective ages might have admitted, like tender flowers drooping their heads surcharged with rain; we may reasonably conclude, a suitable sympathy would have been extended to them, and an additional tear have been given to each. But here were the two pious sisters, whom friendship and grace had concurred to join in such endearing bonds to the deceased, and to Jesus himself. The Jews also were weeping; partly for Lazarus, partly for his sisters, and partly for themselves; and perhaps some of them, for that sorrow which Jesus himself discovered in his aspect and deportment, before these tears fell. Now we cannot wonder, that this penetrated the heart of Christ yet more deeply, when he saw grief reflected from breast to breast, and each affectionate friend in that mournful assembly bearing (as it were) the burthen of all.—What I now see before me, what I persuade myself we all feel, gives me so lively an idea of this part of my subject, that it will scarce permit me to pursue it.—I will only add, that if there were any of the spectators then present, who did not weep with the rest, and bore no part in so general a lamentation, even they might perhaps be an occasion of yet greater distress to him, who always formed the truest estimate of things, and saw through every fallacious appearance by which our ignorance and credulity are daily misled; which leads me to add,

4. The Lord Jesus Christ himself might justly weep, to think of that dreadful ruin which was coming on some present for their continued impenitency and unbelief.

He who saw what was in man, undoubtedly discerned that malignity of heart, which so soon bore some of them to contrive the death of Lazarus, that he might not remain a living testimony of Christ's miraculous power, and which would so soon lead them to reject the yet more important evidence of his mission, produced by his own resurrection from the dead, expressly foretold and appealed to in that view. He saw all the dreadful consequences of this obstinacy, in their utter ruin by the Romans: and as hell was open to him, and destruction had no covering, he foresaw distinctly the horrors of their guilty spirits, when they entered these gloomy regions; and the increasing horrors that should seize them in the judgment day, when in their graves they should hear the voice of the Son of God, and come forth to the resurrection of eternal damnation. And though our Lord could not but on the whole approve of that vengeance, by which a righteous God would plead his cause, and revenge the quarrel of his rejected gospel; yet some sentiments of pity mingled themselves with the view, as when he had lately wept over Jerusalem: just as a humane and compassionate judge looks with compassion on those criminals, whom for wise and, on the whole, benevolent reasons, he given up to destruction. But I mention this only incidentally, as it is not hinted at in the context, and has no immediate connexion with the event which is now so ready to engross our thoughts. We have seen the cause of these tears; and now,

II. Let us consider to what purposes of practical edification we may improve them.

The following reflections may naturally arise from the subject; and I hope it may be useful to dwell a while upon each of them.

1. This may serve to vindicate a compassionate temper from the imputation of contemptible weakness.

The fierceness of some minds, and the indolence of others, leads them to despise those whom they frequently see under the impression of tender passions. But wherefore should they despise them? Surely when God implanted in our nature these melting emotions of soul, he intended them for some valuable purpose; and not that we should look upon them as weeds, to be rooted out of every well cultivated soil. I am sure, we cannot learn any such stoical maxims from the word of God; for there, not only the most eminent saints, but many of the bravest heroes, are described with the softest sentiments of humanity about them, and are frequently painted in tears.* What greater names has the Old-Testament history transmitted to us, than those of Abraham and Joseph, David and Jonathan, Hezekiah and Jeremiah? Yet we are told of various occasions on which they wept. And the tears of Paul, that great Christian hero, who could so courageously face imprisonment and martyrdom for the cause of truth and goodness, are frequently spoken of, either in his history, or his letters. But a greater than these is here: Jesus wept. In the days of his flesh he poured out tears, not only under the pressure of his own personal sorrow, but sometimes out of compassion for others: and he particularly did it in the instance before us, though he was to receive a public honour, which rendered this day one of the most illustrious of those which preceded his own resurrection. He behaved in every circumstance of his conduct, with a dignity worthy of his general character, and of the present occasion;† as one equal to the great work to be performed, and no way elevated or transported at the signal honour he did him: yet, (to allude to an expression of Job concerning himself,) while he was amongst them with a majesty beyond that of a king even in his army, he tempered that majesty with the gentlest sympathy which could have been expected from one, whose professed business it was to comfort the mourners. Surely in this respect, as well as every other, the disciple is not above his master; nor can those marks of tenderness be a reproach to us, which were not unbecoming in him. In circumstances like these in which Jesus wept, tears are so far from being an unmanly weakness, that they may rather be called (as they are by one of the most celebrated of the Roman poets, nostri pars optima sensûs) one of the most amiable parts in the constitution of human nature; which God seems to have provided on purpose, that we might be able to give each other a sensible token of commiseration and affection, which cannot so easily be counterfeited as fond words may; and he has taken care, that while they testify our passions, they should also ease them, and unload the heart when almost ready to sink under its pressure.

2. We may also learn from the preceding discourse, what may be of use to direct our compassion in the most affectionate workings of it.

We well know, that the blessed Jesus had all the passions in the most harmonious order, and that the symmetry of his soul was entirely unbroken. We may therefore assure ourselves, that tears which flow from the considerations on which he shed them, are the drops of wisdom and of virtue.

To weep with him over the grave of a departed friend, especially of one remarkable for piety and usefulness, is most easy and natural. The more difficult task will be, to restrain those tears within such bounds, that they may not swell into a torrent, which will bear down our comforts, our hopes, and our graces. But while they are duly moderated, and submitted to the great Lord of life, we shelter ourselves under the great example of Jesus. And indeed, without such an authority, our sorrows on such an occasion might be vindicated, not only as a tribute of humanity due to the living as well as the dead, but in some degree as a proper expression of our pious humiliation under God's rebuking hand. For nothing is an affliction, any further than it is felt; and the very end of Providence with respect to us would be frustrated, if our hearts were not deeply penetrated and impressed by the stroke.

But let not personal and domestic calamities engross all the tenderness of our souls. Let our compassions spread themselves all abroad, and take in every proper object which may fall under their notice. Let us endeavour to pass through the world, as the friends of God, and of mankind; as those, who have a cordial affection for the whole human species, and being ourselves men, can think no human concern entirely foreign to our hearts. Let us often think of the state of human nature in general; how it is defaced and pained, and wounded even to death: how man grows up to lamentation and mourning; and every age, and station, and circumstance, has its affliction! Even tender and innocent infancy is not excepted; those little helpless strangers in life, though they have not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, are born under the sentence of it. What numbers of them are brought into the world, only to smart, and weep, and die! And in other instances, when the human blossom begins to open, and the beautiful colours discover themselves in the bud, how does it wither before it be fully grown! Children, who have all the charms and all the hopes their early age can admit, seem to have been spread for a few years, only to take a deeper root in a parent's heart, that it might ache and bleed the more, when they are plucked up, sometimes by a sudden stroke, and sometimes by a slow progress which prolongs to weeks and months that dreadful operation by which we are losing a part of ourselves. Youths are taken away in the full bloom and vigour of their nature, in the gay delusive dream of their mortal hopes. And we who survive, find so many thorns springing up in our most pleasing paths, that we are sometimes tempted, with him who knew most of the magnificence and luxury of life, and so most of its vanity, to "bless the dead which are already dead, rather than the living which are yet alive." Such is the course of mortal man. Thus are we, like the rebellious Israelites, doomed to wander in the wilderness, with but one certainty before us in it, the sad assurance of dropping our carcasses there! Surely had we no distinct and peculiar sorrows of our own, we might feel those of this unhappy family to which we are allied, and there would be an evident propriety, as well as humanity, in the tears we shed for it. Yet while we are lamenting its ruined state, let us own the righteous sentence of that God, who is thus consuming our days in vanity, and our years in trouble, so that we spend them as a tale that is told, or rather, as the word might be much better translated, like a sigh or a groan.

* See those of Homer, and Virgil, are often remarkable; which plainly shows, that those most judicious observers of human life thought, there was nothing so much a mark of mind accompanied with the most exalted courage and magnanimity.

† This is most beautifully illustrated by the Reverend Dr Lardner, in his vindication of this story against Mr Woolston's objections; which is written with a spirit of candour as just and noble, as that of his antagonist was false, invidious, and inhuman.

But there is another subject of yet juster lamentation, to which our thoughts are directed by what we have now been hearing: I mean, that obstinacy of heart with which multitudes reject the counsel of God against themselves, and despise that sovereign remedy which divine grace has provided for all their sorrows in the everlasting gospel. How many wilfully make themselves, as it were, blind and deaf, lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and be converted and healed. Dying souls are a sad spectacle indeed; especially, when they are dying under the means and offers of life, and aggravate their ruin by the only method of cure. Where is the faith of Christians, if we do not regard them as on the borders of eternal ruin! and where is the tenderness of human nature, if we can see them with indifference in so dangerous and miserable a state? David beheld the transgressors, and was grieved; and rivers of waters ran down his eyes, because men kept not God's law. Will it be less fatal to reject his gospel! Or should we be less impressed, when the tears of the Redeemer over perishing sinners are added to all the other moving considerations which attend their case? O that our head were waters, and our eyes were fountains of tears, that we might weep day and night, for our neighbours, our friends, it may be, some of our dearest relatives too! who seem so near to that state, where there will be perpetually weeping and wailing, and even gnashing of teeth; where the torment of all the raging, shall be added to the distress of the mourning, passions.

3. With what cheerfulness may we address this compassionate Saviour, when we are weeping on such accounts as called forth his own tears!

I might take occasion from hence to argue the encouragements we have, at all times, and on all occasions, to apply ourselves to him, as (according to the apostle's representation) a high priest who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; or (according to Isaiah's description) a gracious shepherd, who gathers the lambs in his arms, and carries them in his bosom, and gently leads those that are with young.

But that we may not too much digress on so copious, though so delightful, a theme, let us now apply the thought to the view of those sorrows in particular, which gave occasion to the mention of it; the removal of dear and pious friends, and the consideration of the calamity and degeneracy of mankind.

When our heart is overwhelmed within us, on occasion of the removal of those who were dearest to us in the bands of nature and of love, what a shelter is here!—to come to this immortal friend, and open to him all the anguish of our souls. "Blessed Redeemer, behold me in a case which was once thine own! Thou knowest what it is to be in this sad circumstance, to be weeping over the grave of a friend. Let what thine own gentle benevolent heart then felt, engage thee to pity what I now feel, and to pour balm into this deep and painful wound! O let my heart be more open to thee, now this dear guest has quitted his apartment in it! Raise my soul from that dust to which it is fondly cleaving, to thy glorious and amiable self! Make up my loss in a more abundant communication of thy divine friendship, and I shall own it a rich equivalent for whatever mortality can invade!"

Again, under that distress on account of the calamities or degeneracy of human nature, which the best of men do most tenderly feel, let us apply ourselves to Christ as the great physician, who can cure the one and the other; as one who condescended to come into the world, that the world through him might be saved. And when we see, as we shall often see, the feebleness of our own attempts; and are grieved to observe, how little we can do to supply the necessitous, to comfort the sorrowful, or to reform the vicious; let us humbly commend them to him, whose arm is almighty, whose treasures of grace and love are inexhaustible. In a word, let us with all the importunity of faith and prayer urge him to redress what he once bewailed, and to hasten that happy day, when every thing that offends shall be taken out of his kingdom, and a face of universal holiness and joy shall be spread through all its spacious provinces, and triumph for ever there.

4. From the tears of Christ at the grave of Lazarus, we may infer, that the death of his saints is still precious in his sight.

There is not surely in human life a more cutting circumstance, than the sight of a dying friend. When all the importunity of prayer, the prescriptions of art, and the offices of love, have been tried in vain; when physicians own the case to be desperate, and the symptoms of it are so evident, that we cannot so much as flatter ourselves with one remaining, though delusive, hope, in favour of a life which perhaps we would gladly ransom with our own: yet even then, with what officious though unavailing eagerness do we return to the bed of languishing! and while our eyes are weeping, and our hearts bleeding, how willingly do we pass through days of confinement and nights of wakefulness, if we may but contribute to make the passage to the grave a little the smoother, when the journey cannot be prevented! But alas, how poor do our efforts appear, and how weak and impotent all our pity and our friendship!

Let us then, from the subject we are now upon, draw a consolation with regard to our pious friends, which may surely, as a reviving cordial, raise our spirits when they droop, and mingle praises with our tears. Jesus attends them, though in an invisible form; and the eye that wept over Lazarus, is with incessant care fixed upon them. Can we imagine, that he is grown less gracious on his removal to the heavenly world? It is true that he has laid aside those expressions of compassion, which are peculiar to animal nature in this inferior state; and drops of grief, and sentiments of sorrow, can have no further place. Yet still on the throne of his glory he retains a kind of royal compassion; and in this respect, as well as another, having loved his own that are in the world, he loves them even to the end. He doth indeed, for wise and gracious reasons, permit and appoint their death; but as he cannot be absent from any place, or unacquainted with any circumstance of mankind, we may assure ourselves that he is not an unconcerned spectator, when his servants are struggling away their breath, and fainting off from the stage of mortality. The compassions of a fellow-mortal are vain and fruitless; but those of a God are infinitely important. He can moderate their dying agonies, or communicate inward strength in proportion to them. He has a gentle voice, which can assure them that their sins are forgiven them; and attendant angels are at his command, to convoy them to the regions of glory. Nay, we may assure ourselves, that as their great and good Shepherd, he will himself be with them when they pass through the dark valley of the shadow of death; and his rod and his staff will yet comfort them. We may hope, that by his care rays of glory shall cheer them through the gloom; and the gates of the invisible world, of which he holds the keys, shall be opened upon them, in a manner which shall least shock and surprise. He will surely manifest himself to them by such gracious tokens, and embrace their separate spirits with such unknown endearments, as shall leave no room for one moment's terror, or even a moment's suspicion. He will delight to teach them the songs of heaven, as soon as the breath passes from their mortal lips; and attemper the rays of opening glory in such a manner, as he knows most suitable to the state of spirits new-born from flesh.

These meditations seem naturally connected with the subject; and I am sure, they are full of divine consolation, to support us under the death of our pious friends, and in the views of our own, which is so soon to succeed it: especially when connected with the last reflection I shall suggest, viz.

5. With what holy triumph will Christ rejoice over all his people, when he hath finally recovered them from the power of the grave, and destroyed that last enemy!

What our Lord did in this instance for Lazarus, was but an imperfect specimen of what he intends shortly to do for all that sleep in him. All that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and come forth; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Delightful prospect, for the Redeemer, and all the redeemed! While Christ was thus weeping over Lazarus, he knew what he would do; and we may assure ourselves, that his gracious heart felt a secret unutterable pleasure in the thought of it. It must be delightful to him, while sympathizing with these mournings, to reflect how soon he should give them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; how soon he should turn their sorrow into raptures of pleasing surprise, by the revival of this lamented friend. And when he came to the tomb, and spoke those divinely efficacious words, Lazarus, come forth! who can describe, or imagine, the moving circumstances that attended it! With what transport did Lazarus, and Martha, and Mary, embrace and congratulate each other! With what a mixture of amazement and gratitude did they all prostrate themselves at the feet of their almighty Saviour! and with what fervours of devotion and love did the newly-ransomed captive of the grave consecrate to him the life which he had renewed! A stranger must have beheld such a sight with pleasure: how much sublimer delight must it then give to the great Author of such mutual happiness!

But, O my brethren, what was this resurrection of Lazarus to a mortal and a sinful state on earth, when compared with that resurrection to immortal holiness and glory which Christ is designing for all his people! Surely the very prospect of it must delight his compassionate heart, and add new joys to his throne at the right hand of the majesty on high. Death is making havoc among his subjects here; those whom he loveth are sick and dying; their countenances gather blackness, and their bones are scattered at the grave's mouth: but he foresees the day, when he shall lead captivity captive; and he seems to glory in the view of it, and to comfort himself (as it were) in the thought of that ample vengeance which he will shortly take on their cruel destroyer. Is not that the language of those sublime words, I will ransom them from the power of the grave: I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction; repentance shall be hid from mine eyes. "Like an inexorable conqueror, I will abolish the very memorial of thee."

And when the glorious work is accomplished, with what complacency and delight will he survey it! How joyfully will he welcome that important day, which is to wipe away the reproach of his servants, and to clothe them with beauty, honour, and immortality! When he sees them springing out of their graves, as a mighty nation born at once, and shining in his own complete likeness, with what pleasure will he view that happy change, hear their mutual congratulations, and accept their united praises! Attendant angels will undoubtedly rejoice: the morning stars will sing sweeter, than at laying the foundations of the earth, and the sons of God will shout louder for joy. With what pleasure then must the blessed Jesus view it, as the work of his own love, and the travail of his very soul!

It is a known circumstance in the story of Augustus Cæsar, that when he was quitting empire and life, he expressed his great satisfaction in the improvements he had made in the buildings of Rome, so that, whereas he found it brick, he left it marble.* But surely Christ may much more justly glory in it, when he descends in all the pomp of the resurrection-day, that he has made a nobler change, even in this corporeal part of our nature; and that whereas he found it mortal, corruptible clay, he has raised it to a strength and splendour superior to that of marble or adamant. This is the joy and triumph of the blessed Jesus; this is the glorious hope, that animates the Christian under the mournful prospect of the ravages of death.

Glorious hope! reviving thought! at once adequate to the sorrows of this day; to the solemn occasion of which I must now turn, and persuade myself I shall not trespass on your patience, though I should a little transgress the limits of your time, while I speak of that venerable and excellent person, of that dear, amiable, generous friend, whose much-lamented removal has directed our meditations to this fruitful subject, on which it has been so hard to confine them.

The reverend and eminently worthy Dr. Samuel Clark had the honour to be descended from ancestors remarkable for their learning and piety. Mr. Samuel Clark of Bennet Fink, so well known by his historical writings, was his great-grandfather by the father's side;† and Mr. Samuel Clark of Aylesbury, the author of those judicious annotations on the Bible, which are still so generally esteemed, was his mother's father. As he bore the name of each, he imitated them both, as well in their ministerial as Christian character. His immediate parents were very valuable persons, whom God spared to an advanced age to rejoice in such a son; whom, in regard to the early marks both of genius and seriousness which they discerned in him, they early consecrated (together with his younger brother, the late reverend Mr. Daniel Clark) to the service of the sanctuary. He pursued his academical studies under the direction of the learned Dr. Ker, with whom (as I have been assured by those who were then his companions) he acquired an early reputation; particularly, for that accurate acquaintance with the Greek language, and that intimate knowledge of the Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testament, in the original, which is so important, I had almost said so indispensable, a part of ministerial furniture.

When he left the academy, he did not choose to enter on preaching directly, though I believe few of his years were better qualified for it; but he resided some time in two families of rank, under the capacity of a chaplain and tutor; where, while he was directing the studies of young gentlemen committed to his care, he was greatly improving his own. He had in one of these families considerable offers of preferment in the established church; which, in concurrence with other much weightier considerations, put him on studying the foundations of nonconformity with great attention. The result is well known to you, by the happy effects of it, which you enjoyed for so many years: and though no man was less enslaved to a party spirit, or more ready to do justice and honour to learning, moderation, and piety, wherever he found any of them; yet I am authorized to say, he never repented the choice he made, under all its temporal disadvantages: nor is it any wonder to me, that the observation of growing years, and the freest converse with men and books, and above all, the nearest views of eternity, increased his satisfaction in it.

* Lucr. Tit. glorietur, marmoream se reliquisse, quam lateritiam acceperat. Suetonius Vit. Aug. cap. 28.

† I have often heard Dr. Clark express the great satisfaction he had in meeting, [illegible] with a valuable School Book, in a [illegible] In several passages [illegible] where [illegible] the Latin [illegible] Dr. Clark [illegible] happy [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

During this period of retirement, of which I have just been speaking, he gave that accurate examination to all the most remarkable theological controversies, on which he fixed his judgment in relation to them. And as he heard all the different parties of Christians pleading for themselves, and endeavoured to try them all by Scripture, as the only infallible standard, he happily steered between opposite extremes: and his great natural sagacity enabling him to see much further into many questions, than the generality of mankind do, he plainly discerned, that many matters which have been most warmly debated, have related to what is circumstantial rather than essential in the doctrines of Christianity, and when sifted to the bottom, relate rather to different phrases than different ideas. This gave him that moderation, for which he was so eminently remarkable and amiable; and engaged him, while he was vigorously supporting and strongly enforcing the great peculiarities of the gospel, to hold the truth in love, and not only to bear with those that expressed themselves differently with respect to some of them, but to pay a real deference to those valuable qualities which he discerned in them, and to which no man seemed to render more impartial justice. It was a maxim, which he early imbibed, and constantly retained, "that all the heresies which had corrupted and afflicted the church, owed their original to men's departing from the simplicity of Scripture, and must derive their cure from a return to it."

When he appeared under the character of a preacher, he happily joined the rational and pathetic with the Scriptural and evangelical strain. In consequence of this, the most judicious hearers were entertained, whilst the least knowing were instructed, and they who had made the greatest progress in the divine life were led on to further improvements. It was an honour to the taste and judgment of those who then constituted this society, that they unanimously made choice of him for their pastor: and who can express how great a blessing it has been to the church and auditory, to have enjoyed the benefit of his labours more than thirty-eight years? During which, as every public assembly in which he presided, has been witness to the fervency of his prayers, and the excellent matter and tendency of his discourses; so he has had a testimony in the conscience of every one that knew him, how powerful his instructions and exhortations were enforced by the most blameless and honourable conversation.

Most remarkably may it be said of him, that in strenuous imitation of his Divine Master, he went about doing good; and all the branches of his work were his delight. As his mind was furnished with a rich variety of knowledge, in consequence of a long and very close attention to reading, meditation, and prayer; so he was always ready to communicate it, and desirous to support, wherever he came, a spirit of rational and improving conversation; that he might fill up his time profitably abroad as well as at home, and redeem the hours which are so frequently lost even by persons of knowledge and piety. Seasons appointed for meals were not exempted from this care; and as the book of God of course furnished out in his own family food for the mind during that of the morning,* so what he daily met with in other books, (often greatly improved by his own judicious reflections,) was happily introduced on other occasions.

His generous heart was always working with some benevolent and useful design; and he endeavoured to inspire all about him with such sentiments, and to encourage to the utmost every worthy pursuit, whether in his brethren in the ministry, or in private Christians. His steadiness of temper carried him through the various accidents of life with uncommon composure. Far from that desultory temper, which is often so fatal to the usefulness even of great men, he pursued with persevering patience whatever good design he undertook; and that prudence which was so distinguished a part of his character, enabled him to judge of the importance of ends, and the properest measures of obtaining them: so that I have seldom known any, who appeared to suffer fewer disappointments in the prosecution of their schemes than he.

His great modesty did indeed prevent him from some public services, of which he was on many accounts very capable; I mean, instructing the world more frequently from the press. But the few specimens of this kind which he has given, are sufficient to make us regret there are no more; and to excite our wishes that some way may be found of rescuing from oblivion some of his many valuable remains.

* It was in Dr. Clark's family a general custom, [illegible] every morning and evening [illegible] Scripture: and I have known [illegible] those [illegible] observed.

It was one instance of Dr. Clark's remarkable wisdom, that he was a most attentive observer of providence: and the conduct of providence towards him was, in many respects, peculiarly worthy of observation: he delighted himself in the Almighty, and God gave him the desire of his heart.

He was undoubtedly one of the happiest, as well as one of the best of men, in domestic life; and indeed for a long course of years prosperity seemed to attend on all his steps. As he was greatly blessed in a most suitable, affectionate, and amiable consort, and in a train of lovely children, he treated them always with the most endearing tenderness, and was perpetually labouring to improve all his influence over them, for their advancement in religion, and in whatever else might make them capable of increasing happiness.

Prudence taught him to form friendship with due deliberation, and none could cultivate it more faithfully; nor could any one be happier in expressing the kind sentiments with which his heart overflowed, wherever he professed it; or more ready to think himself obliged, or to return with interest every good office he received. And the good hand of his God was remarkably upon him in this respect, in sparing to him for many years some intimate friends, for whom he had through life the highest esteem; and in raising up others towards the close of his life, who showed in the most obliging manner the high respect they paid to his merit as soon as they began to know it, and the pleasure they took in contributing to his happiness.

As God had placed him in more plentiful circumstances than many of his brethren, it appeared that he well knew how to use and become them. His mind was too great to be in any degree elated with them, too wise and too good to fail of improving them for the best purposes. His liberal soul devised liberal things, which yet he was studious to conceal. He took a peculiar pleasure, in hospitably sharing with his brethren and friends the bounties of divine Providence; and gave and received a new supply of spirits, while he was conversing with them in such circumstances.

Thus did this good and happy man pass through a long series of years, increasing in knowledge and in piety, in zeal and usefulness; loving all, and by all beloved; honouring all, who deserved any peculiar regard, and by all such honoured, in proportion to their knowledge of him, bringing joy into every house which he entered, and most of all into his own when he returned to it. And when towards the close of so bright a day, heavy afflictions visited him, he took occasion from them to exhibit new virtues and graces, and to demonstrate that it was not from speculation alone, he had known how so well in prosperity to inculcate the duties of adversity. He bore frequent visits of acute pain, with uncommon patience and cheerfulness: and though the unutterable pleasure he took in exerting himself continually in public service, rendered his paralytic disorders peculiarly grievous; yet even these he supported with great resignation to the will of God, and cheerful hope in his long-experienced goodness. And in this visitation, mercy surrounded him in a manner well worthy of our recollection. Though his speech was so much affected by it, as to render him, for more than a year and a half, incapable of the labours of the pulpit, yet his understanding continued in its full vigour; nor did I ever hear him discourse with more sagacity and penetration, or pray with more readiness or propriety of expression, than since this lamented complaint seized him: and he was still capable of study, which to his latest days he pursued with as much eagerness, as if he had just been laying in his furniture for the ministry.

There seemed also a providential beauty in the vicissitudes of Dr. Clark's illness and recovery. Whereas he was so extremely afflicted for a considerable time at Bath with a complication of distempers, that his skilful physician scarce expected to have found him alive at his return, for several days; his spirits still kept up, to the amazement of all that were around him, and he discovered a serenity which nothing could discompose, a cheerfulness which nothing could overbear. Thus he triumphed over death, when it seemed to make its nearest and most deliberate approaches: and after this you know, in how surprising a manner he was given back to the prayers which were offered for him, and restored to his own house, and the house of his friends, again; yea, what was to him most delightful of all, restored to the house of his God. I cannot express the pleasure with which I reflect upon it, that the last sabbath, and almost the last day of his life, was spent with you in this place; and that he was administering the sacrament of the Lord's supper to you, but a few hours before he received his final discharge from the services of this lower world.* And truly, I think the circumstances of that discharge peculiarly favourable. To be so suddenly struck, as to be able only by a speaking smile to testify to the dear relatives then near him, the secret tranquillity and joy of his heart, when all the powers of utterance and of nature were failing him at once; and then to take flight for heaven, without so much as a groan, is a death greatly to be congratulated, when viewed in connexion with such a life.

* On Lord's day, Dec. 2, whereas he died on the Tuesday following.

O my brethren, what shall I say? With difficulty indeed do I restrain a thousand thoughts which are rising in my mind, while I speak of my friend, of my father, for such I may properly call him, if all the offices of paternal tenderness and care can merit that title. We cannot but mourn, yet let us rejoice too. Let us rejoice, that we have known him, and known him to be such a man; that he has marked his way with such distinguished usefulness, and scattered so many blessings, of which so many are left behind him. As when Dorcas was gone, surviving friends showed the garments which she had made for the poor, as memorials of her goodness; so may I this day show many remaining, many present, effects of Dr. Clark's piety and zeal; and though so many of them may seem to be hidden in the grave, yet neither are they lost. To him, I may truly say, that under God I owe even myself, and all my opportunities of public usefulness in the church; to him, who was not only the instructor of my childhood and youth in the principles of religion, but my guardian when a helpless orphan, as well as the generous, tender, faithful friend, of all my advancing years. By him were many of you instructed with me in the course of catechistical lectures, and other exercises of the like kind, which he so happily invented and diversified for the benefit of the rising generation.* To him, as the instrument in the hand of divine grace, do many of you owe it, that early religious impressions were made upon your minds; that you were introduced betimes to the table of the Lord; and that you were formed, by all the advantages of instruction and example, to those characters which many of you so worthily and usefully sustain. In some families he has been in all these respects successively a blessing to parents and children; and he has with unutterable pleasure seen in many of you, that his labours have not been in vain in the Lord. And I cannot look upon the children of the charity school now present, without recollecting, that it is now more than thirty years since it was founded by his pious care, exciting the generality of his flock to make (if I mistake not) the first effort of this kind, that was ever made among the dissenters in the country; which has since been followed in many other places with happy success, and which I hope will still be, as I am sure the institution here has already been, a means of great good, with respect both to the temporal and eternal interest of many, who must otherwise have been exposed to great ignorance and wretchedness.

Such are the monuments which our honoured friend has left behind him; and may they long remain! May the effects of his pious and excellent labours be more and more conspicuous! Grievous indeed would it be, if any who heard such exhortations, and saw them illustrated by such an example, should remain unimpressed with a sense of divine things. If there be any such present, let me entreat them to hear him once more, while dead, yet speaking. Let me entreat them to give an attentive perusal to those excellent sermons on the folly of irresolution in religion, which at our united request he published: they seem sufficient to convince every conscience; and O that divine grace might add efficacy to the conviction! As for those of us, who by that grace have felt and submitted to the power of such considerations, and are now serving God in the sincerity of our hearts, what can be more seasonable, under our present distress, than to have recourse to that collection of Scripture promises, which he so judiciously ranged in comparison with the characters to which they are made. Let us drink of these living streams, from that fountain which can never be drawn dry, and our souls shall be refreshed; and we shall be taught to say, with a joy which a loss like this will not be able to take away, The Lord liveth, and blessed be our Rock; and let the God of our salvation be exalted. Amen!

* It was customary with Dr. Clark for many years, to meet young persons at the vestry on the Thursday evenings for religious conversations, in which he went over successively some useful subjects, of which he gave them some schemes in writing, that they might give him an account of them. Thus he went over the history of Scripture, the evidences of natural and revealed religion, the reasons of the reformation from popery, and the ethics of Solomon, collected from a very judicious analysis which he made of his Proverbs and book of Ecclesiastes. He has left behind him, fairly transcribed in short hand between two and three hundred discourses on this last subject, which I could wish in every hand, so far as I can judge of the specimen I have seen of them.

ORDINATION SERMONS.

SERMON XI.

THE TEMPER AND CONDUCT OF THE PRIMITIVE MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL.*

2 Cor. iv. 5.

For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake.

The apostle observes, that what had happened to him with regard to his imprisonment at Rome, though it seemed to bear so melancholy an aspect, yet did on the whole fall out by the special providence of God for the furtherance of the gospel: and we may justly apply the same reflection to several other very afflictive circumstances of his life, and particularly to the most perverse and unjust opposition which he met with from those factious teachers, especially of the circumcision, who gave so much disturbance to him and the churches. The attack which they made upon his character and interest at Corinth, laid him under a necessity of saying many things which he would have gladly omitted, and of mentioning some circumstances in his history, which had otherwise perhaps remained unknown, at least could never have appeared with equal evidence and spirit. While he is engaged in his own vindication, and entering into the particulars of his character and conduct, he drops many very edifying expressions, which are worthy the most attentive regard both of ministers and private Christians; of which the words I have now been reading are none of the least considerable. He was obliged to say something which might look like an encomium on himself, and therefore chooses to speak in the name of all his faithful brethren in the ministry, as well as his own. Now after he had declared that they had renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, (which were the great mysteries of the heathen priesthood, and probably the secret spring which actuated these judaizing teachers,) not like them, walking in craftiness, not handling the word of God deceitfully, or adulterating it with any foreign and corrupt mixtures; but acting so constantly in the sight of God, as to secure to themselves a secret testimony in the consciences of all that intimately knew them, and accurately observed them; he adds, For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake.† O that every Christian minister, who in succeeding ages hath read these words, had been delivered into the mould of them! O that we whom God hath honoured with this high and holy calling, may make it our increasing care to form ourselves by them; and beholding as in a glass the beautiful model, may be changed into the same image from glory to glory!

It will be my business in the process of my discourse from these words,

I. To illustrate the account which the apostle here gives of his own conduct, and that of his brethren in the Christian ministry.

II. To consider the principles on which we may reasonably conclude they acted, and by which they were influenced to it.

III. I shall close with some reflections on the whole.

I choose to throw my Discourse into such a form, as it will give me an opportunity of suggesting my advice and exhortations to you, my dear and reverend brother, who are this day giving yourself up to this excellent work, in the most humble and respectful manner; which I am now the more solicitous to do, lest I should seem to dictate to those from whom I shall always be ready, with great pleasure and deference, to receive instructions.

I. I am to consider the account which the apostle gives of his own conduct, and that of his brethren in the Christian ministry: We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake. In which words he plainly declares, that they did not make themselves the chief end of their ministry, but faithfully devoted it to the service of Christ as the great Lord, whom they endeavoured to serve by all the most humble and affectionate condescensions to those that were committed to their ministerial care.

* Preached at Wadesworth, June 8, 1737, at the Ordination of the Rev. William Johnston.

† It seems evident to me, that ver. 5 and 6 come in as a parenthesis.

1. The apostles did not make themselves the chief end of their ministry.

We, says St. Paul, preach not ourselves. It is to be feared that some did so even in these early days, for the antichristian spirit began to work betimes; so that it gave Paul reason to say, that they served not Christ Jesus, but their own belly, while they preached him out of contention rather than love, supposing to add addition to his bonds; insomuch that he complains of it as a general, though, blessed be God, not a universal, character, all seeking their own things, not the things which are Jesus Christ's. But this was far from being the character of the apostle, or any faithful disciple of Christ; who must have learnt, in some measure, that essential branch of the Christian character, to deny himself, and taking up even his cross to follow his Master to crucifixion itself, should he lead him on in that painful and dangerous way.

It may be worth our while more particularly to observe, that these good men did not seek their own applause, their own interest, or their own power and authority, as the chief end of undertaking and prosecuting the ministry; for each of these particulars must be included in this general expression, We preach not ourselves; and it will be our wisdom to regard each.

These primitive ministers did not, in preaching the gospel, aim at their own applause and reputation.

The greatest men amongst the heathens did it, and avowed it; they reckoned the love of fame amongst the noblest of passions, and the pursuit of it appeared a mark of the most generous mind. But Christian apostles had higher views. They considered themselves as in the presence of God, and had the truly great ambition of being accepted of him, and then human applause and admiration disappeared as less than nothing. It is, says good St. Paul, a very small thing to me, the smallest matter one can imagine,[a] to be judged of man's judgment, for he that judgeth me is the Lord. On this principle we find, that when he came to Corinth, though it were so learned and polite a city, he did not affect to come with the excellency or loftiness of speech, and the persuasive words of man's wisdom; he did not labour for the exactest forms of expression, nor study to compose and deliver his discourses in such a manner as might most easily have gained him the reputation of an exact orator, so that people should point after him as he passed through the streets, and say, That is Paul! a little circumstance with which poor Demosthenes was so highly delighted, but he contented himself with preaching the plain things of the gospel, in a plain and serious, a rational and unaffected, manner, whether men would hear, or whether they would forbear. And indeed, he was rather on his guard against too pompous and florid a style, lest it should seem that a man who was so studious to adorn the doctrines of the gospel, did not thoroughly believe them; and so the cross of Christ should have become of none effect, when an apostle seemed so little penetrated with the argument drawn from it, as to be at leisure for trifles.

Such a turn of mind we may easily perceive in his epistles. They appear to be written out of the fulness of his soul, but without any anxiety about the style, or any very exact care even to range the ideas according to the most methodical order; abounding every where with a great many lively and beautiful digressions, that often run into each other in a manner which the strictest rules of polite writing will hardly allow. In a word, we eminently see in St. Paul, perhaps beyond any other writer in the world, a good man bringing out of the good treasure of his heart good things, with a kind of magnificent negligence. His works are like a wilderness of beautiful and fragrant plants, springing up promiscuously out of a happy soil, and amidst all their seeming confusion, producing, to a natural taste, a finer effect than if they were drawn out with a solicitous care, set in the most regular figures, and cut into a thousand artificial forms.

Again, the apostles, and their fellow-labourers in the gospel ministry, were not governed by a view to the possessions of the present life.

These holy men abhorred the very thought of making the church of Christ a kind of porch to the temple of Mammon. The circumstances in which they undertook their work, were such as could leave no room to suspect that they sought it only as a gainful trade. On the contrary, at their very first setting out in it, they left all, that they might follow their Master. And though it may be objected with regard to some of them, that their all was little, yet they had at least food and raiment, and a habitation which they could call their own; whereas, when they devoted themselves to the ministry of the gospel, one of them could say in the name of the rest, Even to this day we are hungry and naked, and have no certain dwelling-place. And this was St. Paul, who seems to have resigned very great prospects, which his liberal education, his remarkable proficiency and zeal in the Jewish religion, and the degree of favour which he had even in his younger days with the greatest men of his nation, might fairly have given him. But those things, which were before gain to him, he counted loss for

[a] Ἐλάχιστον, 1 Cor. iv. 3.

Christ, and when he had once devoted himself to his service, his actions as well as his words plainly showed, that he was crucified to the world by the cross of his Redeemer. He could therefore appeal to the Corinthians, that his conduct had proved he sought not theirs, but them; and when writing to the Thessalonians, could make an appeal to God himself, that he had never used a cloak of covetousness. Nay, when leaving the Ephesians, amongst whom he had made so long an abode, that his real temper must have been discovered, he could assure them, and they themselves could testify the truth of it, that he had been so far from coveting any man's silver, or gold, or apparel, that his own hand had ministered to his necessities; and that, in order to prevent his being burthensome to them, even for the necessaries of life, he had sometimes added the labour of the night to that of the day.

Nor did these holy men arrogate to themselves any secular power, or pretend to any authority, over the civil liberties of mankind.

Grotius supposes this to be the direct and principal meaning of the text; We preach not ourselves as lords, but proclaim Christ Jesus alone under that character. And this, undoubtedly, is included in the phrase, though I can see no imaginable reason for such a limitation as he would lay upon it. These primitive pastors of the church, according to that excellent advice of St. Peter, (so peculiarly forgotten by those who have contended for the honour of being his only successors,) did not behave as lords over God's heritage;* and though they insisted upon it, that what they wrote by a divine revelation and direction, should be received as the commandment of Christ, yet Paul himself expressly renounces all claim to a dominion over men's faith; thereby confessing himself not to be the master of the family, but merely a servant in it, who desired to be regarded by them no further than he could prove that he spake in a greater name than his own. Let a man, says he, so esteem of us as ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God, of whom the great thing required is, that we be found faithful to him whose commission we bear. Nor did they ever pretend that this extraordinary character of messengers from heaven gave them any claim to secular power on earth; they assumed no authority in temporals in order to spirituals; and they were not penetrating enough to understand the doctrine of the two swords, with which many have since been so fond of meddling, I fear to their own wounding, as well as to the dishonour of the Christian name, and the destruction of many of their fellow-creatures. The weapons of the apostle's warfare were not carnal, but spiritual, as it was necessary they should be, in order to the bringing every thought into subjection to the law of Christ.† Which leads me to pass on from this negative part of their character, to observe, that, as they did not preach themselves, so as to make their own reputation, or interest, or dominion, the end of their labours; so,

2. They faithfully devoted their ministry to the service of Christ.

We preach Christ Jesus the Lord; which plainly intimates, that they made Christ the great object of their preaching, and that they endeavoured to speak of him in such a manner as to promote his empire over the hearts and consciences of men.

They made Christ the great subject of their preaching.

So they declare, We preach Christ crucified, though to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness. At Corinth, in particular, curious as it was, the apostle declares, I determined to know, i. e. to make known, and insist upon, nothing among you save Jesus Christ, even that crucified person; with whatever scorn and contempt such a subject might be treated. And therefore it is observable, that preaching Christ is sometimes used as a comprehensive expression for all that the apostles taught. Not that Paul or his brethren neglected the great doctrines of natural religion, which are so evidently the foundation of the gospel itself, that it is perfect madness to pour contempt upon them. We might in reason conclude, as we find it to have been fact, that, when they came amongst Gentile and idolatrous nations, they began with asserting the being and attributes of the only true God, the universality of his providence, and that certainty of a state of future retribution, which is so naturally connected with it. All this they taught; but they did not stop here, for they well knew, that it was their duty to make these things the plan on which to raise that glorious superstructure which Christianity hath built upon them. They served God with their spirit in the gospel of his Son, and therefore proclaimed the glory of the Father, as reflected from the face of Christ Jesus the Lord.

They established the truth of his deity, the mystery of his incarnation, the necessity of his atonement, the perfection of his righteousness, the riches of his grace. They described him as living on earth an example of universal goodness, as dying on the cross a sacrifice for sin, as rising from the dead, and ascending into heaven, and as reigning there the Lord of universal nature, and head over all to the church. You cannot but know, that these are their darling topics, on which they most copiously insist, in their sermons and writings which are transmitted to us: and if St. Paul at Athens seems to touch more sparingly than usual on these important doctrines, it is to be considered, that we have only the beginning of a discourse, in which the rudeness of the philosophers interrupted him, before he could proceed to open and establish those doctrines which were peculiar to his character as an ambassador of Jesus. And I am persuaded, that whoever impartially peruses the epistles of that great apostle, and observes not only his direct arguments, but his lively and pathetic digressions on this glorious subject, when it comes in his way, will not only see that Paul was delighted with it, but will himself be disposed to wish that every Christian minister may copy after this great original. Especially when it is considered,

* De Latinorum exegesi non semel me dissensisse et dissentire [illegible] my text at the Ordination of Messieurs Gregory and Dupuy will more fully supply the deficiency of these brief remarks of mine upon it; and further I do with great pleasure refer the reader.

That he and his brethren preached Christ in such a manner, as might most effectually establish his empire over the hearts and consciences of men.

We preach Christ Jesus the Lord, i. e. we preach him under the character of the great Lord, the ruler and governor of his church. They very well knew, that the design of Christianity was not merely to amuse the world, but to reform it; and that its sublimest speculations were received and admitted in vain, if the life were not regulated, and the heart subdued, by the gospel. Therefore do they on all occasions inculcate it, that God had exalted Christ to be a Prince as well as a Saviour; had ordained, and even sworn, in his holiness, that every knee should bow unto him. These good men did not think it enough to declare the grace of the gospel, and then leave it to the Spirit of God, by his own immediate agency, to draw the proper consequences relating to duty; but they expressly draw those consequences themselves, and enter into a very large and particular detail of those duties. They insist upon it with great spirit and earnestness, as a faithful saying, that those who have believed in God should be careful to maintain good works, and direct succeeding ministers to affirm it constantly. They declared, that it was the very purpose for which the saving grace of God had appeared unto all men, to teach them to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly. They urge Christians therefore to yield themselves to God, as alive from the dead, and to employ their members as instruments of righteousness. Beseeching them by the mercies of God, to present their bodies as living sacrifices, holy and acceptable to God, which was indeed their most reasonable service. Nor did they think it beneath the honour of the evangelical ministry, sometimes to insist on arguments taken from the terrors of the law. Knowing those terrors, they laboured to persuade men by them; they affectionately warned them, that the ground which under divine cultivation brought forth nothing but briers and thorns, was nigh unto cursing, and its end was to be burned; that to those who did not obey the gospel of Jesus Christ, there remained a certain fearful expectation of wrath, and fiery indignation, which should devour them; yea, that they should be punished with everlasting destruction, from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. This was the apostolic method of preaching Christ; so warning every man, and teaching every man, as that they might, through the divine blessing, most probably hope to present every man perfect in Christ; that having their fruit unto holiness, their end might be everlasting life.

You see I have generally expressed these things in Scripture language, that the illustration and proof might advance together. And if we desire to approve ourselves faithful in the same cause, we must conduct our ministration thus, and must also imitate these good men in the third particular of their conduct, which alone now remains to be considered from these words; which is,

3. That they endeavoured to serve their great Master, by the most humble and affectionate condescension to those that were committed to their care.

So far were they from lording it over their brethren, that according to the example and command of Christ himself, they owned themselves the servants of all: nor was it merely an empty compliment, for their actions spoke it as well as their words; they exercised great humility and condescension towards all, and they did it for Jesus' sake.

They exercised great humility and condescension towards all their brethren, not excepting even the meanest of them.

To this Paul frequently exhorts others: Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. In love serve and be subject to one another, and let each esteem others better than himself. Thus he advised, and thus he acted: and his brethren, no doubt, behaved like him. They well knew their calling as Christians, and plainly saw, that not many mighty, not many noble, were called, but that God had chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty; that he had chosen the poor in this world, rich in faith, and heirs of a kingdom of eternal glory. And if God would stoop thus low, they were cordially willing to do it. They could discern a dignity in a child of God, and an heir of glory, which shone through all their poverty and meanness in their dress, and outward appearance; inconsiderable circumstances, which could not prevent these holy men from honouring them that feared the Lord, though they might want some of those decorations which the vilest of mankind may wear, and perhaps to their greater infamy.

St. Paul was a memorable instance of this amiable temper: though by his education fit for higher company, and from his early years accustomed to it, he did not disdain the meanest of the people, and was not only easy of access to them, but visited them at their own dwellings, and carried his instructions and consolations from house to house, even to those where he could expect no entertainment, but such as arose from religious converse, society in worship, and a consciousness of being useful to the souls of men. And it is worthy of our notice, that in subserviency to this great design, this holy man was a very affectionate friend to their temporal interests; and that to such a degree, as to be far from imagining that he had done his part, when he had exhorted his hearers to contribute liberally to the supply of their indigent brethren. Most instructive in this view is the address he makes to the presbyters or bishops of the church of Ephesus; in which, appealing to them, that they themselves knew that his own hands had ministered to his necessities, and those that were with him, he adds, I have showed you, that so labouring, you ought to support the weak: and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.

The same true greatness of soul which engaged him cheerfully to contribute out of his small stock, for the relief of those that were yet more necessitous than himself, disposed him with great condescension and tenderness to bear the infirmities of his people, and in many instances to sacrifice his own taste and humour to theirs. Who was weak, and he was not weak? Who was offended, and he did not burn with desire to remove the offence? When his converts behave with too much of the peevishness and perverseness of children, he did not haughtily chastise them, but rather chose tenderly to expostulate with them, and if possible to love them out of their follies. He put on not only the bowels of a father, but the indulgence of a nurse towards them: We were, says he, gentle amongst you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children, and ready to have imparted to you, not only the gospel of Christ, but our own souls or lives also, i. e. to have died, as we lived, for your service, because you were singularly dear to us.

This was the governing temper of St. Paul, and it carried him through some circumstances which required great and resolute self-denial; he became all things to all men, if by any means he might gain some sincere converts to the gospel. And in particular, to the Jews he became as a Jew, that he might gain them; i. e. he voluntarily laid himself under all the restraints of the Mosaic law, though he knew it was now abolished, that he might as a Christian apostle convert the Jews. And this he carries so far, as to declare his readiness, not only to forbear those kinds of food which the law of Moses pronounceth unclean, but to give up all animal diet, and subsist entirely on vegetables, rather than he would grieve and offend his brethren, i. e. the feeblest Christian. If meat, says he, make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth. Thus, though the apostles were free from all, they nevertheless voluntarily became the servants of all, and indeed condescended to do and forbear many things, because disagreeable to their Christian brethren, which few hired servants would have done or forborne out of regard to those who were properly their masters. But let us not fail to remember that They did all this for the sake of Christ and his gospel.

Ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake. It is certain, that such condescensions as we have been describing, are either great or mean, according to the principle from whence they proceed. Ambition can creep, that it may soar; and soothe, that it may afterwards insult: but the apostles stooped, that they might raise others; and pleased, that they might profit. We, says St. Paul, please all men to their good for their edification. This was their great concern, that whether they ate or drank, or whatever they did, they might do all to the glory of God. This was their earnest expectation and their hope, that in all things Christ might be glorified in them, whether by their life or their death. They sacrificed not only their humour and their ease, but life itself, to the great purposes of pleasing and serving the blessed Jesus; and Paul spake the sentiments of them all, when he said, Neither bonds nor imprisonments move me; nor do I count my life dear unto me, that I may finish my course with joy, and the ministry I have received of the Lord. But while I insist on such expressions as these, I do in part anticipate what I am to offer under the second head. Where I proposed,

II. To consider what were the principles by which they were animated to so noble a temper and conduct.

I the rather enter into the survey of them, as we shall find they were not only suited to the age and circumstances of the apostles, but ought also to have a very great influence upon us, whom God has favoured so far as to count us faithful, putting us into something of the same ministry with them, which can never be comfortably and honourably fulfilled, but by those who govern themselves by the like maxims and principles. They were undoubtedly influenced by an affectionate love to the blessed Redeemer, a pious zeal for the glory of God in the salvation of souls, and a prudent regard to their own present and future happiness. And if these great motives have their due weight with us, we shall not preach ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord, and ourselves the servants of his people for his sake.

1. The apostles were engaged to the conduct we have described, by a most grateful affection to the blessed Redeemer.

That dear name is precious to every believing soul, and how precious it was to these holy men, almost every page of their writings will declare. Divine grace had deeply humbled them under the conviction of their own guilt and weakness, and then taught them to view the Lord Jesus Christ as made of God unto them wisdom and righteousness, sanctification and redemption. They knew the grace of the Son of God in descending, and living, and dying for their salvation; and in passing through all the most dreadful scenes of suffering which imagination can suggest, with a love to them, which all those waters could not quench, nor the floods drown. And believing this, they could not but speak in his cause, they could not but desire to spend and be spent in his service. On this principle therefore doth Paul vindicate those ardours of zeal, which a profane world censured as enthusiasm and madness. If we are beside ourself, it is to God, for the love of Christ constraineth us while we thus judge, and approve the argument in the coolest moments of reflection, that if one died for all, then were all dead; for had they not been in a state of condemnation and death, they would not have needed such a ransom. And he died, that we, who live only in consequence of his dying love, should not henceforth live to ourselves, but to him that died for us, and rose again. And we may assure ourselves, that while their souls were thus drawn with the cords of a man, and the bands of love, they saw a peculiar beauty in the condescensions of so great a personage and so dear a friend, which inclined them with pleasure to trace his steps, in making themselves the servants of others for his sake, who took upon him the form of a servant, though he were Lord of all.

And ought not these considerations, my brethren, to have a constraining force upon us? Was it for the sake of the apostles alone, that the blessed Jesus stooped so low, and bore so much? Did he not love us, and give himself for us, and was not the news of our salvation contained in those glad tidings which he brought from heaven, which he proclaimed on earth, publishing them with long-continued labour, and at length sealing them with his blood? Have not we our lot amongst his people? nay, I will add, are we not distinguished from most of the rest of them, by his favour, in that he hath committed to our trust his glorious gospel, the important cause that lay so near his heart, the great end of his toils and his sufferings? And where is our gratitude, where is our fidelity, where is our common integrity, if we can forget such engagements, and lose our concern for that gospel, in a mean solicitude about our own applause, or interest, or dominion? I trust, my brethren, it will never so be lost. I am persuaded, through divine grace, there are those amongst us, whose bosoms glow with such undissembled love, that we can truly say, we reckon the title of servants of Christ, and of the church for his sake, a thousand times more honourable than to be called, and to be, the lords of the whole world; that we had rather approve ourselves the faithful interpreters of his laws, than see assembled nations bowing down before us, and with the profoundest submission receiving law at our mouths.

2. The apostles were animated to the conduct we have been reviewing, by a pious zeal for the glory of God in the salvation of souls.

They well knew, that the grace of the Father was the original source of all the blessings they received by the interposition of the Son, and their hearts were so subjected and united to God, that they could not fail of being tenderly concerned, that being bought with such a price, and maintained by such a constant emanation of divine favour and bounty, they might glorify God with their bodies and their spirit, which they owned to be the Lord's, by so many important claims.

And they must further infer from the complete all-sufficiency of the divine Being, that the only way whereby we are capable of glorifying him, is by promoting the display of his attributes; which are most nobly illustrated in the perfection and happiness of his rational creatures; especially their final and eternal happiness. It plainly appears from the whole strain of the apostles' writings, that those holy men were deeply penetrated with the views of an invisible world: and as it was their great concern for themselves, that their own souls might be given them for a prey; so sentiments of compassion and humanity, joined with those of piety, to engage them to wish and labour the salvation of others.

They certainly knew, however others might forget it, that every human creature hath in its breast an immortal soul, which must survive not only the dissolution of the body, but the wreck of this lower world; a soul that, by its original constitution, was capable of shining in the image of God, and the glories of paradise, when the sun should be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood. They were likewise sensible that these precious souls were naturally in a very dangerous state, and by sin stood exposed to everlasting darkness, despair, and ruin. And this appeared to them such a lamentable sight, that they could not but weep over those whose end would so probably be destruction. And when they saw them going on in a gay insensibility of danger, and a proud confidence, on the very borders of hell, it cut them to the heart, and put an eagerness and pathos into the manner of their address, which nothing but such an infinite concern could have given. They were attempting to recover those out of the snare of the devil, who were led captives by him at his pleasure: to turn men from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that instead of meeting all the terrors of his wrath, and sinking into eternal destruction, they might receive the forgiveness of their sins, and an inheritance amongst his sanctified people. And while this was the view in which they regarded them, who can wonder that they did, as it were, travail in birth for their conversion? Who can wonder if it appeared to them even an inhuman thing, to be more solicitous about soothing men's ears, or gaining an influence over men's temporal concerns, than saving their souls? As it would indeed be a more cruel kind of folly, than for a physician to be more careful that his bill were elegantly written, than that the life of his patient should be saved by the suitableness of the prescription.

I must further add, in order to complete the argument, that the apostles well knew, that nothing was so likely to save the perishing souls of men, as the great doctrines of the everlasting gospel; nothing so like to recover them, when fainting and dying, as the vital savour of a Redeemer's name; which is indeed the power of God to the salvation of every one that believeth. This engaged them, in this manner, to preach Christ Jesus the Lord; and I hope, my brethren, we shall never imagine, that our wisdom can find out another more effectual way. I hope we shall never practise so dangerous a complaisance to the unbelievers of the present age, as to wave the gospel, that we may accommodate ourselves to their taste; which if we do, we may indeed preserve the name of virtue, but I fear we shall destroy the thing itself; lose it in our congregations, and probably in our hearts too. For, I confess, it seems to me much more probable, that the doctrines of natural religion alone should be blessed as the means of reforming heathens, who never heard of Christianity, than that they should have much effect upon those who, under the profession of it, slight its most glorious peculiarities; as if the revelation of Jesus were a mere encumbrance, which, while we own it to be true, we might nevertheless forget, without great danger, or much inconvenience. But if we imbibe the spirit of the apostles, and make their conduct the model of ours, we may cheerfully expect that presence of God with us, in consequence of which the great ends of our ministry may be answered, to the reformation of men's lives, and the salvation of their souls.

How glorious a hope! how rich a recompence for all the fatigue, for all the condescension, for all the self-denial, which our office may require! Most forcibly doth St. James express the importance of the thought, if one man be the happy instrument of gaining another to the cause of truth and holiness, let him know, let him pause upon it and reflect, that he who converteth a sinner from the error of his ways, shall save a soul from death, an immortal soul! And how much is comprehended in those few words! We are sometimes perhaps ready to envy the opportunity which the great men of the world have to promote the happiness of others, and it is the most generous, and indeed the only rational, view in which riches and power can be desired. But let us remember, my brethren, such is the nature of an immortal soul, that to bring it into the way to eternal life, is a greater good than any merely temporal blessing, which can be conferred upon the greatest number of men for the longest duration in the present world. And it is most certain, that the moment will at length come, when the sum of happiness which hath actually been enjoyed by every particular soul, that we have led into that blessed world, will be greater than what the most uninterrupted peace, liberty, and plenty could have given to the most numerous nations, in a hundred, or a thousand, or ten thousand years. Let so sublime a thought animate our pursuit, and make us willing to spend and be spent in such a service.

3. The apostles well knew, that by such a conduct as we have now been surveying, their own present and future happiness would be most effectually secured.

They seemed indeed to sacrifice their present interest, and in many important instances they did so; yet surely they found a rich equivalent in the consciousness of such a temper, and a prospect of that reward which would through grace attend it.

The pleasures of gratitude and humanity, are a thousand times superior to that which can arise from gratifying the senses, or even from improvements in science. I hope all that hear me this day, know the delight of serving a friend whom we highly esteem and love; many of us, I question not, do particularly know how agreeable it is to find some opportunity of expressing our cordial sense of those favours, which it is impossible for us fully to repay. Let us judge by that, how delightful it must be to these good men, when their hearts were full of the most lively and penetrating sense of a Redeemer's love, to see themselves in such a situation, as that their whole lives should be spent in serving his interest, and every day of them should do something to promote it.

And the influence which their labours had upon the happiness of mankind, must also add a most delightful relish to them. Our nature is so constituted by the wise and gracious Author of it, that some degrees of pleasure inseparably attend every attempt for the real improvement of any part of his creation, even the meanest. It is pleasant to view a spot of ground, which from a barren and useless wild has been manured and cultivated, planted and adorned, by human industry, so that it is reduced to a fruitful garden or field; and he who hath laboured to effect it, reviews it with double satisfaction. It is much more delightful to have been instrumental in forming and cultivating the mind, and reducing those who were once little better than savages to discipline and arts, to the improvements and elegances of life, whereby they may as it were be broken into men; but surely the apostles must with incomparably greater satisfaction look round about them, and see whole regions enlightened by the rays which they had diffused; thousands of their fellow-creatures recovered from darkness and ignorance, superstition and vice, and formed to wise, regular, noble sentiments, subjected to God, united to Christ, and conducted into the ways of peace and life by their means. Accordingly, I doubt not but you have often observed in how sublime and pathetic a manner St. Paul expresseth himself on this occasion, in the name of his brethren as well as in his own, in the progress of this epistle. We approve ourselves, says he, the ministers of God, in all the various circumstances through which we pass, in honour and dishonour, treated indeed by the world as deceivers, yet conscious to ourselves that we are true, and the great patrons of truth; as obscure and unknown to a proud and insolent world, who affect to overlook us with sovereign contempt, yet well known, even by the happiest tokens, to those blessed souls who are brought home to God by our means; as dying daily, yet behold we live, through the singular interposition of our great Lord for our preservation; as sorrowful on account of various calamities that surround us, and yet in spirit always rejoicing, because though we appear in the world as poor in these things, yet we are making rich in grace and glory. Blessed leaders in the army of Christ! who would not emulate such a character and state? Who would not wish for your hardships and trials, might his supports and success be proportionable to yours? Such were the pleasures they found in preaching Christ Jesus the Lord; and undoubtedly their generous minds delighted to do it in the condescending manner we have described. To converse with their flock in such a free, easy, obliging way, as their brethren, as their servants for Jesus' sake, on the foot of equal and respectful friendship, suited their taste and their temper much better than all the homage, and all the revenues, which secular power could have given, and secular terror could have extorted.

I only add, in the conclusion of this head, that the apostles were influenced to such a conduct by a regard to their own eternal interest:

That great important concern, which swallowed up all others in their mind, and with which nothing here seemed by any means worthy to be compared. Paul himself did not think it unfit to reflect, and to say, a necessity is laid upon me, and woe unto me if I preach not the gospel. He well knew, that if such vigilance was expected from a Jewish prophet, that the souls who perished by his neglect should be by God required at his hand, the danger of such a neglect under the Christian dispensation, would be yet greater in proportion to the clearer degree of evidence with which life and immortality was brought to light. He, therefore, and his associates in this important work, made it their care, as himself expresseth it, to watch for souls as those that must give an account, and were exceedingly solicitous, that they might do it with joy and not with grief. They looked on their converts as those who should be their crown and rejoicing in the day of the Lord, and their delightful companions in the glories of the heavenly world. And when, conscious that through the divine assistance they had fought the good fight, and finished their course, and kept their fidelity, they were humbly bold to look forward with cheerful expectation, as well as desire, to that crown of life which the Lord had laid up for all his faithful servants, that love his appearance. Such may our hopes be, my fathers and brethren, and such our triumphs in the near views of death and eternity. Our days are passing away apace, and no secular powers or advantages can prolong them; nay, perhaps, were we in the number of the richest and greatest of those that call themselves the ministers of Christ, life might run out only so much the sooner, while on the one hand, the baits of luxury, and on the other, the cries of the oppressed, might concur to shorten it. When this scene of vanity is closing, when we are to exchange every ornament for the dress of death, and all the amusements and cares of mortality, for the solemnities of the eternal state; in that awful hour, I say, it will be no grief of heart to us, that we have chosen in all humility to serve Christ and the souls of men, rather than to make our names great, and our families wealthy. And when we come to appear in the presence of that great Redeemer, who hath been witness to all our conduct, and all our designs, we shall really find that we have lost nothing by whatever we have sacrificed to his cause and interest. The applause of thousands is but an empty sound when compared with that of Well done, good and faithful servant; and all the honours and possessions which the greatest princes could bestow, would be lighter than vanity, when laid in the balance with that unfading crown of glory, which every faithful minister may expect, when Christ the chief Shepherd shall appear.

I have dilated so much on these pleasant and copious topics, that I have hardly left myself time.

III. So much as to mention the reflections which may naturally arise from what we have been hearing. You will easily apprehend they are such as these:

How greatly is the truth of Christianity confirmed by the character of those who were first employed in the publication of it; who gave the greatest evidence that can possibly be imagined of their being entirely devoted to the sacred cause of truth and piety, and expressed, as we have heard, the most disinterested and self-denying zeal in the service of both.

How happy is it for the Christian cause, that these original monuments are still preserved, and that we are not left to form an idea of its ministers merely from the general history of succeeding and distant ages, or by the canons and decrees of the greatest part of ecclesiastical councils; which are commonly drawn up with so different a spirit, that, were we to judge by them alone, charity would have inclined us to hope, that those who called themselves the chief successors of the apostles, had never heard of the character of those holy men; but had rather formed their conduct, and even their maxims too, I will not say by the Jewish, but by the heathen, priesthood.

Nevertheless, let us bless God, that, in the midst of so general a depravation, there have been, in all ages, and particularly in our own, a select remnant, who have not defiled their garments, nor prostituted their sacred character and office to those idols of jealousy, which have been so shamefully erected, even in the house of the Lord. Persons, so far as I can judge, of all denominations, both of established and separate churches, at home and abroad, who have been, and are, in their respective spheres, burning and shining lights; men of God, who, however differing in opinion, in discipline, or in worship, have agreed to love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, to bow their hearts and souls to the obedience of his laws, to value the souls committed to their care, serving them in humility and love, candidly excusing the frailties of their brethren, praying, that wherein they were otherwise minded than reason and Scripture directed, that God would, in his own time and way, reveal it unto them; and in the mean time labouring, that whereunto they had already attained, they might walk by the same rule, and might mind the same thing.

Let us daily bow our knees in the most importunate supplications to the God of grace and of peace, that this happy number may be increased; and as he is from time to time laying those in the dust, who were once the joy of our assemblies, and the glory of their profession, let us tenderly feel, let us deeply lament, the desolations of his sanctuary.* And let us earnestly pray, that he would raise up in all the churches a generation of faithful and laborious, serious and spiritual, candid and evangelical, ministers, that instead of the fathers there may be the children, by means of whom a people that are yet to be born may see the salvation of our God in its genuine glories.

And this, in connexion with the subject before us, might also lead us further to reflect, how important a part of an education for the ministry it is, to endeavour to lead young people into the knowledge of this Jesus, whom their office obligeth them to preach and to serve. Polite literature is not by any means to be neglected, nor will it be despised by any but those who know not what it is, yet surely it is not the one thing needful. The Sacred Scriptures are the grand magazine whence the most important, and therefore I think by far the greatest number, of academical lectures are to be drawn. And they who are honoured with a charge of so great importance to the church, should surely be concerned, that those of the rising age, in whose hands this invaluable treasure of the gospel is to be deposited, may not rest in a cold speculative acquaintance, either with the evidences or contents of it; but may feel its vital transforming power, and speak of this great Redeemer as of one on whom they have themselves believed, and whom their own souls do most cordially love.

But I must wave the prosecution of these copious reflections, to conclude with two which are yet more immediately the concern of those who attend the gospel ordinances; and which I would particularly recommend to you, my friends of this society, who are now, through Divine Providence, so well settled with a workman that needs not be ashamed, and one whom you so highly and justly esteem.

Think how solicitous you should be to know and acknowledge Christ Jesus as your Lord.

I know you think it your happiness often to hear of him: O let it not be in vain. Own his authority in your lives as well as your assemblies; or those who have most frequently preached him to you, will be the swiftest and severest witnesses against you in that dreadful day, when all that have not bowed to his sceptre must fall by his sword.

And, to add no more, think also how willing you should be to use the assistance of your ministers, as your servants for Jesus' sake.

Do not neglect to attend on their ministrations, and thereby shut out wisdom and piety at its first

* N.B. This sermon was preached a few days after the death of that great man of God, the truly reverend and excellent Mr. David Jennings entrance. Do not increase their burthen by any unkind usage, lest, by weakening their spirits, you may injure yourselves, and disable them from doing you that service, in which they are cheerfully spending their lives, though perhaps they apprehend they are thereby shortening them.

And, once more, be not unwilling to use a proper freedom with them in your religious concerns. Officiously to pry into the secrets of families and persons, is a meanness which a generous man will scorn; and particularly to know them is a burthen, and often a snare too, which a wise man will gladly decline: but some knowledge of your spiritual state and experience is necessary to our knowing how to address you, and to address God on your account. Nor can you expect such suitable assistance from your spiritual physicians, as might otherwise be hoped for, if you will not communicate to them some particulars of your complaints.

On the whole, my dearly beloved, fulfil you our joy, and let it be your great care so to receive our message, and so to improve it, that it may be the delight of our souls now to proclaim the honours of our Redeemer amongst you, as your servants for Jesus' sake, and that the more tenderly we love you, the more abundant satisfaction we may find in our present labours, and our future account. Amen.

A CHARGE,

Delivered at St. Ives, Huntingdonshire, at the Ordination of the Reverend Mr Jacob Jennings; on August 12th, 1742.

My dear friend and brother,

I doubt not but your own sagacity has prevented me in observing, that the discourse we have been just now hearing is in effect a charge, though with great dexterity couched under the form of a popular address. Your general work has been well represented to you, and you have been instructed as to the authority by which you are to act in it, the subject on which you are chiefly to insist, and the end which you are to pursue. The particular offices in which you are to endeavour to serve Christ, in serving the souls of men, have also been happily touched upon; and the grand arguments which should engage you to attend this service, with diligence, resolution, and delight, have been powerfully suggested. It would therefore be easy for me to go over all the most natural branches of it, in an application of it to you, by which I might well answer the whole purpose of the province particularly assigned to me, in the work of this day. But lest by such a repetition I should seem unseasonably sparing of my own labour, as well as a sense of my inability to express these things in a more agreeable manner than that in which they have already been handled, I shall now attempt a method something different; only observing, that the hints I am now to address to you will appear with some peculiar advantage, when considered in their connexion with the preceding discourse.

I am willing to believe, Sir, that in consequence of what my reverend brother has been laying before you, your heart is now glowing with a vigorous yet humble resolution, that, in the divine strength, you will emulate the character and conduct of the great apostle, and will preach not yourself, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and that you will be ready to approve yourself the servant, the lowly, affectionate servant, of the meanest of your brethren for his sake. I will suppose your inquiry to be, How may I serve this great Master in the most acceptable and successful manner? How may I conduct myself, so as another day to hear him saying to me, Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter into the joy of thy Lord? I know not how to answer such an inquiry better, in a few words, than to remind you of another lively and proper expression of the same apostle St. Paul, when, speaking of the blessed God, he says, I serve him with my spirit in the gospel of his Son. You serve God in the same Gospel. I hope it will indeed be the same. God forbid we should any of us introduce any other. Labour therefore to do it with your spirit, with all the united powers of your soul, and labour at all times to keep your spirit in a proper situation for it.

For your assistance in this respect, I shall make it my present business to show you, as well as I can, what must be the situation and temper of that spirit, which would, in the happiest manner, serve Christ in the great work you have this day undertaken. This will give me an opportunity of suggesting hints which will have their use, not in this or that particular respect alone, but in every circumstance through which you pass, and in every service to which you are called out, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished and prepared to every work. Nor can I think of any thing which appears to me a more proper supplement to the many particular advices I have given you, with respect to your business as a preacher and a pastor, in those academical lectures on that subject which you have heard from me, and the hints of which are still in your hand. Permit me now to remind you, that they come recommended to you by a very material circumstance, as several important passages in them were taken from the lectures of my honoured tutor, your reverend and worthy father; whose name will long be precious in the churches, and my relation to whom I must always esteem as, under God, one of the greatest blessings of my life. You will no doubt frequently review them, and pardon me if I say, you will in effect hear two fathers speaking in them, with a united voice; if the most endearing affection, and the most intimate converse, even from your infant years, can give me a title to that tender name.

If you desire to serve Christ with your spirit in his gospel, I confess you undertake a difficult task. So difficult, that were there not a much better spirit than our own, in the strength of which we attempt it, even the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ himself, I know not how any of us could encourage our younger brethren, or how we could find any encouragement ourselves, in the midst of so many infirmities, temptations, and oppositions. But at once exhorting you, my dear son, to be strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus, and praying, as the apostle expresses it, that the Lord Jesus Christ may be with your spirit, I proceed to give you some hints, as to that frame and temper in which it must be your business and mine to preserve our spirits, if we desire they may be fit for so great a service. And my younger brethren who hear me this day, of which there is so large an appearance, will, I hope, consider a great deal of what is now to be said, as their own concern, as well as ours, and lay it up in their memories, as against their own ordination day. Not to say how much every preacher, and every private Christian, is obliged, on the common principles of religion, to cultivate the main branches of the temper I am to recommend. Now, with respect to this, I may indeed say, as Solomon does, Keep thine heart with all keeping; bestow the utmost attention upon it, and let every thing be done that can be imagined, with any appearance of propriety, in subserviency to so great an end. May it be your constant care, and the grand, noble point of your ambition, to have a mind as well ordered as possible. So that no one irregular affection may be admitted or encouraged, no one good affection wanting or languid. But the general exhortation may further be illustrated in such particulars as these which I shall touch upon, not as exhausting the subject, but as containing some of the most material instances of watchfulness and duty, to which it may lead.

Be solicitous, my dear friend, if you would serve God with your spirit in the gospel of his Son, that your spirit be habitually devout—and humble,—that it be elevated and free,—that it be attentive and active,—that it be courageous and resolute,—that it be tender and gentle.

1, 2. Let it be your care that your spirit be evangelically devout; that it be set upon God, upon God in Christ. He is your Master, and you are always in his sight; labour to act as continually in it. Converse much with him, and you will love him the more, and, by a very natural consequence, you will serve him the better. Labour after the knowledge of the Divine Being, so far as feeble mortals can attain it: and see to it that it be a practical knowledge, affecting your heart with those powerful emotions of reverence and love, due to the great Father of the world, and to your God and Father in Christ. Know and honour him under the various views in which he appears by the light of nature and revelation, realizing to your own mind continually, his existence and his presence. "O my soul, there is a God, and such a God as I discourse of to others: and he is this day, this moment, present with me, and observing what regard I will show him, and what effect all the discoveries he has made of his greatness and goodness will have upon my mind and my life!"

Let this engage you to make devotion a considerable part of your business, and to attend to it as such. You will often be speaking to God, in the name and presence of others; and a regard to your own reputation will engage you then to address him in a solemn, reverend, composed, and affectionate manner.

It will engage you to awaken and regulate your thoughts, while employed in social prayer, which indeed seems to me by far the most difficult part of our public work, as performed in such assemblies as ours. But surely that minister has great reason to suspect the integrity of his own heart, that can pray with some copiousness, affection, and pleasure with others, and in secret can only find in his heart to run over a few hasty, inattentive, and customary words, in such a manner as he would be ashamed to do, if any one of his fellow-creatures was present. Guard against this, my dear brother; and especially guard against it in the evening, when the fatigues arising from the labour of the day may expose you to the peculiar danger of it. And for that purpose take time to retire, if possible, before the fatigue becomes too great and sensible, that there may be flame for the evening sacrifice.

Be assured, that as prayer is the food and breath of all practical religion, if I may be allowed the expression, so secret prayer in particular is of vast importance; insomuch, that I verily believe, that if a man were to keep a particular and accurate journal of his own heart but for one month, he would find as real and exact a correspondency between the temper of his soul at seasons of secret devotion, and in other parts of his life, as we find between the changes of the barometer and of the weather.

To furnish out matter for prayer, let meditation be called in to your assistance; and let the word of God, above all, be the subject of your meditation. You know it is placed among the most distinguishing characters of a good man, that his delight is in the law of the Lord, and in his law doth he meditate day and night. Various matter of prayer may by this means be suggested, and the soul brought into a proper frame for pouring out itself before God. Observe in what channel the devotion of David and Asaph ran in the Old Testament, and that of Paul, John, and the other apostles, under the New, and, above all, that of our great Lord; and labour, with allowances for the difference of circumstances, to have your heart affected with divine things, as theirs seem to have been.

Labour not only to breathe out this temper before God in the seasons of solemn devout retirement, for which you will do well to have your hours and your plan, to be, if possible, strictly and resolutely observed, but also endeavour to carry it along with you into the world: and be lifting up your heart to God, in many of those little vacancies of time which often hang on the hands even of the busiest of mankind, but might this way be profitably employed. Why should you, for several hours together, be in the presence of such a Master, and such a Friend, without speaking one word to him? Or why should any of his most affectionate servants, in former ages, have addressed him with a devotion warmer and more constant than yours? If this advice be observed, you will also be glad to have an occasional errand to the throne of grace, will be heartily glad to sweeten the hours of friendly conversation, by making them subservient to communion with God. It will glad you often to conclude your visits with prayer, and cheerfully to come into any scheme of seeking God in a more solemn and express manner, on any particular emergencies that may arise relating to yourself and friends; as also to encourage what we commonly call private meetings for social prayer at stated times, which, so far as I can judge, greatly promote a minister's usefulness, and which are generally kept up with the greater spirit, and the best order, when he accustoms himself to be often present at them.

But permit me, Sir, before I dismiss this head, to remind you, that it is evangelical devotion I am recommending; a devotion in which a due regard is habitually maintained, to the love and grace of Christ, and to the influence of his good Spirit. Indeed one would think, if a man believed the gospel, his devotions should naturally and unavoidably take this turn. Would to God we find it so; nevertheless this I may confidently say, so far as reason and experience can justify a confidence in saying any thing, that very much will depend upon turning our thoughts into the channel to which the gospel has directed them, and viewing things in the light in which that has placed them. No devotion so sweet, and none so lasting, as that which is thus guided and animated. Remember it is the Gospel in which you are serving him; and you can never serve him so effectually, as by a close and constant attendance to it. Keep your heart therefore full of those impressions, which it will naturally introduce into an attentive mind. Think what a friend the blessed Jesus has been to you, and how much you are, and must for ever be, indebted to his life and death, his resurrection and ascension, his guardianship and intercession. And when this view grows daily familiar to your own soul, your heart will teach your mouth, and add this best kind of knowledge to your lips. So that you will be in no danger of starving or destroying the souls of your hearers, as I fear many who should be ministers of the gospel do, by a criminal and fatal silence upon these heads: and this will happily influence you to all humility of spirit in the service of Christ; for nothing has so great a tendency to humble the soul, as the sight and converse of the blessed and glorious, Jehovah, in whose presence we are less than nothing, and vanity; especially when we consider ourselves as introduced to him by the blood of Christ, and animated by his own Spirit, in every thing which is pleasing, in every thing which is not offensive, to him. Pride, my dear brother, is one of the most subtle, and one of the most dangerous enemies that you will encounter with, in the whole course of your Christian and ministerial warfare. It is at once astonishing and grievous, to think under how many specious forms it insinuates itself into the very sanctuary of God, and hides itself, if I may be allowed the expression, even under the vestments of those who serve at his altar; indeed frustrating its own most darling end, and exposing them at once to the displeasure of God, and, to what they seem yet more to fear, the contempt of men. You must therefore continually and constantly guard against it; and make it one of the chief cares of your life, not only to suppress its growth, but to root it out of your soul.

If you would be honourable in the sight of the Lord whom you serve, you must be humble, and that humility must be seated, not merely in the external behaviour but in the heart. A small degree of common sense may be sufficient to preserve a man from the ridiculous folly of making encomiums upon himself, and his own performances; or from the madness of putting on imperious airs in common life, which is indeed no other than bespeaking the scorn and aversion of all about us. I had almost said, a manly pride will set a minister above these things, and teach him to curb every appearance of them. But our humility should dwell in our very souls; and I am well persuaded, the greatest and the best of men may find enough in themselves to nourish it from day to day. When I think, for instance, what the man and the minister, in the most perfect view of his character, ought to be, in comparison with what I myself am; when I look about on all the negligences and irregularities of my life; when I look in especially on all the folly and corruption of my heart; and further recollect, that all these things are open to the eyes of God, who sees what I am, and what I have done, in comparison with what I should have been, and should have done, in comparison to what I might have been, and might have done, for his glory, and the good of mankind, if all my capacities, and all my opportunities, had been improved to the highest possible degree; what reason do I find for the deepest abasement in the divine presence! what reason to abhor, rather than applaud, myself; to hide my head with conscious blushes, rather than to lift it up in a haughty supercilious manner, as if I had whereof to glory before God or man! It is not a freedom from gross matter of reproach among men, no, nor some distinguishing share of genius, of learning, of eloquence, of reputation and popularity, that will raise a man's esteem for himself, when such views as these are made familiar to the mind. He will apprehend it to be, at least a supposable, and indeed a very probable, case, that many who, in these things, and in the eye of the world, are his inferiors, may on account of their better temper and conduct be in the eyes of God far superior to him; and may be fitted for much more distinguished honours in that world which is to fix our rank for ever: and we shall certainly find it very much for our own ease and comfort in life, thus to esteem others better than ourselves, in honour preferring one another. When we do not look upon any distinguishing regards as our due, if we miss them we shall not be much disappointed, and if they meet us, we shall think ourselves obliged to the world for its kind partiality in our favour; and behave so much the more humbly, while we endeavour indeed to be, what they are so kind as to think we are: and thus, in more senses than one, it will be prudent for him, who would be the greatest, to be the least, and servant of all. Our blessed Redeemer is such an example of this amiable temper, that nothing in the world illustrates the natural pride and corruption of the human heart more, than that this lesson is so little learnt and practised, by those who call themselves his disciples, and even his ministers.

3. Let it be your concern to preserve a due freedom and elevation of spirit. I join these together, as being nearly of a kin, and the latter only a superior degree of the former. And therefore when I mention liberty of mind, you will apprehend I intend not only or chiefly what the world calls freedom of sentiment. You have long since been taught to indulge that, and have I hope taken your religion from the word of God, and not from any human system or composition whatever. Go on to act upon this maxim. I dare not say, like St. Paul, Continue in the things thou hast learnt and been assured of by me, knowing of whom thou hast learned them. It rather becomes me to say, Examine all I have taught you, and search the Scriptures daily whether these things are so or no. You will not, I am persuaded, run the matter to extremes, and imagine, like some half-thinkers, that liberty consists in boldly daring to decide against received opinions, as soon as some new difficulties are discerned; and confidently venting raw and undigested notions, however noxious, without fearing any of the consequences. And while you guard against this, I am not so conscious of the weakness of any cause in which I am embarked, as to fear it should be brought to the test of strict inquiry. But this inquiry, how well soever guarded and regulated, is not the whole that I mean by freedom. I intend something much nobler and greater; something which many who boast loudly of their liberty are entirely ignorant of. I mean a freedom from all undue attachments to every thing that would debase and enslave the mind, and render a man the ignominious servant of corruption.

If Paul thought it proper to say to Timothy, Keep thyself pure, and flee youthful lusts, the admonition cannot be unseasonable to any who are early in life entering on the ministry. And indeed, if after so many years spent in the apostolic office, he represented it as a daily labour of his life, to keep under his body, and bring it under subjection; we may reasonably conclude, that the most advanced servants of Christ had need to be cautious on this head; had need, while they dwell in an animal body, to watch and pray, that they enter not into temptation. Especially considering that some of the excesses to which unguarded appetite may betray a man, are of such a nature, as to fix a lasting stain upon his character. A minister especially may, in one single hour, incur a reproach, which past and future years of the strictest temperance shall not be able to avert, remove, or efface. Yet I cannot but say, that to a person in whom the habits of a temperate and regular life are formed, I apprehend the passions to be much more dangerous enemies than the appetites; and especially those excesses of the passions, which are generally, among virtuous and worthy men, reckoned weak rather than infamous. By these has many a wise and good man been miserably enslaved, and fallen far beneath the dignity of his character and office; not to mention the unhappy consequences they have often drawn after them, with respect to the ease and comfort of future life.

Wisdom is not indeed intended to root out the passions, but she seldom dwells in the heart in which they are suffered to grow wild. They turn the soul into a desert, and render it a disagreeable abode to so divine a guest; or rather, to speak in language more becoming a Christian divine, the blessed Spirit of God is by this means driven away, and it is impossible to say how much the evil spirit may sometimes do, in his absence, to irritate our minds, and drive them into the most fatal extremes. It must therefore be of great importance to keep a resolute guard on these turbulent subjects, and to check the first rising of sedition among them; lest they gather strength by insensible degrees, and break out into such open rebellion, as to depose reason and religion from the throne, reducing the soul into a state of anarchy; or rather, making its noble rational powers the slaves of those whom they were formed to command.

To be secure from all the danger, and all the appearances, of so great an evil, let it be your care, Sir, to maintain a becoming elevation of spirit, and to fill your mind with sublime ideas, principles, and views. This the Christian religion naturally suggests to all its votaries, and above all to its ministers. Think, what a Master you serve, and in what a work you are engaged! Think how little all the titles which the princes of this world can give must appear, when compared with that of the minister of Jesus, and a servant of God in the salvation of souls. Think how low the employments of secular life are, even those in which the nobles and kings of the earth are engaged, in comparison with yours. In this respect, it is good to magnify our office; not as if it gave us any the least power to tyrannize over our brethren, to invade their liberty of thinking, or of acting, or to command their properties in any degree. Secular power seems too inconsiderable a thing for our Master to give to servants, whom he has set so high in his family, and intends for a charge so much greater and more important, in which the exercise of that would necessarily interrupt them. We are appointed to be, in subordination to Christ, the friends, the guardians, the deliverers of souls; and if our labour succeeds, the effect is everlasting. All the productions of human art and industry shall perish; the palaces and citadels which it raises shall moulder back to dust, and be levelled with the earth; the mightiest nations, whose interests divide the globe, shall soon be blended together, and distinguished no more. But every soul whom we recover to Christ and to holiness, will be an everlasting monument of the power of divine grace, and of our fidelity to our Master's service; will be an honour and delight to us, ten thousand thousand thousand years after the earth itself has been removed out of its place. Think and act like one that has such grand schemes in view; like one who is continually realizing to himself the presence of God, and the prospect of immortality, and has learnt by them not an affected and counterfeited, but a real, contempt for the pleasures and interests of this perishing state; like one who has learnt heartily to pity those whom mistaken mortals imagine the objects of congratulation, or of envy.

4. Let it be your constant care to keep your spirit attentive and active.

The great employments and views in which you are engaged, should, methinks, effectually engage you to this. Since the work is so grand, and to be carried on in the midst of so much opposition, as you well know is to be expected from the indispositions and corruptions of our own hearts, and the influence of so subtle and so powerful an enemy as the prince of darkness is, you will naturally apprehend that many difficulties and obstructions will arise; so that you had need exercise an habitual prudence, both to guard against temptations, and to seize opportunities; precious but transient opportunities, which perhaps, if they are once suffered to slip by, may never return. "Bright as the heavenly world appears to my view and my hopes," says an eminent Christian in one of his letters, "I am sometimes afraid of going thither, till I have done something considerable for the service of Christ upon earth." Methinks such a thought as this, while the uncertainty of human life is remembered, should engage us to a watchfulness of soul, should lead us every hour to recollect, "What can I do for my great and glorious Master? What can I do for him immediately? Supposing this should be the very last day I have to spend in his service, how may he find me employed in a manner that will be most acceptable to him?"

Labour, in this view, to do good every day, and every day to do as much good as possible; and if any thing can conveniently be done to-day, defer it not, by any means, till to-morrow. To-morrow is God's, and not yours; and if it come, and find you here in a capacity of service, it will so far take thought for the things of itself, that whatever you can do to-day, there will be business enough remain, for that and for the next day too, and for all the days and hours God shall assign you. Therefore, Sir, guard not only against a slothful and inactive temper, but against unnecessary delay. Here are certain duties so apparently great and important, that Satan himself has not the assurance so much as to propose it to us, that we should come to a resolution that we will always omit them. All he will demand is, that you would this day wait for a more convenient opportunity, and continue waiting to-morrow, and so on for one day more, till he can find you no more excuse for further procrastination. And it is by this artifice, palpable as it is, that he enervates the usefulness of the greater part of Christians; that he makes their life but a shadow of what it might be, and sinks them into so insignificant a kind of being, that one would imagine a rational soul should be continually upbraiding itself with its own importance, while its noble furniture and capacity is employed to such low purposes; and instead of acting, is only dreaming first of one vanity, and then of another; always intending to be wise and useful hereafter, but not allowing itself so much as to say when. I have always observed, that those tradesmen who are most solicitous to execute their orders immediately, give the greatest satisfaction to others, and generally improve their own stock best. But alas, the children of this world are, in this respect, and almost every other, wiser than the children of light. I would only add, that as growing years will naturally impair the activity of the spirits, it will be your wisdom, while you are young, to accustom yourself to vigour and despatch, that so the force of habit in riper years may be some equivalent for the want of the vivacity which will then, in the course of nature, be diminished. And I really think activity and cheerfulness to be so nearly allied, that one can hardly take a more effectual method to secure the latter, than to cultivate the former. Especially when, as in the present instance, it is employed to sow the seed of an immortal harvest, which will be rich and glorious in proportion to our present diligence and zeal.

5. In order to this activity, it will be necessary to see to it, that your spirit is maintained in a courageous and a resolute temper.

The difficulty and obstructions which I hinted under the former head will render this necessary, and necessary in proportion to your diligence: just as the resistance of any dense fluid, through which a body is moved, acts more forcibly, in proportion to the velocity with which the body is impelled. You must therefore lay your account thus; the ministry is not an easy employment; it will not always go on smoothly; many entanglements will arise, even from the pleasantness of our circumstances, from the kindness of our friends, many of whose importunities we must break through, if we desire to improve our time well, and to pursue the business in which we are engaged; and in the execution of some part of it, other and greater difficulties must be expected. It is possible you may not be able faithfully to discharge your duty, without greatly disobliging some whom you respect and love; some on whom your temporal circumstances may very much depend. Perhaps you may be obliged, in conscience, to bear a public testimony against their errors, or against their irregularities, and it may be against both, as they are frequent companions: or at least you may be obliged plainly to admonish them in private, and expostulate with them in a manner that they may not be disposed to bear; even after all the most prudent address on your side, to make it as inoffensive as is consistent with fidelity. Nor is it impossible, that in consequence of some distant and unforeseen change in public affairs, you may be called forth even to martyrdom, and obliged either to resist to blood, or to make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. An heroic resolution must therefore be put on, that in the strength of Christ you will be faithful to the death; that your Master may be pleased, whoever is displeased, and that your crown of glory may be secure, whatever else is lost. And it will be the part of Christian prudence sometimes to exercise a voluntary self-denial, in smaller matters, that it may become easier to you in circumstances of considerable difficulty, importance, and necessity. But while you are setting your face like a flint in the midst of all the most violent and forcible opposition,

6. Let this courage and resolution be tempered with a becoming degree of tenderness and gentleness.

Labour to preserve your mind continually under the influences of benevolence and love. Remember you serve the most benevolent of masters, in the most benevolent of works. The whole business of your life is to do good; and therefore, to make that business easy, cultivate love; for the labours of love are easy labours, and are indeed no other than their own reward.

Indulge too a continued sensibility of heart. Be willing to look upon the sorrows of others, and to feel them, and live continually mindful of the common tie of brotherhood and of kind. Look upon the human family as one, and then do all you can to make it an orderly and happy family. Especially cultivate love and compassion to the souls of men. Seriously think what an immortal soul is, and to what extreme danger the souls of multitudes are exposed. Think also in how languid a state religion is, so far as actions can discover it, in the souls of many, concerning whom, charity would hope that they are not quite estranged from all the principles of the divine life; and long earnestly to bring them into a more healthful state, and to see them lively and active.

Under this head let me recommend to you a tender love for the rising generation, and particularly for little children, dear amiable creatures, who, one would think, should need no advocate to plead their cause, with a person of a humane and generous disposition. Christ was an example of condescending regard to them, and he certainly meant to teach it to us. Learn this meekness and lowliness from him. Converse with them, instruct them, and as you are often praying for them, be sometimes praying with them too; and for that purpose appoint a number of them at proper seasons to attend you, and then, when you have talked with them in a free and affectionate manner about the things of religion, pray over them, in such easy natural language as they are most likely to understand, and recommend them to God with that tenderness of heart which their presence will naturally inspire.

I have often observed numbers of them melt into tears upon this occasion; and when that is the case, it is a secret encouragement to hope, that even while we are praying, God hears. And would parents sometimes try the same method with their children, and appoint but a few minutes every week to pray with them alone, they might find, as to my certain knowledge some pious parents have done, not only that it had a good tendency to compose and soften the temper of those little creatures, but possibly, in some instances, to give such a turn to the mind of those grown up to some maturity, as might be carried through the remainder of life; and fixed upon, as the probable season from whence their conversion to God might take its first rise.

While I am on this head, I must exhort you also, to condescend to the least and weakest, as well as the youngest. Remember you can never stoop so low to others, as Christ has stooped to you; and that, when you have done all, your great Master will exceed you in condescension, as much as he does in glory.

Let this tenderness also engage you to enter into the sorrows of others. Who, says St. Paul, is weak, and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I burn not? i. e. feel fire, as it were, kindled in my bosom, which makes me restless till I have done all I conveniently can to make him easy. You, Sir, must accustom yourself to bear the burthens of others, that you may fulfil the law of Christ, and with greater advantage teach others to fulfil it. You must not shun the cottages of the poor, or the chambers of the languishing; nor must your ear be so intent on the more pleasing sounds, as to turn away from the sighs and groans of the distressed. You must often be visiting your brethren, that you may see how they do; and their personal or domestic afflictions must be tenderly weighed, in their various circumstances, that your heart may feel its part, and so prompt you to do all you can, if possible, to remove them; or if that be impracticable, as it often will be, at least to alleviate them; and sometimes the sight and conversation of a Christian friend does so much to alleviate them, that one would imagine so cheap a charity should not be denied. Let not our Master say, in reference to any of his servants, I was sick and ye visited me not; I was confined and ye did not come unto me. You will, I hope, be ready, according to your ability, to relieve the necessitous: you will also, I hope, improve your interest among your Christian friends, to procure that relief which you cannot immediately give; and be assured that, while thus employed, you are performing a kind action toward the rich and the prosperous, many of whom are so ready to forget the indigent and afflicted, that when one thinks upon the great day of account, one is ready, as the world generally appears, to congratulate the poor, and to tremble for the rich. Let benevolence to both, therefore, remind you of St. Paul's words to Timothy, Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who gives us all things richly to enjoy; that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold of eternal life.

And before I close this head, I must also beseech you, by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, that you endeavour to exercise a meek and gentle temper under contradiction and opposition. I hope and believe you will meet with very little of this sort, from so kind, so generous, and so obliging a people, as that to which you have the happiness of being related: yet there is no soil so good, but some root of bitterness may spring up in it, and if not among your own people, and among your nearest brethren in the ministry, yet among others injuries may arise; but if you are reviled, revile not again; if you are injured, let forgiveness be all your revenge; for it is all Christianity allows, and all that it is good for us to take. And if you should, which is always too supposable a case, be called out to combat with error and immorality, venture to do it in the spirit of meekness. It is the method which the God of truth and holiness has taught us. The servant of the Lord, says the apostle, must not strive, but must be gentle towards all men, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves, if peradventure God will give them repentance. We must be cautious lest the old serpent find out a way of brooding over our hearts, and diffuse his venom there, while we mistake the fermentation it occasions to be only a warmth of zeal for Christ, and so do the work of his enemy in his name. I cannot, for my part, apprehend satire to be an ordinance of Christ, at least I believe he will be more ready to excuse those who have erred on the tender than on the severe extreme. The knowledge I have had of your natural disposition, prevents my enlarging on this head, which, with regard to you alone, it might not here have been material to mention: nevertheless it is a sin that easily besets young divines, who, as I suppose, with their wits and passions warm about them, have had the chief hand in bringing theological fury into a proverb. As for you, Sir, whatever personal ill usage you may meet with in life, be not overcome with evil, but overcome evil with good; and trust in him who has given you the command, to bear you harmless while you are careful to observe it. Goodness will, on the whole, not only be safe, but victorious; and the wisdom of this and all the other rules of our great Master, will be demonstrated, not so much by debate, as by experience. Go on, therefore, my dear friend and brother, not only in this respect, but in all others, to conduct your spirit by these, and you will find them your ornament and defence. The satisfaction of a well governed, and of an acceptable and successful, ministry, will infinitely over-balance all the pains you can take with your spirit, to keep it in such a temper. God will approve the effect of his Holy Spirit's agency on your heart; and when I have said you will be the object of his approbation and delight, it is little to say the happy fruits of this care, which will appear in the sight of your fellow-creatures, will entitle you to their veneration and affection, and gain a degree of both, which neither the exalted stations, the most flourishing circumstances, or the most extensive genius and learning, could possibly secure in the neglect of these things. And as there is no room to doubt but divine grace will bless your labours, while conducted on such principles, you will be continually laying up in store new treasures, to be possessed in the celestial world, among multitudes whom God will make you an instrument of bringing on into the way to it, or of conducting in those peaceful and blissful paths.

I conclude with exhorting you, my friends of this congregation, to continue your affectionate regards to my dear brother, who has now commenced a more intimate relation to you than before, and is become your pastor. Never give him reason to repent that he is so, and that he has preferred you to other congregations, who would gladly have engaged his settlement among them. Encourage his valuable labours by your constant attendance, and by your friendly care for his support: above all, endeavour to improve in religion by his means. I am well satisfied that he seeks not yours but you, and will think he lives indeed, if you stand fast in the Lord. You will not, I persuade myself, grieve him by any personal unkindness: God grant that none of you may distress his soul by undoing your own! God grant that none of you may send him back to his great Master with lamentation, on account of your refusing to accept of that message of pardon and life he brings! I do indeed hope better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, and conclude with my hearty prayer, that he may rejoice in every soul of you in the day of the Lord, that he has not run in vain, nor laboured in vain. Amen.

A CHARGE,

Delivered at Norwich, at the Ordination of the Reverend Mr Abraham Tozer; on June 20th, 1745

My dear brother,

When I consider the rational and edifying manner in which the solemnities of ordination days amongst us are adjusted and conducted, and recollect what I hope I may justly call the various and delightful tokens of the divine presence in our assemblies on such occasions, I cannot but esteem it my happiness to have been an attendant on so many of them. My memory goes back with joy to many former years, in each of which Providence has given me, in one part of our country or another, to see young ministers, who have a good report of all men, and of the truth itself, after having approved themselves to Christian societies, generally by some considerable series of probationary labours, unanimously chosen by the respective churches, and invited to the pastoral office over them without one dissenting voice. With delight have I heard their faithful and affectionate testimony to the great truths of the gospel, in judicious summaries of the Christian religion, drawn up by them in such expressions as they freely chose, without the imposition of human forms; summaries which, in this connexion, I must acknowledge to have been in the number of the most affecting and edifying public discourses. If I have ever known the spirit of prayer poured forth, as in a kind of celestial torrent, to add at once dignity, sanctity, and transport to our assemblies, it has been on such occasions; and the exhortations of my brethren in their sermons and charges, have often been the means of humbling, of melting, and of animating my soul.

The present pleasure attending these sacred hours, the religious improvement received from what has passed in them, the cheering prospect which they give relating to the church in future years, and even in generations yet to come, do all concur to demand my thankfulness, that I have so often on such seasons been called to go with the multitude to the house of God. But I will freely own, the enjoyment has often been abated by the obligation I have been under to officiate, not only in some public work, but especially in the part which is now devolved upon me. Nor should I, after having delivered so many charges, as well as opened my heart so fully to you, dear Sir, in a more private manner, on almost every subject relating to the ministry, know how to set myself with any spirit to what must be in a great measure a repetition of former things; if I did not recollect, that what is immediately addressed to one's self, in the midst of such peculiar solemnities, may have some singular weight, beyond what the same thing would have in a more private address, or if thus publicly offered to another person. And therefore I persuade myself, you will hear me with all attention and regard, while I give a little vent to the fulness of my heart, in such fraternal congratulations, admonitions, and encouragements, as may suit the present occasion, and may, by the divine blessing, be of some service to you, and my other beloved and honoured brethren, who are sharing in the honours, the labours, and the burthens of this evangelical ministry, to the full exercise of which you have now been solemnly called and set apart.

I. Let me most cordially and affectionately congratulate you, my dear brother, that you have now been thus publicly called and devoted to the ministerial and pastoral office.

Paul esteemed it matter of most joyful reflection, when he said, I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, that he hath counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry. And I thank him from my soul, as the great head of the church, that he is still raising a succession of those who are to bear it, and that you, dear Sir, are numbered among them. I most heartily congratulate you on the honour,—the pleasure,—and the usefulness, of that station of life, on which you now enter.

1. I congratulate you on the honour of your office. For with whatever contempt ignorant and profane men may treat it, it is highly honourable in its simplest forms, and needs none of the external ornaments which men can hang about it, to render it so. If it be honourable to be (though confessedly in a lower sense than the title was applicable to the apostles) an ambassador of Christ, and a man of God, you have that honour. If it be honourable to sustain the highest trust that can, in the methods of common providence, be reposed in mortal man, even to have the glorious gospel of the blessed God committed to our charge, and to be made guardians of souls which are to exist for ever; if it be honourable to bear an office which was sanctified by Christ, who himself bore it, and by bearing it has dignified it for ever; an office, which is mentioned in the sacred oracles as the great gift of Christ to his church; as the immediate, though not the ultimate, end of the most visible and extraordinary effusion of his Spirit: for when he ascended up on high, and led captivity captive, he gave gifts unto men; and distributed the royal donative, giving first apostles, then prophets, then evangelists, then pastors and teachers; that by it holy men might be perfectly fitted for the work of the ministry, that so the body of Christ (that is, his whole church) might be edified, or built up:* —rejoice, that your name is now (as it were) inserted in the catalogue of these his servants, and reflect frequently on the honour: not to be exalted above measure, but to be awakened and animated to a dignity and sanctity of behaviour correspondent to it.

2. Let me also congratulate you on the pleasures of that office on which you are entered.

For pleasures mingle themselves amidst all its labours and difficulties, all its reproaches and its persecutions; yea, when duly executed, it is a series of pleasures. Pleasures will meet you in your secret retirements, they will attend you here in the house of your God; they will follow you to the house of your friends; they will crown all your days, and above all, your sabbaths: and these, rational, pure, sublime pleasures, which the man may approve, the Christian relish, and which, did angels dwell in human flesh, they surely would pursue.

Must it not necessarily be pleasant to a devout heart, (and God forbid that any other should here be in question!) to give itself up in secret to the contemplation of divine things, to search the rich mines of Scripture, to investigate the glorious mysteries with which they are pregnant, and which angels stoop down that they may look into! to compare one part of the sacred oracles with another, that each may be illustrated by the comparison * to discover, I will not say new doctrines of importance, (for I persuade myself God has not left his Christian church to learn them in these last days,) but new illustrations of the great and acknowledged truths of the gospel, new beauties in the arrangement and expressions of particular texts, new methods of touching the hearts of men, by truths already familiar to their ear?

* This verse I think the original words will [illegible]

What can be more delightful also, than to rise up to lead the public devotions of a worshipping assembly? to spread before the blessed God, in their name, and our own, prayers and supplications, intercessions and thanksgivings? to remind them of the divine mercy? to proclaim among them the everlasting gospel, animated with a secret hope, (while meditating in private, while speaking in the assembly,) that by the divine blessing, the knowledge and love of God in a Redeemer may be shed abroad on some ignorant and wretched soul, hitherto destitute of it; and in many other instances, that truly Christian sentiments may be kept alive in hearts that have already received them, and be transmitted from the present to the next generation!

Nor can any subjects of conversation administer a nobler delight in the houses of your friends, than those which will naturally fall before you, as a minister. For if religion add so much sweetness and endearment to friendship, when contracted between persons of the most private characters, it must much more do it in such instances; where past ministerial services may be recollected, where the fruits of them may be made apparent, and the man of God more abundantly furnished for the future discharge of his office, in the most suitable, and therefore the most edifying, manner. Which naturally leads me,

3. To congratulate you on that prospect of usefulness, which this happy day may open upon you.

It is true, that how well soever we may be furnished for the ministry, and how agreeably soever we are placed in it, we must not hope, that our success will be universal; hardly can we flatter ourselves, that it will be general. What are we better than our fathers, or how comparable to our Master, that we should never complain with them, and even with him, that we labour in vain, and spend our strength for nought? Yet we can ourselves witness, from what we have seen, and from what we have felt, the blessing that hath attended the ministry of others. And I trust, that even those of us, who are least advanced in life, least experienced in the work, have already been favoured with some seals of our ministry, some who are as letters of recommendation, written as it were by the hand of Christ himself; and that you, Sir, will be thus honoured. O that it might be abundantly! Yes, I trust, God will give you to convert many. And if it were but one, who can express the happiness of saving one soul from death, of conducting one immortal creature to life and glory everlasting!

You will also, I doubt not, edify many by every public prayer you offer, and by every sermon you preach. Your words, proceeding from your own heart, will reach the hearts of others, and rekindle the languishing flame of devotion. Every virtue and every grace will, I hope, flourish under your cultivation; while you strengthen, with renewed exhortations, every good resolution already formed: and the rising generation, growing up under your care, in concurrence with that of pious parents whom you animate to the important charge of their education, will, by insensible degrees, be furnished with the knowledge of religion, and brought, not only to the speculation, but to the sentiments and practice, of it. So that while others have, it may be, their bags, their houses, their furniture, and their fields, to show as the effect of their labours; you will have captives of Satan, rescued from his tyranny, adopted into the family of God, and honoured with the privileges of his children, crowding his courts, and surrounding his table, as the infinitely more valuable fruits of yours. You will see the character of Christians brightening from sabbath to sabbath, under your evangelical and practical instructions; their blemishes wearing out, and their graces contracting (as by exercise they will contract) more strength and more beauty continually.

God will also undoubtedly give you, to wipe the weeping eye, to cheer the mourning heart; to be his instrument in taking off the burthen from tender depressed spirits; in which number you will sometimes find those, who may (if any in the world may) be justly called the excellent of the earth. Christ, the great Lord of the church, will in many instances make you (as it were) the almoner of his bounty, and messenger of his love; while he is giving to them that mourn in Zion, beauty for ashes, and sending them the garments of praise in exchange for the spirit of heaviness. Your kind offices, and the happy effects of them, will attend your friends, not only in all the darkest hours of preceding affliction, but even on their dying beds. There will you animate their faith; there will you be a helper of their joy, and furnish the hand of the departing pilgrim with the promises of God as a sure staff, to support him in his way through all the gloomy horrors of the last valley, by which he must pass to the New Jerusalem.

By such traces of usefulness will you mark (as it were) the several years, and months, and days of life; while the passage of so many others through it is like that of an arrow through the trackless air: until at length you die with a pleasing consciousness, that you have not lived in vain, and rise to rewards never to be described by mortal voice, never to be conceived by the human heart, and of which I must not say any thing more now, as I am briefly to touch upon them in the concluding part of my discourse.

Now while you have these things in view, do you not, my brother, congratulate yourself upon this happy occasion? I am persuaded you do. I am persuaded, that your heart is even now bowing itself in secret thankfulness before God, that he hath honoured you with capacities for this work; that he hath furnished you with the means of a proper education for it; and that his providence has at length called you out to it. Nor can your gratitude forget his distinguished goodness in settling you with so generous, so affectionate, and so pious a people, and now in the bonds of joint-pastorship with that faithful and venerable servant of Christ, with whom you share the office.* You will, I doubt not, serve with him, as a son with a father, in the gospel of Christ. Nor can the warmest friendship form a greater wish for you, than that you may learn by the daily opportunities of conversing with him, to improve more and more in that rich variety of Christian and ministerial graces, which have for a long series of years rendered his name so honourable in our churches, and his flock so peculiarly happy. O that I could also congratulate you, and them, on returning and continued opportunities of learning, as formerly, by his public labours! In the mean time, permit me with these cordial congratulations to intermingle,

II. Some faithful admonitions, relating to the labours,—the difficulties,—the oppositions, attending the station of life on which you are entered,—and the solemn account in which it is to terminate.

Of these indeed you have just now been reminded by my dear and honoured brother, in so judicious and in so pathetical a manner, that it is the less necessary for me to enlarge upon them. Yet were they to be wholly omitted by me in this discourse, it could hardly be called a charge; and, I fear, it is a subject, on which we all need line upon line, and precept upon precept. Let me therefore solemnly, though briefly, remind you,

1. Of the labours that attend this situation in life.

These indeed are such, as will demand an almost uninterrupted attention of mind, and vigour of diligence. Labours await you at home and abroad; labours on your own days, and on the sabbath, a day of rest to others, but to you of the most strenuous, though most delightful, service:—labours in the study; that knowledge may be increased; that provision may be made for public ministrations, with solidity, with perspicuity, with propriety, with energy, with tenderness: labours in the pulpit; that public devotions may be suitably and fervently poured out before God; and sermons so delivered, as, if possible, to command the attention of the auditory, and to communicate, in a natural and effectual manner, those good affections to others which you feel in your own breast.—Not to mention the labours to be gone through in visiting your friends, and in the exercise of that prudent personal and domestic inspection, which you must necessarily attend to, if you would approve yourself a skilful, yea I will add, if you would approve yourself a faithful, shepherd.—What a combination on the whole! Labours of the head, labours of the voice; but oh, above all, labours of the heart! For this is indeed the labour: to fix on our own inconstant spirits a becoming habitual sense of God; to feel always in our own breast those pious affections, which it is our business to endeavour to raise in others; in a word, to keep the sacred flame of love to God, to Christ, and to the souls of men, ever burning, yea, ever glowing, with an intenseness of heat proportionable to the number and nature of those sacrifices, which are daily, which are hourly, to be presented!—Help, Lord, or it will soon be extinguished! Feed it continually by thy celestial stream; or, who is sufficient for these things?—You will surely say so, when you consider,

2. The difficulties attending your work, of which I am next to admonish you.

But here, as indeed under the former head, your own experience must already have done it in the most convincing manner. You find the ministry a work that requires not only patient industry but wise conduct and happy address. Difficulties meet us in the closet, even when our own minds are competently furnished with divine knowledge, so as to adjust the composition of our discourses, as that the understanding of our hearers may be enlightened, their conscience convinced, and their affections impressed; that the ignorant may be instructed, that the careless may be awakened, that the hypocrite may be detected, that the mourner may be comforted, the dejected revived, the backslider restored, the confirmed Christian yet more established; in a word, that every one may have his portion of meat in due season, and every one, so far as may be, according to his own taste too; at least, that what we say, while it is intelligible to the meanest, may not be justly contemptible to the more refined, but that things and words may be sought out, so far as faithfulness will permit, acceptable to both. And how hard is it to unite all these views, especially amidst such a diversity of sentiments, as well as circumstances! And this, not only where those are in question, who have apparently made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience, and whom in some respects it might be unsafe to please, but even where, among the best of men, different apprehensions of things, conscientiously received and retained, will lead one to diserlish what another most wishes to hear, and possibly in some instances, one to censure even because another applauds.

* The Reverend Mr. Thomas Scott, senior.

It may on all these accounts, and many others, be difficult to instruct, and it will be still more difficult to reprove. General hints given in public will by guilty consciences be interpreted as personal reflections, and perhaps aggravated into open abuse, and occasions of declared enmity; and private applications will be evaded, discouraged, and very probably resented. The corruptions of the heart will rise against the most friendly efforts of cure; and those wounds which most absolutely require a deep search, will be least patient even under the gentlest touch. Your solicitude to please God will, in many instances, displease men. Your heart will be grieved by many unsuccessful labours. And to close the melancholy scene, you will probably see some, of whom you had very agreeable hopes, falling away from all regard to serious religion; and perhaps may find yourself obliged, though with a reluctant heart, to bear your part in separating some from your communion, whom you gathered into it with the greatest joy, and in whom you blessed yourself as the seals of your ministry.

These are the difficulties which may arise from within; and besides these, the prejudices of the world will lie strongly against you from without. Many eyes will be upon you, to observe your conduct. By some your slips will be magnified into crimes; and if you walk so cautiously, (though who can promise himself that he shall?) as to escape any just blame, malice will create occasions of censure, perhaps in some instances even from your solicitude to avoid it. Your zeal will be called bigotry, and your candour hypocrisy; your humility affectation; and your activity will be imputed, either to a high opinion of your own abilities, or to a vain desire of outshining others, or to a low pursuit of popularity from arrogant or interested principles. Such treatment have the best of men found; and such must you expect, unless Satan lose his influence over the world by much swifter degrees than we have any warrant to hope that he will. But this naturally leads me to warn you,

3. Of the oppositions which you may meet with in your ministry.

These may indeed in different circumstances, be more or less extreme; but something of this kind is at all events to be expected, and it will be our wisdom to provide against the worst. Gird up therefore the loins of your mind. Remember, that you are putting on your harness; and God only knows to what combats you may be called.

We have long enjoyed halcyon days, through the favour of Providence, and the equity of our civil governors; to whom, I hope, we are grateful for it, as we ought. But He that rules in the heavens can only say, how soon clouds may gather, and how soon tempests of thunder and lightning may burst upon us. Sometimes, you know, a storm arises on a sudden, and the deadness of the preceding calm increases both its terror and its strength. So sinful a people as we must confess ourselves to be, can never have reason to wonder at any public and national calamity, which may break in upon us in a moment. But should circumstances more gradually change, you, Sir, and our younger brethren, may live to see an enemy in the sanctuary of the Lord; may live to see our religious liberties trampled under foot, and with them undoubtedly our civil, for they are twins that will live and die together. You may perhaps be called to resist unto blood, to glorify God in the flames, and to teach your flock Christian courage and fidelity, not by words, but by martyrdom. Such things you may suffer, as a protestant, as a Christian.

And more peaceful times have their trials too, though perhaps not equally severe. I do indeed hope, that mutual love is growing, among the various denominations of Christians, and particularly between us, and our brethren of the establishment. And may the blessings of the God of peace rest on the men who cultivate it, on both sides!—But we cannot hope to see the time, when all shall be so moderate and so equitable, as not to think and judge with some severity of those, whose conscience obliges them, though in the modestest manner, to maintain different forms of worship and discipline, even where the great articles of faith are the same. And a different judgment relating to the articles of faith may draw down yet severer censures and opposition, from those whose judgment in worship and discipline agrees ever so well. And I must faithfully warn you, Sir, that if you go on to assert (as I hope you always will) those great doctrines of the gospel to which you have now borne a public testimony, (I particularly mean the deity and atonement of Christ, the ruin of our nature by the original apostasy, and our restoration by the agency of the blessed Spirit,) you are not to imagine, that any moderation of temper, or any other personal virtue, or all your zeal for the service of the common cause of Christians, protestants, or dissenters, will atone for what some will imagine so great a crime; or shelter you from the affected contempt and severe reproaches of some angry people, who amidst all their professions of the most unbounded charity will think yours an excepted case, or will rather choose to be injurious to you than consistent with themselves.—But it is after all a very small matter to be judged of man's judgment: he that judgeth us is the Lord: and that is the most solemn thought of all, concerning which I am lastly to admonish you, even,

4. The awful account which you are shortly to give up to him, from whom you have received your ministry.

We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; and if he account with the meanest of his servants, we may assure ourselves, he will do it with his stewards. And let us remember, that when the books are opened, it will not only be found upon record there, that such a congregation was at such a time committed to this or that minister; but a particular register will in effect be produced of every soul consigned to our care: "So many heads of families, together with such children, and such servants." And then our conduct will be reviewed, and examination made, "how far we have answered our trust." Should it be found, that we have neglected and abused it, the displeasure of our great Lord and Master will rise in proportion to its importance, and to the opportunities we have had of doing good in it: opportunities which, though we may not perhaps so thoroughly examine, as to conceive of their full extent, he most circumstantially knows. And surely, if it be then found, as it undoubtedly will, a fatal thing to have betrayed the bodies or the estates of men, when committed to our care; much more will it be so, to have betrayed, and by betraying to have destroyed, so far as in us lay, immortal souls. This is a matter of such weight, that when we seriously think of it, and compare it with those criminal neglects, which conscience will charge even on the best of us, there is just reason for us with one voice to cry out, Enter not into judgment with thy servants, O Lord; for in thy sight can none of us be justified. And when you, my brother, think of it, in such a moment as this, you may find your heart ready to fail, and even may be tempted to draw back, and say, Who shall stand to minister before this holy Lord God! lest he break forth upon us, and we die. But I would not leave you under the distress of such a view, and therefore conclude,

III. With a few hints addressed to you by way of encouragement, to animate you to go forth with courage and cheerfulness, notwithstanding these awful views which I have been giving you of your office.

And, through the goodness of our divine Master, I have many considerations of great importance to urge here. As,

1. That you have an unerring rule in the word of God, from whence your instructions, admonitions, and directions, are to be drawn.

You well know, that Scripture was given for this end, that the man of God, that is, the Christian minister, might be perfected, thoroughly furnished to every good work, various as the good works of his office are. The best of human writings have their defects and their blemishes; but in this respect, as well as others, it is true, that, as for God, his way is perfect, and the word of the Lord is tried. When we read the most excellent moral and religious writings of the heathens, we find a great deal of error and superstition, which mingles compassion with our admiration. When we read the merely human writings of the most celebrated ancient and modern divines, there is much to exercise our caution and our candour. As for any new theological hypothesis, we generally find, on a more accurate examination, the proofs of its falsehood, proportionable to the confidence with which it is advanced, and the importance to which it pretends. And where men write with the greatest caution and modesty, though such generally err the least, yet there is something defective, or something redundant; something ungarnished, or something over-strained: so that, though they may be useful companions in our journey, we dare not commit ourselves to any one of them as our guide; and they often differ so much among themselves as to increase our perplexity, and indeed to give us painful apprehensions as to our safety, or theirs; did we not recollect, that various paths, after having divided a while, may so run into each other, as to lead to the same place, though some may be more direct than others. But of Scripture it may be said, as of its great Original, that in it there is perfect light, and no darkness at all. O how happy are you that have, in so small a bulk, the oracles of eternal truth, and particularly the volume of the New Testament, which may so easily be carried about with you, to entertain you abroad as well as at home; to talk with you when you lie down and when you rise up; to be the man of your counsel when you are preparing to instruct your flock in public, and more privately to guide and advise them in the most intricate circumstances! This is like the pillar of fire, to direct your way amidst the darkest night; and like the pillar of cloud, to refresh your soul amidst the most painful labours and most scorching heats. Let it be followed faithfully; and you, and that part of the Israel of God over which you preside, will be happily conducted through all the windings, through all the fatigues, of the wilderness, till your feet and theirs stand upon Mount Zion. Consult it, my dear brother, and reverence it as you ought; and you will be safe, not only under the shelter and guard of aged wisdom, but in every change that can be apprehended or imagined.

2. You have also for your encouragement the daily prayers of many, whom you have reason to think not destitute of an interest at the throne they address.

You have your share, I trust, in all the prayers which are daily put up by the church, under its various forms, for all the faithful ministers of Christ, but you may assure yourself that you are more particularly and distinctly remembered by your Christian friends, to whom you are related in ministerial bonds. You need that remembrance; and they consider that you need it. In their families, in their closets, they see not a day in which they do not supplicate earnestly for the blessing of God on your person, your studies, and your labours. When you come to them in the house of God, you may consider yourself (if you will pardon the expression) as raised on the wing of their prayers; and may hope to experience, in answer to them, some new unction from above. How great an encouragement, amidst the daily consciousness of our own unworthiness! whether we consider it as testifying their love, and so securing in a great measure their candour to us; or as effectual to obtain those fresh supplies of divine assistance, which they have sought. Nor can I conclude this head without saying, that it is happy when the minister, amidst all his various cares, is as constant, as earnest, and as affectionate, in praying for the whole people committed to his care, as many a pious, and, it may be, obscure Christian, in each of our assemblies is, in striving with God for a blessing on his minister.

3. You may also expect the countenance, esteem, and friendship, of all good men that thoroughly know you.

I put in this limitation, because the misrepresentations of character which ignorance and malice may draw, often alienate the minds of very deserving people from each other; so that they turn away with some distaste from they know not whom, or what. But where a valuable character is known, (and that of a faithful minister will always be such,) it must command esteem and affection; and prejudices which had been conceived against it, will melt away before the radiancy of it, like snow before the sun. Be diligent and resolute in the execution of your office, and you will find favour, and good acceptance, in the eyes of God, and of worthy men; and perhaps, should your reputation be aspersed by the ignorant and the malicious, you may find that Providence will exert itself to bring forth your righteousness as the light, and your honour, as well as your salvation, as a lamp that burneth. You will be sure of a peculiar share in the affection and veneration of the flock over which you preside. They will look upon you, as the gift of God to the society: they will consider you, as, in some measure, the representative of our Lord Jesus Christ himself; of whom every faithful minister is indeed a living image. They will therefore esteem you very highly in love for your work's sake. The maintenance they give you, will be cheerfully offered in proportion to their respective abilities, as the tribute of gratitude, and the pledge of endearment. Your affliction will be the common grief, and your prosperity their joy; and each of them will look upon himself as obliged in duty to approve himself the guardian of your character, and of your peace. Their hearts, as well as their houses, will be open to you: their countenances will tell you, better than any words can do it, how welcome you are to them; and every proper token of respect will be cordial, in proportion to the degree in which it is unconstrained. And where this is the case, you will have no cause to envy any dignities or revenues, which mere power may command, but which no superior splendour and abundance can render equally sweet. Above all must it encourage you, to reflect,

4. That you have the promise of your Master's presence, and may trust in him for the communication of his Spirit.

He that told his ministers, he will be with them always, even unto the end of the world: and you may rest on the veracity of a word, that shall continue, though heaven and earth shall pass away. Christ will meet you; Christ will strengthen you. He will feed and cheer your soul; that you may be enabled to feed and to cheer those that he has committed to your care. It is not a mere empty sound: your brethren, and your fathers, among whom you stand this day, can from their own experience attest the truth of the promise. He has softened our fatigues; he has sweetened our afflictions; and carried us with songs in our mouths through scenes, at the very distant prospect of which we should have trembled. Having obtained help from him, we continue even to this day, the living, the cheerful witnesses of his power, his goodness, and his faithfulness. Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. And remember,

5. That in consequence of this, you may expect such considerable improvements in personal religion, as shall be a rich equivalent for all your labours, and for all you can resign for the ministry, or suffer in it.

It must be nourishing to the soul, if it be spiritually alive, to be so continually conversant with spiritual and divine things. Your meditations, your prayers, your public discourses, your private converses on religious subjects and occasions, together with the administration of both the sacraments, will all have a great tendency, under a divine blessing, to make good impressions on your own heart, and to advance you in a holy and devout temper. While you are thus daily watering others, you will be watered yourself; as I doubt not but you will remember, that while you teach others, you teach yourself also. While the daily cares of others in their secular callings, have an apparent tendency to divert their minds from God, yours will tend directly to him, and give you advantages, beyond what can easily be imagined, by being continually with him: such advantages indeed, that, were the nature and the value of them sufficiently known, men would be ready to contend for the ministry, as for a sacred prize. They would esteem it among the greatest privileges of a plentiful estate, that it might give them opportunities of being educated for it, and of being independent in it; while that independency was considered as some additional security for their fidelity. And the zeal, with which persons of the highest rank among us would then press forward to this work, would bring us into a necessity of directing into some other channel that provision which the wise charity of some public benefactors, the living and the dead, has made for the support of poor students for the ministry: a charity which, in the low ebb to which religion is fallen amongst us, may almost, under God, be called the hope of our churches, even for the very next generation. Especially would the richest and greatest esteem it their honour and their happiness, did they consider what I am in the last place to mention to you, my dear brother, viz.

6. The glorious expectation and hope, which closes the whole prospect.

What if every other hope, but that of religious improvement, were in a moment to vanish! What if nothing should remain, between this and the grave, but the view of labours, of reproaches, of tribulations, of persecutions? What if you were to conflict, through the whole of your course, with the malice of enemies, the coldness and ingratitude of friends, the incorrigible obstinacy of sinners, the perverseness and imperfections of those whom, if any are such, we must hope to be Christians? Here is enough to balance all. Death is approaching: death, that stripped Aaron of his garments and of his burthens together, and ended all his painful pilgrimage. Be faithful unto death, says our divine Master, and I will give thee a crown of life. O think every day of the ecstasy with which you shall receive that crown, and of the high everlasting exultation with which you shall wear it. Think of the joy with which, after a life of persevering fidelity to him, your separate spirit shall ascend into his presence, ere yet this body, the instrument of his service, shall be laid in the grave. Think of the congratulations, with which your venerable predecessors, your eminently pious parents, and those of your flock who have fled upwards before you, will then meet you, and hail your arrival. And think how Jesus will, by one smile and embrace, overpay all the labours and sufferings of a long protracted life. Think of the complacency and delight, with which you will look down on the field which you have cultivated, and on the growing harvest you have left behind; while perhaps some of the blessed fruits of your labours may be running on from age to age, so as to be the means of propagating Christianity to the last rounds of time. And O think, above all, of the great day of the Lord, when the chief Shepherd shall appear, that he may confer on you, and on all those who have faithfully discharged their ministry, a crown of glory that fadeth not away. Then, when every Christian of the lowest station and character shall receive his proper share of honour and reward, what may you expect, if you faithfully improve your ten talents, when those of your people whom you have converted or edified, appear with you as your joy and your crown in the presence of the Lord, and are honoured with the public applause and remunerations of the eternal and universal Judge in the face of the whole assembled world? All the pageantry of human greatness passes away like a dream; the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood: but human souls are durable and immortal; and they that have turned many of them to righteousness, shall have, in each, an everlasting ornament, and, decked with a new lustre from each, shall shine as the stars for ever and ever.

May that God whom we serve, through the riches of his grace, give us all a portion in the triumph of that day! And may he add to all the joy, which the most unworthy of his servants is humbly bold to expect in it, that of seeing you, my dear brother, giving up an account of a faithful and happily successful ministry! To encourage and assist you in the discharge of which, may these plain hints conduce, through the blessing of him, who knows how, from the least and most inconsiderable seeds, to call up a rich and plentiful harvest! Amen

AN APPENDIX,

Relating to the usual methods of Ordination among the Protestant Dissenters.

As in the beginning of the Charge I have touched upon the decent solemnities attending the methods of Ordination generally used among the protestant dissenters, it may not be improper to give a brief account of them; especially as I have been earnestly desired to do it by a pious and learned clergyman of the established church; who apprehends it may obviate some mistakes, and promote that mutual candour among Christians of different denominations, which both of us concur to wish, and labour to promote. There is indeed a little variety in the usages of different places: but that which I have generally seen, does, I believe, prevail in most of our churches, with the exception, and sometimes no more than the transposition, of a few circumstances.

It very rarely happens, that a minister among us is admitted to the pastoral office, till he hath spent some years as a kind of candidate for it; and, so far as I can recollect, more undertake it after, than before, their twenty-sixth year is completed. But as our theological students generally employ either four or five years in preparatory studies, after they have quitted the grammar-schools, so they are examined by three or four elder ministers before they begin to preach.* A strict inquiry is made into their character, and into their furniture; both with respect to the learned languages, especially the sacred, and also as to the various parts of natural and moral philosophy; but above all, into their acquaintance with divinity; and some specimen of their abilities for prayer and preaching is generally expected.

An unordained minister is seldom chosen to the pastoral office in any of our churches, (for in the members of each of these societies the whole right of election lies,) till he has resided among them some months, or perhaps some years; preaching statedly to them, and performing most other ministerial offices, excepting the administration of the sacraments.

When the society, which generally proceeds with entire unanimity in this great affair, has received what it judges competent satisfaction, the several members of it join in giving him a solemn and express call to take upon him the pastoral inspection over them: and if he be disposed to accept it, he generally signifies that intention to neighbouring pastors; whose concurrence he desires in solemnly setting him apart to that office.

Previous to the assembly for this sacred purpose, his credentials and testimonials are produced, if it be required by any who are to be concerned; and satisfaction as to his principles is also given to those who are to carry on the public work, generally by his communicating to them the confession of his faith which he has drawn up; in which it is expected, that the great doctrines of Christianity should be touched upon in a proper order, and his persuasion of them plainly and seriously expressed, in such words as he judges most convenient. And we generally think this a proper and happy medium, between the indolence of acquiescing in a general declaration of believing the Christian religion, without declaring what it is apprehended to be, and the severity of demanding a subscription to any set of articles, where if an honest man, who believes all the rest, scruples any one article, phrase, or word, he is as effectually excluded, as if he rejected the whole.

The pastors, who are to bear their part in the public work, having been thus in their consciences satisfied, that the person offering himself to ordination is duly qualified for the Christian ministry, and regularly called to the full exercise of it; they proceed, at the appointed time and place, to consecrate him to it, and to recommend him to the grace and blessing of God, and of our Lord Jesus Christ, the great Head of the church, by fasting and prayer, generally accompanied with the imposition of hands; and the public work of the day is usually, so far as I have been witness, carried on in the following order, or something very near it.

It commonly opens with a short prayer, and the reading some select portions of Scripture which seem most proper to the occasion; then a prayer is offered of greater length and compass than the former, in which most of our common concerns as Christians are included; which is sometimes, though less frequently, succeeded by another of the same kind. Then follows a sermon, on some suitable subject, such as the institution, importance, difficulty, and excellency of the ministerial work, the character and conduct of the first ministers of the gospel, or the like.

After this introduction of a more general nature, another minister (usually one of the eldest present, who is a kind of moderator for the day,) gives the assembly a more particular account of the occasion of its being convened. The call of the church to the candidate is then recognized, either in word, or writing, or by lifting up the hand; and his acceptance is also declared. He is then desired, for the satisfaction and edification of the assembly, to pronounce the confession of faith; (which his brethren have already heard and approved;) and pertinent questions are put to him, relating to the views and purposes with which he undertakes the solemn charge, that he may be brought under the most awful engagements to a suitable behaviour in it; and an express renunciation of the errors and superstitions of the Romish church generally makes a part of these answers, as well as a declaration of his resolution, by divine grace, never to forsake the ministry, whatever inconveniences and sufferings it may draw after it.

This being despatched, the presiding minister comes down from the pulpit, and prays over the person to be set apart. There is no particular form of prayer on this occasion, or on any other among us; but I have observed, that the person who officiates is generally led in such a circumstance, to adore the divine wisdom and grace, in the constitution and revelation of the gospel, in the appointment of an evangelical ministry, and in supporting the succession of it throughout all ages of the Christian church, as well as in vindicating it from popish corruption and bondage. Some notice is often taken of what may have seemed most remarkable in Providence, with regard to the particular circumstances of the society then to be settled, and the person to be set apart to the ministerial office in it; who is then solemnly offered up to the service of God, and recommended to his blessing, in all the several parts of his work, which are distinctly enumerated. And this prayer seldom concludes without fervent intercession with God, for the Christian church in general, and all its faithful ministers of every denomination: and as those rising up to succeed in the work are often mentioned here, so I have had the pleasure frequently to hear the universities of our island, as well as more private seminaries of learned and pious education, affectionately recommended to the divine protection and favour on such occasions, with all the genuine appearances of a truly Christian and catholic spirit. When that part of this prayer begins, which immediately relates to the person then to be consecrated to the service of the sanctuary, it is usual for the speaker to lay his hand on his head; and the other pastors conveniently within reach, (frequently to the number of six, eight, or ten,) lay on their hands also, at the same time: by which we do not pretend to convey any spiritual gifts, but only use it as a solemn, and expedient, though not absolutely necessary, designation of the person then to be set apart.

* See the Advertisement to my Sermon on the Evil and Danger of neglecting Means of Spiritual Life.

When this prayer is over, (which often engages a very profound attention, and seems to make a very deep impression both on ministers and people,) the Charge is given to the newly ordained pastor, who generally receives it standing (as much as may be) in the sight of the whole assembly: and an exhortation to the people is sometimes joined with the charge, or sometimes follows it as a distinct service, unless (which is frequently the case) it is superseded by the sermon, or some other previous address. Another prayer follows; and singing having been intermingled, so as properly to diversify a service necessarily so long, the whole is concluded with a solemn benediction.

I know no method of proceeding on such occasions, more rational, edifying, and Scriptural than this; and I hope, few who believe any thing of Christianity, can be so ignorant or abandoned, as to make light of such solemnities. But however any of our fellow-servants may judge, I have a calm, steady, and joyful assurance, that transactions like these are registered in heaven with approbation, and receive the sanction and blessing of the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls.

Northampton, September 18, 1745

POSTSCRIPT.

As the want of psalms or hymns [illegible] Christian worship, [illegible] I have often been requested by the Congregation where I have [illegible] to compose something for that end: I have therefore [illegible] and I would gladly do it with my whole heart, [illegible] and every [illegible] to a blessed and devout preparation [illegible] And if any one of these hymns [illegible] the use of [illegible] of Scripture subjects.

A HYMN

I.

FATHER of mercies, in thine house,
Shine on our homage and our vows!
While with a grateful heart we share
These pledges of our Saviour's care.

II.

Blest Saviour! when to heaven he rose
In splendid triumph o'er his foes,
What royal gifts he scatter'd down;
How large, how permanent the boon!

III.

Hence sprung th' apostle's honoured name,
Sacred, beyond heroic fame:
Hence dictates the prophetic sage;
And hence the evangelic page.

IV.

In lowlier forms, to bless our eyes,
Pastors from hence and teachers rise;
Who, though with feebler rays they shine,
Still gild a long-extended line.

V.

From Christ their varied gifts derive,
And fed by Christ their graces live;
While guarded by his potent hand,
Midst all the rage of hell they stand.

VI.

So shall the bright succession run
Through the last courses of the sun;
While unborn churches by their care
Shall rise and flourish, fresh and fair.

VII.

Jesus our Lord their hearts shall know,
The spring whence all these blessings flow,
Pastors and people shout his praise
Through the long round of endless days!

SERMON XII.

CHRISTIAN CANDOUR AND UNANIMITY STATED, ILLUSTRATED, AND URGED.*

To the Right Honourable the Countess of Huntingdon.

That eminent example of the Christian Candour here recommended, and of every other virtue and grace, which can inspire, support, and adorn it, the author, finding himself (after repeated attempts) incapable of writing any dedication, under the restraints which her humility amidst its utmost indulgence has prescribed him; or to mention any excellence which would not seem an encomium on her, has chosen thus most respectfully to inscribe this Discourse: entreating that his further silence, in this connexion, may be interpreted by her Ladyship, and by every reader, as the most sensible and painful proof he can give of the deference, veneration, and grateful affection with which he is,

Her Ladyship's

much obliged and obedient humble servant,

P. DODDRIDGE.

PHIL. ii. 1, 2.

If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind.

IF it indeed be, as it certainly is, a test of true eloquence that it is suited to strike powerfully upon the minds of all, however different in genius, education, or rank, I cannot but conclude that every one here present, must already acknowledge these words to be a remarkable specimen of it, even before we proceed particularly to illustrate them; and, having felt something of their pleasing energy while we have been reading them, is ready to confess that the sentiment they contain is finely conceived and pathetically expressed. But ill shall we answer the great design of the apostle, if we rest in the mere acknowledgment of this. His views were much more worthy of him whose minister he was: he laboured to diffuse, through the breasts of his fellow-christians, that spirit of love, which was in his own, as a constant spring of living water. And what more convincing proof can be given of the deplorable disorder of men's minds, than that such addresses, proceeding from such a man, yea, I will add, the yet more forcible address of his Divine Master, and ours, should have produced so little effect: that such discord and animosity should so early, so long, I had almost said so universally, prevail in the Christian church, amidst all the incentives, amidst all the entreaties, amidst all the tender adjurations, as well as the godlike examples, which the sacred oracles exhibit to charm us into the most endeared affection. But alas, these incentives, and entreaties, these adjurations, and examples, are overlooked, as not having lustre enough to detain our attention; for we too generally seem to study our Bibles (if we study them at all) for amusement or ostentation, rather than practical instruction. We fix on some curious incident or high speculation, and are first ingenious to explain it where it cannot be explained, and then impassioned to defend it, as if it were fundamental truth till we beat out the sacred gold so thin, that every breath of air carries it away: whilst the plain things which tend to inspire a heavenly temper, and lead us on to the most exalted goodness, are slightly passed over; as too obvious, and too vulgar, to engage our attention or excite our emulation. Thus we feed our pride by what was intended to humble it, and make that the prize of mutual contention, which was designed to be the band of love.

What wise man has not observed this! What good man has not lamented it! Yet, alas, who so wise as in all instances to have avoided it? Who so good as to have exerted himself to the utmost to cure it? A cordial, however feeble, attempt of this kind will now be made, and so powerful are the arguments, so alluring the motives, suggested in the text, that if the spirit of wisdom and of love so often, and I trust so sincerely, invoked, may guide our meditations upon them, we may cheerfully hope for some valuable effects.

* Preached at a meeting of Ministers at Creaton in Northamptonshire, January the 12th, 1749-50.

And happy will it indeed be, if he may teach us to enter into these words with a temper like that which the holy apostle St. Paul felt, when in his bonds for the sake of the gospel, and particularly for his zeal in asserting the calling and the liberty of the Gentiles to whom he wrote, he addressed them with this tender and pathetic entreaty: If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, fulfil ye my joy; that ye be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind.—It may be here proper to inquire,

I. To what the apostle is endeavouring to persuade the Philippians.

II. To consider in how tender a manner he addresses them, and what a variety of affecting arguments he pleads with them; and then,

III. To conclude with some advices for maintaining and cultivating the temper he so pathetically recommends.

I attempt it, my reverend and dear brethren, with the greater cheerfulness, as from long experience I am persuaded, that all your hearts are one with mine, in every effort to spread Christian love; and as that uninterrupted peace, and unalienated affection, which has so long reigned among ourselves will not only dispose you to receive what I shall say with unprejudiced minds, but will render it as agreeable to you as it is in general needful to the Christian world. Long have we beheld, and blessed be God, long have we felt, how good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity: long has the odour of this precious ointment filled our little tabernacles with its perfume. May the dew descend on all the mountains of Sion, and the Lord more abundantly command the blessing, even life for evermore! that life of which fervent Christian love is the earnest, the foretaste, the beginning!

I. We are to inquire, to what it is that the apostle endeavours so affectionately to persuade the Philippians. And here I might observe, it is in the general to fulfil his joy, and more particularly to do it by cultivating unanimity and love.

1. He urges them in the general to fulfil his joy, that is, to conduct themselves in such a manner as might cause him greatly to rejoice. This was in the general to be done by remembering their Christian character, and walking worthy of it, or, as he expresses it in a few verses below, by working out their salvation with fear and trembling, and by keeping themselves blameless and harmless, and acting as the children of God in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, that so they might shine as lights in the world, and hold forth with advantage the word of life. Paul, like the beloved disciple St. John, had no greater pleasure than to see his children walking in the truth, and therefore elsewhere says, We live, if ye stand fast in the Lord.

Now before we proceed to what is more peculiar to our subject, let us pause for a few moments on this edifying, this animating consideration. Let us as it were, in our devout meditations, pay a visit to this illustrious confessor in his chains at Rome, for he was now a prisoner there, that we may learn how his mind was employed in the midst of his confinement, his straits, and his sorrows,—to inquire what would have afforded him the most sensible joy, so far as others could be instruments of affording it? Not that his eloquence should be admired, or his necessities relieved, or his liberty restored, or his patience and magnanimity applauded, but that his Christian converts might behave in character; that the honour of their profession, and their own happiness, might be most effectually secured. "Only let your conversation be as becomes the gospel, and then if bonds and imprisonments await me, yea, if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all; and I call upon you also to congratulate me: for none of these things move me, neither count I (in a cause like this) even my life dear unto me." But it is evident that, whatever may be comprehended in fulfilling the apostle's joy, the phrase has a peculiar reference to the method he prescribes, wherein they might effect it, which we are next to consider.

2. He urges them to do it, by cultivating unanimity and love.

As we render the second verse, this must be the sense of the whole: Be like-minded, having the same love, of one accord, of one mind. A limitation for the present this version, which I think may be considerably improved, common sense will not allow us to understand it as an exhortation, to be all entirely of the same opinion in every religious sentiment about which they might exercise their inquiries. For considering the diversity of men's capacities, and opportunities of improvement, that is absolutely impossible. Had Paul condescended to enter into the minutest detail of doctrines and principles that can be imagined, had his form of words been as artificial and elaborate, as that of any scholastic divine, and his decrees as large as those of the most voluminous councils and synods of succeeding ages; yet still, while the apprehensions and understandings of men had continued of a different size, different interpretations might have been put upon his words, even by good and honest, much more by designing and prevaricating, men, when interest on the one hand, and resentment on the other, had given an edge to their invention. Least of all could such an unanimity as we are now speaking of, be effected by mere entreaties; and it is very observable, we here meet with no arguments or decisions, by which one doctrine is established rather than another, about which there could be any supposed difference, or one speculative sentiment or disputed practice pointed out, in which they are so earnestly exhorted to agree; not now to insist upon it, that where there was such a perfect uniformity, a peaceful disposition would have been matter of very little praise, and might seem only self-love diversified and reflected.

We are necessitated therefore, by the absurdity of such an interpretation, especially in this connexion, to seek out for another; and we shall more easily attain it in its greatest perspicuity, by a little varying our version of the original words. Ἵνα το αυτο φρονητε την αυτην αγαπην εχοντες, that ye may be unanimous, maintaining the same love, συμψυχοι το ἑν φρονουντες, having your souls joined together in attending to the one thing. On this interpretation, it will be as if he had said "Be unanimous in affection, if you cannot be so in opinion, agree on cultivating the same love, however your judgments, yea, and in some instances your practices, may be divided. And that you may be so cemented, let all the ardour of your souls be combined in attending more and more to the one great thing, which ought to be the leading concern of every Christian, the advancement of vital, practical holiness." This might well be understood, though it was not particularly expressed and described, it being so obvious to all that knew any thing of the gospel, that it was the great design in which it centred; and having been spoken of by our Lord, in a very celebrated oracle, under the title of the one thing needful.

And in this view we may consider the apostle as addressing himself, not only to his friends at Philippi, but to all Christians of every nation and age: and thus supported by his authority, I may address you, my brethren, that hear me this day, whether in the ministry or in private life.

To agree in our sentiments as to every point of doctrine or discipline, or as to the authority or expediency of every rite of worship that may be in question, is absolutely impossible. The best of men differ; their understandings differ; various associations have been accidentally formed, and different principles have been innocently, and perhaps devoutly, admitted, which, even in a course of just and sensible reasoning, must necessarily lead to different conclusions. Accordingly we find that in this age, enlightened as it is, (and so far as the age of literature can go, I am persuaded no age was ever more enlightened,) the wisest and the best of men at home and abroad have pleaded the cause on either side of various questions, which to both have seemed important, without being able to produce conviction. The event of many a voluminous controversy has been this; that men of contrary parties have sat down more attached to their own opinions than they were at the beginning, and much more estranged in their affections: the champions something sore with the rough usage they have mutually received in the combat, and the partisans of each so heinously displeased, at the obstinacy of their brethren, in refusing to yield to such unanswerable arguments, that they can hardly now condescend to own them for brethren. And when this is the case, what is further to be done? The laws of human nature, the laws of Christ, will not permit of force on either side; and blessed be God, the laws of our country forbid it too, which if they did not, I much fear that neither the voice of nature or Scripture would be heard by many. Since then after all that has been said, or that can be said, we must live together, let us, by every consideration of prudence and of tenderness, be entreated to live not only in peace but in love, in a free intercourse of all the good offices in our power, as well as with a strict care not to injure and afflict each other by unkind treatment, or censures unnecessarily harsh. Truth is indeed too sacred a thing ever to be denied on any consideration; and so far as we are in our own consciences persuaded that any particular truth is important, neither honour nor charity will allow us to give it up, as a point of mere indifferent speculation. Let us therefore ever be ready, when properly called out to the service, to plead its cause in the name of the God of truth; but let it be in a manner worthy of him, a manner which may not offend him as the God of love. And let us be greatly upon our guard that we do not condemn our brethren, as having forfeited all title to the name of Christians, because their creeds or confessions of faith do not come up to the standard of our own. Yea, if it were in a matter which seemed of so great importance as to give us some room to suspect that the mistake were fatal, (which surely nothing can be that does not greatly affect men's temper and conduct towards God and each other,) even that consideration should engage us to gentleness and tenderness, rather than severity to them; if peradventure our friendly and respectful carriage may gain such a happy ascendant over their minds, as to remove their prejudices against our reasons: for the reasons in such important matters must surely be so forcible, that nothing but very strong prejudices could obstruct their efficacy; prejudices too, which on our own principles, we may endanger their souls by increasing.

But where we and our brethren agree in attending to the one thing which Christianity was designed to teach us; surely an agreement in that should unite our minds, more than any difference, consistent with that agreement, should divide them. To reverence with filial duty and love the God of heaven, and to adore him with integrity of heart; to honour Jesus his Son, as the brightest image, subscribing to the truth of all he is known to have revealed, and the authority of all he is apprehended to command; conscientiously to abstain from every known evil, and to practise, so far as human infirmity will permit, the comprehensive precepts of living soberly, righteously, and godly; still looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life, assuredly expecting a future judgment, and an eternal world, carefully endeavouring to prepare for both, by setting the affections on those great objects, which the gospel opens to our view; and finally being habitually ready to sacrifice life and all its enjoyments, to that blessed hope;—this, this, my brethren, is the essential character of every Christian, and where we see this, should we esteem it a difficult thing to live peaceably with him in whom we discern it? Should we arrogate it to ourselves as any high praise, that we do not censure, that we do not grieve, that we do not injure him, because he follows not us? Is this the man to be hated or suspected, I will add, can we refuse to esteem and embrace him, merely because he worships in another assembly, or according to a different form, because he expresses his apprehensions about some of these doctrines in different words, because he cannot see all that we think we discern in some passages of Scripture, or because he imagines he sees something which we discern not? Is it after all so great a matter, to love a character, which, amidst all its imperfections, is in the general so justly amiable! Nay, instead of thinking much of any acts of kindness, which it is in our power to perform for such a fellow-disciple, ought we not rather to lament that we can do no more for his service! Ought we not to endeavour rather to supply in our fervent prayers to God the lack of that further service, which Christian benevolence dictates, but which the narrow limits of our condition and our nature will not allow us to perform?

Methinks the matter might safely be rested here, and that the very description of Christian charity, and its proper objects, might engage every heart to cultivate it. Nor is it easy to expatiate beyond the just boundary of such an argument. But I should be inexcusable, if while I have this text before me, I should deprive you of the pleasure which every benevolent mind must undoubtedly feel, in contemplating, what we are to consider.

II. In how tender a manner the apostle addresses himself to these Christians, and conjures them to cultivate the temper he had been recommending. And no words but his own will so properly represent this. He pleads the consolation of Christ, the comfort of love, the fellowship of the Spirit, the bowels of mercy. Considerations, which if I can but illustrate, there will be little occasion to enforce them by any arguments of my own.

1. He pleads with them the consolation of Christ.

This most strongly implies, that many important consolations arise from him, and that they will all, properly regarded, conspire in disposing us to mutual love.

That numberless consolations do indeed flow to the true believer from the Lord Jesus Christ, is too obvious to need being proved at large. Yet, O how delightful would it be, to attempt a little to illustrate the point, if my time would permit! How delightful to speak of the genuine and strong consolation to be derived from the offices he bears, from the benefits he imparts,—and from the figures under which he is represented in Scripture!

How delightful would it be to me to speak, and to you to hear, of this faithful and infallible Prophet, who brings us so complete a revelation of the divine will, in so plain and so condescending a manner! Of this great High Priest, holy, harmless, undefiled, who made his own life our sacrifice; who is now, in virtue of it, interceding in our favour before the throne of God, and lives for ever to attend this friendly important office! Of our most gracious Sovereign, who rules with consummate wisdom and proportionable goodness; and is ever ready to exert the power with which he is invested at the right hand of God, to defend us from every evil, and to make us more than conquerors over his enemies and our own! Of that kind Surety who has undertaken our cause, and paid off our dreadful debt, that he might rescue us from that prison from whence there is no redemption! Of that compassionate Shepherd, who having generously given his life for the sheep, folds the weakest of the flock in his gracious arms, and carries the lambs in his bosom!

And where should I bound my discourse, if I were to speak of those consolations, which flow from the benefits that Christ bestows! from the pardon he proclaims, the complete pardon of the most aggravated sins! from the peace which he restores to our troubled consciences! from the cures he performs on the diseased powers of our natures! from the strength he diffuses through the enfeebled soul! from the joys which his cheering Spirit gives, and the delightful prospect which his gospel opens; which it opens not merely with respect to the happy spirit, when it has shaken off this burthen of flesh and blood, and springs to its blessed associates in the intermediate state, but especially after the resurrection, when inhabiting a glorious, a spiritual, a vigorous, and incorruptible body, fashioned after the model of his blessed Redeemer, the complete man shall be for ever with the Lord.'

These views, Sirs, will justify all the liveliest and most beautiful figures, under which so glorious and adorable a Saviour is described in Scripture: As the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys; as the bread of life that comes down from heaven; as the true vine; as the pearl of great price; as the cleansing fountain; as the shady rock; as the morning star; as the sun of righteousness. Nay, must I not add, these views will teach us as it were to call for a new creation to open upon us; to call for something fairer than roses and lilies, richer than pearls, sweeter than manna, more generous than the richest productions of the vine, more refreshing than shades or streams, yea, brighter than stars, or the sun itself, to set forth the glory of Jesus, and describe the consolations which flow to our souls from him.

But you recollect to what purpose these consolations are here mentioned; that by them we might be entreated to mutual love. And O how forcible is the conclusion! The consciousness of happiness sweetens and exalts the soul, it makes it capable of nobler and more generous sentiments, especially when happiness, like this of ours, is conferred on those that were once the children of misery; and conferred, not by merit, but by rich compassionate bounty, by overflowing grace and mercy. That must be a mean and stubborn soul indeed, which is not melted with such goodness, and which is not full of a desire to impart what it has so freely received.

Especially may these consolations operate here, when we consider those who are recommended to our benevolent affections, as sharing in them with ourselves. Where, the full communication to all leaving no room for envy, the thoughts of being joint-proprietors must naturally be a source of love: for every one who is admitted to a share in these blessings is honoured and adorned by them; is not only exhibited to us as the object of our Redeemer's love, which surely should greatly recommend him to ours, but is made lovely in consequence of it, and that with this further important and endearing circumstance, that he is destined by our glorious Master to dwell with us and with him, in a world of final and everlasting felicity. Let our souls enter into the attractive thought. However we now be divided, if we are indeed the members of Christ, one temple shall at length contain us, one anthem shall at length unite our voices, one object of supreme love for ever fill, and by filling cement, our hearts. Such consolations have we in Christ, such are the engagements in love which result from them, uniting to display what we are secondly to consider.

2. The comfort of love, which the apostle urges as a distinct argument. And certainly there is great comfort in it, comfort too great and too sweet to be displayed in one single branch of a discourse, and which I rather wish you may all learn by experience than by report, which at the best must be very imperfect. But it is most obvious these comforts are powerful and divine. Love not only guards the mind from the furious and diabolical passions of rage, envy, malice, and revenge, which tear it like a whirlwind, which corrode it like a cancer, which consume it like rottenness in the bones, but fills it with a thousand gentle and pleasing sensations. Love distils a fragrant balm into the soul, that, while it heals the wound which contrary passions have made, diffuses a most grateful and reviving perfume, most justly compared, in the passage I referred to above, to the ointment poured on Aaron's head, or the refreshing dew descending on Hermon and Sion, and making all the country between them to share in its copious blessings.

Who can enjoy himself even in the greatest plenty, while his heart is full of unkind passions to any, especially to his brethren? Who could rest in a palace amidst such disturbers, far more intolerable than the swarms of flies that infested Pharaoh's gilded roof, or the frogs that came up to the very chambers of the king? But a benevolent and generous heart will make the plainest accommodations delightful, and as Solomon, who was so exquisitely acquainted with human nature, testifies, will render a dinner of herbs where love is, better than a stalled ox, and hatred, rancour, and malice with it. Hatred has torment, more sensible than fear; torment sufficient to turn heaven itself into hell, as it in a manner did, before those wretched spirits, who first entertained it, were by God's righteous judgment driven out from thence. But love, joined with that fervent devotion which so well agrees with it, and indeed is inspired by it, will turn the meanest and most incommodious dwelling on earth into a paradise, yea, into the delightful anticipations of heaven itself. And therefore has a gracious God, though his own felicity is perfectly independent on the greatest height of our love, or the most total deficiency of it, required us to love himself, and to love one another, that we might continually feel the noblest pleasure, a pleasure like that which he feels in the consciousness of his own most perfect goodness, and in the survey of his creatures as made happy by it; and I hope I offend not in adding, a pleasure, which, as our natures are constituted, Omnipotence itself could not communicate to us in any other vehicle but that of love. But we must not forget the third topic of argument which the apostle pleads.

3. The fellowship of the Spirit. Now, it is implied as the foundation of this argument, that all

Christians do indeed partake of one spirit. As the apostle expresses it, By one Spirit we are all baptized into one body, and have all been made to drink into one Spirit; and this is pleaded as an endearing consideration, not only here, but elsewhere, Keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace,—there is one Spirit. And it is indeed so. Hereby we become members one of another, we are one body, as animated by one spirit. It is also the gift of Christ as our common head, and given that it may adorn us, and by so adorning may unite us: as indeed what can render the soul more amiable than to be animated, to be impregnated with the Spirit, whose fruits are so celestial and divine! Hear how the apostle, in whom it so eminently reigned, represents its effects, The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; and surely these fruits, fair as they appear when considered in themselves, must render those who possess them so much the more amiable, when considered as proceeding from this sacred principle: for thus they render the persons who possess them venerable; and we the more easily love where we greatly esteem. Does not the Holy Spirit himself disdain to descend and dwell in such souls, and there to plant these noble and glorious fruits, and shall I disdain them? Shall all the rich treasure that he has lodged there, go for nothing with me, because he has not added this or that circumstance? because he has not taught them to judge exactly with me, and inclined them to worship with me? Surely, to argue thus would be to grieve and affront this Spirit of goodness. And let us not think to secure ourselves by saying they have it not. On men apparently sensual, cruel, and wicked, we may indeed pass this censure, whatever their religious profession may be: but where appearances are fair, we should be cautious of drawing such a conclusion; should rather be ready to suspect ourselves, and say, "Have I indeed the Spirit of God, the Spirit of wisdom, of candour, of love, when I thus judge my brethren, when in honour I prefer myself to them? When I say, let me take the mote out of thine eye, and consider not the beam that is in mine own?" Let us not thus grieve the Holy Spirit of God, if we desire to preserve any hope of being sealed by it to the day of redemption. The sense and the force of this argument is apparent; though it may perhaps be a little difficult precisely to fix that of the next, to which we must now proceed.

4. He pleads the bowels of mercies; for bowels and mercies are not to be understood as signifying different things, but, by a usual Hebraism, bowels of mercy, that is, the tenderest compassion, by which the bowels are struck and caused to yearn: and the general meaning to be sure is, if we have learned the compassion of Christians. This implies, that it was intended that Christians should be compassionate. If there are bowels in human nature, how much more tenderly must they move when instructed by the holy discipline of the gospel! This the genius of our religion very evidently shows; as it gives us so many precepts of compassion, and as it gives us so bright an example of it, in him whose whole history is the history of compassion and love. And need I name him to you? O Sirs, from whom can we learn this lesson, if not from Jesus the Son of God, whose pity for us, for our otherwise hopeless ruin, brought him down from his exalted glory, clothed him in these mean garments of mortal flesh, which we wear, and when it had made him a man, made him a sacrifice too, and triumphed over all the agony, and all the infamy, of the cross, that it might raise us to life and glory! O let us study this generous compassionate love in its various circumstances, till every stern and stubborn passion be subdued in our hearts, till we feel our souls melted into streams of love, and disposed to put on the Lord Jesus Christ; for greater love has no man than this, that a man should lay down his life for his friend, and yet when we were enemies Christ died for us.

But it is possible St. Paul might mean particularly to apply to their Christian compassion for him, as if he had said; "If on the whole you pity the load of affliction under which I am lying, for the gospel, and would not grieve me yet more than all my enemies can distress me; if you would rather comfort and support me under what I suffer for them, show it thus. Let Paul amidst all his labours and sorrows have this joy, that you love one another; that you are ready to every kind and friendly action, and show a true Christian magnanimity, as well as gentleness of mind, in looking higher than those things which are so often the causes of discord, to the great consideration which have so strong a tendency to unite us."

Such, my dear brethren and friends, such are the arguments which St. Paul urges, and let us endeavour to retain a sense of them upon our hearts. Let me, as it were, adjure as many of you as hear me this day, by the consolations of Christ, if they are sweet to you, by his offices, by his benefits, by all the representations which the Scripture makes of him, by the endearing tenderness and delight of this most noble godlike affection of the human mind, by the love of that Holy Spirit which unites us into one body, and is, as it were, the common soul of it, by all the compassions which as Christians you ought to feel for each other, and we the ministers of Christ would add, (if that may avail any thing, as surely it may,) by all your compassions to us, if we may indeed pretend to any merit with you, for all that we do, or for all that we resign, upon your account, for all our most affectionate care for your education, working frequently by night as well as by day, attending us into every place, and every service public or private; an affection which I hope, and I trust in the Lord, would bear us cheerfully to bonds and imprisonments, or to death itself for your establishment in our common faith. If any of these considerations, if all of them united, can have any weight, be unanimous, having your minds joined in the same love, and attending to the one thing: thus fulfil ye our joy, which is herein the joy of our common Lord too, and which will be your joy, amidst the various inconveniences inseparable from mortal life. Cultivate more and more that lovely principle, which having ennobled as well as delighted your spirits, having rendered you the ornament of religion, and dear in the eyes of men and of God, will prepare you for, and through the grace of the Redeemer transmit you to, the regions of everlasting love, and will there continue for ever to delight and adorn you, when faith and hope shall cease, and all our present causes of contention shall be long forgot. But I would hope you feel the force of these motives, and begin to be impatient for those advices for maintaining and promoting this blessed temper, which I gave you reason,

5. To expect at the conclusion of this Discourse. And here, as I intend rather to suggest some useful and comprehensive hints, than to expatiate upon them, I shall not range them under distinct heads, but offer them briefly as they rose in my mind.

It will be one step towards attaining this excellent temper, "earnestly to desire to attain it." And that we may, let us often reflect with ourselves how amiable and how excellent it is! What an ornament, and indeed, with all its meekness and tenderness, what a defence, to true Christianity! Let us accustom ourselves to think, so far as our best information reaches, what the face of the Christian church has in fact been, amidst all the mutual animosities that have reigned among its members; and, on the other hand, let us try to imagine what it would have been, if that pacific, gentle, beneficent temper which the gospel recommends had constantly, had generally, been prevalent, and every angry, turbulent, malignant thought and passion, had been brought into sweet subjection to the laws of Christ. But who can make the computation, whether we consider its aspect on present or on future happiness? Who can calculate how widely Christianity would have been spread, while the admiring world had been charmed by so bright a light, had been melted by so celestial a flame! Who can imagine what delights had sprung up in every breast, and how they had been multiplied by reflection from each! Above all, who can conceive how large a colony the regions of perfect love and blessedness would have received from the peopled earth, a colony increased by how many thousands and millions of those, who, filled with rancour and hatred, are now alas gone down to final destruction, and feel an hell of malignant passions within, which will be matter of everlasting torment to themselves, and all their wretched companions.

"Let us often think of the meekness and gentleness of Christ and of his apostles," particularly of St. Paul, and render familiar to our minds the many candid maxims, and principles, with which his writings abound. Let us remember, as he has admonished us, that the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. That as for some particular ritual observances, though the imposition of them must indeed be displeasing to God, yet the practice or the omission does not affect our share in his favour, if conscience be not violated. Neither if we eat are we the better, neither if we eat not are we the worse. Let us remember the very same principle, and that a very good one, indeed the very best of all principles, the desire of pleasing God, may, to persons under different apprehensions, produce a quite different conduct. He that regards a day may regard it to the Lord, and as for him that regards not a day, it may be out of a conscientious regard to the Lord that he does not regard it. When we are tempted to make our own taste and relish the standard to which all our brethren should bow, let us remember that Christ pleased not himself; and, when we are ready on the one hand to judge our brethren, or on the other hand to despise them, let us call up to our assistance that awful tribunal before which we are all in a little time to appear, that the account we have to give of ourselves to Christ may awe our spirits, and restrain us from that severity on our part, which might seem to challenge a severity on his, which the best of us could never be able to support under.

"If unkind thoughts against our brethren arise in our minds, let us suppress them," for by being vented they gain strength, and one injury is apt to beget another. If therefore we are obliged, as we sometimes may be, to plead the cause of truth and of liberty, though our antagonists may possibly give us great personal advantages against them, yet let us not be too ready to take or even to observe them, but let us rather show a noble superiority to injurious usage, and learn to answer confidence and petulance, censoriousness and severity, with calmness and gentleness, with reasonings indeed as strong as possible, but with a resolute guard upon our tempers; lest we become like those whom we blame, and condemn, in what is their folly, and will upon the whole be the disadvantage of their cause! for whatever little turn it may for the present serve, it will of course recoil upon them at last, and the more strongly when it seems to do it by its own natural spring, while we are too generous to urge it to the last extremity.

"Let those of us who appear under public characters, be very careful that we do not on any occasion passionately inveigh against our brethren, and especially in religious assemblies." Thus to abuse the sacred and important moments, which we spend immediately in the divine presence, thus to pervert the great design of Christian ordinances, and make them the vehicle of such malignant passions, is equally affronting to God and pernicious to men. It is calling the sheep of Christ together to be poisoned under a pretence of feeding them. Alas, too inflammable are the passions of men in this degenerate state of nature, and too many are the unavoidable occasions of offence. It is not necessary that the ministers of Christ should abet their fury, and if I may be indulged in the expression, tear out some of the most important leaves of the book of God, to give fire to the fatal train.

It is always proper to be upon our guard here, and "it is never more necessary than when the petulance and bigotry of others has given the example and begun the attack." Nature will be roused on such provocation, and is ready to spring forward, and enter into the contention with a fierce delight: but it will be our surest wisdom in all such cases, "to leave it off before it be meddled with," remembering our relation to him who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, and being reviled, reviled not again, but in calm silence committed himself to Him that judgeth righteously.

Permit me to add, that "in proportion to the degree in which God has distinguished any from their brethren by peculiar abilities, or more eminent services, they should be so much the more careful to distinguish themselves by meekness and candour." As James expresses it, whoso is a wise man, and endowed with distinguishing knowledge among you, let him especially illustrate his meekness of wisdom. The lowest understanding, the meanest education, the most contemptible abilities, may suffice to give hard names, and to pronounce severe censures. A harsh anathema may be learnt by heart, and furiously repeated by one that could scarce read it, and, as was in truth the case in some ancient councils, may be signed by those that cannot write their names. But true catholicism of temper is a more liberal thing, it proceeds from more enlarged views, it argues a superior greatness of mind, and a riper knowledge of men and things. And the man who is blessed with such advantages should be so much the more solicitous, that he does not on any provocation add the weight of his example to so bad a cause as that of uncharitableness always is. He owes it to God and to the world that such an influence be employed to the happy purposes of healing the wounds of the Christian church, and of conciliating the affections of good and worthy men towards each other, till their united counsels can regulate its disorders, and restore to it a form more worthy of itself.

"All these precautions will be more easy to us, in proportion to the degree in which we labour with our own hearts, to subdue the inward workings of pride and vain-glory." And for this purpose let us often review the too voluminous history of our own miscarriages in conduct, and mistakes in judgment; and it will make us less confident in ourselves, less severe and overbearing in our treatment or censures of others. On the other hand, let us look upon the excellences of our brethren rather than their defects, and let it always be the joy of our hearts to dwell in our thoughts upon what is beautiful, rather than what is exceptionable; and to trace, especially in those whose advantages for them may seem to have been inferior to our own, the evidences of wisdom and humanity, of benevolence, and piety. For this purpose, it is much to be desired that Christians of different sects, while this diversity must subsist among us, should be ready as Providence gives them opportunity to form acquaintance with each other, and also that their reading should not be confined merely to authors of their own sentiments, which often feeds bigotry, and shuts out candour at its first entrance. An enlarged acquaintance will infallibly convince us that all truth and goodness is not confined to one denomination of Christians, nor among the patrons of any of those opinions, for which we have been inclined most eagerly to contend. Now when we are persuaded of another, that God has received him, we shall be more cautious how we presume either to judge or despise him, and when we see excellency in so many respects superior to our own, we shall not exalt ourselves highly on the advantage we enjoy in being, as we must indeed suppose we are, right, in that particular in which we are obliged to differ from persons we so highly esteem. Perhaps, said one of the greatest and most excellent men our country has ever produced, I mean Mr. Howe; "Perhaps the reason why, in some disputable points, I have seen further than some of my brethren, is, because their more elevated minds have been employed on greater and nobler objects, which has prevented their looking so minutely into these particular questions."*

By such means as these I hope something may be done towards mending the appearance of things among us, and reconciling the hearts of contending Christians to each other, especially if we do not insist too rigorously on the history of former wrongs and injuries, for which we have all too much reason to blush, nor unwarrantably charge the iniquities of the fathers upon the children.

* N B I [illegible] marked the [illegible]

There is great reason to hope that the endeavour of every single person in his station to promote mutual union and love by methods like these, will in some degree be effectual; nor let us be discouraged, though it be not immediately successful, to the full extent of our wishes.

It may too justly be said, with regard to the evils with which we are to contend, in such a case, that the fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge. Too many have from their tenderest years been taught to place a part of their religion in the severity with which they censure their brethren, and a peevant humour, so early wrought into the constitution, will not easily be subdued by the most sovereign medicines. That very reflection, however, should teach us "to take great heed that we do not convey unkind prejudices into the minds of the rising generation," but that youth be educated among us in more open and generous sentiments, that they be taught to reverence true Christianity wheresoever they see it, and to judge of it by essentials rather than circumstantials. Let this be our care, and it is more than probable, that our children may rejoice in the shade and fruit of these trees of righteousness, which our hands have planted, and I hope it is not a vain presage that it will be so; for, blessed be God, the present season is mild and favourable to such an attempt, and I am persuaded none living have seen a crisis, which seemed more encouraging and inviting to these labours of love.

But here, as in every other respect, neither is he that planteth any thing, nor he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase. "Him therefore let us humbly and earnestly invoke, for the benign influences of his Holy Spirit;" whose great office it is to heal and sweeten, to purify and elevate, the mind, and in every sense, to take away the stony, and to produce and cherish the tender, heart. And O may the God of the spirits of all flesh, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the author of peace, and lover of concord, hear the prayers in which our hearts would unite with all our brethren; humbly interceding for the prosperity of the universal church: "That it may be so guided and governed by his good Spirit, that all who profess and call themselves Christians, may be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith once delivered to the saints in unity of Spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life, through Jesus Christ." Amen.

SERMON XIII.

THE EVIL AND DANGER OF NEGLECTING MEN'S SOULS.*

DEDICATION.

To the Associated Protestant Dissenting Ministers, in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, particularly those with whom the author had an interview at Denton, June 30th, 1741.

GENTLEMEN,

My Reverend Fathers and Brethren, and much esteemed Friends,

THE condescending respect, and endeared affection, with which you were pleased to receive me, in my late visit to your parts, and the very great satisfaction which I found in your company at Denton, and elsewhere, have left a very delightful memorial on my heart, and have impressed those unfeigned sentiments of gratitude and esteem, which it would be painful to suppress. Most gladly therefore do I take this method, in a few words, publicly to avow them: and I sincerely congratulate the happy societies, respectively under your care, who gratefully enjoy the benefit of those valuable labours, a little taste of which gave me an exquisite pleasure, beyond what it is possible for me fully to express.

Nevertheless, desirous as I am of erecting some little monument of thankful friendship, I should not have attempted it by inscribing this plain Sermon to you, unless the subject of it had been such, as peculiarly suited your perusal, and, if I may be permitted to say it, amidst all its imperfections, your patronage too.

* Preached at a meeting of ministers at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, October the 15th, 1740.

No doubt, many of you, Gentlemen, remember, that after the public worship at Denton was over, on that memorable day, which I shall always number among the most delightful of my whole life, you were pleased, toward the evening, to indulge me in the liberty of a private conference, in which I laid before you some hints of a scheme, which I was then forming for the revival of religion in our parts; a scheme, which you were pleased, in the general, to approve, and, in several particulars, to ripen, by your prudent and valuable counsels.

Greatly encouraged by the sanction which your concurrence gave to the plan, and also by that which it received from the approbation of some of the most eminent London ministers, of different denominations, to whom I had an opportunity of communicating it on my return home, I proposed it in general to my reverend and worthy brethren in these parts, at a meeting of ministers, which was held here at Northampton, about the middle of August. The proposals were, in the general, very well received, and it was agreed to take them into a more particular consideration in a conference, at our next assembly, to be held at Kettering, on Thursday, the 13th of October.

To that conference, Gentlemen, the Sermon with which I now present you, was introductory, and the result of it was, that the heads of the scheme I had concerted with you at Denton, with a few other particulars which had not then occurred to my thoughts, were unanimously approved; and we are taking proper measures for carrying them into execution. And, as this Discourse may fall into the hands of some, who may be curious to know what the particulars were; and as I hope them so frequently in my thoughts, though many passages of my Sermon, I shall take the freedom here to give an account of them, though, I doubt not, but the most material of them are fresh in your memories.

It seemed most agreeable to the deference due to the reverend assembly, to propose the scheme in the form of queries; on which the following resolutions were formed, nemine contradicente:

I. That it may tend to the advancement of religion, that the ministers of this association, if they have not very lately done it, should agree to preach one Lord's day on family religion, and another on secret prayer; and that the time should be fixed, in humble hope that concurrent labours, connected with concurrent petitions to the throne of grace, might produce some happy effect.

II. That it is proper, that pastoral visiting should be more solemnly attended to, and that greater care should be taken in personal inspection, than has generally been used. And that it may conduce to this good end, that each minister should take an exact survey of his flock, and note down the names of the heads of families, the children, the servants, and other single persons in his auditory, in order to keep proper memorandums concerning each, that he may judge the better of the particulars of his duty with regard to every one, and may observe how his visits, exhortations, and admonitions, correspond to their respective characters and circumstances.

III. That consequent on this survey, it will be proper as soon as possible, and henceforward at least once a year, to visit, if it be practicable, every head of a family under our ministerial care, with a solemn charge to attend to the business of religion, in their hearts, and houses, watching over their domestics in the fear of the Lord, we, at the same time, professing our readiness to give them all proper assistances for this purpose.

IV. That it will be highly expedient, immediately, or as soon as may be, to set up the work of catechising, in one form or another, and to keep to it statedly for one half of the year at least: and that it is probable, future counsels may ripen some scheme for carrying on this work, in a manner which may tend greatly to the propagation of real, vital, catholic Christianity in the rising generation.

V. That there is reason to apprehend there are, in all our congregations, some pious and valuable persons, who live in a culpable neglect of the Lord's supper, and that it is our duty, particularly to inform ourselves who they are, and to endeavour, by our prayers to God, and our serious address to them, to introduce them into communion; (to which, I question not, we shall all willingly add, cautiously guarding against any thing in the methods of admission, which may justly discourage sincere Christians of a tender and timorous temper.

VI. That it is to be feared, there are some, in several of our communions at least, who behave in such a manner as to give just offence, and that we may be in great danger of making ourselves partakers of other men's sins, if we do not animadvert upon them: and that if they will not reform, or if the case be notorious, we ought, in duty to God, and to them, and to all around us, solemnly to cut them off from our sacramental communion, as a reproach to the church of Christ.

VII. That it may, on many accounts, be proper to advise our people, to enter into little bands, or societies, for religious discourse and prayer, each consisting of six or eight, to meet for these good purposes once in a week, or a fortnight, as may best suit with their other engagements and affairs.

VIII. That it might be advisable, if it can be done, to select out of each congregation under our care, a small number of persons, remarkable for experienced prudence, seriousness, humility, and zeal, to act as a stated council for promoting religion in the said society: and that it would be proper they should have some certain times of meeting with each other and with the minister, to join their counsels and their prayers for the public good.

IX. That so far as we can judge, it might, by the divine blessing, conduce to the advancement of these valuable ends, that neighbouring ministers, in one part of our land and another, (especially in this county,) should enter into associations, to strengthen the hands of each other by united consultations and prayer; and that meetings of ministers might, by some obvious regulations, be made more extensively useful than they often are: in which view it was further proposed, with unanimous approbation, That these meetings should be held at certain periodical times: That each member of the association should endeavour (if possible) to be present, studying to order his affairs so, as to guard against unnecessary hinderances:—That public worship should begin and end sooner, than it commonly has done on these occasions:—That each pastor preach at these assemblies in his turn:—That the minister of the place determine who shall be employed in prayer:—That after a moderate repast, to be managed with as little trouble and expense as may be, an hour or two in the afternoon be spent in religious conference and prayer, and in taking into consideration (merely as a friendly counsel, and without the least pretence to any right of authoritative decision) the concerns of any brother, or any society, which may be brought before us for our advice:—And finally, that every member of this association shall consider it as an additional obligation upon him, to endeavour to be, so far as he justly and honourably can, a friend and guardian to the reputation, comfort, and usefulness of all his brethren in the Christian ministry, near or remote, of whatever party and denomination.

X. That it may be proper to enter into some further measures, to regulate the admission of young persons into the ministry. The particulars here were referred to further consideration; but, so far as I can judge, the plan proposed will be pretty nearly this:—That if any student, within the compass of this association, desires to be admitted as a preacher, he apply to the ministers at one of their periodical meetings; when, if they be in the general satisfied, that he is a person of a fair character, in sacramental communion with Christian society, and one who has gone through a regular course of preparatory studies, they will appoint three of their number, to examine more particularly into his acquaintance with, and sense of, the great doctrines of Christianity, as delivered in the Scripture, and into the progress he has made in literature, the views with which he professes to undertake the ministry, and in general, his aptness to teach; in order to judging of which, it may be proper, that a theological thesis be exhibited in Latin, and a popular sermon, composed by the candidate, be submitted to the perusal of the examiners: that if they in their consciences believe he is fit to be employed in the Christian ministry, they give him a certificate of that approbation, which he may be desired to produce at the next general meeting, that his testimonial may be signed by all the associated ministers present, and he solemnly recommended to God by prayer.

Thus, Gentlemen, you have a view of the scheme, as it now lies before us, and as every article, except the last, (not yet considered among us,) was approved at Kettering, at the time above mentioned. I will take leave to add one particular more, which has since occurred to my thoughts, and which I here submit to your consideration, and to that of my other reverend brethren, into whose hands this may fall, especially those of our own association.

XI. Qu. Whether something might not be done, in most of our congregations, towards assisting in the propagation of Christianity abroad, and spreading it in some of the darker parts of our own land? In pursuance of which it is further proposed, that we endeavour to engage as many pious people of our respective congregations as we can, to enter themselves into a society, in which the members may engage themselves to some peculiar cares, assemblies, and contributions, with a regard to this great end. I will not swell this Dedication with the particulars of that scheme, which has been formed to this purpose, but rather choose to insert at the bottom of the page a copy of such an association, which I am endeavouring to introduce among my own people, and which several have already signed. It is a feeble essay; and the effects of it in one congregation can be but very small: but if it were generally to be followed, who can tell what a harvest such a little grain might at length produce? May God multiply it a thousand-fold![*]

Excuse me, my reverend and dear brethren, that I have detained you so long with these various particulars: and permit me to conclude this address, with beseeching you to join with me in humble prayer to him, who knows the sincere regard to the temporal and eternal happiness of his creatures, by which the plain things of this Dedication and Sermon are dictated, that he may honour both with his blessing. If any parts of the scheme here laid before you, have not indeed that subserviency to the great end proposed,

* We whose names are subscribed, being moved, as we hope and trust, by a real concern for the propagation of the kingdom of Christ in the world, have determined to form ourselves into a society for that end, on the following terms:—

I. That we purpose, in our stated assemblies, to be duly putting up some earnest petitions to the throne of grace, for the encouragement of the gospel in the world, and for the success of all the faithful servants of Christ, who are engaged in the work of it, especially among the heathen and Jews.

II. That we will assemble, at least four times a year, in our place of public worship, at such seasons as shall by mutual consent be appointed, to spend some time in solemn prayer together on this important account; and we hereby engage, that we will endeavour so to order our affairs, as to attend at such meetings, unless such circumstances happen, as to lead us in our own consciences to determine, that it will be more acceptable to God the night at least, that we should be employed in some other business elsewhere.

III. We do hereby express our desire, that some of us may go, as God gives us opportunity, every year, those progresses of Scripture, which relate to the revival and enlargement of the Redeemer's kingdom in the world; that our hands may be supported, and our prayers quickened, by the continual intelligence of them.

IV. It is also our desire, that whatever unpublished accounts may relating to the progress of the gospel be received by the various parts of this kingdom, or from foreign lands by any members of the society, they may be communicated to one of our quarterly meetings; and the end of the charter if any required by our ministers, that he will endeavour to do it. Concerning such correspondences, that we may be the more capable of judging, how far God answers our prayers and those of his other servants, in this regard.

V. We further engage, that on those days of general fasting, which we shall as God shall be pleased to prosper us enable to keep, (which, be it ever so little, towards the carrying on the pious designs, in the hands of a Commissioner, to be chosen at the first meeting, to be disposed of by him, and four elders' trustees, that may be appointed, on such a manner as they shall judge most convenient, towards supporting the aforesaid designs, as abroad, printing Bibles, or other useful books in foreign languages, establishing schools for the instruction of the ignorant, &c. &c. &c.

VI. That the pastor for the time being, of one of the society, be always one of these trustees, and that four more be annually nominated by the society at the first meeting after New-year's-day, with a power of choosing their successors out of their own number, and that the accounts of the former year be then laid before the society, or before a committee appointed to examine them.

VII. That members after the first meeting, be admitted by the consent of the majority of the society present, at some stated meeting, and that any member there to be at liberty to propose to the society, as he sees fit.

VIII. That fines if needful be taken at every meeting, of the business transacted, the persons admitted, the contributions made at it, &c.

To these rules we subscribe our hands, earnestly praying, that God may open to us, and many others by our means, a greater door in this, and in every good work that we seek: and that pursuing the good wealth of those who in one place or another, are devoting their lives to the advancement of the gospel, we may another day partake of their joy.

which they are imagined to have, it would be a peculiar pleasure to me to be better informed; yet I must take the liberty to say, those must be strong arguments, which will prevail against the experience of the happy effects, which have for some time, in my own congregation, attended those, alas, too imperfect attempts, which I have made to carry them into execution. But if they are, as I assuredly believe, calculated to revive the languishing interest of real religion, may your advice, my honoured friends, in concurrence with that of my worthy brethren in these parts, and with the serious expostulations contained in the ensuing Discourse, prevail on others to make the trial of them, which surely they will not repent in the nearest views of eternity.

I persuade myself, gentlemen, that in the midst of those various cares and labours for the public service, to which, weak as I am, Divine Providence has called me, you will sometimes be repeating for me those suitable and pathetic petitions, which you were pleased, at Denton, and elsewhere, during my late interviews with you, to offer on my account; petitions, which I never recollect without a most sensible pleasure, and by the very remembrance of which I find myself animated to this very day. On my part, dear brethren, be assured of all the most affectionate good wishes, which sincere esteem and grateful friendship can inspire. May that Spirit of grace and supplication, the happy effects of which I so delightfully observed in those of you, on whom I had then an opportunity of attending, be in a still richer abundance poured forth upon you all! May you open your mouths boldly to declare the mysteries of God, as faithful witnesses to the truth and purity of his gospel, in the midst of a degenerate and backsliding age! May you teach, not only publicly, but from house to house! May a truly primitive and Scriptural discipline, which it is our privilege, that amidst all our discouragements we are able, not only to pray for, but to exercise, be impartially maintained! And in consequence of all this, may you have the pleasure to see your assemblies flourishing! May you feel your hearts daily cheered and animated, by the visible success of your labours! and may there be no contention among you, unless it be who shall exert himself with the most exemplary prudence, zeal, and love, in the prosecution of so good a work! May each of you, in the sphere which Providence has assigned him, be a burning and a shining light! And may the lustre of your fervent and active piety awaken (if any of them slumber) our brethren of the established clergy, to guard against that growth of the dissenting interest, which must otherwise be the probable consequence of such measures! May they all emulate the most faithful and zealous among us, in the purity of their doctrine, in the seriousness and spirituality of their address, in the vigilance of their pastoral inspection, in their tender care to train up the rising generation for God, and above all, in the distinguished sanctity of their lives! This will unite our hearts in such mutual esteem and affection, that even while in different communions, we shall treat each other like brethren and friends, and follow labourers in the vineyard of Christ; far more endeared by our common love to our divine Master, and the souls he has redeemed, than alienated by our different apprehensions as to the particular mode by which that interest is to be promoted. The question between us will not then be, "How much may we lawfully impose?" and "How much may we lawfully dispute?" But on the one side, it will be inquired, "What may we wave?" and on the other, "What may we acquiesce in, from a principle of mutual tenderness and respect; without displeasing our common Lord, and injuring that great cause of original Christianity, which he has appointed us to guard?" Thus may the flames of undissembled love purge away our dross, and cement us into one mass; where the union will be the closer, in proportion to the degree in which the metal is the nobler, and the more refined! And thus may it cause those letters to fall off, under the weight and the straitness of which, however they may have been gilded over, the worthiest persons that wear them must secretly groan! We are praying and waiting for that happy day, which, whenever it appears, will be the glorious earnest of the revival of the protestant and of the Christian cause. In the mean time, may each of us have a pleasing consciousness, that we are labouring to promote it; or at least that while we are waiting for the appearance of the great Physician among us, we do not, by our own rashness, exasperate those distempers, which in his absence we cannot heal! A wish, and a care, in which, I am sure, you will concur with,

Gentlemen,

Your most affectionate brother,
and faithful and obliged humble servant.

Northampton, February 1, 1741-2. P. DODDRIDGE.

PROV. XXIV. 11, 12.

If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain; if thou sayest, Behold, we knew it not: doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? and he that keepeth thy soul, doth not he know it? and shall not he render to every man according to his works?

THE interviews of the ministers of Christ will always be pleasant, in proportion to the degree in which they are animated, by divine grace, to think and act worthy of their honourable relation to him, and to each other. We, in these parts, have great reason for thankfulness, that we have so long known, by happy experience, how good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity; and it is with peculiar joy that I reflect, we are met this day, not only to express and cultivate our mutual affection; but also, by our united counsels, to strengthen each other's hands in the work of our God, and to concert measures for the more effectual revival of religion, in the several places where Providence has especially assigned it to our stated care. As iron sharpeneth iron, so a man often sharpens the countenance of his friend. Most gladly would I this day, since I am called to address you on so solemn and important an occasion, contribute my utmost to whet your spirits and my own; and to awaken us all to that zeal for the service of our common Master, which will render the various duties of our office abundantly delightful, and our reward in heaven proportionably great. O that what I have now to say might be like goads, to penetrate all our minds; and like nails, securely fastened in our memories and our hearts, given forth from the one great Shepherd! May all the instruments with which he is furnishing us in our pastoral work, be wisely and faithfully employed; and may the Master of assemblies this day be excited to use them with greater skill and diligence in his service!

And as for you, my brethren, in more private stations of life, I persuade myself you will hear me patiently and candidly: for though but little of my discourse will be immediately addressed to you, it is your cause I shall be pleading in the whole of it. You will, therefore, I hope, be often lifting up your hearts to God for the success of it; and will also be considering what intimations of your own duty you may collect, from what I am to address to those of a more public character. For though the words of my text may, with peculiar propriety, be applied to the ministers of the gospel, they were at first spoken with a much more general view: nor is there one soul in the assembly who may not consider them as directed by God to him, as truly as if his own name were prefixed to them. If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain; if thou sayest, or (as it might be rendered) though thou mayest say,* Behold, we knew it not: doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? and he that keepeth thy soul, doth not he know it? and will not he render to every man according to his works?

For the explication of which words, with all becoming deference to the superior judgment of some before whom I speak, I would offer these three plain and obvious remarks.

1. That the omission, which is here charged as so displeasing to God, though immediately referring to men's natural lives, must surely imply, that the neglect of their souls is much more criminal.

The text strongly implies, that we shall be exposed to guilt and condemnation before God, by forbearing to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain. This must directly refer to innocent persons, brought into visible and extreme danger by some oppressive enemy, either by the sudden assault of a private person, or by some unjust prosecution under forms of law; and may particularly extend to cases, where we have reason to believe, a capital sentence has been passed in consequence of false witness, detected before execution is done:† when cases of one sort or the other occur, we may consider Solomon as requiring, just as his father David had done, that we should by such interpositions, as suit the case in question, and that station in which Providence has fixed us, defend the poor and the fatherless, or those who are oppressed, as orphans often are; that we should do justice to the afflicted and the needy; and should endeavour to deliver the poor and the needy, and to rid them out of the hand of the wicked. And though this may expose us to popular clamours, we should adopt the heroic resolution of Job, not fearing a great multitude, nor permitting the reproach of families to terrify us, so as to keep silence, and not go out of the door. One would hope, such attacks as these seldom happened under the peaceful and equitable reign of Solomon: but as violence and fraud are in some degree the product of all climates and ages, he had, no doubt, in some instances observed them;‡ and had remarked a culpable negligence in those, who ought to have interposed to have delivered the victims from such an undeserved stroke; on which account, he judged it necessary to enter his solemn protest against an indolence and cowardice, so detrimental to society, and so offensive to God, the great guardian of it.

Now you will please to observe, that delivering persons reduced to such extreme danger in the circumstance I have described, would generally be an act of charity attended with great danger, or with great trouble. And if the neglect of that be (as you see it is) represented as highly criminal, it must be a much greater offence to suffer any to perish, for want of either food, shelter, or harbour, in circumstances where a person is able, by a little trouble, expense, or care, to preserve their lives. And we may argue, by a consequence yet stronger than this, that it must be a much more heinous crime than either, by any neglect of ours, to permit the ruin of men's souls, without endeavouring their recovery,

* It is well known, that the particle כי [illegible]

† [illegible]

‡ [illegible]

when they are, as it were, drawn away to the extremest danger of eternal death, and are ready to be slain by the sword of divine justice. For if temporal life should be thus tenderly regarded, and expense or danger should be cheerfully met in the defence of it, judge you, Sirs, as in the sight of God, how much more precious the redemption of the soul is, which will soon cease, even for ever.

Nay, I might go yet further, and draw an inference, if it were necessary, from that humane and charitable precept of the Jewish legislator: If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again: if thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burthen, wilt thou forbear, or, (as it might be rendered,) wouldst thou refrain, to help him? or couldst thou be so cruel as to harbour a thought of it? No, thou shalt surely help with him; i. e. thou shalt go, if it be necessary, and join thy strength with that of thine enemy, to raise the beast from the ground. Now if God not only regards the natural life of a man, but if he thus appears to care for oxen, and for asses, how much more must he require us to reduce wandering souls, and to do what we can to raise them, when pressed under the burthen of sin, and in danger of being crushed into eternal misery?

2. The text seems to suppose that men would be ready to excuse themselves for this neglect.

It is true indeed, that at the first sight of a miserable object we naturally find a strong impulse to endeavour to relieve it. Our hearts do, as it were, spring in our bosoms, and urge us forward to exert ourselves on such an occasion; which seems to be intimated by that word, which we render forbear, which often signifies to check, restrain, and hold back a person from what he is eager on doing.* But the wise man intimates, there may be danger of suppressing these generous sallies of the soul on the first view of the object; of suffering our charity to cool, and then of searching out apologies for our inactivity. You may be ready to say, Behold, we knew it not. "I did not particularly see the danger; I did not, however, apprehend it to be so extreme: or, I did not know the innocence of the person in danger: or, if I did believe it, I knew not how to deliver him. I did not think the interposition of such a person as I could be of any importance in such an affair. I was sorry to see innocence overborne, and weakness oppressed; but I was myself too weak to contend with the mightier oppressor; too poor, too ignorant, or too busy, to meddle in an affair, where those who were much my superiors were concerned, and had determined the case. I had no obligations to the person in danger; I had no concern with him, nor any thing to do to embarrass myself with his affairs."

If these excuses be just, it is well. God requires impossibilities from no man; nor does he expect that persons should rashly throw themselves upon difficulties and dangers, when there is no such rational prospect of doing good, as may balance the hazard. Nevertheless the text supposes,

3. That these excuses might often be overruled, by an appeal to men's consciences as in the sight of God.

Doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? and he that keepeth thy soul, doth not he know it? As if he should have said, "It is an easy thing to excuse omissions, so that a fellow-creature shall have nothing to reply; but whoever thou art that readest these words, I charge thee to remember, that it is comparatively a very little matter to be judged of man's judgment; he that judgeth thee is the Lord: and he pondereth the heart; he weighs, in a most accurate balance, all its most secret sentiments. I therefore cut off all chicane and trifling debate at once, by placing thee in his presence, and laying open thy conscience there. Thou canst answer me; but canst thou answer the heart-searching God? Does not he, the great Father of spirits, see, in every instance, how inferior spirits conduct themselves? Does he not precisely know the situation, in which thy heart was at the very moment in question? Thou sayest, thou knewest it not; but he is witness, whether thou indeed didst or didst not know it. And he also sees all the opportunities and advantages, which thou hadst for knowing it; all the hints, which might have been traced out to open a more explicit and particular knowledge; every glimpse which thou hadst, when thou wast (like the priest, when he spied at a distance the wounded traveller) passing by on the other side, and perhaps affecting to look the contrary way."

Nor was it in vain, that the wise man renewed his expostulation in a different form. He that keepeth thy soul, doth not he know it? As if he had said, "Consider God, as keeping thine own soul; as holding it in life; as preserving thy spirit by his continued visitation: and then say, O thou, that neglectest the life of thy brother, whether he must not be highly displeased with that neglect? May he not reasonably expect, that while he, the Lord of heaven and earth, condescends to become thy guardian, thou shouldst learn of him, and be according to thine ability, and in thy sphere, a guardian to the whole human race, and shouldst endeavour, in every instance, to ward off danger from the life, from the soul, of thy brother?"

And that these thoughts may enter into the mind with all their weight, it is added once more, in this pointed form of interrogation, Will not he render to every man according to his works? I appeal to thine own heart, is he not a Being of infinite moral, as well as natural, perfections, and will he not, as the judge of all the earth, do right? Would he not have remembered, and rewarded, thy generous care for the preservation of the miserable creature in question? And, on the other hand, will he not reckon with thee for such a failure? Human laws, indeed, cannot punish such neglects; but the supreme legislature can, and will do it. Think of these things, and guard against such fatal negligence in every future instance: think of them, and humble thyself deeply before God, for every past instance in which such guilt has been incurred."

* It is in the original חשך, and the same word is used for even the restraint put on the passion of Abimelech by Sarah, Gen. xx. 6; the revenge of David, when mollified by Nabal, 1 Sam. xxv. 39; and on the martial fury of David's party when pursuing the rebels under Absalom, 2 Sam. xviii. 16. Compare Job xvi. 6. Prov. xxi. 26.

You easily perceive, from this explication of my text, that (as I hinted above) I might very properly make it the foundation of a discourse "on the care of souls in general," addressed to persons of all ranks and professions in life; especially to parents,* and masters, and heads of families: and they will indeed have an evident share in what I am to say, and therefore I would bespeak their particular attention to it. But considering the occasion of our present assembly, and also considering how much of their fidelity, in the performance of their duty, will probably, under God, depend upon the exhortations, instructions, and assistances, they receive from us, I shall chiefly address these things to you, my reverend fathers and brethren in the ministry; and entreat your patient and candid attendance, while I speak to you with all possible plainness and seriousness, as in the name and presence of our common Master.

God is my witness, that I mean not to insinuate the least disrespectful thought with regard to any one of you. Indeed I have not the least temptation to it, for I can say, with equal integrity and pleasure, that I believe few of your profession in the Christian world (glorious as that profession is, and happy as it is in many that adorn it) are more constant, more upright, or more zealous, in the course of their public ministry. I repeat it with great cheerfulness, that I am inwardly persuaded, few of the servants of Christ are, or in any modern age have been, more faithfully solicitous to declare to their people the whole counsel of God; or to enforce their public exhortations, by the silent but powerful eloquence of a blameless, a holy, an exemplary life. And of this, I assuredly believe, you have a testimony in the consciences of all around you, and even of multitudes who are not stated attendants on your labours; and who perhaps, in such a case, are under some temptations to err on the severe, rather than on the candid, extreme. So that in this respect, I could cheerfully say, Would to God, that all your brethren in the Christian ministry, throughout the nation, and the world, were even as you! Nevertheless, permit me to say it without offence, (for I say it in the fear of God, and with the sincerest deference and friendship to you,) I am afraid, the extensive and important obligations of the ministerial office are not generally considered, and remembered among us, as they ought. I apprehend, much more might be done for the honour of God, and the good of souls, than is commonly done, I will not say, by those careless and profane wretches, who undertake the tremendous charge merely for the sake of worldly emoluments; by those whom the plainness of prophetic language calls dumb dogs, that cannot bark, and greedy dogs, that can never have enough; but even by those, who in the main have a principle of true religion in their hearts; by those, who keep up the exercise of public worship in a regular and honourable manner, and appear not only irreproachable in their conversation, but, if considered as in private life, bringing forth the fruits of righteousness. The learned, the wise, the virtuous, the pious minister, is, I fear, often negligent of a considerable part of his trust and charge; and thereby fails to deliver, as he might, those that are drawn unto death, and perhaps are just ready to be slain. To awaken our spirits therefore from that insensibility in this respect, into which they are so ready to fall, and so to improve the present opportunity, that the man of God may be perfect, and thoroughly furnished to every good work which our office requires, I shall take the liberty,

I. Briefly to consider, what excuses we may be most ready to offer, for neglecting the souls of men.

II. Seriously to represent the great evil of that neglect in the sight of God, notwithstanding all those excuses. After which,

III. I shall add a few hints by way of reflection, as the time may admit.

And if a consciousness of my own past neglects, and an ignorance of circumstances in the congregations of my brethren, lead me to suppose some deficiencies greater than they really are, and to give any cautions, which their diligence and zeal render necessary, with regard to some that hear me, they will, I hope, forgive me this involuntary wrong. I am far from the thought of charging any particular person, and ground most of the remarks I now present, on what is obvious in the temper of mankind, and on those infirmities of human nature, to which the best of men are obnoxious, however by divine grace they may be conquered in a few of the most eminent for fidelity and zeal.

I. I am to consider, what excuses we may be ready to make, for neglecting to do our utmost for the salvation of men's souls.

Now I imagine one of the first thoughts, which may present itself to our view upon such an occasion, may be this:

* I have treated the matter at large with them in my Sermons on Education.

1. That we do something considerable for that purpose:

And particularly, that we take care for their instruction in public; reading the word of God to them, when they are assembled together in his house; explaining and enforcing it in our expositions and sermons; presenting prayers and praises to God, in their name; and, at proper seasons administering the sacraments, in such a manner as we judge most agreeable to the institution of our Lord Jesus Christ.

And so far, indeed, it is well: and a most wise and gracious constitution of our blessed Redeemer it is, that such ordinances should be administered, on solemn stated days, and by men appropriated to that employment; in consequence of which, such knowledge is dispersed, as may be, and undoubtedly is, through the divine blessing, effectual for the salvation of many souls. So that ministers cannot go through the external and public services of their function, without giving their hearers some great and valuable advantages, far beyond what the professors of any other religion can find in the rites of their various, and generally absurd and superstitious, worship. And I am not afraid to say, that this would make the Christian ministry, even in the hands of ignorant, careless, and vicious men, a blessing to the nation where it is settled, so long as reading the Scriptures, and almost any kind of prayers, in an intelligible language, make a part of divine service in their assemblies. Much more then will it be so in the hands of wise, sober, and religious men, though, through human frailty, they are much less zealous and active, than it were to be wished they were, or than they ought to be.

But while we are thus pleading our diligence and care in the administration of public ordinances, it will be kindness to ourselves seriously to ask our own hearts, at least, how they are administered. It is (as I have elsewhere hinted) a very important trust, to have the management of men's religious hours committed to us; their seasons of social worship being comparatively so short, and so infinitely momentous. Methinks we do almost, as it were, put our own lives in our hand while we undertake it, and may justly tremble on the view of that awful account which we are to give for it.

I hope, Sirs, we have the testimony of our own consciences before God, that we do not, on these solemn occasions, content ourselves with cold essays on mere moral subjects, however acute, philosophical, or polite; nor make it our main business, in our sermons, to seek the ornament and elegance of words, the refinements of criticism, or the nice arrangement of various complex and abstruse argumentations. When we speak, in the name and presence of God, to immortal creatures on the borders of eternity, I hope we entertain our hearers with plain, serious, and lively discourses, on the most important doctrines of Christianity, in their due connexion, and their relation to each other, in such a manner, as we, on mature consideration, do verily believe may have the most effectual tendency to bring them to God through Christ, and to produce and promote in their hearts, through the divine blessing, the great work of regeneration and holiness. I hope and trust, that God is our witness, and that the people of our charge are witnesses, that not one of those that diligently attend on our ministry, though but for a few succeeding sabbaths, can fail to learn the way of salvation, as exhibited in the gospel; and that we speak of it as those that are in earnest, and do from our very souls desire to answer the great ends of our ministry, in the prosperity of the Redeemer's kingdom, and the eternal happiness of those invaluable souls whom he has committed to our care. Otherwise we may incur great and fatal guilt, though public worship be constantly and decently carried on, and though a reasonable proportion of time be employed in it, with numerous and attentive auditories; to whom we may be as the lovely song of one that has a pleasant voice, while in the ears of God, for want of that fervent charity which should dictate and animate all, we are but as sounding brass, or as a tinkling cymbal.

But granting, as I would willingly suppose, and as with relation to you, my brethren, I do firmly believe, all these reflections can be answered to satisfaction; here is indeed a part of your duty honourably performed, and an important part of it too.

But is that part, though ever so important, to be substituted for the whole? The diligent inspection of our flock, pastoral visits, the observation of the religious state of families, personal exhortations, admonitions, and cautions, by word or letter, as prudence shall direct, the catechising children, the promoting religious associations among the younger and the elder people of our charge, and the strict and resolute exercise of discipline in the several churches over which we preside; are these no parts of our office? Will we say it with our dying breath, will we maintain it before the tribunal of Christ, that they did not belong to the Christian ministry? And if not, will our care in other parts of it be allowed as a sufficient excuse before him, for our total omission of these? We have preached, and prayed, and administered the sacraments. These things we should indeed have done; and when we had taken the care of congregations upon us, we could hardly avoid it; but surely our own consciences will now, or hereafter, tell us, that we ought not to have left the others undone. But we may perhaps for a while elude the conviction, by pleading,

2. That the care of particular persons more properly belongs to others; and especially, to heads of families, who have more opportunities of being serviceable to those under their charge, and indeed have the most immediate concern in them.

It certainly does. But does it belong to them alone? Or if it did, do not they belong to us, and to our care? And is it not the part of every superior officer of a society to see to it, that the subaltern officers be careful and diligent in the discharge of their duty? And in this case, are we to take it for granted, that in our respective congregations heads of families are of course so? That they pray in their families; that they read the Scriptures, and other good books there, especially on the evening of the Lord's day; that they catechise their children, and solemnly press upon them, and their servants, the serious care of practical religion? Are we roundly to conclude, without any further inquiry, that all this is done; and done in so diligent and so prudent a manner? And that there is no need of any particular exhortations, instructions, or admonitions from us? Would to God there were any one congregation in the whole kingdom, of which this might reasonably be presumed to be the case! But if it were indeed so, would not our concurrence with these wise and pious heads of families, in so good, but so difficult, a work, encourage and strengthen them to prosecute it with greater cheerfulness and vigour? Would it not quicken both their cares and their endeavours? And might it not, by the divine blessing, promote the success of them? Might it not gain on the minds of children and servants, to see that we did not think it beneath us, tenderly to care for their souls? And might not our tender and condescending regards to them in private, while it convinced them how well we meant them, render our public labours more acceptable and useful to them? Now we well know, that the children and servants of the present generation are the hopes of the next; as they are probably those, that in their turns will be parents and governors of families; whose children and servants, when they arise, will one way or another feel the happy, or unhappy, consequences, of our fidelity or neglect? And when such affairs are in question, shall we allow ourselves to plead,

3. That we have so much other business, and such various engagements of a different kind, that we cannot possibly attend to these things.

But give me leave, my brethren, to observe, that the question here is not, whether we can find out other agreeable ways of filling up our time? but whether those other ways are more important, and whether that different manner of employing it, be most acceptable in the sight of God, and will turn to a better account in that great day, when our conduct is to be finally reviewed by him? We must indeed have our seasons of recreation and our seasons of study, but it will easily appear that no regards to either of these will vindicate, or excuse, our neglect of the private duties we owe to our flock, in giving diligence to know their state, and being careful to teach them, not only publicly, but from house to house.

Recreation, to be sure, can afford no just apology for neglecting it; since to follow this employment prudently, might be made a kind of recreation from the labours of a sedentary and studious life. A grave and severe recreation! you will perhaps say. Grave indeed I will acknowledge it to be; but not therefore to a serious mind less delightful. So much of those two noblest and sweetest exercises of the soul, devotion and benevolence, would naturally mingle with these pious cares and tender addresses, as would renew the strength which had been exhausted in our studious hours, and the manly, shall I say, or rather the godlike, joy it would administer, would quite discountenance that which we find in the gay indulgences of a humorous and facetious conversation; though I see no necessity of forbidding that, at proper intervals, so far as its cheerfulness is consistent with wisdom and religion. And I am sure, that if we can turn our seasons of recess from study to so profitable an account, as would be answered by the duties which you know I have now in view, it will be a most happy art, well becoming one who is truly prudent, and would therefore husband his time to the best purposes for eternity; in which view it is evident, that the smallest fragments of it, like the dust of gold, or jewels, are too valuable to be lost.

The great proportion of time to be given to our studies, will, no doubt, be urged, as a yet more material excuse. But here it is obvious to reply, that a prudent care in the duties I am now recommending, is very consistent with our employing a great deal of time in study; and particularly, with our giving it, what I hope we shall always learn to value and redeem, our morning hours, to which some of the evening may also be added. And if these will not generally suffice, give me leave to ask, what are those important studies, that would thus engross the whole of our time, excepting what is given to devotion, and to what is generally called recreation?

I have had some little taste of the pleasures of literature myself, and have some reason to hope, I shall not be suspected of any prejudice against it; nor am I at all inclined to pass those contemptuous censures on the various branches of it, in which ignorance and sloth are often, with strange stupidity, or with yet stranger assurance, seeking, and it may be finding, a refuge. But on such an occasion I must freely say, I fear many things, which employ a very large portion of our retired time, are studied rather as polite amusements to our own minds, than as things which seem to have any apparent subserviency to the glory of God, and the edification of our flock; and consequently, I fear, they will stand as articles of abatement, if I may so express it, in our final account; and when they come to be made manifest, will be found works that shall be burnt, as being no better, in the divine esteem, than wood, hay, and stubble, how beautifully soever they may have been varnished, or gilded over.

Let me here, in particular, address myself to my younger brethren, with a frankness which may be to them more excusable, while I urge them to a Christian self-denial upon this head, where perhaps it may be, of all others, the most difficult. I do not apprehend persons of your approved character to be in danger of any other kind of luxury and intemperance; but there is, if you will permit me so to call it, a sort of refined intellectual luxury, with regard to which I am jealous over you, lest you should be seduced into it, or rather lest some of you be already insnared by its specious charms.

I would not, my young friends, be so severe and cruel, as to desire you should be confined from that high and elegant entertainment, which a person of genius and taste will find in the masterly writings of the ancient orators, historians, and poets; or in those polite and elegant pieces, which our own and other modern languages, may afford; from which the wise man, and the Christian, will learn many things of solid use, as well as matters of most delightful amusement. Neither would I pretend to forbid some mathematical and philosophical researches, into which you are initiated in your academical course, and with which you will do well to retain and improve your acquaintance in the progress of life, both to strengthen your rational faculties by that strenuous exercise, and to improve your knowledge of the works of God, which will appear great, wonderful, and delightful, in proportion to the degree of sagacity and diligence with which they may be searched out. But it is one thing to taste of these poignant and luscious fruits, and another to feed and live upon them:—one thing to make the most noble and substantial parts of them our entertainment and refreshment; and quite another to make their circumstantial curiosities the chief business of our study, and the favourite subjects of our most attentive inquiry. That true greatness and elevation of mind, which the gospel is so admirably calculated to produce, would teach us a much sublimer science: and if, for the sake of these little things, we neglect to pray for those whom God hath committed to our care, to inquire into their religious state, to pursue them with suitable applications and addresses, the time will come when we shall assuredly own, that we dearly purchased the most refined pleasures they could possibly give us; not to say, how much greater and nobler pleasure we even now resign, while our duty is neglected. O, my brethren, let us consider how fast we are, as it were, posting through this dying life which God has assigned us, in which we are to manage concerns of infinite moment, how fast we are passing on to the immediate presence of our Lord, to give up our account to him. You must judge for yourselves; but permit me to say, that for my own part, I would not for ten thousand worlds be that man, who when God shall ask him at last, how he has employed most of his time, while he continued a minister in his church, and had the care of souls, should be obliged to reply, "Lord, I have restored many corrupted passages in the ancient classics, and illustrated many which were before obscure; I have cleared up many intricacies in chronology, or geography; I have solved many perplexed cases in algebra; I have refined on astronomical calculations; and left behind me many sheets on these curious and difficult subjects, where the figures and characters are ranged with the greatest exactness and truth: and these are the employments in which my life has been worn out, while preparations for the pulpit, or ministrations in it, did not demand my immediate attendance." O, Sirs, as for the waters which are drawn from these springs, how sweetly soever they may taste to a curious mind that thirsts for them, or to an ambitious mind which thirsts for the applause they sometimes procure, I fear, there is often reason to pour them out before the Lord, with rivers of penitential tears, as the blood of souls which have been forgotten, while these trifles have been remembered and pursued.*

Nor am I without my fears, that a great deal of studious time is lost, in an over-artful composition of sermons, and in giving them such polish and ornament, as does not conduce to their usefulness, not any way balance the labour employed in the work. If we do not diligently watch over our hearts, this will be an incense, offered to our own vanity, which will render our sacrifice less acceptable to God, however we and our hearers may be delighted with the perfume. Greater plainness and simplicity of speech might be more useful to the bulk of our auditory, and perhaps more acceptable too; and on the whole, it might be at least equally beautiful. For all that are not children in understanding know, that there is a natural and manly kind of eloquence, arising from a deep sense of the subject, and an ardent love to the souls of our hearers, which is, of all others, the most to be desired and esteemed. And though such discourses may be attended with some little inaccuracies, and may want something of the varnish which exacter preparation might set on; yet surely, where a habit of speaking is formed, by proper application, and the materials of a sermon are well digested in the mind, it will rise above a reasonable contempt. And if where exacter preparation is made, a care to preserve those niceties of composition deaden the manner of the delivery, and take off either its solemnity, its vigour, or its tenderness, I cannot but apprehend it as injurious to the character of the orator as to that of the Christian. The most celebrated speakers in judicial courts, and in senates, have, in all nations and ages, pursued the method I now recommend; and the most acceptable preachers have successfully attempted it. On the whole, permit me to say, it would be a fatal thing, to barter away the souls of our people, for the highest and justest reputation of speaking well; yet I fear there are many, who in this view do it for nought, and have not in any sense increased their wealth by the price. But perhaps, after all, the most plausible excuse may be that, which I have reserved for the last I shall now mention, viz.

* [illegible]

4. That the attempts I am proposing might displease those that attend upon our ministry; upon which account it may seem, both with respect to them and ourselves, a necessary precaution of prudence to decline them.

This is the lion in the street; which, slothful as we too naturally are, we often plead for staying within doors, when our duty calls us abroad on these charitable errands: but I hope, on a nearer approach, it will not be found so fierce or so invincible, as a timorous imagination paints it.

Methinks, brethren, we make a very unfavourable representation of the temper and character, not to say of the breeding and understanding, of our people, when we so readily take it for granted, they will be displeased with us for addressing those exhortations to them in private, which they seem so desirous of receiving from us in public. Let us ask our own consciences, would they all be displeased? If not, the displeasure it might give to some, can be no excuse for neglecting it with regard to others. And are we indeed so miserable, as to be situated among whole congregations, in whom ignorance, pride, and profaneness, prevail to such a degree, that a minister, who would be welcome among them if he came only as a common visitant, should be looked upon with contempt or indignation, when he came expressly as a friend to their eternal interests, and would step a little out of the common way for their salvation? If this were really our case, who would not say with the prophet, O that I had in the wilderness a lodging-place of wayfaring men, though it were but such a wretched cave as travellers find in a desert, that I might leave my people, and go from them; for they be all an assembly of treacherous men!—of treacherous men indeed, if, while they call themselves Christians and protestants, yea, and profess to separate from their brethren on religious principles, they should think themselves injured and affronted by the exhortations of their ministers, while they would warn every man, and teach every man in all wisdom, that they might present them perfect in Christ. But blessed be God, bad as the world is, there is no room to imagine this to be the case, or any thing like it. Perhaps while we are delaying, and coldly deliberating about it, many lively Christians under our care are earnestly praying, that God may put such a thing into our hearts; and should we attempt it, I doubt not but they would receive us as an angel of God, or even as Christ himself; their love to us would be more abundantly confirmed, and their heart cemented in closer bonds than they have yet known. And many others would at least own, that we acted in character, and maintained a more apparent consistency of behaviour, if the affair were properly conducted.

Did we indeed pretend to control them in the management of their temporal affairs, or to exercise a lordly dominion over their faith and their conscience, they might justly be displeased; or did we craftily demand that they should lay open to us the secrets of their breasts in confession, their suspicions were pardonable, and their resentments reasonable. But it must be great malice or folly to suspect any design of that infamous nature, from our visiting them as pastors, with pious exhortations and affectionate prayers, as those who are concerned for them, and their children, and servants, that their souls may prosper and be in health. A solicitude for the health of their bodies is esteemed friendship and gratitude, and inquiries concerning it seem but common decency, and can it offend them to find we are solicitous about that welfare which is infinitely more important, and, by virtue of our office, our peculiar charge?

Yes, you will say, in one instance it will displease; for when we are obliged to blame any thing which we see amiss in them, their pride will naturally take fire on such an occasion: and perhaps those whom we have thought our best friends, will become our enemies, if we will venture to tell them such disagreeable truths as fidelity may extort in some circumstances. This is, after all, the main difficulty; and as I cannot wonder if it impress our minds, I pray God to forgive the perverseness of those that make it so great. Yet surely, it is possible to manage reproof so, as that, in most instances, it shall oblige, rather than provoke. If we tell our hearers of their faults privately; and if we do it with tenderness and respect: if we show by our manner of speaking, that what we say proceeds from a humble fear lest we should displease God, betray our trust, and injure their souls by the neglect: if, at the same time, our behaviour to them be, as it surely should be, constantly obliging: if we do our utmost, so far as truth and justice will permit, to guard and shelter their character in the world; and bring our complaints of them to none but themselves: bad as the world is, I believe few will quarrel with us upon this account; but we shall see, as Solomon observed, that he who rebuketh a man will afterwards find more favour than he that flattereth with his tongue.

But supposing the worst that can happen, that folly and wickedness should prevail so far, over all the tender and prudent address of the friend and the pastor, as to render us evil for so great a good, and hatred for so generous and so self-denying an instance of love, how could that hatred be expressed? Seldom in any more formidable manner, than by withdrawing from our ministry, and discontinuing what they have done for our support; for the revilings of persons of such a character can seldom hurt any but themselves. Now I hope, brethren, we shall always retain so much of a manly, not to say a Christian, spirit, as to choose to retrench some of our expenses, to forego some of the entertainments of life, to cast ourselves and families on Providence; or even, if it were necessary, to subsist in an honest and creditable poverty by the daily labour of our own hands; much rather than meanly to crouch to such haughty sinners, and sacrifice duty, honour, and conscience, to the arrogance of their petulant temper. Let us fear God as we ought, and we shall find nothing to fear from them; but should be willing to imitate the fidelity and courage of the Baptist, though the wrath of a king might be provoked by it, and imprisonment or martyrdom might be its reward.

I hope such considerations as these may effectually obviate the excuses which indolence or cowardice may be ready to form, from our neglect of men's souls: especially when we go on,

II. To consider the great evil of that neglect, as it appears in the sight of God, notwithstanding all these excuses, or any of the like kind, with which we may endeavour to palliate it.

But who can fully represent it, as it appears to his capacious and all-penetrating view? What human mind can conceive the infinite evil? It is not, Sirs, a subject on which to display the wantonness of wit, or the colourings of artificial harangue: a terrible kind of solemnity attends it, and I attempt the display of it with fear and trembling. If it seems a light matter to us to forbear to deliver those that in this sense are drawn unto death, and them that are thus ready to perish, consider, my brethren, and oh, may my own conscience always consider,—what the death of the soul is;—how many wretched souls are continually dying around us;—what gracious provision God has made to prevent it;—and what peculiar obligations we are under to labour to the utmost for the preservation of their lives.

1. Let us think, "what the death of the soul is."

The apostle James intimates, that it is a thought of great importance, when he says, He that shall turn a sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death: as if he had said, Do but reflect what that is, and you will find your success is its own reward. We well know, that to save a soul from death, is not merely to prevent the extinction of its being, though even that were much; but to prevent its positive, its lasting, its eternal misery. It is to prevent its being slain by the pointed and flaming sword of the divine justice.

It is a tragical spectacle to behold a criminal dying by human laws, even where the methods of execution are gentle; as, through the lenity of ours, they generally are amongst us: and I doubt not, but it would grieve us to the heart, to see any who had been under our ministerial care in that deplorable circumstance. But oh, how much more deeply must it pierce our very souls, to see them led forth to that last dreadful execution, with those of whom Christ shall say, As for these mine enemies, who would not that I should reign over them, bring them forth, and slay them before me! Oh how will it wound us, to hear the beginning of those cries and wailings, which must never end! How shall we endure the reflection, "These wretches are perishing for ever, in part because I would not take any pains to attempt their salvation!" And is this so strange a supposition, that some once under our ministry may then perish in our sight! Would to God, that it were less probable! But, on the contrary, let us,

2. Consider, "how many souls, precious and immortal as they are, seem to be continually dying around us."

Are there but few that miscarry! Let Peter inform us, when he says, That the righteous scarcely are saved. Yea, let our Lord himself inform us, when he says, Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it; whereas wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat. We grieve to see epidemical distempers prevailing around us; we are ready, as Providence calls us, to visit the sick and the dying, and could take little pleasure in our own health, if we did not endeavour to succour them, as we have opportunity. But let us look round, and see, whether that distemper, which threatens the death of souls, be not epidemical indeed. With all the allowances which that charity can make, which believeth all things, and hopeth all things, which it can with any shadow of reason hope and believe; must we not own, there are marks of eternal death on many? and that there are many more, in whom we can see nothing which looks like a token of spiritual life? So that the best we can say of them is, that possibly there may be some latent sparks of it concealed in the heart, which as yet produce no effect to the honour of their profession, or the benefit of the world. In the mean time, sinners are spreading their infidelity, and their vices, far and wide; as if, like some illustrious wretches that have been miscalled heroes, they accounted the destruction of numbers their glory. Can we behold such a contagion spreading itself even in the Christian church, which ought to be healthful as the regions of paradise, and not bitterly lament it before God? Or can we seriously lament it, and not endeavour its redress? Especially when we consider,

3. "What gracious provision God hath made to prevent their death."

Is there not indeed balm in Gilead? Is there not a physician there? even this glorious gospel of the blessed God, whose efficacy we have so often heard of, and seen? And shall they yet perish? Adored be the riches of divine grace, we know (and it is infinitely the most important part of our knowledge) that there is a rich and free pardon proclaimed, to all that will sue it out, and accept the benefit in a proper, that is, a grateful, manner; for cordial acceptance, and real gratitude, is all it demands. One would expect, the tidings should be as life to the dead: but we see how coldly they are received; how shamefully they are slighted; how generally, yea, how obstinately, they are rejected. And what is the consequence? Refusing to believe on the Son of God, they shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them, with an additional weight of vengeance, as it well may. Now is not this enough to make our very hearts bleed, to think, that immortal souls should die under the gospel; die under aggravated guilt and ruin? So that instead of being any thing the better for this delightful message of peace and grace, they should be for ever the worse for it; and have reason to wish, throughout all eternity, they had never seen the faces, nor heard the voices, of those that brought it, but had been numbered among the sinners of Tyre and Sidon, of Sodom and Gomorrah.

If we do not, on the express authority of our Lord, believe this to be the case with regard to impenitent sinners under the gospel, we are not Christians of the lowest class. But if we do believe it, and are not affected with it, so far as to endeavour their recovery, I see not how any regard to our own temporal interest, or that of others, can entitle us to the character, either of prudence, or humanity; even though we had not been distinguished by a public office in the church, but had passed through life in the station of the obscurest among our hearers. But it is impossible I should do justice to my argument, if I do not urge,

4. The consideration of "the peculiar obligations we are under, to endeavour the preservation of souls, not only in virtue of our experience as Christians, but of our office as ministers."

If we were only to consider our experiences, as we are Christians, if we have any thing more than the empty name, that consideration might certainly afford us a very tender argument, to awaken our compassion to the souls of others. We know what it is ourselves, to be upon the brink of destruction, and in that sad circumstance to obtain mercy; and shall we not extend mercy to others? We have looked to Jesus, that we might live; and shall we not point him out to them? We have tasted that the Lord is gracious; and shall we not desire to communicate the same happy relish of his grace to all about us? He has magnified the riches of his pardoning love to us; and shall we not, with David, resolve, we will endeavour to teach transgressors his ways, and labour to promote the conversion of sinners unto him? Even now is he keeping our souls; his visitation preserves our spirits, and, as it is by his grace that we are what we are, it is by having obtained help from him, that we continue unto this day: and shall his grace, daily bestowed upon us, be in vain? And shall not we have compassion on our fellow-servants, as our Lord continually hath pity on us?

But our office, as ministers, completes the obligation, when we consider the view in which the word of God represents that office, and the view in which we ourselves have received it.

As for the former of these, we are all acquainted with those representations, and it is greatly to be wished, for our own sake, and that of our people, they may be very familiar to our minds. Let us often listen with becoming attention to the blessed God as speaking to us, in those words which he once addressed to the prophet Ezekiel, that faithful approved servant of the Lord: Son of man, I have made thee a watchman to the house of Israel:

therefore hear the word at my mouth, and give them warning from me: when I say to the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his evil way to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but his blood will I require at thine hand. And with apparent reason may the sentinel be punished, for the desolation which the enemy makes, while instead of watching he sleeps.

We are elsewhere represented as men of God, as soldiers of Jesus Christ, as made overseers, or bishops, by the Holy Ghost, as under-shepherds in subordination to Christ, the great shepherd and bishop of souls: and ought not the thought, gentle as it is, to awaken us to a diligent inspection over the sheep he has committed to our care? Otherwise, we are but images of shepherds; as it is represented in those lively and awful words of God by Zechariah, which methinks might strike terror and trembling into many, who in the eye of the world may seem the happiest of their brethren: Woe to the idol shepherd, that leaveth the flock: the sword of divine vengeance, which by his negligence he has justly incurred, shall be upon his arm, and upon his right eye; upon that eye, which should have watched over the flock, and that arm, which should have been stretched out for its rescue; so that he shall be deprived of those capacities he abused, and be made miserable in proportion to that abuse; for his arm shall be clean dried up, and his right eye shall be utterly darkened.

Such we know are the pathetic views, which the Scripture gives us of our office, and of the guilt and danger attending the neglect.

I might, if my time would admit, further urge the views, with which we have ourselves received it, and engaged in it. Most of us, when we undertook the pastoral charge, solemnly recorded our vows before God; "that we would endeavour, with all diligence and zeal, to attend to the services of this holy function; that we would be instant in season, and out of season, and labour to discharge the private, as well as public, duties of the ministerial life." These vows of God are upon us; and every ordination of any of our brethren, at which we assist, adds a further and solemn obligation to them. Let us therefore take the greatest care, that we do not deal deceitfully, and unfaithfully, both with God and man. For it is most evident, that though the neglect of immortal souls is very criminal in every rational creature, it is most of all so in us, who have so deliberately, and so publicly, undertaken the charge of them.

It would indeed, in this case, not only be cruelty to them, but the basest treachery and ingratitude to our great Lord, who has lodged such a trust in our hands; a trust which evidently lies so near his heart. Having redeemed his people with his own blood, he commits them to our care; and having acquired to himself the most tender claim to our love that can be imagined, he graciously requires this evidence of it, that we should feed his sheep, yea, his lambs; so putting our office in the most amiable view, and bringing in every sentiment of grateful friendship to excite our diligence in it.

However we may regard it, I doubt not, but our blessed Redeemer considers it, as the greatest favour, and honour, he could have conferred upon us; that being returned to his throne in the heavens, he should choose us to negociate his cause and interest on earth, and should consign over to our immediate care that gospel he brought down from heaven, and those souls which he died to save; and that he should make it the delightful labour of our life, to follow him in his own profession and employment, to be, of all our fellow-creatures, his most immediate representatives, and, in humble subordination to him, saviours of men. Does not the very mention of it cause our hearts to glow with a fervent desire, and generous ambition, of answering so high a confidence? Could any one of us endure the thought of betraying it?

How could we, in that case, lift up our faces before him, when we shall, as we certainly must, see him eye to eye. Yes, my brethren, let us every hour recollect it; our Master will, ere long, come, and reckon with us: he will render to every man according to his works, as my text expresses it in exact harmony with the language of the New Testament. And which of us would not then wish to appear before him, as those that have been faithfully attached to his cause, and have distinguished themselves by a zeal for his service? Shall we then, any of us, repent of our activity in so good a work? Shall we wish, that we had given more of our time to the pursuit of secular interest, or the curiosities of literature, and less to the immediate care of souls? O my brethren, let us be wise in time. We have but one life to spend on earth; and that a very short one too: let us make our best of it; and lay it out in such kind of employments, as we do verily believe will give us most satisfaction in the closing moments of it, and when eternity is opening upon us. It is easy to form plausible excuses for a different conduct: but our own hearts and consciences would answer us, if we would seriously ask them, what that course of life in the ministerial office is, which will then afford the most comfortable review, and through the riches of divine grace, the most pleasing prospect. I should now proceed,

III. To the further application of these things, in some practical inferences from them:

But what I have already said, has been so copious, and so practical, as not to leave room to pursue such inferences at large.

You have all, I doubt not, prevented me in reflecting on the reason we have to humble ourselves deeply in the presence of the blessed God, while we remember our faults this day. I do not, indeed, at all question, but that many of us have set before our people life and death: and have, in our public addresses, urged their return to God, by the various considerations of terror, and of love, which the thunders of mount Sinai, and the grace of mount Zion, have taught us. We have, on great occasions, visited them, and entered into some serious discourse with them; and have often, and I would hope, more or less daily, borne them on our hearts before God, in our seasons of devout retirement. Blessed be God, that in these instances we have, in any degree, approved ourselves faithful! It must give us pleasure in the review. But O, why have not our prayers been more frequently presented, and more importunately enforced? Why have we not been more serious, and more pressing, in our private addresses to them, and more attentive in our contrivances, if I may so express it, to catch them in the net of the gospel? Let us ask our own consciences, this day, as in the presence of God, if there be not reason to apprehend, that some, who were once our hearers, and it may be our dear friends too, have perished through our neglect; and are gone to eternal destruction, for want of our more prudent, more affectionate, and more zealous care for their deliverance? In these instances, my brethren, though it is dreadful to say it, and to think it, yet it is most certain, that we have been, in part, accessary to their ruin; and have reason to say, with trembling hearts, and with weeping eyes, Deliver us from blood-guiltiness, from the blood of these unhappy souls, O God, thou God of our salvation! And we have need, with all possible earnestness, to renew our application to the blood and righteousness of a Redeemer; not daring to mention any services of our own, as matter of confidence in his presence; how highly soever others may have esteemed them, who candidly look on the little we do, and perhaps make more charitable excuses for our neglect, than we ourselves can dare to urge before God. Let the remembrance of these things be for a lamentation: and while they are so,

Let us seriously consider, what methods are to be taken to prevent such things for the time to come.

They that have perished, have perished for ever, and are far beyond the reach of our labours and our prayers. But multitudes to this day surround us, who stand exposed to the same danger, and on the very brink of the same ruin. And besides these dying sinners, who are the most compassionable objects which the eye of man, or of God, beholds on this earth of ours, how many languishing Christians demand our assistance! Or, if they do not expressly demand it, appear so much the more to need it! Let us look round, my brethren: I will not say, upon the nation in general, but on the churches under our immediate care, and say, whether the face of them is such, as becomes the societies of those, whom the Son of God has redeemed with his own blood, and of those, that call themselves the disciples, and members, of a once crucified, and now glorified, Jesus! Is their whole temper and conduct formed upon the model of his gospel? Are they such, as we would desire to present them before the presence of his glory? What is wanting cannot be numbered; and, perhaps, we may be ready, too rashly, to conclude, that what is crooked cannot be made straight. Nevertheless, let us remember, it is our duty to attempt it, as prudently, as immediately, and as resolutely as we can. Many admirable advices for that purpose our fathers and brethren have given us; particularly Dr. Watts, in the first part of his Humble Attempt for the Revival of Religion, and Mr. Some, in his Sermon on the same subject: excellent treatises, which reduced into practice would soon produce the noblest effects.

That those important instructions may be revived, and accommodated to present circumstances, with such additions as those circumstances require, we are, this day, having united our prayers, to unite our counsels. I will not anticipate what I have to offer to your consideration in the more private conference, on which we are quickly to enter. To form proper measures will be comparatively easy; to carry them strenuously into execution will be the great exercise of our wisdom and piety: may proportionable grace be given to animate us, and to dispose them that are committed to our care, to fall in with us in all our attempts, for the honour of God, and for their edification and comfort!

We shall esteem it, my friends, a very happy omen, if your hearts be with ours on this occasion; and if you help forward so good and so necessary a design, by your prayers to God for us. If you are sincere and affectionate in them, we may humbly hope, that he, of whom we ask wisdom, will graciously impart it to us; and may assure ourselves, that you will not only bear with us in the plainest addresses to you, which fidelity may oblige us to make; but will add all the weight of your countenance and interest, to support us in our applications to others, whether public or private. And I have a cheerful confidence, that all will not be in vain; but that he, who thus powerfully awakens our minds, will so succeed our labours, that many, whom we find under a sentence of condemnation, and ready to perish by it, will receive the forgiveness of their sins, will be recovered to a spiritual and divine life, and, as the happy consequence of all, will at length be fixed with us, and with you, in the regions of everlasting security and glory. Amen.

OCCASIONAL SERMONS.

SERMON XIV.

ON ACCOUNT OF THE FIRE AT WELLINGBOROUGH *

DEDICATION.

To those Inhabitants of Wellingborough, at whose request this Sermon is published.

My dear friends,

The composition of laboured and polished discourses on occasions of solemn humiliation before God, seems to me to have an absurdity yet greater than an exact elegance of dress at the funeral of a friend. When therefore I appeared among you, on your late fast day, I was solicitous about little other preparation, than what arose from a view of human nature, a deep feeling of the several circumstances of your affliction, and a serious concern to deliver what might be approved of God, as suited to the great purpose of your assembling, and subservient to your edification by the awful providence which occasioned it.

With these sentiments I spoke to you out of the fulness of my heart, and the countenances of many of you testified, that you heard me in the fulness of yours. When you surprised me with your unexpected request, that the Sermon might be printed, (which some of my reverend brethren that heard it had before intimated as their desire,) I knew not how to deny it you, though I had excused myself to them lest I should seem wanting in a due concern to keep alive upon your minds any good impressions which might have been made by it: and on further consideration I was the more willing to comply, as such melancholy accidents (though blessed be God, not in an equal degree) frequently happen, especially in populous cities, and I do not recollect many single sermons which so directly lead to the religious improvement of them. I therefore set myself, as well as I could, to recollect what I had said, and have endeavoured to preserve the same freedom in writing which I used in speaking. I have laboured, as much as possible, to write from the life. The ruins of your town, the distress of your families, and the mixture of hope and fear attending the present situation of your affairs, have been as it were before my eyes and on my heart in almost every sentence: and I have frequently intermingled those meditations with earnest prayers to God, that he so would lead me in to the secret recesses of your souls, that what you before heard, and will now read, may be like a nail fastened in a sure place.

The trouble of writing this Discourse in short hand, and afterwards correcting the transcript, is so little a matter as hardly to deserve your thanks. Would my other engagements have allowed of more, I should have submitted to it with pleasure. I only beg that you, and others in your circumstances, into whose hands it may fall, will read it attentively, and that each of you will consider what conscience hath to say to the plain admonitions it contains: and if you feel your hearts warmed anew, endeavour immediately to improve those good affections, that they may produce holy resolutions, and yield the peaceable and substantial fruits of righteousness: that it may appear you have not suffered so many things in vain.

These are my most hearty prayers for you. I hope you will in return excuse the defects of a Sermon, which might have been more accurate, had it been less sincere: and will also pray, that I may be animated and cheered under the various and almost incessant labours, to which Providence calls me, by seeing the world around me growing the wiser and better by them, and may finally be accepted of Him, whom it is my highest ambition to serve and please: for whose sake I am

Your very affectionate friend,
and faithful humble servant,

Northampton, December 30, 1734. P. DODDRIDGE.

* Preached at Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, November 8, 1738.

Amos iv. 11.

I have overthrown some of you, as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah, and ye were as a firebrand plucked out of the burning: yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord.

We are assembled this day (I hope many of us with sensible and penitent hearts) to lament the burning which the Lord hath kindled. You have wisely set apart this portion of time as a season of solemn fasting and prayer, that you may humble yourselves under God's mighty hand, as those that hope he will exalt you in due time. But what is that humiliation which he requires, and will accept? Is it merely for a few hours to bow down your heads like a bulrush? Is it merely to give us your bodily presence in this place of worship, and hear the words that are spoken in God's name to you, or in yours to him? Nay, I will add, is it merely to feel some transient emotions of the mind, in the reflection of a providence which has left behind it such deep memorials, as nature itself may teach those to retain, whom grace doth not teach to improve them? Sirs, if your assembling this day be indeed a rational and a religious action, you come to inquire wherefore it is that God hath called to contend by fire, as Amos expresses it: you come that the voice of the rod may be more distinctly explained, in the name of him who has appointed it; and, in one word, agreeable to the language of my text, that you may be engaged to return to the Lord that smiteth you.

I could wish you had among you such an interpreter, as might be one among a thousand, to declare to you his righteousness and his will, in such a manner as might most effectually lead you to comport with it. But since the office of addressing you on this occasion is devolved upon me, I shall endeavour to show, that you have at least consigned it to one who is tenderly concerned for you, and therefore will not, and indeed cannot, have the heart, to amuse you with a studied form of words; but will endeavour, in the plainest and most faithful manner, to advance some important instructions and useful reflections, suited to the said occasion that calls us together. And though some of those hints, like the providence that introduced them, may seem not to be joyous, but grievous, I hope they may afterwards yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness.

It is a great instance both of the wisdom and goodness of God, that he has chosen to teach us, not only by precept, but example; in which respect it may properly be said, as well as in the other, that he has set before us life and death. The hearts of men in all ages are fashioned in a great measure alike, and from observing the temper and conduct of the Israelites in particular, in those various and remarkable circumstances in which they are represented, we may learn more of the corruption of our nature, and draw more obvious lessons of religious instruction, than perhaps from the history of any other nation whatsoever. One can hardly imagine a circumstance, either of prosperity or distress, to which there is not something in their case, which has an apparent correspondence: and it is evidently so in particular, with reference to the event spoken of in the words of my text. God had been exercising them with a variety of judgments and at length, as that was one of the greatest he gives a commission to the devouring flames to break out, and spread ruin and desolation in their dreadful march. Thus far their condition and yours agree; and would to God that it might rest there, and that with respect to you, who are as brands plucked out of the burning, there might be no room to add, "yet have ye not returned unto me."

In handling the words, I shall,

First, Consider their contents; and,

Secondly, Attempt the practical improvement of them, with a proper regard to your present circumstances. Yet affecting as they are, and suitable as the tenor of the Discourse may be, I am sensible it entirely depends on the divine blessing and grace, to make it successful; to that, therefore, I humbly recommend what I am about to say, and entreat you to lift up your hearts to God, that he may give you the seeing eye, the hearing ear, and the understanding heart.

I. I shall first, as plainly and briefly as I can, consider the original meaning and contents of these words: I have overthrown some of you, as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah, and ye were as a firebrand plucked out of the burning; yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord: in which words you will naturally observe,

1. They are reminded, that it was the hand of God which had lately kindled a fire among them.

I have overthrown some of you, as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. I doubt not but these words are to be understood, in a proper and literal sense, of fire, and of fire kindled in the common methods of Divine Providence.

They are to be understood of fire properly so called. It is true, sometimes any of God's judgments are compared to fire, that being, as you too well know, a most dreadful and irresistible calamity, when it breaks out among the dwellings and possessions of men. Thus does the wrath of God, whenever it is kindled, rage and flame: thus does it bear down all before it, and turn the most pleasant objects into heaps of ruin, desolation, and horror. But here, I apprehend, it is to be taken for proper fire, because it stands distinguished from several other kinds of judgments, as [illegible] from drought, blasting, and mildew, from the palmer-worm, and the pestilence; and it is very remarkable, that it brings up the rear, as one of the most terrible of all.

I scruple not to add, that Amos speaks of fire kindled by the common method of Divine Providence. It is indeed said, he overthrew them, as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah, which, you know, was by fire and brimstone, rained down upon them in a miraculous manner; but there is no reason to take the words thus strictly, or to suppose that such a terrible tempest of fire and brimstone had actually fallen upon the cities of Israel. That had been an event of so great moment and importance, that probably the sacred history would have been full of it, and succeeding prophets would often have referred to it, as more memorable than even the calamity of Sodom, as such a visitation on God's people would certainly have been; whereas there is an entire silence elsewhere, with relation to any such judgment. And I am sure it is impossible to infer it from hence, because the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah was proverbially used for any very dreadful calamity, and might with peculiar propriety express any devastation that was made by fire, though kindled in a common manner.

As for the fires here mentioned, it is possible some of them might have been kindled, by what men in their common forms of speech call some unhappy accident; and drought, and winds, and other circumstances, might concur, to spread that conflagration, which at first arose from a little spark, or some trifling instance of negligence. Others of these fires might be kindled by a cruel enemy: for though Jonah, the father of Jeroboam the second, in whose days Amos prophesied, was in the main a prosperous and successful monarch, yet being engaged in frequent wars with his neighbours, it is not improbable that the frontiers of his country might sometimes suffer by them. And we are particularly informed of a Syrian war, which had happened some years before; for we are told, that in the days of Jehoahaz, the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of Hazael king of Syria, and Benhadad his son, all their days, and he oppressed Israel all the days of Jehoahaz. And since this Hazael carried his inhumanity so far, as to dash even their children in pieces, and to rip up their women with child, it is no wonder also, that he should set their strong holds on fire, as we are expressly assured that he did.

But whatever was the occasion of the conflagration, whether the cruelty of enemies, or negligence, or accidents, you plainly see, that God claims it to himself, as his own deed, that he had overthrown them; agreeable to the general principle which is laid down in this very prophecy, as what every man's conscience must bear testimony to, that there is no evil in the city that the Lord hath not done. And it is a most evident and important truth, discovered and attested even by natural religion, that all the efficacy of second causes is owing to the continual operation of the Supreme. He appointed fire and water to be, in their various natures, useful to mankind; and when he pleases, he can turn both into a scourge. Thus when the rains descend, and the floods beat down the fruits of the field, and overwhelm houses, with their inhabitants, it is he that breaks up the fountains of the deep, and opens the windows of heaven. And when the flames break out with impetuosity, and the fiery deluge spreads itself abroad, it is the breath of the Lord that kindles it and keeps it up; nor does one single spark rise or fall without his providential interposition and guidance. An observation to be applied to all the other events of human life, and which the sacred Scriptures every where inculcate, with a plainness and spirit suited to its importance, for the conviction of those ignorant wretched creatures, who live without God in the world.

2. The prophet further leads them to reflect on their own preservation from the flames, as an instance of divine mercy.

Ye were as a firebrand plucked out of the burning: this plainly intimates, how narrow an escape they had from the extremity of danger to which they were exposed; and so the expression is elsewhere used, Zech. iii. 2. where Jerusalem is represented by the same similitude: Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire? It implies, that they were just ready to be consumed; that the flames were beginning to take hold of them; that the smell of fire had, as it were, passed upon them, and they were scorched and blackened with it; but yet they were saved, and their lives at least given them for a prey. There may perhaps be some remote reference to the case of Lot, who when God was about to overthrow Sodom, and he loitered in it, was thus delivered; for the Lord, being merciful unto him, the men laid hold of his hand, and brought him out of Sodom.

Again, as the prophet argues from their preservation, as well as their calamity, to enforce their obligations to return to God, we may infer, that he intended to represent that preservation likewise as his work. Whatever accidental engagements, whatever prudential conduct, might have been the means of it, still it was to be acknowledged, that there was the gracious hand of God in it, which prevented their being destroyed with their habitations. And we lose more than half of the sweetness and advantage of all our deliverances, if we do not see and adore the gracious providence of God in them, and are not thereby engaged in his service. Which leads me to add,

3. It is also intimated in the text, that [illegible]n of this afflictive providence, was to bring them to thorough repentance and reformation.

Yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord; plainly implying, that this was what might, humanly speaking, have been expected, and what was by God intended in the dispensation. This gives us a most edifying and important view of the nature of true repentance; it is a return to God. All sin is an alienation of the heart from the service of God, to which we are under ten thousand natural obligations, all highly increased by the revelation God has made of himself to us. Now the very essence of true repentance consists in a return to God; in a deep acknowledgment of our guilt in going astray from him, and casting off the easy yoke of his commands; and in renewed resolutions of devoting ourselves, for the future, more entirely to his service. That external reformation, which arises from other inferior motives, is by no means worthy of the name of religion. It may indeed be human prudence; it may be compassion to others, who might suffer by our irregularities; but till God is regarded, yea, supremely regarded in it, we cannot reasonably suppose that God will regard us; which he intimates, when he complains concerning the Israelites, that they returned, but not to the Most High.

Again, the text further implies, that this overthrow by fire had, in its own nature, a tendency to promote such penitent and religious sentiments, and that it was their duty to consider it in this view. And indeed, whatever awakening judgments befall men, it is their wisdom and duty thus to regard them. The Lord crieth, and the wise man will hear his voice: Hear ye the rod, and him that hath appointed it. And thus God is represented as sending very terrible calamities on the Israelites in this very view: "In their affliction they will seek me early, saying, Come, let us return unto the Lord; for he has torn, and he will heal us; he has smitten, and he will bind us up." And it is a most important truth, that he does not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men: which abundantly justifies the goodness of God in all those penal evils with which our world abounds. Life is to be considered as a state of discipline, and our heavenly Father has recourse to the rod, that it may give wisdom to those, who are too giddy, or too stubborn, to learn it by gentler methods. Thus did God call to the Israelites; thus is he calling to you, and may his grace prevent the necessity of joining with the prophet, when,

4. He complains that they had not fallen in with the design of those awful providences, but still continued an unreformed and impenitent people.

Yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord, notwithstanding this judgment, and all the others with which it was introduced. And this charge is advanced no less than five times within six verses. "Though I have given you cleanness of teeth in all your cities, and want of bread in all your places; though I have withheld the rain from you, though I have smitten you with blasting and mildew; yea, though I have sent among you the pestilence, after the manner of Egypt; your young men have been slain with the sword, and the stench of their camps hath come up into your nostrils; and though, to complete all, I have overthrown some of you, as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah, and ye were as a firebrand plucked out of the burning; yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord." Thus the awful Majesty of heaven complains, that they had been chastised, and delivered, in vain. And, indeed, when we come to examine into their history, we find the complaint but too just. Could it be said they returned to God, when they sold the righteous for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes; when they trod down the head of the poor in the dust of the earth; when they added whoredom and incest to all their other iniquities; and with mingled rapine and impiety lay down before their idolatrous altars, on clothes which (expressly against the law) they had taken for pledges, and drank in the house of their false gods the wine of those whom they had unjustly condemned. Yet this is the account that God himself gives of the state of things among them, in the preceding chapter; even he who had been witness to their sins, and had sworn by himself, that he would not forget any of their works. So evidently does it appear, that the human heart may harden itself against the most dreadful dispensations of Divine Providence, and, like that of king Ahaz, even in its distresses may trespass yet more against the Lord; unless the secret influence of his grace be joined with the stroke of his rod, and while he is chastening them thereby, he teaches them out of his law. There is a reprobate kind of silver, which will not be purged even by fire: when the bellows are burned, and the lead consumed, the founder will yet have laboured in vain.

Thus I have laid before you those particulars in the text that appear to me most remarkable and instructive. And though I doubt not but you have anticipated me in your own reflections, yet I hope you will now permit me,

II. To attempt the more particular application of these things to you, of whom it may with such evident propriety be said, God has overthrown some of you, and ye were as a firebrand plucked out of the burning.

And here let me solemnly entreat and charge you,—that you acknowledge the righteous hand of God in what has befallen you,—that you reflect on the mixture of mercy, that has attended this awful providence,—that you make it your earnest prayer, that the dross of sin may be purged away by it,— and that you long retain upon your hearts a permanent sense of these important lessons, which you have seen in so strong and so affecting a light.

1. Let me entreat you to acknowledge the righteous hand of God in this calamity which has befallen you.

Let me address you in those words of the Psalmist, Be still, and know that he is God. Be affected with the sense of his interposition, and confess the righteousness of it. Assure yourselves, Sirs, that it is not only a general truth, that, as we before observed, all second causes (and fires among the rest) operate only by the divine concurrence and efficacy, but that it is applicable to the present occasion. It was the hand of the Lord that kindled your fire, and his breath that fanned it into such a terrible blaze. The wind, you say, drove it upon some of the most considerable parts of your town; but under whose command is the wind? and why did it not blow towards an opposite quarter, so as to bear it the contrary way, where it would soon have died for want of fuel? Or why did it not sleep in an entire calm, which might have given you an opportunity of extinguishing the burning with little trouble and damage?

It was his hand; and let it also be remembered, it was a very righteous hand. Know, that God is just in all that he has brought upon you, nay, in all this he has punished you less than your iniquities deserved. I mean not to insinuate by this, that you of this town are greater sinners than those that are round about you; or that any inference is to be drawn, as to the character of particular persons, or families, from their share of this calamity, whether more or less. I would not by any such partial and uncharitable censure, add grief to your sorrow. Nor would it be reasonable to do it; for in such providences as these, all things come alike to all, and there is one event to the righteous and the wicked. But this I confidently say, that all the sufferers that hear me this day, how clear soever they may have been from scandalous crimes, nay, however worthy in their character, or however useful in their station, have reason to acknowledge, that there are with them, even with them, sins against the Lord their God, sufficient to justify this, and more than this: yea, such will be most ready to say, It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed: justly might he have delivered us over to indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, to the rage of everlasting burnings, and the darkness of perpetual despair: we lay our hands on our mouths, and our mouths in the dust, and cry out guilty before thee. And while you are thus owning God's justice, let me exhort you,

2. To attend to the mixture of mercy, which has appeared in this memorable providence.

Let me call you this day to see it, and own it, and to mingle songs of praise with your tears. Think not, I beseech you, your case worse than it really is; but acknowledge the goodness of God in every mitigating circumstance that attends it. Most certain it is, most evident to every one that is but a stranger among you, to every wayfaring man that passes by your dwellings, that in the midst of judgment God has remembered mercy. Why else is not your whole town consumed? why are some of your houses standing, in which to receive your suffering brethren, and stores remaining, out of which to relieve them? Let me address myself to those of you in particular, who were in the neighbourhood of desolation? to you who were in a literal sense like a brand plucked out of the burning, freed from the flames, that were raging near you, perhaps I may add, that were devouring all around you; to you, whose houses stand in the midst of the ruins, as monuments of God's peculiar and distinguishing goodness: now does he demand your sacrifice of praise; and see to it that you retain an abiding sense of the mercy, and of that consequent claim which he has to distinguished services from you.

But let me address myself to those, who, though perhaps their houses were reached, had opportunities (as I know very many of you had) of saving some considerable part of your goods; or to those who had estates and substance elsewhere, out of the reach of those flames, perhaps sufficient for the comfortable and honourable support of your families; perhaps, after all this diminution, far more than you were possessed of some years ago. Permit me, Sirs, to tell you, that it would be very criminal ingratitude, to think so much of what you have lost, as to forget your remaining mercies: permit me to say, that you have reason, as it were, to weep over those floods of tears, which you have so profusely shed: to faint thus in the day of adversity, argues your spiritual strength to be small; and perhaps may discover such an attachment to the enjoyments of this present life, as may awaken a serious mind to more afflictive doubts, lest your portion is here, or your gods are taken away.

But what shall I say to those of you, who have lost your all; your houses, your goods, your furniture, your clothing; and are turned out naked and destitute, to seek your bread you hardly know where! I do from my heart condole with such of you; I have felt your affliction myself, and, as I have had an opportunity, recommended it to the consideration of others; but you must give me leave to remind you, that even in your case there is a mixture of mercy. Why else are you living among us this day? Is it not something, that your lives have been given you as a prey? Is it not to be acknowledged as a gracious circumstance in providence, that the fire did not break out in the night, and surround you while you were sleeping in your beds, so as to cut off, perhaps, the possibility of your own escape; or at least to oblige you, in your first surprise, to fly for your own lives, incapable of assisting those that were dearest to you? What if when you had a little recovered yourselves from your consternation, and come to examine the ruins, you had found among them the bones of a beloved child, or of a friend, who had been to you as your own soul? There had been a wound indeed, the scar and the pain of which you must probably have carried to your graves. But your present losses are much less deplorable: for, not to say how much the spirit of a man may sustain these afflictions; not to plead, what good sense, and much more religion, may do, towards reconciling men to some of the inconveniences of poverty; it is to be remembered, that God may change the scene: hope at least is remaining, and that not an improbable hope. God has supported you thus far, and already carried you through the most helpless and destitute days of life, that you ever saw, or probably will see. Your brethren, your neighbours, your friends, and benefactors, whether nearer or more remote, have pitied you: and pity alone, much more with those substantial expressions of it, is some balm to our sorrows. Let me call you this day thankfully to acknowledge the wisdom and goodness of the great Author of our beings, who has thus made man the guardian of man; who has implanted this tender feeling in the human mind; so that on the sight of any remarkable distresses of our fellow-creatures, we are moved by a most powerful, but amiable, kind of instinct, to open our hands, yea, to draw out our souls to them. Happy provision of the God of nature and of grace, which makes the possessions of the wealthy and prosperous a perpetual bank for the support of the distressed, and opens, as it were, amidst heaps of desolation, the sweet fountains of benevolence on the one hand, and of gratitude on the other! These things call for your acknowledgment; and you are to remember, that all those supplies are ultimately derived from God, which, from his additional goodness, he chooses to send you by the hands of your fellow-creatures. And I would hope, he will go on to do you good, and will so turn your captivity, like that of Job, that your present suffering may serve to add a greater relish to succeeding and growing prosperity. At least with regard to the true Christian, there remains another more secure, as well as more important, hope; that the soul may be enriched by what impoverishes the body, and that these light afflictions, which are but for a moment, may work out a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory: which if you desire, then,

3. Make it your serious concern and earnest prayer, that the dross of sin may be purged away by this burning.

By this, said Isaiah the prophet (speaking of very terrible judgments, which God sent among the Israelites,) by this shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged, and this is all the fruit, to take away his sin. Surely then it is meet to say unto God, I have borne chastisement, I will not offend any more: that which I know not, teach thou me: if I have done iniquity, I will do no more. So may it be with you, and you will be unspeakable gainers by this loss; gainers in the true comfort and happiness of the remainder of life, and much more in the future state.

In pursuit of this blessed end, let me, my friends, this day solemnly call you to search and try your ways, and to examine what is that accursed thing, which may have occasioned this trouble and distress. I cannot do you a kinder office, than to assist you in the inquiry. Give me leave therefore to suggest a few reflections, by which I would not be understood to mean any thing personal, for indeed I cannot intend it; most of you are strangers to me, nor have I reason to suspect peculiar evil of any; but an acquaintance with human nature in general, will very naturally lead me, in the present circumstance, to turn your thoughts inward, that you may accomplish a diligent search. Wherefore has God visited you? Wherefore has he written these bitter things against you?

It may be some of you have indulged yourselves in a luxurious way of living; and therefore God has stripped you of those things which have been the instruments of it. You have, perhaps, taken a secret pleasure and pride in gay dress, or affected a magnificence of furniture, beyond your rank; and therefore God has consumed your ornaments, and turned you out almost naked and bare. Or you have, perhaps, been addicted to riot and intemperance, squandering away your substance, and destroying your health, and it may be, your reason, with the abundance of good things God had given you. Just is he then in taking them away; for it is a thousand times better, that intoxicating liquors should be employed (as they have been here) even to quench the flames, or that the choicest dainties should be burnt up, and your money perish with them, than that your reason should be impaired, your health destroyed, and your families reduced, by continued extravagance.

Perhaps there are some of you that have been accustomed to make a kind of by-word of hell and damnation, to scatter about in rage, or mere wantonness, oaths and imprecations; which in a professed Christian is blasphemous impiety, and which even an atheist must own to be at best but boisterous and unmannerly nonsense. And if so, justly has God executed upon you that denunciation against him that sweareth, justly has he caused his curse to enter and remain in the midst of your house, and consumed it, with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof.

Or possibly, in other of your houses, the fire of contention has before been kindled; contention between members of the same family, or between neighbour and neighbour; while a clashing of secular interests with some, or the diversity of religious persuasions and practices with others, have led you to forget the common ties of brotherhood and human kind, and to burn with mutual animosity and wrath. Justly has God written your sin in your punishment, and joined you as companions in suffering and distress; which must surely teach you a better temper, if you are not quite incorrigible.

But among those of a more peaceable disposition, are there none that are conscious to themselves of dishonest gain? no merchant, or trader, that has held the balances of deceit in his hand, and has allowed himself to keep (as the Scripture expresses it) a weight and a weight, a measure and a measure, to buy by the one, and to sell by the other? none, that have gone beyond and defrauded their brethren, and practised arts by which they would have thought themselves to have been greatly injured, if they had met with them from others? If such there be, that (as the prophet expresses it) have coveted an evil covetousness to their house, let them not wonder, if God has verified the words of his servant, so that the stone has cried out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber has answered it. And so will it be with those, who may attempt to found their rising houses in falsehood, and to cement them with perjury. And if any have already done it, by giving in, even upon oath, unjust accounts of their losses, let them be sure, their sin will find them out, and their unrighteous gain, the plunder of their fellow-sufferers, will be bitterness in the latter end.

But to insist no longer upon this head, it is very probable there are some, whose conscience would not allow them in such methods as these, who yet may accuse themselves of having been formerly, in their most prosperous days, backward to actions of bounty and charity; some, in whom the words of Solomon are fulfilled, They have withheld more than is meet, and it has tended only to poverty. It may be, when compassionate objects have presented themselves, or been recommended to you, your hearts, instead of being opened and warmed, have rather been contracted; and you have been ingenious in finding out excuses for not bearing your part in such expenses. And now, all that you have spared and saved by such a mean and unworthy temper is gone, and perhaps, through the righteous judgment of God, has carried away with it a great deal more: while the generous and compassionate Christian has at least had this satisfaction, that a part of his substance is laid up in the bank of heaven, and secured far beyond the reach of any unhappy accident; for nothing is indeed so truly and so surely our own, as what we have laid out on such charitable occasions. And I shall have reason to congratulate you upon your present loss, if having felt affliction yourselves, and experienced the compassionate assistance of others, you melt into more humane sentiments, and knowing the heart of sufferers, be for the future more ready to relieve them, and more abundant in every good word and work: and happy for you will it be, if the Lord purge away your dross, by the spirit of judgment, and the spirit of burning, so that you come forth from this furnace as silver seven times purified, and take the divine image in brighter and fairer characters. It has been often observed, that places which have suffered by a kind of general conflagration, rise more beautiful out of their ashes. But there will be much greater reason to congratulate you, if by this means your tempers are refined; if the vain become grave, the luxurious temperate, the profane religious, the contentious meek, the fraudulent upright, and the sordid liberal. And sure I am, that with such an alteration, you would be happier in a cottage of clay, than you could have been before in a house of marble and cedar. And that this happy end may be answered, let me exhort you, once more,

1. That you endeavour to retain upon your hearts a lively sense of those important lessons, which you might, as it were, read by the light of these flames.

There are many very instructive truths, which God has often spoken to you from his word, and by his ordinances, which yet might, with some more sensible demonstration, be learned from such a scene of providence. And I doubt not but those that are truly wise, and who have set themselves with strict attention to reflect on what has passed, have prevented me in some of these meditations. Let me for a few moments, however, recall them to your minds, and suggest them to those who have been either too indolent, or too perplexed, to form them for themselves.

I shall only mention two, which comprehend a great many more.—How vain are worldly possessions, when compared with spiritual and eternal blessings!—And how unutterably dreadful is the divine displeasure, by which fires will be kindled so much more terrible than these!

You have seen here the vanity of worldly possessions, and the superior value of spiritual and eternal blessings; and therefore labour to preserve a sense of it.

You had often before read that expostulation, Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings, and fly away as an eagle towards heaven. But perhaps you never saw those wings spreading so wide, and rising in so rapid a flight. You never saw so many families undone in an hour, the wrath of so many hundreds and thousands of pounds dissipated in the air, and borne away by the wind in blazing and smoking columns. You could not, when you came to look over the ruins, distinguish between the ashes of the most precious of your goods, and the poorest refuse of them; but they were mingled together, like the dust of the dead. So vain is wealth, and so uncertain is our confidence in riches! Thus all our goods and our houses may perish. And though our lands may seem a more lasting possession, yet, as you have seen, flames may devour the product of them, either before or after it is gathered in: and our lives themselves, yet frailer than almost any thing else, may fail us in a moment. This you have seen with your eyes; and forget it not; but charge it on your conscience, to observe the infinite difference between these transient enjoyments, and spiritual and eternal blessings. Those treasures are not liable to such accidents; as neither moth nor rust can corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal them, so neither can fire break out and consume them. It is a known story of Bias the philosopher, that, when in danger of shipwreck, he saw others concerned about their goods, which were like to be lost, even if they escaped with their lives, he said, in consciousness of superior worth, and therefore superior happiness, I carry all my treasure with me. And so can the Christian say. The most valuable treasure is that, which by divine grace is laid up in the heart, or, to speak with more strict propriety, in the soul itself; so that should devouring flames surround the house, even the tabernacle of clay, or any other overwhelming calamity demolish it, the heaven-born inhabitant would escape with all its riches, and borrow wings from the tempest itself, to bear it on to eternal blessedness.

Once more, reflect how unutterably dreadful the wrath of God is, by which fires will be kindled much fiercer than these.

Our God, says the apostle, is a consuming fire; and it is a representation which God himself has made, when describing his displeasure against sin: Who, says he, would set briers and thorns against me in battle? I would go through them, I would burn them together. You have seen a burning town, and have found it, perhaps, an object of terror beyond all your imagination. But remember, Sirs, the day is approaching, when you must see a burning world: for the day of the Lord will come, and that as a thief in the night; in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. And though, long before that time, the grave will have received you, and you will have no portion any more in all that is done under the sun, yet you yourselves must be called forth, and shall arise, to be spectators of that august solemnity: and you shall all behold the day, when the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood; when the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers thereof shall be shaken; when the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig-tree; when the streams shall be turned into pitch, and the dust into brimstone, and all the beauties of nature and art shall be sunk into rubbish and chaos. Happy men, who shall then be able to lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their complete redemption draweth nigh; and who, according to the promise of that God, who amidst all the convulsions and revolutions of nature is still the same, look for new heavens, and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

But let it be remembered, that all this pomp is to usher in that day of judgment, which shall be a day of perdition to ungodly men: for a fire shall then be kindled in God's anger, which shall burn even to the lowest hell, when it has consumed the earth with its increase, and calcined the very foundation of the mountains. And in this view, let the sinners in Zion be afraid, and let fearfulness surprise the hypocrites; for who can dwell with the devouring fire? who can lie down in everlasting burnings! Yet this, you well know, is the doom of every impenitent sinner; a doom, to be pronounced by the lips of Christ himself, in words which he has already uttered and recorded, that, by weighing their terror, we may be roused from our security, and be alarmed to escape it: Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. Nor can you imagine the sentence shall be pronounced in vain, or that all the confederate nations of the condemned shall be able to ward it off. But who can sustain the terror of its execution? What, if, while your habitations were in flames, and you were endeavouring to escape for your lives, a host of armed enemies had cut off your retreat, and forcibly driven you back to the fire? You cannot bear the thought; the horror of it strikes you to the heart, and nature shudders at it. But will it not be infinitely more terrible, when legions of angels with irresistible power urge you on, and the wrath of God like an overflowing torrent sweeps you away, into the lake that burns with fire and brimstone? Wretched creatures, that are yet obnoxious to such a destruction! Weep not, Sirs, if this be the case, for your houses and goods consumed. Weep not for your substance wasted, and your families undone. You have a far juster cause for deep lamentation. Mourn over your perishing souls. Say not, we will recover our affairs as fast as we can, by renewed application to worldly business; and much less presume arrogantly to say, in the pride and stoutness of your hearts, The bricks are fallen down, but we will build with hewn stones: the sycamores are cut down, but we will change them into cedars! Remember, that pride goes before destruction; and amidst all the most pressing cares and hurries of life, let it be still considered by you, there is one great concern, that even now demands a more attentive regard; that you may flee from the wrath to come, to Jesus, who is appointed to deliver from it. Think not of repairing your losses, and of settling your affairs here; but let me rather say to each of you, as the angel to Lot, while he lingered in Sodom, (perhaps from too great a regard for the goods he was to leave there,) Escape for thy life; look not behind thee; escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed. I must be insensible of the worth of souls, and most regardless of the great end of my office, if I were not willing to digress much further than I have now done, to give so necessary a caution. May divine grace make it effectual to awaken those, who, if their present stupidity continue a while longer, must feel those flames, which they will not see!

But I trust, my brethren, there are those of you, whom God has plucked as brands out of the burning, in the noblest and most important sense of these words, and who have sought and found your shelter from this most terrifying prospect, in the grace of the gospel covenant. Whatever your other circumstances are, be thankful for this most gracious interposition; let your losses and sorrows sit light on your hearts, while God has appointed salvation itself for walls and bulwarks. But still be sure that you maintain that active zeal and continued watchfulness, which suits your obligations to God, and your expectations from him; and seeing that you look for such things, be diligent, that you may be found of him in peace. In the mean time, encourage yourselves in the Lord your God, well knowing, that if the foundations of the earth were to shake, and the arches of heaven to burst asunder, it becomes the soul that is supported by its God, to stand the shock with intrepid courage; as being assured, that nothing can finally crush and overwhelm him, who is covered by the shield of the Almighty; and that the trial of the good man's faith, which is far more precious than that of gold which perishes, though tried in the fire, will certainly be found to honour and joy at last.

Such may the event of all your trials be! So may divine grace animate every heart that hears me! So may it visit all who have been sufferers by the loss, or shared in the alarm, though they share not with us in the devotions, of this day! May the compassionate eye of God regard you and your habitations! May his providence cement, strengthen, and adorn them; for except the Lord build the city, they labour in vain that build it! May the candle of the Lord shine on your tabernacle, and his Spirit enlighten and renew your souls! May peace and prosperity, friendship and religion, always flourish in this town and neighbourhood! And, in a word, may God so compass-round your calamity, as to give you joy for mourning, and beauty for ashes; that those who have lamented over you may rejoice with you, and that at length you may share the security and joy of the city of God, even the heavenly Jerusalem, where no flames shall be felt, but those of love, and no sound heard, but the accents of everlasting triumph and praise! Amen.

POSTSCRIPT

The following Hymn, though not originally designed for the occasion, was judged so suitable by the congregation that many of them desired to have it sung. And it might be proper to add, that Sermon, after which it was sung. I was the more willing [illegible] [illegible] publication, either of this, or of the Discourse itself.

THE HYMN

I.

Eternal God! our humbled souls
Low in thy presence bow:
With all thy magazines of wrath,
How terrible art thou!

II.

Fanned by thy breath, huge sheets of flame
Do like a deluge pour!
And all our confidence of wealth
Lies mouldered in an hour.

III.

Led on by thee, in horrid pomp,
Destruction rears its head;
And black'ned walls, and smoking heaps,
Through all our streets are spread.

IV.

Deep in our dust we lay us down,
And mourn thy righteous ire;
Yet bless that hand of guardian love
Which snatched us from the fire.

V.

O that the hateful dregs of sin,
Like dross, were perished there;
That in fair lines our purer souls
Might thy bright image bear!

VI.

So might we view with dauntless eyes
That last tremendous day,
When earth, and seas, and stars, and skies
In flames shall melt away!

SERMON XV.

COMPASSION TO THE SICK, RECOMMENDED AND URGED.*

DEDICATION.

To the Right Honourable the Earl of Halifax

My Lord,

The generous and active zeal with which you have espoused the charity this Sermon is intended to recommend, and the assiduity with which you have vouchsafed to preside in the committee appointed for ripening the general scheme, and bringing it into effect, might justly have entitled your Lordship to this application: had your various abilities been much less conspicuous, and the other parts of your character (incomparably more valuable than any abilities) been less known to the author, or less to be exceed by him. Yet I am very sensible, that the plain and hasty Discourse, which I have now the honour of presenting to your Lordship, might fear the review of an eye so accustomed to all that is eloquent, beautiful, and finished, in antiquity, did it not trust to that kind prejudice, which your attachment to its general design will naturally give you in its favour.

I am sensible, how impertinent it would be in me on this occasion, to give myself a liberty of saying all the respectful things, which from my heart I think of the Earl of Halifax, or to imagine, that his general permission of inscribing this Sermon to him would authorize the doing it. But it would be overrigorous in your Lordship to prohibit my intimating that pleasure I have shared with so many more discerning persons than myself, in observing that accurate judgment, that steady application, that impartial equity, and that engaging address, with which your Lordship, under the character of our chairman, has conducted the counsels and affairs of the committee. I know that I speak the sentiments of several of its members, and I believe I speak the sentiments of all, when I say, that in the fatigue of that close attendance which we have thought it our duty to give on this good occasion, we have often been relieved by reflecting, as it was most natural to do, on the benefit which the public must receive from such talents, when exerted in the highest assembly of our nation. There your Lordship finds a sphere of action more amply proportioned to the largeness of your heart, and suited to that high sense of liberty and benevolent concern for the general good, which is the brightest ornament of a peer, and of a Briton.

Go on, my Lord, to shine in this ornament more and more. Animated by every principle which humanity, and nobility, and (what is most humane and most noble) true Christianity, can suggest, go on to exert the distinguished capacities of usefulness with which Providence has blessed you in such services, and by exerting to increase them; and with them to increase that veneration and affection, which every worthy heart will pay you as its just tribute, and that infinitely more important and divine pleasure, which your own will find, in the consciousness of having acted well. A pleasure, indeed, worthy of the most ardent pursuit, and on which heaven sets so high a value, that it allows it not to be treated with by proxy: not will grant any thing like it, to the most illustrious birth, the most ample fortune, or the most elevated genius, unless the possessor of them all will go to the price of it by a resolute exercise of personal virtue.

I rejoice, not for myself alone, but for my country, that our civil and sacred liberty hath one such guardian among the rising nobles of our age. I hope it has many, and I pray God their number and their virtues may be increased; and that wherever they are they may be rewarded with a rich variety and a long succession of external blessings, joined with that inward satisfaction which is inseparable from such a character.

May your Lordship especially, not only have the sublime joy of beholding Great Britain distinguished among the nations by public honour and prosperity, but see every thing which can conduce to your personal and domestic happiness added in privately life! And in particular, when you condescend to turn your thoughts towards Northampton (a town under so many obligations to your Lordship's family, which I hope it will never be so ungrateful as to forget), may you soon and long have the satisfaction to see its County Hospital, which you are now so kindly cherishing in its infant weakness, grown up to full maturity, and giving more certain presages of being an extensive blessing to generations yet to come!

I sincerely congratulate your Lordship and the other illustrious nobles and worthy gentlemen who are exerting themselves in this good work on a capacity of doing greatly for its service, while my narrow sphere will allow me little more than to wish it well. Yet it is a comfort to me to think, that this Dis-

* Preached at Northampton, September 4, 1745, at a Sermon appointed to recommend a County Infirmary there for the relief of the poor sick sent thither.

course, in which (imperfect as it is) I flatter myself there will be found traces of an honest and a tender heart not easily to be counterfeited, will be some memorial of the affection with which I have endeavoured to serve it, and at the same time of the undefigned and profound respect with which I am,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most faithful,

most obedient, and most obliged humble servant,

Northampton, October 8, 1743 P. DODDRIDGE

PREFACE.

THE great desire which I have to promote that noble and amiable charity which is now set on foot among us, has engaged me to comply with the request of some of my friends in publishing this Sermon, which was delivered on too little notice to allow of much preparation. But indeed very little recommendation is necessary, where the arguments in its favour are so obvious, and little art can be required to plead a cause, which, as soon as it is admitted to a short hearing, speaks so loudly and so eloquently for itself.

The only plausible objections, which I remember to have heard against it, are these two. That the distant parts of the county can expect little benefit by it; and that any private house, which can be taken for the purposes of a County Hospital, can bear but little proportion to all the necessities of so large a county will require. But I hope, neither of these objections will be found unanswerable; and that every objector will do his part towards removing them. I am sure they cannot be pressed so.

I apprehend myself to have no right to speak here of the particular precautions which the committee has taken with regard to the first of these; but shall refer the reader to the state of the intended Hospital, when they shall be published, as they quickly will. But it may and ought to be taken for granted, till the contrary appear, (which I persuade myself it never will,) that the rules for the admission of patients will be so constituted among us, as shall effectually secure from any just complaint. Distant parts will have some preference given them, to those that are near home. And as none but extraordinary cases are like to offer from a distance, if due precautions be taken in writing and answering letters for the representation of cases, and in bringing patients, I cannot see any probability of frequent disappointments. If the contrary be suspected, let gentlemen and others, who are willing to set for the common good of the charity, if it be duly ordered, favour us with their presence at our next general meeting of subscribers, and there let them examine what the committee will then offer on this head, as well as on others; and if they are not satisfied with what is already adjusted, let their proposals and reasonable methods of making them easy on this head: they will no doubt be heard with all due regard, and the assistance of their counsels be thankfully acknowledged by all who have the interest of the Hospital at heart.

As for the second objection, the force of it cannot be thoroughly judged of till the house intended for the reception of patients be known, and the proposed alterations in it are executed. If after that it be still insisted upon, that we should build, then let those who are of that opinion, subscribe their respective benefactions for that purpose; and there can be no doubt but the work will be cordially undertaken, as soon as there appears any fund so considerable as to render it safe. But in the mean time it would surely be most unreasonable to clamour against any private house committee, who essay to establish, (or not attempting it, while they have no stock but a great inexperience, in any tolerable degree proportionable to it. This county, so well cultivated and improved, and celebrated for two seats of so many of the nobility and gentry, is capable of many great things if it pleases and most (like Devonshire,) without feeling any severe burthen, compared with the expectations of those to whom for this purpose in a few months; and it is unexpected pleasure to promote it. I know not what should forbid us to hope and expect it. Good examples are already given: great patrons are engaged[1]; and measures are entered into for soliciting the country in the most prudent and engaging methods that could be contrived. The effect will soon be seen; and then we still hope the managers will be able to judge what they can at first safely attempt, and will, I dare say, gladly assist to set a much greater scheme practicable, than they have allowed themselves particularly to project.

It is with great pleasure that I see persons, who have been listed in different opposite parties and who bear different denominations, cordially uniting to advance this gracious scheme, and emulating to make each other as easy as possible in the execution of it. There is very little in the following Sermon which is not matter of common concern, as we are Christians, and as we are men; and I am not aware of one word, which can reasonably give offence to any: and therefore I hope the cause of the poor will be no prevailing prejudice against its acceptance and usefulness. I cannot indeed but attempt this kind

[1] This refers to the honour which we have to say the Duke of Montagu and the Lord of Northampton have done to the cause, by offering a very handsome benefaction to the Hospital, and by their generous example and influence in the neighbourhood. The Duke of Bedford has given not a guinea, as we only name such persons and benefactions as we have received; but he has been a most active member of the committee for drawing up the constitution of the Hospital, and has favoured them with his presence at their meetings, and his assistance in effecting several considerable points, which otherwise would have been attended with great difficulty. The Lord of Northampton has also been a most active member of the committee, and has favoured them with his presence at their meetings, and his assistance in effecting several considerable points, which otherwise would have been attended with great difficulty. It is impossible to imagine how they could have done more. The committee has also received considerable benefactions from several gentlemen, who have signalized themselves on this occasion. The whole county, and indeed the whole nation, is under great obligations to the Duke of Bedford for his having represented there so here, will, no doubt, have the same good effect in other parts of the kingdom. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] out of character in present circumstances. I have peculiar obligations to love a county, where I have spent so many agreeable years, and in the various parts of which I have the pleasure of enjoying a personal friendship with so many deserving people. But had I been only an occasional resident in it for a few months or weeks, I could not have refused what little I might have had an opportunity of doing, in subserviency to a design so friendly to human nature as this. Homo sum, humani nihil a me alienum puto.

P. D.

Psalm xli. 1, 3.

Blessed is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble. The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing: thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness.

It is matter of certain observation, and of delightful reflection, that, under the administration of a wise and gracious Providence, even the distresses of human nature are so overruled, as to occasion some of its most exquisite pleasures. Our own have this effect, when generously encountered in a good cause; or when, from whatever source they arise, we bear them with a calm resignation to the great Governor of all, animated by a humble confidence in his goodness. And the calamities of others, deeply as they wound every compassionate heart, are the accidental cause of a proportionable satisfaction attending every humane attempt for their relief. This is what I am persuaded many of you, to whom I now speak, have often experienced already; and I hope, that experience will now be largely and happily renewed. I am confident it will, if what I am about to lay before you in favour of the scheme, which is now opening upon us, for a COUNTY INFIRMARY to be erected here, be regarded in such a manner, as I have great reason to hope it will; considering how noble a charity it suggests, and how ready I have ever found you to comply with every call of providence to contribute liberally for the assistance of the necessitous.

That important branch of Christian charity, which consists in giving alms to the poor and indigent, has been the subject of so many of my discourses, that almost every topic, and every argument, which I could think of to enforce it, has been warmly and frequently urged upon you; and the fairest examples of such a disposition have been particularly illustrated, that, charmed with the beauty of them, you might go and do likewise. Especially have you been often pressed by that noblest and tenderest of all arguments, which arises from the infinite compassion and benevolence of the blessed Jesus, and the distinguished genius of his religion; as having charity for its declared end, and rising above all other religions, as much in the excellence of its tendency, as it doth in the dignity of its Author. And therefore, without so much as recapitulating what I have said on such occasions, I shall make it the whole of my present work, to suggest such things, as may have a peculiar suitableness to that particular kind of charity which we have now in view: and I think myself exceedingly happy in this opportunity of offering you a set of thoughts, which would never before have been equally seasonable here. Many of them will naturally arise from the words which I at first read, as the foundation of my discourse: Blessed is he that considereth the poor, &c.—

It would perhaps be too bold a criticism, to pretend to determine the particular distemper, under which David had been labouring, just before he composed this admirable psalm. But I think it is in general abundantly evident, that it was occasioned by a violent and dangerous fit of sickness; in which he met with most inhuman treatment from some base and wicked men, who had pretended great affection to him. "Mine enemies," says he, "speak evil of me, saying, When shall he die, and his name perish? They think the distemper, terrible as it is, does its work too slowly, and would gladly, if they durst, aid its victory by murder. And as for him who is the chief of them," (by whom some suppose he meant Absalom, whose unnatural rebellion might be ripened by the concurrence of this circumstance,) "if he come to see me, as he frequently does under specious pretences of duty and affection; yet in all his most respectful condolences, he speaks vanity and falsehood, and his heart is in the mean time gathering iniquity; is making one malignant remark or another, which, when he goeth away out of my apartment, he proclaims abroad, to increase the disaffection he is endeavouring to sow among my subjects: and their mischievous counsels are quickened and imboldened hereby, while they say, an evil disease cleaveth fast unto him, as a peculiar judgment of heaven upon him; and now that he lieth disabled in his bed, he shall arise no more. Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted to have given me the surest assistance in my pressing affairs, while I am thus rendered incapable of attending to them myself, even he who did so long eat of my bread, and had a place at my table, has, like an ungrateful brute that strikes at his feeder, lifted up his broad heel against me," as the original imports,* "and endeavoured to do me all the mischief in his power."

This was king David's unhappy circumstance in his illness, as royal dignity can neither secure the continuance of health or the fidelity of friendship; nor fortify the heart against the sting of ingratitude, especially in such a concurrence of afflicting circumstances. On his recovery he described it in the most lively colours; and to represent how much it impressed him, he speaks of the scene, as if it were actually present: and that a proper contrast might set it off the more forcibly, he begins the psalm with an affectionate reflection on the beauty of a contrary character, and on the happiness to which the possessor of it was entitled. Blessed is he who considereth the poor. The original is yet more emphatical and extensive: O the blessedness, or the various felicities, of that man, who wisely reflects on the case and circumstances of him that is brought low.† The margin renders it, him that is weak or sick: and another translation gives it thus, Blessed is the man that provideth for the sick and needy; which is a sense undoubtedly comprehended in the words, though I cannot think them limited to it. They speak of a person reduced and brought low, whether by poverty, or oppression, or sickness, or any other calamity, affecting mind, body, or estate:‡ from whence it will clearly follow, that where several of these causes join, as the circumstance is peculiarly worthy of compassion, the virtue, and therefore the blessedness, of him who is ready to pity and relieve it, must be proportionably great.

The word which we render considereth, is sometimes used for taking an intelligent view of a thing, and sometimes for acting in a prudent and reasonable manner, suitable to such views.§ And accordingly it well expresses the character of one who examines into the circumstances of the afflicted creature of whom David speaks, and upon that takes wise and proper measures for giving him the most convenient and effectual assistance he can. And as, on the one hand, it may be intended to recommend the use of discretion in directing and managing our charities; so, on the other, it may intimate, that where men overlook those that are brought low, it is an evidence of a narrow inattentive mind, that takes up with short and superficial views of things; whereas if men's sentiments were juster, their affections and actions would be kinder and more beneficent. They would find that nature, and duty, and interest too, if rightly considered, and justly estimated, would all dictate the same thing on such occasions.

This will especially appear, when it is considered, in how gracious and condescending a manner the blessed God, the Supreme Disposer of all events, is pleased to interest himself in the cause of the indigent and distressed, and the kind notice which he takes of the man that appears as a patron of such persons. The Lord will deliver him in time of trouble, or (as it might more literally be rendered) in the day of calamity: as if it had been said, "There is a revolution in human affairs, as well as in the returning seasons of day and night, of summer and winter. Calamity will have its day, and the time will come, when they, who are now the most prosperous, will find themselves surrounded with dark and gloomy scenes. And then may the generous and charitable man hope to receive the compassion he hath extended; or, (as we elsewhere read,) with the merciful thou, Lord, wilt show thyself merciful." And indeed one cannot without astonishment, as well as delight, reflect on what is so suitably and so tenderly added in the third verse, to express the divine care of such a person. The Lord, (Jehovah himself, in whom is everlasting strength, and who bears up the pillars of heaven,) will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing, or, as it might be rendered, will support him, or hold him up there.¶ Thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness: some would literally render it, thou wilt change his bed, and explain it of turning a bed of pain and distress into a couch of pleasure and delight; supposing it alludes to their custom of lying on couches in their banquets. But I think the image which our translation suggests equally suits the original, and is, on account of its tenderness, greatly to be preferred. The good man is now supposed in his turn to be brought low by illness, so exceeding low, that he is not able so much as to sit up in his bed: and God does not disdain to represent himself under the image of an affectionate

* They who can consult the original, and will give themselves the trouble of tracing the etymology from עקב, and examining the many places in which this word is used, will soon see the force of these remark. It most frequently signifies poor, and as being is often opposed to rich, as 1 Sam xxx. 15. Ruth iii. 10. Job xxxvi. 15. Prov x. 15, xix. 4, xxviii. 11. It is sometimes rendered brought low, in our version, as Psalm lxxix. 8, cxvi. 6, and cxlii. 6, in which last place the connexion shows it relates to sickness. It is sometimes applied to streams emptied and dried up, Job xxviii. 4. Isa xix. 6, and sometimes it signifies emaciated, Isa xvi. 4, and in that sense applied to Pharaoh's lean kine, Gen xli. 19, and to Amnon when pining away for Tamar, 2 Sam xiii. 4, according to some. מוקלח derived from the same root, is rendered pining sickness, Isa xxxviii. 12. And it is elsewhere used to express a weakness in the eyes and limbs, compare Isa xxxvii. 11 where כהי עיני לראות should be rendered, mine eyes are so weakened, or dy by reading, &c. so that I am not able to look up; and Prov xxiv. 7, which verse might most naturally be transcribed, As the legs of the lame sink down, so (הלוי שקים ממשל) so doth a parable in the mouth of fools. Solomon thereby beautifully expressing how feeble the sublimest discourses on moral and religious subjects are in the mouth of a vicious man. I know many critics have produced these two last texts, as instances in which הלל signifies to be lifted up, but I believe it must of the places in which the same Hebrew word is said to signify contrary things, were accurately weighed, they would be found as little to the purpose of proving that very improbable, and, in many instances, mischievous assertion, as these two.

† שכל has plainly the former signification. Neh viii. 13. Job xxxiv. 27, 35. Psalm xiv. 2. Jer iv. 22. Dan i. 4 and the latter, 1 Sam xviii. 14, 15, 30. Psal. ci. 7. Amos v. 13.

‡ אשרי משכיל אל דל | תנמוהו יי ביום רעה ימלטהו יי

§ כי עיני לראות

¶ יסעדנו

 כל משכבו הפכת בחליו

friend, or parent, who holds him up in his arms: and himself assists in turning his bed, and making it easy to him, when, being too weak to rise, he is only able to shift the sides.

Amazed and charmed with an expression of so much condescension and endearment, I set myself, with additional pleasure, as in the presence of this compassionate God, to open my mouth, and plead the cause of the poor and the afflicted, and would attempt to cultivate in your minds, and in my own, the temper which the words recommend. That I may do it in the most suitable and useful manner, I shall,

I. Represent the reasonableness of a compassionate temper, towards those in general, who are languishing on beds of sickness.

II. Show how wise and happy a method of expressing our compassion towards such, that which is now recommended to us is like to prove. And,

III. Conclude with the mention of some circumstances in the present situation of affairs, by which the design is peculiarly recommended to us at this time.

I. Let me represent in general how reasonable it is, that we should feel compassion in our hearts towards those, who languish under the burthen of bodily disorders, and particularly are confined to beds or chambers of sickness.

And this you will not only see, but feel too, if you reflect—on the calamity of their state;—on the tender sense they naturally have of the treatment they meet with in it;—and how liable we ourselves are to the same circumstances of distress.

1. Consider the calamity of their state.

Some of you know it by familiar acquaintance, by dear-bought personal experience, and must have the wormwood and the gall in a long and a painful remembrance. Go back in your thoughts to those chambers, which you were almost ready to consider as your sepulchres, and those beds, from whence perhaps you expected to rise up no more, or which seemed as racks, if not as graves, to you; and then say, whether you were not objects of compassion yourselves, and whether others, in the like circumstances, must not necessarily be so. Others of you have, no doubt, been conversant with the sick and the pained: reflect on what you then saw and heard: and let your eye and your ear affect your heart.

There are indeed some, who seem solicitous to keep as much as possible from the sight of such mournful objects; as if they were afraid, that in such a circumstance an involuntary kind of humanity should invade their hearts, and force them on a sudden, and as it were before they are well aware of it, to do something more generous than they care to allow themselves in. But no man, who hath lived any time in the world, can be such a stranger to human nature, and to human life, as not to know something of the various distempers and accidents to which we are liable in this feeble state, and of the sad symptoms of sorrow that attend them; fatal effects of the entrance of sin into this world of ours, and awful monuments of the divine displeasure against the first instance of it!

I am not indeed learned enough to run over the tenth part of those names, which physicians have given to the various maladies under which their aid is demanded. But the fever, the dropsy, the gout, the stone, the rheumatism, the cholic, the asthma, the cancer, the palsy, consumptions, and the like, are words of dreadful import; to the general signification of which few are strangers, though perhaps none, who have not themselves laboured under them, can distinctly understand how much terror they express.

Let us however think a little closely, (for the thought may have an apparent tendency to humble and to humanize our hearts,) into how sad an object the greatest, the richest, the strongest, and the fairest of mankind is reduced in a few weeks or days, when attacked by any of these, and crushed, as it were, into an early and an untimely old age. When thou, Lord, with thy rebukes dost correct man for his iniquity, how dost thou cause his beauty and his vigour to consume away like a moth, which moulders under the lightest touch! How are all the services of life obstructed, and all its choicest pleasures blasted at once, as the opening blossoms of spring by the severity of winds and frosts! According to that most natural description of Job, when a man is chastened with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain, how does his life abhor bread, and his soul dainty meat; so that his flesh is consumed away, that it cannot be seen, and his bones, which were not seen, stick out! In some distempers, what convulsive strugglings, what terrible heavings and pantings for breath! In others, what deep sighs do we observe, what piercing groans, what doleful cries! Or in persons of a more resolute temper amidst a painful silence, what earnest speaking looks, while perhaps large drops of sweat are trickling down the face, and nature seems, as it were, to be weeping its distress at every pore! And in cases less acute than these, what months of vanity are many active souls made to possess, and what wearisome nights are appointed to them! How slowly do the hours and the moments roll away, while in the evening they say, would to God it were morning; and in the morning, would to God it were evening! but find themselves equally disappointed in their expectations of relief, from the silence of the night, or the amusements of the day; till at length perhaps nature is weakened to such a degree, that it can scarce hear the voice of the dearest friend, if a little louder than a whisper, or endure so much light as shall discover his countenance! God only knows, how many are at this moment in a condition sadder than I have described, while we are ourselves at ease in Zion, and are too little grieved for the afflictions of our brethren. Yet surely, if we have any thing of the man, and the Christian, we cannot be wholly unmoved, but must feel some tender solicitude rising in our hearts, and must be casting about in our thoughts for some proper manner of expressing it, especially when we consider,

2. The peculiar tenderness of the spirits in such circumstances as these, and that exquisite sensibility, either of regard, or neglect, which is almost inseparable from them.

Such is the vanity of human friends, that they can do much to wound, where they can do very little to heal; their negligence can greatly afflict, where their most solicitous care can administer very little comfort. And this is more especially the case in sickness. When the blood is impoverished, when the animal spirits are weakened, and when melancholy humours prevail in the body, little things impress with a very disproportionate weight. Solomon hath observed long ago, that when heaviness in the heart of a man maketh it stoop, then a good word maketh it peculiarly glad. And by a parity of reason, then any thing that looks like unkindness in a friend pierces much deeper, than at another time, when nature is in all its vigour, and the business and amusements of life divert the mind from pausing on such things, and the imagination from dressing them up in colours of its own, which, unnatural as they often are, appear to the distempered mind inherent in the objects themselves. Sick people likewise, conscious to themselves that they cannot but be less agreeable than at other times, easily conclude, that they grow insupportably burthensome to those about them; and if great care be not taken to prevent it, they will be very ready to infer, that their friends are wearied out with them; and perhaps will secretly suspect, they wish them out of the way, that they may be eased of their burthen: while they imagine, like Job, that were their friends in such an afflicted state as themselves, they should study all opportunities of softening their sorrows, by every circumstance of the most tender address; and then they bemoan themselves, and think, surely it is enough to bear all this illness and pain, without having the unkindness of such and such a friend added to it; and so perhaps the saddest complaints of Job, David, and Heman, are thought over as applicable to their sorrowful condition.

This is indeed very often their infirmity; but we should bear it, and pity it, and study, as well as we can, to accommodate ourselves to it: for it undoubtedly makes their case much more afflicted, and therefore more compassionable. And it will especially appear so, if we reflect,

3. How liable we ourselves are, to share in these sorrows and these infirmities.

This thought is beautifully touched upon by the apostle, when he says, Remember those that suffer affliction, as being yourselves also in the body: as if he should have said, "in necessary consequence of being in the body, you yourselves are obnoxious to the like affliction; and therefore should readily impart to your afflicted brethren such assistances, as you in a change of circumstances would reasonably desire."

And is it not most evidently the case here? What are we, Sirs, better than our fathers? better than our brethren? better than those, who have drooped, and sunk, and died, under such burthens as those I have described? Is our strength the strength of stones, or is our flesh brass, that we should plead an exemption from sorrows and complaints common to our species? In all probability, they await us; and would await us, if we were nobles and princes of the earth: and God only knows, how soon we are to begin our encounter with them, or how soon they may complete their victory over us, and bring us beyond the reach of being helpful to men, or receiving help from them.

And, which is peculiarly interesting, these are probably some of our last scenes. When we have done with our merchandise, our husbandry, or our studies; when we have finished our journeys, our visits, our sports, and our feasts; we must, unless death surprise us with a very sudden blow, retire into our chambers of illness to come out no more, but languish away the remainder of our days there, till the moment of our exit from life shall come. There shall we need the compassion we are now exhorted to extend; shall need all the relief, which a generous heart may then feel, in a consciousness of having been, in its better days, an helper to the afflicted; and above all, shall need that divine consolation, which God is ready to impart to that blessed man, who has considered him that is brought low, so graciously expressed in the text, by holding him up on his bed of languishing, and by making all his bed in his sickness.

And therefore, in the conclusion of this head, let me entreat you to suffer the word of exhortation, and to bear away in your hearts a firm resolution of doing all you can to be helpful to the sick, whatever their other circumstances in life be, as Providence may give you an opportunity and call. Consider those that are brought low; reflect seriously and tenderly on their condition; for they sometimes suffer a great deal from the mere inattention of those about them, who yet could not bear on any terms deliberately to do what they apprehended cruel or unkind. Let us, as afflicted Job expresses it, (as afflicted persons know best how to speak of afflictions,) put our souls into their souls' stead. Let us inwardly commiserate their melancholy case; and let our behaviour express that commiseration in the most natural and genuine manner. Let us be ready, where it may be useful to them, to visit them; for visiting the sick is, you know, mentioned among those acts of charity, which Christ assures us he will commemorate with peculiar honour, even upon the throne of his glory. Let us patiently bear those instances of fretfulness and peevishness, into which under such a pressure they may be ready to fall; imputing them to their distemper, and not to themselves. Let us avoid every thing rough and boisterous in our behaviour, near the apartments in which they are; and let nothing be done which might give the poor patient reason to sigh on his bed, and say, "Alas, they do not regard me! they little think what it is to be ill!" Show in all your conduct a concern for their comfort and happiness; show it, above all, by endeavouring by wise and pious discourses to lead them into the best improvement of their afflictions, and to form their minds to such sentiments and characters, that through divine grace they may be entitled to the noblest supports; those which arise from a sense of the divine favour, from pardoned guilt, and from a comfortable prospect in the invisible and eternal world; that so they may not struggle at once with the agonies of a distempered body, and a wounded spirit; but rather, as the outward man declines, may find the inward daily renewed. And to show how sincerely you are concerned for their spiritual, neglect not their temporal, interest. If they are poor, extend your alms to them, and endeavour to procure for them such medicines, food, attendance, and other accommodations, as may promote their recovery, or at least alleviate their sufferings. It is what, I question not, many of you are often doing, and you now have an opportunity of doing it with some peculiar advantages; as you will evidently perceive by what I have to offer under my second general, the business of which is,

II. To show how wise and happy a way of expressing our compassion to the sick and infirm, that which is now proposed to us is like to prove.

You apprehend, that I mean our concurrence in this scheme for establishing a County Hospital in this town, for the relief of the poor, who are sick or wounded; into which, in extreme cases, they may be freely received, and in which they may be properly assisted, without expense to themselves, or the families to which they belong.

The very mention of this design might seem sufficient to recommend it to every intelligent and generous person; and I am sure, none who have perused the printed paper in favour of it, which has been generously published and spread over the whole county, can be uninformed on this subject: nevertheless, as it may be new to some, and others may have reflected but slightly upon it, I shall say something briefly on the head, and I hope a few words may suffice; since the scheme wears so beautiful an aspect, if only viewed in its first appearances; as well as appears so fruitful of good, when attentively examined in its remoter consequences.

1. You will easily see, that the scheme wears a very beautiful aspect, if viewed only in its first appearances.

It promises, in its most obvious and direct design, relief to the poor in their sickness; and their case is attended with many circumstances to recommend it to our compassion, which have not yet been touched upon in the preceding branch of my discourse. What I have said before might be sufficient to prove, and one day's experience of our own might in a yet more convincing manner demonstrate, that sickness is of itself a burthen heavy enough, though we languish upon beds of down, and have all the relief we can derive from the skill of physicians, the attendance of servants and friends, with every other additional accommodation which the most plentiful fortune can furnish out. What then must it be to bear all this, and perhaps more than this, in the want of all things! What must it be for a person, who perhaps found it hard enough to live when he was in all the vigour of nature, and his own hands ministered to his necessities, to find himself under his languor, perhaps under his agony, destitute of medicines, destitute of attendance, and it may be, destitute of convenient food, with hardly any thing but inclination, in these cases no certain guide, to direct him what is so. Or if, pressed with a sense of urgent necessity, after long delay, he calls in such assistance, and procures it, perhaps it is at such an expense, that his spirits are broken with the thoughts of the debt he is contracting, which either prevents, or retards, or imbitters his recovery; and when it is perfected, almost tempts him to wish he had quitted the world, rather than survived under such an insupportable pressure.

But so far as the scheme now opening upon us succeeds, this additional load of misery will be taken off. The patient will be encouraged to seek for timely assistance before his illness becomes inveterate, the neglect of which is, no doubt, yearly the destruction of thousands: and when his case is so bad, as to require his being taken into the infirmary, he will be kept clean and warm, with convenient accommodations of food, physic, and lodging; he will be kept under proper regimen and government, which may shelter him, on the one hand, from becoming a prey to ignorant pretenders, whose chief merit seems to be, to sell diseases and death at reasonable rates; and, on the other, he will be protected from imprudence, which is oftentimes more fatal than the disease; while, according to the rules of the house, it is put out of his own power to indulge himself, or to be indulged by over-fond friends, if such he have, in what would be pernicious to his health.

In consequence of this we see, that many are recovered in such houses as these, who have long languished in their own, under tedious and extremely dangerous distempers; some of them, perhaps, after having, like the poor woman in the gospel, consumed all their living on physicians, and been nothing the better, but rather the worse.

Facts impress the mind more strongly than any reasonings unsupported by them. I therefore think it proper here to tell you, that I have made the most careful observations I could on those yearly accounts of other hospitals which have come to my hands, viz. those of Winchester, Bath, Exeter, York, Bristol, and the London and Westminster infirmaries. Few of these have reached back farther than three years, and some have extended only to one; and I find, on the whole, that we have an account of seven thousand three hundred and thirty, who are known, or supposed, to be cured, and only of seven hundred and eighty-four, who have died, or been discharged as incurable: so that it should seem by this hasty and imperfect calculation, (for such I confess it to be,) that near ten patients have been relieved for one who has failed of success.

I find palsies, dropsies, consumptions, fevers, leprosies, rheumatisms, cholics, stone, as well as multitudes of ulcers, fractures, dislocations, and the like, on the list of those calamities from which these poor creatures have been relieved: and it further appears, that great numbers of these had been languishing under their distempers two years, others five, ten, twelve, fourteen, and a few twenty years; and this after some of them had been reduced to so low an ebb, that their admission was blamed as a hopeless attempt, yet a few months have turned their captivity, and they have gone out from those gates vigorous and cheerful, into which they were brought almost like corpses, borne on men's shoulders.*

What heart does not feel a secret pleasure at hearing such an article? Who would not rejoice if even large contributions could be the means of procuring so happy effects? But it ought further to be considered, in favour of this design, that there is, in proportion to the good to be expected from it, great frugality and liberality so dispensed. For it is certain, (as many have observed on such occasions,) that a small sum thus managed will go further than a much larger given to relieve the sick poor at their own houses; as the same person may attend on different patients at the same time; and as the medicines and provisions to be used in the house may be bought at the best hand; whereas it is often, and I fear too justly, said, the poor generally pay dearer than others for what they have.† What is thus given is also much securer from being misapplied, either by the persons themselves, or by others, who might be base enough to make a prey of them. Nor can I forbear mentioning it as another most agreeable circumstance attending the charity proposed, that it often shelters the person who receives the benefit of it, from the mortification of coming to a parish allowance, and perhaps of being consigned over to a work-house: which is generally a terrible sort of infirmary indeed, where we have reason to fear there is seldom sufficient care taken to secure the cleanliness, the quiet, or the morals, of those who are so unhappy as to be brought thither; though perhaps some of them have lived creditably and comfortably in families of their own, have long contributed for the support of the poor around them, and have been at last reduced by the afflictive hand of Providence, without any visible crime of theirs, or any remarkable imprudence. A state, which, when sickness is added to it, appears one of the most desolate and deplorable which can be imagined: so that it is no wonder the very prospect and apprehension of it should press, in a very painful manner, on an honest and tender spirit, and greatly increase the force of any bodily disorder, which seems to threaten so bad an event.

Reflect, Christians, on such considerations as these; and add to all, that you are the disciples of that benevolent Jesus, who went about doing good, and who particularly expressed the tenderness of his generous compassion, by healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people. This was the calamity of human nature, which seems of all its temporal evils to have impressed him most; and I am sure, if we have any thing of his spirit and temper, without which we are none of his, we must necessarily wish well to a design of this kind, if it were only considered in reference to those, who receive in their own persons

* I am credibly informed, that at Exeter there have been an instance or two of persons, who, on account of their extreme weakness were brought into the hospital but in their coffins, who have gone out carrying their coffins on their backs.

† It has been spoken of in the suggestions for the erection of the Hospital, page 3, as a thing universally confessed, [illegible] may be added, attested by the [illegible] that they [illegible] others. And the truth of this observation was [illegible] whose memory will ever be dear to all good men who knew her earlier days, in the progress [illegible] Scheme in the beginning of Westminster Hospital, page 5. "I trust the memory [illegible] perverted, which I hope [illegible] would still be many good reasons [illegible] distributing to the necessities of the poor, as [illegible] would [illegible] of visiting the sick [illegible] and [illegible] Wesley's Works, page 9, 10. "It is well known, that scarce any medicines are received in those Hospitals at a less expense than can be procured for so many hundreds in any other way."

immediate relief from it. But I am to add, that as the scheme appears thus amiable in its most obvious aspect, so likewise,

2. It will appear more abundantly fruitful of future good, when attentively weighed in its remoter consequences.

The benefit extends much further than the persons thus relieved. It evidently affects others of their families, who have that time and labour to employ in the business of their respective callings, which must otherwise have been taken up in attending the sick. It extends also to all those, to whom the patients themselves may be useful when recovered from their illness; whether their near relations and friends, who have any dependence upon them; or the public, who owe much more, than we are generally aware, to the labours of the poor, and upon that account are under great obligations to them, which I fear are seldom considered. Not to say, that in many cases the very existence of those yet to be born may, under God, depend on such cures.

I shall not now insist on the advantage which others may receive in their illness, by the improved skill of physicians and surgeons, in consequence of their attendance on such hospitals; though it is evidently a very possible thing, that the lives of some very useful and valuable persons may be so preserved. It is yet more obvious and certain, that many other poor may be relieved, in the respective parishes to which they belong, by that money from the parish stock, which must otherwise have been employed upon the sick: or if, in consequence of being discharged from this burthen, the parish rates be lessened, (as perhaps in many places they sensibly may be,) the subscribers of that parish are then paid in specie; and after the honour and pleasure of bestowing their bounty, a part of it immediately flows back upon them again. And how much may so flow back, and with what large accessions of blessing, God only knows; as he only can tell, what casualties and diseases are warded off, what prosperity and success in affairs may be allotted, as the token of his favourable regard to this pious munificence.

Neither can it be improper for me to add upon this head, that what was more directly intended as a benefit to the body, may prove a blessing to the soul. For dissolute persons, by these means being brought for a while under regular discipline, may perhaps be broken and reclaimed: the good instructions they receive from ministers who attend them, especially while the rod of God is upon them, and his sword may seem to hang over them, the spectacles of mortality frequently before their eyes; together with the regularity and good order to which in such places they will be accustomed, and their being sheltered from many temptations, from which, in some kinds of sickness, the patient is not necessarily secure: may all, under the influence of divine grace, prove the means of sowing the seeds of true religion in their hearts, and of infusing into their minds that noblest of all cordials, an antidote against the servile fears of the second death.

Nor does it appear to me a contemptible effect of this charity, that as it is necessarily concerted upon a plan, in which all parties and denominations are equally concerned, it will probably be a means of promoting more candid and catholic sentiments, in consequence of repeated opportunities of mutual converse. This wears out that narrowness and bigotry of spirit, which, where it prevails, renders the Christian so unlike himself; and which is generally the effect of ignorance, and arises from viewing our brethren through false mediums, which represent, what may in itself be regular and fair, in a distorted and disagreeable form. As interviews with each other have a general tendency to rectify such mistaken apprehensions, that tendency is peculiarly evident, where this circumstance is added, that all are associated in the same good design, and have agreed on laying aside every party view in pursuing it. This may promote something of that unity of heart, under a variety of professions, which good men on all sides wish; and which, amidst such an unavoidable diversity of sentiments, is the only method of securing the honour of Christianity, and the peace of the church.

I must by all means add, that whatever good consequences this scheme may produce, which are many more than I have enumerated above, our engaging heartily in it may render them both extensive and lasting. It is probable, that neighbouring counties may quickly learn to imitate our example, when they see in fact that it is no impracticable design: an apprehension, which I suppose has hitherto been the chief obstruction, where its obvious benefits have been at all thought of. At length it may spread from county to county, till perhaps there will not a parish be found in Britain, which shall not have an interest in some such charitable foundation; to which they may send their sick in the most obstinate chronical cases, with some prospect of relief. Thus the remotest regions of our land may have reason on this account to call us blessed, and I will add, the remotest generations may also have reason to do it. Reflect how many hundreds are at this day enjoying the benefits of those wise and charitable foundations, which our nation owes to the pious and beneficent king Edward the Sixth, of truly sacred and immortal memory. So would I hope, that in this place, when our children, and our grand-children, are in their graves, their remotest descendants, which arise in their stead, (and God only knows what revolutions may bring any of them to need it,) may have cause to reflect on this year 1743, as the happy era of an establishment, to which many around them may owe their health, their comfort, their usefulness, and possibly, under God, their Christian principles, and their immortal hopes. Whatever streams may in the mean time have flowed into it, (and God grant they may be as large as shall be needed,) the fountain will be traced up hither; and blessings will be pronounced on the memory of those, who have opened to these refreshing and healing waters so free and so pleasant a course.

These considerations I lay before you, not to extort any thing from you, as against your wills, by mere importunity; but to convince you of what I hope will be abundantly sufficient to engage your concurrence in the design; I mean, that it is eminently calculated for extensive usefulness. I wish you may heartily join in it, because I wish your present happiness, and your future comfort. It is observable, that when our blessed Redeemer sent forth his apostles, as sheep among wolves, he gave them this consolation in the midst of their poverty and affliction, that though as for silver and gold they had none, they should be able to command one of the noblest delights which riches could purchase, in being the means of healing the sick. This was, if I may be allowed the familiarity of the expression, one of the great perquisites which he permitted to these his most favourite servants; that their hearts, rendered no doubt by his grace exquisitely sensible, should have the godlike pleasure of beholding from time to time the cheerful countenances of those, who had lately been among the most lamentable spectacles of human nature, and under God owed their health, their limbs, and their lives to them; and of seeing the joy of families and neighbourhoods, made happy by the recovery of those who were dear to them. I wish you my brethren, beloved in the Lord, a pleasure something like this of the apostles; and may I not add, of their Master too, so far as a diversity of circumstances will admit. And it is not only in compassion to the afflicted, but in the overflowings of the sincerest friendship to you, that I go on, (unnecessary as it may almost seem,) in the conclusion of my discourse.

III. To touch on some circumstances peculiar to the present season, which may especially recommend this scheme to our immediate regard.

And here it is obvious to think, of the war in which we are now engaged,—of the mercies of the harvest which we have lately reaped, and of the crisis to which the scheme is now brought, which therefore must be immediately supported, or sunk beyond all probable hope of future recovery.

1. The consideration of the war, in which we are embarked, may properly be introduced as what should have some weight with us on this occasion.

This should engage us as a nation, to conduct ourselves in as virtuous and pious a manner as possible; as the most probable way of drawing down the divine blessing upon our arms: now it is very reasonable to suppose, that acts of public charity, being in their own nature so peculiarly pleasing to the gracious Father and Governor of the universe, must have a great tendency to this. An ancient Jewish writer expresses this in terms remarkably adapted to the present purpose: "Help the poor," says he, "for the commandment's sake; and shut up alms, as it were, in thy store-house;" almost as if he had said, Raise hospitals for magazines: "and it shall fight for thee against thine enemies, better than a mighty shield, or a strong spear;" that is, than any kind of defensive or offensive armour. Nay, an inspired prophet, when giving advice to him, who was then the greatest monarch upon earth, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, expresses himself thus: O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee: break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by showing mercy to the poor; if it may be a lengthening out of thy tranquillity.

And as a view to our future interest, especially in this nice conjuncture of affairs, may require such a care; so it will be a very proper expression of our gratitude, for the assistance which God has lately given us. The victory at Dettingen was a very remarkable and seasonable appearance of Providence in our favour, which we have been solemnly acknowledging again and again in our public devotions. Let us also acknowledge it in our actions. Let us present some grateful tribute toward this good work, as a thank-offering to him, who giveth salvation to kings, for having so graciously guarded the life, the liberty, and safety of our sovereign, King George. Had the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord, been taken in the snares of the enemy, and our glory in any sense been delivered into their hand, expenses of a very different nature might have been occasioned, and have fallen upon our broken spirits with a very affective weight. But I will not dwell on so melancholy a thought. We are presenting our daily prayers for his majesty's security and prosperity, while, with a generosity which I hope our nation will never forget, he is hazarding his life for us in the high places of the field: let our alms rise with our prayers, if we desire they should come up as a grateful memorial before God.

2. The mercies of the harvest may likewise properly be mentioned, as rendering the charity I have been proposing peculiarly seasonable.

God has remarkably appeared for us, to crown the year with his goodness, and to load the earth with his bounty, and he has added this to complete the favour that he has reserved to us, in as agreeable a manner as we could ourselves have wished, the appointed weeks of the harvest. More seasonable weather on such an occasion has not, so far as I can learn, been known in the memory of man. Seasonable in this respect, that as the bottles of heaven have been so restrained that there have been no violent rains in the time of harvest, to sweep away or corrupt the fruits of the earth; so, for several of the most busy and important days, God has spread his cloud over the heavens, so as to shelter the reaper in the midst of his toil from those excessive heats, which often render autumn much more sickly than it would otherwise be. Since, then, God hath made such provision for satisfying our poor with bread, and for preserving our health too, he may seem thereby to call upon you, by the gentlest voice, to give him, in this pious work, a part of that substance with which he hath replenished you. And surely you must feel yourselves drawn, as by the cords of a man, to lay out this way some of the stores which he has with so liberal a hand poured in upon you, and which in sparing your health he has both spared and sweetened. Honour the Lord therefore with your substance, and with the first-fruits of all your increase, as a thankful acknowledgment of what he hath already done; and then you may by his promise be encouraged to hope, that in future instances your barns shall be filled with plenty, and your presses burst out with new wine. Know, my friends, that God hath given you your corn, and your wine, and your oil, and hath multiplied your wool and your flax. Lay by, therefore, for charitable uses, as God hath prospered you, and as you hope and desire he should prosper you in years to come: otherwise you may chance to have calculated your interests very wrong, and may find to your cost, that as there is that scattereth, and yet greatly increaseth, so there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth only to poverty. Once more,

3. Let me plead from the particular crisis, to which this affair is now brought, which is such, that it must be determined by what is immediately, or at least quickly, done.

The scheme of a County Hospital among us was thought of, and hinted at, long ago; but it was then looked upon as a thing to be wished, rather than attempted and hoped. The attempt is now courageously and vigorously made, and no inconsiderable sum has already been subscribed for that purpose: and what is much more important than any subscription yet made, many of the nobility and gentry of the county, who have not yet ascertained particulars, have declared their approbation of the general design, and their resolution to favour it. It is greatly for their honour to have it, and we may have reason to bless God who hath put it into their hearts; but it would be most ungenerous and unreasonable, to leave the whole burthen upon them. It is the general concurrence of the inhabitants of this county, which must give the greatest strength, stability, and extent to the scheme. Let me therefore entreat your cheerful and resolute concurrence. Suffer not this amiable infant, (if I may be allowed the expression,) to be deserted, and die, for want of due support in its tenderest state; nor let it be said, in Hezekiah's words, that when brought to the birth, there was not strength and assistance to bring it forth. Lend your charitable aid now, if you ever purpose to do it at all; for if it drop now, we cannot expect ever to see it revived: since the defeat of this attempt, so far advanced, and so warmly solicited, will be looked upon as a demonstration to many, that the thing cannot be effected; whereas it is most evident, that if it miscarry, it must not be charged on Providence, but on ourselves. Nothing surely can prevent its success, humanly speaking, but such dispositions, as I am unwilling on this occasion so much as to name, in those who should be leaders in every good work.

If these shameful causes should prevail to frustrate all, we love our neighbours, our brethren, and the public too well, not to lament it. But let us at least have so much regard to the credit of our characters, and the peace of our consciences, as to show, that it fails not for want of our concurrence. I know, it is but very little, in comparison, that we can do. We are by no means distinguished for our wealth, and we have of course our burthens and expenses peculiar to us, as a society of Dissenters. Nevertheless, let us judge equitably, as to what we are able to contribute, and let us do it cheerfully: rejoicing in this, that we act in the presence of a most gracious and merciful Father, who, where there is a willing mind, accepts a man according to what he hath, and not according to what he hath not.

Let not therefore any of the poorer part of mankind, who often have as generous and as compassionate hearts as any which are to be found on earth, be discouraged, because they have not their guineas, or even their crowns, to give on this noble occasion. Were great numbers to join their smaller contributions through such a county as this, it would swell to a very considerable sum. And, which is the most agreeable thought of all, each would have his part in the honour and pleasure of doing something towards helping forward so worthy a design. And I am sure, it is the part of humanity to wish, that those who move in a lower sphere, may share with the rich and great in such pleasures as these; though they cannot in many others, much more expensive, yet not equally exquisite and refined. The joys of liberality, and the delights of benevolence, were intended by the great Author of our nature, like the light of the sun, to be the portion of the whole species, and to extend themselves to the lowest of mankind.

I hope therefore, that all who can without great inconvenience to themselves and their families afford it, will do something to promote this generous scheme. But I would remind those of you, in particular, who are in more distinguished circumstances of life, that you are in the sight of God and man obliged to distinguish yourselves in the various exercises of liberality. I have a great authority to warrant me to do it, and I think it one of the truest offices of friendship which a minister can perform to such, to charge them that are rich in this world, that they trust not in uncertain riches, but in the living God; and that, as they desire any well-grounded trust in him, they practically acknowledge him as the great Lord of all, by being rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, so laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life. And if there are any of you whose riches God hath lately increased, either by causing your grounds to bring forth plentifully, or by giving a favourable turn to the commodities in which you deal, or by any other methods of sudden prosperity; as I may say to you, I come in a good day, so I should think, you had reason to fear that very prosperity were a curse, and might be the means of destruction to you, if you did not feel your hearts as it were melted by it, and disposed to flow forth in the streams of large and cheerful beneficence. I would rather hope, that God has been providing an easy and abundant accession for this public charity, by the accession he has been making to your capacity of supporting it.

I would also particularly beseech those of you who are of tender constitutions, and know, by your own frequent experience, the calamity of illness, to pity the sorrows you have so often felt, and to show a readiness to relieve the poor who are labouring under them, as you desire that the eye of mercy may be directed toward you, and that the arm of God may be extended for your support, if such distresses should return upon you. And I hope, any whom God may lately have raised up to life and health, when they seemed in the extremest danger of being deprived of the residue of their years, will hear how loudly he calls upon them, to present a thank-offering, so suitable to the nature of that favour which they have received.

To conclude all, I would beseech every one of you who hear me this day, both high and low, rich and poor together, that they aid this good work by their prayers: a contribution, by which some of the poorest may be eminently helpful; for such are often peculiarly rich in faith, and high in the favour of the King of heaven.

And may He, the great patron of the afflicted, and of those that pity them, say Amen to our united petitions! May he graciously guide the minds of those who are concerting the scheme, and ripening it for fuller execution! May he open the hearts of those who shall be applied to, that they may give freely and cheerfully, in full proportion to what he, the only perfect judge, certainly knows to be their respective abilities! And may he abundantly reward all, who from worthy principles shall assist in so excellent a work, with health in their persons, prosperity in their families, peace in their minds, and at length, through the merits and grace of the great Redeemer, with an eternal abode in that world, where the great physician of souls having fully accomplished his healing purposes, the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick! Nevertheless, the grace of charity shall live and reign there; though such methods of expressing it as I have now been recommending be happily superseded: nor is it at all improbable, that some, whom we have for a few days lodged in our house of mercy here, may there, as our Lord himself expresses it, receive us into everlasting habitations. Amen.

SERMON XVI.

THE NECESSITY OF A GENERAL REFORMATION, TO OBTAIN SUCCESS IN WAR.*

DEDICATION.

To the Honourable Colonel James Gardiner.

SIR,

I AM far from thinking that I pay any part of the debt which I owe to your most engaging friendship, by presenting you with a plain Discourse; on the contrary, I am sensible, that by your permitting me to inscribe it to you, that debt is increased: but obligations to so much goodness as I have experienced in you, sit so easily and pleasantly upon me, that no objection arises from that quarter. And it has this claim to your patronage, that many of the thoughts are as much yours as mine; having been talked over between us with a great deal of freedom. I know, Sir, they are such as make a very deep impression on your heart, and such as you strenuously labour to promote among those who have the happiness of being under your command; and I am confident you will think it no reproach to you to avow them in the most public manner, as your whole life always speaks your steady regard to those principles on which they are built.

I heartily congratulate you, Sir, and I congratulate the public, on the visible effects of your resolute and courageous zeal for religion, in the remarkable sobriety and regularity of those to whom your influence most directly extends; and I doubt not, but it has extended much further than the company, or even the regiment, to which you stand peculiarly related. Were our officers and our soldiers in general such, I am persuaded it would soon appear, how much righteousness exalteth a nation: and that He who is wisdom to the pious counsellor, would also be strength to them that turn the battle from our gates to those of the enemy; so that our commanders, like the hero who has furnished me with my motto, might well give it for their word, GOD OUR ALLY AND OUR GENERAL.

To all the prayers which I have been offering for my country in the progress of that Discourse of which I now beg your acceptance, permit me to add this one more. That to whatever services you may be called in its defence, that God, whom you serve, in all may continually watch over you for good, and prolong to many future most honourable and important years, a life so faithfully devoted to him. My heart reveres you too much, to permit me to tell the world, so immediately in your presence, the high sentiments it entertains of you; and I am, (with an affection, which is, perhaps, too ready to forget the formalities of a public address, in the tenderness of private friendship,)

My dear Colonel,

Your most faithful and obliged,
and most obedient humble servant.

Northampton, February 25, 1739-40. P. DODDRIDGE.

DEUT. xxiii. 9.

When the host goeth forth against their enemies, then keep thee from every wicked thing.

THE acknowledgment of that God, in whose hand our breath is, and whose are all our ways, is a duty in its obligation so evidently reasonable, in its exercise so delightful, and in its natural consequences so variously advantageous, that one would hope it should be the prevailing temper among men; a temper which should run through the most agreeable and secure scenes of life, since that agreeableness and security is the effect of divine care and goodness. Nevertheless we too generally see, that in this respect men are lulled asleep by those gentle gales of prosperity, which waft them on towards a haven they desire; but when cross and contrary winds arise, and beat upon them, the noise, the motion, the danger of the tempest often awakens them, and engages them, like the mariners in the ship with Jonah, to call every one upon his God. I would hope, indeed, that I am now addressing to many, who have made prayer the business and the joy of their prosperous days; and such may with peculiar pleasure and confidence have recourse to it in circumstances of extremity, if God should be pleased to lead us in such circumstances. In the mean time, I doubt not but it is with great readiness that such numbers of you have obeyed the wise and pious call of our sovereign, to assemble this day, "That we may humble ourselves before Almighty God, in order to obtain pardon of our sins; and may in most devout and solemn manner send up our prayers and supplications to the Divine Majesty, for averting those heavy judgments which our manifold sins and provocations have most justly deserved, imploring his blessing and assistance on our arms, and for restoring and perpetuating peace, safety, and prosperity to us."

* Preached at Northampton, January 9, 1739-40, the day appointed by his majesty for public humiliation.

Christian princes have seldom omitted on such occasions as these, to give such calls to their subjects; and they have instructive precedents for it in Scripture. They might learn it from the conduct of pious Jehoshaphat, who, when numerous nations were conspiring against him, set himself to seek the Lord, and proclaimed a fast throughout all Judah, that they might gather themselves together, to ask help from him. Yea, the hint might be taken even from the behaviour of the king of Nineveh, who, when the prophet had so solemnly declared in the name of God, that his country should be destroyed, arose from his throne, and laid aside his robe, and covered himself with sackcloth, and sat in ashes, at the same time causing a most rigorous fast to be proclaimed through Nineveh, by his own decree, and that of his nobles; an abstinence in which, the more forcibly to impress the minds of men, the beasts were also to share, and neither to feed nor drink water; and those of them which had appeared in that luxurious city in the most sumptuous trappings and decorations, were in the sad procession, like their masters, to be covered with sackcloth. With such low prostration was the whole nation, as one man, to cry mightily unto God, to avert his displeasure: but it is worthy of our remark, that the light of nature and reason taught that prince also to add, in his royal mandate for a general humiliation, Let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands.

Now as obedience to the government, and love to the public, must engage every faithful minister to labour to address his people this day, on such a subject, and in such a manner, as he judges most suitable to its great design; I thought it my duty to fix my own meditations and yours, on the absolute necessity of national and personal reformation, in order to a well-grounded expectation of success in war. This the king of Nineveh inculcated, as you have heard; and Moses also had long before solemnly urged it, in the words of my text; When the host goeth forth against thine enemies, then keep thee from every wicked thing. And surely every one's conscience will tell him, how fit it is, that, after we have been pouring out our confessions and our supplications before God, we should attentively reflect upon such a charge as this, lest future iniquities, aggravated even by the humiliation of this day, should prove our speedy and our final destruction.

You see the words contain a very plain and intelligible admonition to Israel, of the peculiar care with which they should guard against any unreformed wickedness, when (like Great Britain at this day) they were engaging in war: and they are a charge, not only to the soldiery, in such circumstances as these, to abstain from rapine, cruelty, and debauchery, as well as from any superstitious regard to those idols, which they might meet with in the camps and cities of their enemies; but also to the people in general, to be careful that they did not, by any impieties or immoralities at home, bring down the curse of God upon their arms, and blast the success even of the most righteous cause.

Before I proceed to a more particular consideration of the words, I will readily allow, they might have some peculiar weight, when considered as addressed to the Israelites; for they had God in a very extraordinary manner present among them, as the ark, often called the footstool of his throne, was now in the midst of their camp; and, when it was not, there were other holy instruments committed to the charge of the anointed of the field, by which God was to be consulted, and his presence acknowledged. Upon this account we find, in the following words, they are urged to keep themselves, not only from moral, but also from ceremonial, and even natural, pollution; that the order, decency, and cleanliness of their camp might be an habitual expression of their reverence for that God, who condescended to appear among them as their general, and their king: For the Lord thy God walketh in the midst of thy camp;—therefore shall it be holy, that he see no unclean thing in thee, and turn away from thee.

It may also be proper to recollect upon this occasion, that the Israelites were under something of a peculiarly equal providence; and consequently might expect victory or defeat, as they were obedient or disobedient to the divine command, with a certainty greater than is common to other nations. For though indeed it is probable, that, in a series of years, the prosperity or calamity of a nation will be proportionable to its general virtues or vices; yet the peculiar covenant which God had made with Israel, not only seems to have engaged him to a more immediate retribution, but likewise extended itself to all those peculiar institutions, which they as a separate nation were under. Therefore does he particularly tell them, that if they did not observe to do all his commandments and statutes, he would cause them to be smitten before their enemies; they should go out against them one way, and flee seven ways before them; thereby strongly intimating, (and indeed with the utmost reason,) that the presumptuous violation of any ceremonial or positive precept would be attended with fatal consequences; of which, you well know, the defeat brought upon the whole army of Israel for the sin of Achan, in secreting the accursed thing, was an early and very memorable instance; as well as the severity, with which that crime was punished, on the offender and his family. And it was indeed a merciful method which God took, to preserve Israel in an external and visible adherence to the religion and the institutions he had founded among them, thus immediately to animadvert upon them by his chastising providence, whenever they deviated from it, though in circumstances otherwise indifferent; and it may be in those, in which human policy would have dictated a very different conduct, had not a divine command interposed: which, by the way, is particularly apparent in the effect of multiplying chariots and horses, which were always a curse, instead of a defence, to Israel, how useful so ever they might have been to other nations; because God had required them to employ infantry alone, as that by which (the more immediately to show his interposition) he would save them, when they depended upon him.

I pretend not therefore to maintain from these words, that we are concerned in them, just in the very same manner and degree that the Israelites were; yet I doubt not but I shall be able,

I. To prove, that we are highly concerned in this caution which is given to them. And then,

II. I shall endeavour to illustrate it, by the mention of some particular evils, against which, in our present circumstances, we are peculiarly obliged to guard. After which,

III. I shall conclude with some inferences from hence, further suited to the occasion of this day's most solemn assembly.

I. I am to prove, that we are all much concerned in the caution that is here given; and that as ever we, or any other nation, would reasonably expect success against our enemies, it is necessary that, when we go forth against them, we should keep ourselves from every wicked thing.

You will remember, I pretend not to assert that the event of every battle, or of every war, will always bear an exact proportion, either to the justice of the cause, or to the virtue and piety of those that are engaged in it. Indeed the event of some wars, especially towards the beginning of the Reformation, wherein the sufferers were persons of the most excellent, and the victors of the most hateful, characters, is too sad an evidence to the contrary.* I am very ready to allow, that in some instances, to form the hearts of his people to more eminent attainments in goodness by scenes of distress, or for other reasons to us unknown, God may determine events otherwise: yet I think I may very safely venture to affirm, that we can never form any just expectation of continued success and prosperity in our military affairs, unless there be a zealous concern about a reformation in our manners; and unless national piety and virtue be our earnest and governing care. And this may sufficiently appear, if we consider, on the one hand, that the divine favour can only reasonably be expected by those, who are careful to keep themselves from evil; and on the other, that prosperity in military affairs does evidently depend on the divine favour. Both these considerations are so plain, that they might almost be admitted as self-evident; though in order to impress them more deeply upon our minds, I shall spend a few words upon each.

1. The divine favour can only reasonably be expected by those, who are solicitous to keep themselves from moral evil.

I might introduce what I have further to say on this head, by observing, that the moral perfections of God seem evidently deducible from his natural; for to suppose otherwise concerning him, would be indeed to suppose him worse than even the very vilest of men, who, if they act unrighteously where they know what is reasonable and fit, do it as tempted by some self-interest; a temptation, to which an almighty being cannot possibly be obnoxious. Now the consequence from his being perfectly holy and righteous himself, to his loving the like character, and hating the contrary, in his reasonable creatures, is so plain, that the apostle appeals to every one's conscience to bear witness to it: What fellowship, says he, hath righteousness with unrighteousness? or what communion hath light with darkness? It must then be granted, that as the righteous Lord loveth righteousness, and his countenance beholds the upright; so his face must be set against them that do evil, that sooner or later he may cut off the remembrance of them from the earth. Wicked men have reason therefore to be afraid of his judgments: and they have especial reason to fear them, who, like the inhabitants of Great Britain, have been favoured with the clearest knowledge of his will, have received the most eminent deliverances from him, and have for a long series of years been preserved in peace and prosperity; while, at the same time that they have called themselves his people, they have acted in a visible contrariety to their profession, and thereby brought proportionable dishonour upon his name. This is a case greatly to be feared in every condition, and it is especially worthy of our consideration in our present circumstances; because,

* I hardly know a more memorable instance of this than in the success of that pernicious and ungrateful war, which the Emperor Charles V. unjustly waged against those two pious and worthy princes, John Frederick, Elector of Saxony, and Philip, Landgrave of Hesse Cassel; in which the Emperor was supported by a confederate multitude of Spanish and Italian forces, who marched their way through Germany with unheard of cruelties, and particularly on the Lord's day set themselves to burn the churches, and feed their horses in the chancels, to testify their hatred against the Protestant Religion, which those princes professed. Pierre spes et splendidus ensemble manet atque perire, who miserum discrimen. Sleid. de Stat. Relig. lib. xviii. p. 731.

2. It is most evident, that the success of military affairs does entirely depend upon the divine protection and favour.

This is a well known maxim of the word of God; and considering the natural pride of our hearts, it was fit that it should be deeply inculcated. It is therefore repeated again and again; and it is observable, that it comes most frequently from the pen of David, who was himself so courageous a warrior, and so illustrious a conqueror. No king, says he, is saved by the multitude of a host; a mighty man is not delivered by much strength; a horse is a vain thing for safety; neither shall he deliver any by his great strength: behold, the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him, to deliver their soul from death. And we shall have occasion hereafter to mention many other passages equivalent to these.

It would indeed be thus, if the success of battle was always proportionable to the number, strength, and skill of those respectively concerned in it; for all the strength and all the skill of creatures is derived from God, and is supported by him. But we find in experience, as well as in Scripture, that events often arise, in which it evidently appears, that the battle is not to the strong, nor the race to the swift; and circumstances happen, in which, with some allowance for the figurative expression, one chases a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight.

Much of the success of military actions depends upon the weather, which almost the whole world acknowledges to be apparently at the divine disposal, and to be quite beyond any human alteration or control. Wind and rain, cold and heat, have been the destruction of thousands, who imagined themselves most secure of victory and success, even in land engagements. Much likewise depends upon a variety of little accidents; and especially, with respect to the discernment of those that command, and the alacrity of those who engage. Now God at pleasure takes away the spirit of princes, and dejects the men of might, so that they are not able to find their hands. He sometimes diffuses among mighty armies a spirit of discord, so that confederate forces desert or destroy one another, or perhaps sends a sudden panic upon them, and then, be their forces ever so numerous, the entrance of fear is the beginning of a defeat, in which numbers, instead of helping, only crowd, and bear down, and trample on each other. It is evident to all acquainted with history, that, by such incidents as these, small numbers have been rendered victorious, even almost beyond their expectation, and have stood astonished at their own success.

This is a remark peculiarly applicable to naval preparations. Their prosperity most evidently depends on the most uncertain elements, the winds and the waves; and he that gathers the winds in his fist, can with infinite ease pen up the most gallant fleets in their harbours, and waft over to defenceless ports, in the very neighbourhood of them, invading enemies in transports by no means a match for the fine navies, on which the sovereign of the sea has laid his embargo. Yea, at his command the ships of Tarshish shall be dashed in pieces with an east wind, and their bulk and strength only serve to give each other the more violent shocks, and to spread the wider ruin. This is a thought especially worthy our attention, who have in so many instances, within the memory of man, owed the preservation of our domestic peace, and probably, it may be added, even that of our religion and liberty, to the interposition of the wind in our favour. A circumstance which our enemies themselves have recorded with surprise, though we are, alas, too insensible of it.*

We see then how incontestably it appears, that the prosperity of our arms entirely depends upon the divine favour: and indeed the truth of this is so evident, that dissolute as the generality of mankind are, there are few of them entirely unimpressed with it. It is certain, that many of those vices, which tend to provoke God, do at the same time render men's circumstances desperate, their spirits mean, and their constitutions weak. Riot and debauchery unbrace the nerves; and in proportion to the degree in which they are indulged, render the glutton, the drunkard, and the whoremonger, incapable of sustaining those hardships, which would be comparatively easy to those, who had been long trained up under the discipline of abstinence, sobriety, and industry. But, besides all this, guilt of every kind naturally makes men cowards; whereas conscious integrity and upright-

* Not only the story of the Spanish invasion, and that of the [illegible] of the Prince of Orange, our great deliverer, in 1688, [illegible] instances of this; but also the invasions attempted [illegible] by King James the Second, or the Pretender and his [illegible] I cannot recollect any one that has not been [illegible] and those such as we ourselves could have wished. [illegible] Father Orleans, in his History of the English Rev[illegible] some of the former instances, with [illegible] and I know the author of the late Duke of Berwick's [illegible] some of the latter, in some passages which [illegible] reading, that I am sorry I have not room to [illegible] seeing so referring to them.

ness is a kind of impregnable armour, which secures the heart from fear, even in the midst of danger. This Solomon well knew, and therefore says, The wicked flee when no man pursues: but the righteous are bold as a lion. And indeed that man, who apprehends himself under the guardianship and defence of Divine Providence, may well be courageous; and when he can say, The Lord is my light and my salvation, he may justly add, Whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid? Though a host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident: for he has all the reason in the world to be assured, that God will either shield him from danger, which in the most perilous action he can easily do; or if he suffer him to fall by it, will open him a passage to eternal glory, by the wounds he may receive in a righteous cause. Whereas the man who is condemned by his own heart, cannot easily flatter himself so far, as inwardly to imagine, that he is not condemned by that God, who is greater than his heart, and knoweth all things. Nor can he always forget how entirely he is in the hand of that tremendous Being, whom his disobedience has made his enemy: and it is no wonder if death appear terrible, when he has so much reason to fear that hell will follow it; for though it is an easy thing to jest with its distant terrors, it is not so easy deliberately to brave them when they seem to approach. You may therefore observe, that, in order to lay conscience asleep, politic men have often contrived to blow up a wicked soldiery with an apprehension, that what they might want in the regularity and virtue of their behaviour, they had in the goodness of their cause, or in the orthodoxy of their belief; that a persuasion of the piety of their cause, might at least be a balance to the impiety and licentiousness of their characters: yea, they have, it may be, consecrated their cruelties as an atonement for their debauchery. What artifices have been used to this purpose, and by whom, it is by no means my present business to inquire; but I look upon it as a sort of testimony, borne often by the worst of men to the importance of some religious hopes in military affairs; as it does, on the other side, appear from what was before said, that these hopes can only be reasonably entertained by those, who are disposed to a thorough reformation of their lives, or, in the language of the text, to keep themselves from every wicked thing, when their host goes forth against the enemy.

But in order to render these general reflections more useful, by bringing them to a point, permit me, in the second place,

II. To hint at some of those evils, which we should, in our present circumstances, be particularly careful to guard against.

And here I must in the very first place, mention that in which all the other particulars, which might occur on this occasion, are in effect contained, as in their fatal cause; and observe,

1. That "a profane contempt of that divine revelation, with which God has favoured us," is one great evil, that should be carefully avoided.

As I cannot, so I hope I need not, be large in showing, how admirably the whole tenor of the word of God, and especially the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, which we all profess to believe, is calculated to promote a general reformation in mankind; and how certainly it will promote it, in proportion to the degree in which it is cordially received. It indeed most powerfully tends not only to regulate the life, but to awaken and impress the conscience; not only to control those evil actions, which, though detrimental in some measure to society, may not be cognizable by human laws, but also to suppress, and even eradicate, those irregular affections and passions, from which such actions proceed. We can therefore wish nothing better to our country, than that this gospel, this glorious gospel of the blessed God, may be universally considered, embraced, and obeyed; and I am persuaded, nothing would have a happier aspect upon our public affairs, than that we should all labour to our utmost to promote its establishment, and its influence over the minds of men.

We have the more reason to be concerned about it, as perhaps there is no Christian nation under heaven, in which bolder and more mischievous assaults have been made upon revealed religion, than among us: and though it has so friendly an aspect on the comfort of individuals, and the happiness of society, the licentiousness of some, and the pride of others, has engaged them to unite against it, as against a common enemy, and to treat it with a contempt, equal to that veneration it might justly have demanded. This is indeed the natural consequence of that liberty which we enjoy, not only of thinking for ourselves, which none can prevent, but of freely professing our own sentiments; a liberty so honourable to human nature and to truth, and on many accounts (as I have elsewhere shown[a]) so profitable, that I think no wise man could wish it were restrained. Yet the more freely we assert it, the more careful should we be by all rational and Christian methods to prevent its abuse, and to guard against those bad consequences, which, good as the thing itself is, are almost inseparable from it.

Let all who believe the gospel, take heed how they trifle with it; and let all who have any scruples concerning it, make their inquiries into its evidences with all possible diligence, humility, and impartiality; which if they do, they will undoubtedly end in a more established belief. And let us all, according to our abilities, exert ourselves for its defence; not only by pleading its cause by arguments, so far as we have an opportunity in our respective places to do it; but also by bearing our testimony to its importance, as well as its truth; and above all, by labouring to the utmost to make our lives a continued and prevailing apology for it, which they will be, if they are steadily governed by its holy dictates.

[a] Sermon on Persecution.

To excite us to the greater care on this head, let it be remembered, that nothing is more highly displeasing to God, than the contempt of that revelation which he has sent. They that despised Moses's law, found it so to their cost; for when they mocked the messengers of God, and despised his words, and misused his prophets, the wrath of the Lord rose against his people, till there was no remedy; and he brought an invading enemy upon them, who slew their young men with the sword, in the house of their sanctuary, and had no compassion upon young man, maiden, old man, or him that stooped for age: and we cannot expect, that the effects of his displeasure will be less terrible, if we will not reverence his Son. It is owing to his wonderful patience, that we have not long ago been made a monument of his wrath, and punished for these iniquities, as remarkably as we have been known by him beyond most of the other nations of the earth. Our guilt on this head makes it more necessary to add,

2. "The luxurious abuse of the favours of divine Providence, which have in so long a peace been flowing in upon us," is another evil to be guarded against, if we would reasonably expect success in war.

I am now speaking to many who know, more particularly than I myself do, how plentifully our land has yielded her increase for many succeeding years; insomuch that we have been able to relieve the necessities of neighbour nations, out of our own redundant stores: a providence, which has not only prevented corn from growing a drug at home, but has been an occasion of bringing into the nation no contemptible return of riches for a considerable time. Besides this, whatever particular difficulties may have attended some traders, our commerce in general has long been in a flourishing condition. Very considerable estates have been raised; and it is neither to be wondered at, nor blamed, that those who have found their wealth increasing, have thought proper to live in a more liberal, and elegant, and some of them in a more magnificent manner, than before. But I fear, that, in many of those who have thus been distinguished by the blessings of Divine Providence, this indulgence has grown up into luxury and extravagance, and to neglect of honest and industrious employment, whereby God might have been honoured, and the public interest promoted; cares and labours, from which the wealthiest and the noblest of mankind are by no means to think themselves excused; nay, by which they are rather to be proportionably distinguished.

I fear also, that the taste for pleasure and grandeur, which has prevailed so much in persons of plentiful circumstances, has been too eagerly and vainly imitated, by those whose estates and families would have required another kind of conduct. This, in great measure, may have been the cause of the many bankruptcies, whereby such who have dealt largely, and have affected to deal much more largely than they ought, have frequently drawn down many others, and those, perhaps, more industrious and deserving families, into ruin with themselves. While others, in various employments, have been obliged to have recourse to mean artifices, to shore up a sinking credit for a while, till those props have at last only made the ruin the greater, and the more unpitied; and all this to the unspeakable reproach of religion, which has sometimes been vainly pretended to by those, whose conduct has been most contrary to its essential precepts. Indeed, to speak freely, I can by no means think, the great affectation of ornament in dress, and magnificence in living, which is the expensive taste of the present age, can bode well to the public. The sins of Sodom, pride and idleness, with fulness of bread, have long been in the midst of us; and if they are not reformed, they must, both by their natural consequence, and by the righteous judgment of God, involve our nation in destruction. We have long been made to eat the increase of the field, to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock: we have been fed with the fat of kidneys of wheat, and drank the pure blood of the grape; till, like Jeshurun, we have waxed fat and kicked: and therefore, as the guilt has been ours, it will be but righteous, if the condemnation should be ours too; and a fire should be kindled against us in God's anger, that should burn even to the lowest hell, that should consume the land with its increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains. It becomes us, therefore, if we would avert the deserved judgments of God, to set ourselves, as in his presence, to examine seriously how we are using the talents he has graciously lent us; and instead of profusely wasting both our time and our stock in vain indulgences, to apply ourselves with honest industry to the proper business of our calling; and by a prudent frugality at home, to lay a foundation for a liberal contribution to the poor. So are we most likely to regain the strength and honour of our nation, which luxury must infallibly enervate and disgrace, and to draw down the blessing of God upon our affairs, as well as to provide some resource for future supplies, if our present preparation should be (which God forbid) unsuccessful, or the war should be prolonged till the burthen grow much more sensible than it can at present be. Again,

3. "Too great a confidence in our own military strength and preparations," is another evil from which we should be especially solicitous to keep ourselves, in such a conjuncture of affairs as this.

Through the abundant goodness of God, the armaments of Great Britain, both by sea and land, have, so far as I can recollect, in most instances, since the beginning of the present century, been attended with success; and in some circumstances that success has been glorious and remarkable. These being then the latest facts, and facts of so pleasant a nature, are apt to strike our remembrance very strongly; and are now recollected with so much the more pleasure, as the last of them was attended with equal honour to Great Britain, and shame and disappointment to Spain.* But I fear, that (to allude to the expressive language of the prophet) because we have often caught our enemies in our net, and gathered them in our drag, we are fallen into the absurd impiety of sacrificing to our net, and burning incense to our drag: and though it is to be sure a pleasant thing, to see our nation engaging in this necessary war with ardour and cheerfulness, and the apparent righteousness of our cause may indeed encourage our humble hopes; yet I cannot forbear saying, that I fear, that great cagerness which in many instances has been shown on this occasion, has proceeded from a forgetfulness of God, and a proud confidence in ourselves; as if victory were chained to our chariot wheels, and the winds, so often indeed listed under our banners, were always to blow according to our directions; as if the artillery of our ships were as unconquerable, as that of heaven itself, and we could at pleasure send forth our thunder, and scatter our enemies, and shoot out lightnings, and discomfit them.

But let it be remembered, that Pharaoh stood on the very verge of disgrace and destruction, when he said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them; I will draw my sword, and my hand shall destroy them. Yea, let us remember in general, that pride goes before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall. I can wish no happier omen, than that we should learn the language and sentiments, which that martial hero, whom we mentioned before on a like occasion, so often inculcates upon his people; that we may say with him, In the name of our God will we set up our banners; through thee will we push down our enemies; through thy name will we tread them under, that rise up against us; for I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me. Though some trust in chariots and some in horses, we will remember the name of the Lord our God; for God delights not in the strength of the horse, neither takes he pleasure in the legs of a man, so that his victory should be proportionable to their strength, and their agility: and therefore, though in some cases the horse may prudently be prepared against the day of battle; yet still must it be acknowledged, that safety is of the Lord. He breaks the bow, and cuts the spear in sunder, he burns the chariot in the fire; salvation belongs to the Lord; his blessing is upon his people. We have indeed no warrant to expect a miraculous interposition of God in our favour; and it would be folly and wickedness, in a dependence upon that, to neglect any necessary methods of defence: but still it is to be remembered, that (as we proved under the former head) the success of all is from above; and that it is, on the whole, through God alone we can do valiantly, and he it is that must tread down our enemies. This we are solemnly acknowledging in the devotions of this day; and God grant, that it may fix on our minds that pious humility, which, as it is perfectly consistent with the firmest valour, has in some very remarkable instances been a prelude to the most glorious success.

Let me add but this once more,

4. "Too keen a resentment for injuries received from our enemies, growing into a malignant hatred against them," is another evil, which we should be peculiarly solicitous in our present circumstances to avoid.

It is certain indeed, that some of those violences which have been offered us, have been attended with circumstances of such barbarity and contempt, as cannot but awaken a strong indignation; and the genius of Britons can very ill brook such kind of treatment. Yet permit me to say, that it would be unjust to charge the whole Spanish nation with such enormities, as have been committed by some, probably in the number of the most abandoned among them. Humanity is not the growth of one particular climate, but a happy inheritance divided among the various inhabitants of the earth; and I doubt not, but it teaches many among them to abhor the villanies of their countrymen. But if not, be that reproach to our enemies; and may it never fall upon us, that we have delighted in the unnecessary misery of our fellow-creatures, and have retorted cruelty for cruelty. We are indeed to wish, that injustice may be so chastised, as that for the future it may be suppressed; but God forbid, that we should thirst for blood and ruin, or take delight to think of the sufferings of any, how ill soever they may have deserved of us!

War, in such circumstances as ours, is the rigorous and severe work of justice, and must be done; but methinks a humane heart consents to it with some sensible regret, and will sometimes bleed to think, that those benevolent and brotherly cares that ought to fill the heart of one man for another, and of one nation for another, should be turned into thoughts and schemes of destruction; and give place to contrivances, how men may be slaughtered, and cities laid waste, and the beauties of nature and art ravaged and defaced.

* I suppose few need to be told, that I refer to that glorious expedition to Sicily, in the year 1718, which was conducted with so much spirit, prudence, and bravery by Admiral Byng, afterwards Viscount Torrington.

It would indeed be a partial and short-sighted tenderness, if potent nations should, on these principles, suffer themselves to be injured and insulted by every foreign bravo; till at length they sink into contempt, and yield up themselves, or their dependants, a tame and helpless prey to injustice and cruelty. A neglect of the proper methods of self-defence would leave them chargeable before God and man with the calamities resulting from it: yet still it becomes them, in the vindication of their just rights, to guard against that savage fierceness, which forgets that enemies are men.* It becomes us rather to wish, they may be brought to reason by the least destructive methods; and that what they in the mean time suffer, may be a profitable lesson to others, and, on the whole, to themselves.

I apprehend these admonitions not unseasonable, and having enlarged so far upon them, shall omit some other heads, which might easily be connected with them; and shall,

III. Conclude this Discourse with some general reflections.

Now, such as these will probably present themselves to most of your thoughts; and, no doubt, you have anticipated me in some of them.

1. Let us be deeply humbled before God for the evils that are to be found among us.

Let us lie down, as it were, in the dust, in his sacred presence, when we consider that with us, even with us, there are so many crying abominations to be found, notwithstanding all that God has been pleased to do for us. Let us be humbled before him, not only for the sins of our princes, and nobles, and priests, and people; but more especially under a sense of our own guilt, and of what we have added to the divine displeasure, by offences, if not in their kind peculiarly enormous, yet at least in their circumstances most highly aggravated. Let us borrow the expressions of humble contrition, which were used by God's ancient people, and each of us say with Ezra, O my God, I am ashamed, and blush to lift up my face to thee, my God; for our iniquities are increased over our head, and our trespass is grown up unto the heavens: since the days of our fathers have we been in a great trespass unto this day;—and behold, we are now before thee in our trespasses; and we cannot stand before thee, because of this. Let us say with Jeremiah, We lie down in our shame, and our confusion covereth us; for we have sinned against the Lord our God, we and our fathers, from our youth even to this day, and have not obeyed the voice of the Lord our God. Let us say with Daniel, when he set his face unto the Lord God, to seek him by prayer, and supplications, with fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes, O Lord, the great and dreadful God, we have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by departing from thy precepts and thy judgments:—O Lord, righteousness belongs unto thee, but unto us confusion of faces, as at this day,—to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against thee;—neither have we obeyed the voice of the Lord our God, to walk in his laws, which he set before us by his servants the prophets:—Nevertheless, O Lord, hear; O Lord forgive; O Lord, hearken and do; defer not for thine own sake, O my God; for thy people are called by thy name.

Nor let this be words alone, but the deep-felt sentiments of our hearts. Let us call to remembrance our manifold engagements to God, on the one hand, and our transgressions against him, on the other; and acknowledge, in the abasement and bitterness of our souls before him, that it would be a righteous thing in him to bring destruction upon us in its most painful and dreadful forms, to infatuate all our counsels, to blast all our undertakings, to sink our navies in the midst of the sea, to cause our own hearts to melt, and our hands to fail, while those of our enemies were strengthened for our ruin! Let us humbly acknowledge, that he would be just in all that came upon us, if this pleasant land, in which we have enjoyed so great plenty and prosperity, should become a desert; or if we should see those possessions for which we ourselves have laboured, or which have been transmitted to us from our forefathers, plundered by strangers, or even inherited by enemies. And while we are confessing this, let us endeavour by earnest and importunate prayer to avert these deserved judgments, and wrestle with God not to destroy his people; but to give us that help from trouble, without which we shall find, that vain is the help of man.

Let these thoughts, which I hope are impressing our minds in the solemnities of this day, be carried along with us into our secret retirements; let us spread them before God in our family devotion, and let them have a becoming share in our private worship. And if we desire that these supplications and prayers may not be an abomination to a holy God, let us,

2. Be very solicitous to exert ourselves to the utmost, to promote a work of general reformation, according to the various stations in which Providence has placed us.

* Viri boni est, unira bella invitum suscipere, extrema non libenter persequi.—Sallust

Our care in this respect, if it be earnest and sincere, will begin with ourselves; and we should now particularly consider ourselves, as solemnly called by God to search and try our ways, that we may turn again to the Lord. In obedience to the command, let us, as it were, call a court in our consciences, and impartially judge ourselves, as those that are shortly to be judged of the Lord. Whatever is criminal, whatever is even suspicious, in our temper and conduct, let us endeavour to regulate it by the certain rules of religion, and bring all our sentiments and actions to its unerring standard. Let us not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well; labouring to the very utmost to prevent any reproach to our profession, and to reflect a glory upon it. Could every one be engaged to this, all would be well; nay, should it grow the prevailing temper, we might reasonably hope, that the innocent would deliver the island; yea, that it should be preserved by the pureness of their hands.

And this will naturally engage us to a proper care of those committed to our immediate charge. It will, no doubt, have a happy influence upon heads of families, to stir them up to walk before their houses in a perfect way; and so to govern, as well as instruct, their domestics, that none under their roof and care may make themselves vile, without being restrained by proper discipline. This would, under God, (who very seldom denies a blessing to such pious endeavours,) have a happy tendency to secure to our country a race of virtuous and pious youth, whose behaviour might wipe off the stain which the sins of their fathers have thrown upon it; out of regard to whom God might deal so much the more graciously with us, while they were growing up for public service, and might say of our nation, as in another case, Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it. And, to conclude all,

3. Let us, from what we have now been hearing, be excited earnestly to pray for those, who, by reason of their more public stations in life, may be capable of doing more than ourselves, to promote the work of national reformation.

And here our magistrates justly claim the first share in our remembrance. Let us earnestly pray, that divine grace may possess their hearts with a sense of the importance of their respective offices, and of the strict account they must another day render for the manner in which they have discharged them.—Let us especially pray for our gracious sovereign, who is calling us to these prayers, and joining with his people in humiliation before the King of kings, and Lord of lords. Let us pray, that the Lord may hear him in the day of trouble, that the name of the God of Jacob may defend him, that he may send him help from his sanctuary, and strengthen him out of Zion! That the king may joy in the strength of the Lord, and in his salvation may greatly rejoice! That as he is thus publicly declaring his trust in the Lord, through the mercy of the Most High he may not be moved; but that God's hand may find out all his enemies, and his right hand may find out those that hate him! That his glory may be great in God's salvation, and increasing honour and majesty may be laid upon him! I am persuaded, there is not a heart that does not answer Amen! May the father of our country hear, that his enemies are humbled abroad! May he see his people united and reformed at home! Yea, may God make him most blessed for ever; that in the future and infinitely most important world, they that have been here protected by him in war, and cherished in peace, may see him as much distinguished by celestial glories, as he now is by earthly dignities!—May all our counsellors be wise, and all our judges faithful! May our legislators enact good laws, and inferior magistrates vigorously execute them! And may all our rulers, from the highest to the lowest, be themselves examples of universal goodness! May they scatter away all evil with their eyes, and make it ashamed by their presence! May they resolutely reform the people who generally of all others need it most, their own domestics and dependants! And may they have that inward veneration from all about them, which nothing but a character for real religion can give, even to the greatest and wisest of mankind.

Let us pray likewise for our military, as well as our civil, officers; that they may exert themselves, with a bravery so well becoming their character, to drive out wickedness, that most dangerous enemy, from our camps and navies, which it has so boldly invaded; yea, where it has by so long a custom claimed a kind of right to pitch its tent, and to set up its banners. This will indeed be a very hard conquest, considering the circumstances in which persons generally enter on such a life, and the great and dangerous leisure which it gives them, in a time of long peace, of corrupting themselves and each other. Yet the extensive power, which is annexed to superior officers in every regiment, and company, may give them great advantages for serving their country, by regulating the external behaviour of those under their command; and human authority can pretend to regulate nothing more. They may, for instance, be restrained from the open violation of the sabbath, and called to an attendance upon public worship, under one form of it or another; and a great check may be given to that lewdness, debauchery, and profaneness, in which not a few of them vie with each other, as if they were the distinguishing honours of their order. I look upon it as a great ornament, honour, and blessing to our land, that many of our officers are very amiable examples of virtue and piety, and know how deficient even the character of a gentleman is, when notoriously wanting in either. And we in these parts have had many opportunities of observing, how good an influence the inspection of such persons has upon the inferior soldiery, to secure the regularity and decency of their behaviour. Let us earnestly pray, that the Lord of hosts, whom we are entreating to cover the heads of our warriors in the day of battle, may more generally inspire the hearts of those that lead them forth with his fear, and excite them, however it may be censured by the abandoned and profane, to exert themselves to the utmost, to form their troops to the discipline of virtue, as well as of war. It is what the credit of their profession, and I will add, the safety of the public, requires. And I must take the liberty particularly to say, that when my ears are at any time wounded with those detestable imprecations, which are in many places so common among our soldiery, and which are, I think, an infallible proof of a character thoroughly bad, I am ready to tremble with the sad apprehension, lest their guilt should turn back their weapons of war; and lest God should suddenly send them, from the points of their enemies' swords, or the mouths of their guns, that damnation which they have so wantonly invoked on themselves and each other.

We are under yet more apparent obligation, to pray for those that preside in religious assemblies of all denominations; that God would clothe his priests with salvation; as what will have a most important influence to make his people joyful and happy. May their hearts and hands be united in that good work which is committed to them! May God deliver them from the shame and folly of employing the solemn seasons of public worship, in reproaching their brethren, and animating the hearts of professing Christians against each other! An enormity which, I think, is in our day generally driven out with a just contempt; unless perhaps it be yet sheltered among a very few, whom great ignorance, or greater wickedness, has reduced to this wretched expedient, as a kind of forlorn hope. May a better temper universally succeed; and however Christian assemblies may differ in some of their forms of worship, yet as they agree in the essentials of it, may their ministers agree in pursuing the same great end; and as they all have one errand, may their language, in the main, be one! May they all speak with plainness, with seriousness, and I will add, with that authority too, which nothing but conscious integrity and goodness can give! Not even amusing, and much less hurting, the minds of men, with matters of doubtful disputations; but rather exerting themselves to the utmost for that one plain, but glorious, purpose, of reforming men's tempers and lives upon the Christian plan!

For promoting the efficacy of such labours as these, we should earnestly pray, that all who are employed in them, may be examples of distinguishing piety; and that God would be like a refiner's fire, to purify the sons of Levi. For while any gross immoralities are observable in their conduct, they will wound religion like a two-edged sword; as their hearers, by a perverseness and inconsistency very natural to the licentious and profane, will look upon it as a sanction at once for despising their persons, and imitating their vices. Ministers of all denominations claim our prayers on these heads; and peculiarly those of established churches; where, as the temporal emoluments are generally greatest, there is of course more to invite unworthy persons to offer themselves to the ministry.—Nor ought we to forget in our prayers at such seasons, those wise, learned, and pious men, whom our governors may from time to time think fit to raise to the most exalted stations among the clergy, and to invest with a dignity and authority, which though no part of their ministerial office, is capable of being improved to great advantage. It is devoutly to be wished, that they may use their great influence and power, to exclude those that are unworthy from that important trust, as persons whom they cannot suppose to be called by the Holy Ghost to take it upon them; and that they may preside over the doctrine and behaviour of those committed to their care, in such a manner, as may render both most edifying to those who attend their instruction. By these pious and zealous endeavours an establishment will flourish, and separate interests decrease. But what folly and iniquity were it, so much as secretly to wish, that one limb might grow by the distemper of the body, or one coast be enriched by the wreck of the public navy!

Once more, let us, on the principles on which I am now insisting, earnestly pray for those, who have the care of educating youth intended for public stations. Let us pray for all the universities of Great Britain, and for more private academies and schools; which, according to the manner in which they are regulated, will either be the blessing or the calamity of our country. May those, that are so trained up for one important employment or another, and especially those intended for the ministry of Christ's church, be formed to extensive knowledge, and above all, to the knowledge of the gospel! May they be regulated by proper discipline, that habits of virtue may be formed, as well as principles of science and truth imbibed! May those to whom God has committed the high and laborious, though honourable, charge of presiding over such societies, ever remember how much they have to answer for, to God, and to their country! May they cultivate these plantations with that assiduity, may they watch over them with that caution, and I will add, may they weed them with that prudence and resolution, which in concurrence with those influences from above, on which all depends, may render them like a field which the Lord has blessed, and a garden which he continually cares for! There may the rising hopes of future generations flourish, and those plants be reared and spread, which in due time may beautify our land, and refresh and nourish its inhabitants!

And may God so guard our religious and civil liberties from generation to generation, that in this respect, as well as the other, the inhabitants of our favoured island may sit every man under his vine, and under his fig-tree, and have none to make him afraid. May not the study and the arts of peace, among us at least, be interrupted by the noise of war; may not our ears hear the tumult of battle, nor our eyes see the miserable spectacles it produces! Only by report may we learn the success of our fleets and our armies abroad; till we at length hear, that the contention ends in a safe and honourable peace!

And let it not be misinterpreted, as unworthy a British and a Christian heart, to add, let us pray for our enemies; for that haughty nation, which despises our prayers, and has treated us with so much injustice and contempt. May they be sensible of the injury they have done us, and of the affront they have, by every act of injustice and cruelty, offered to the Majesty of heaven, the Father of nations, and the Guardian of men; whose penetrating eye sees through the frauds which may cover treaties, and before whose tribunal those criminals must be arraigned, who are too great, or too distant, for the reach of human justice! May Spain have no reason to glory in those vain refuges, to which the idolatrous principles of their unhappy church teach them to fly! May they be disposed to give, and we to receive, all reasonable satisfaction! And O that, if it were the will of God, their eyes might be opened to see the delusions of popery, which they support in all its darkness, and rigour, and terror! O that they might be so happy, as to understand the guilt of those murders, which they are committing in the injured name of the most merciful Jesus! May their princes, and their priests, see how much it is for their own interest on the whole, whatever the principles of carnal policy may dictate, to divest themselves of those spoils of innocence, and ornaments of superstition, which, gaudy as they seem, may mark them out as the objects of divine vengeance! The day will assuredly come, when the cry of the souls under the altar shall be heard: and there is hardly a nation under heaven that has more reason to dread it, than that with which we are now contending; for none have been more eager, and none more resolute and inexorable, in treading out the first sparks of truth, when it began to kindle among them, and in adding the blood of the martyrs to all their other pollutions.*

In what rigour that diabolical engine of mischief, the inquisition, is still established among them, you need not to be told; but though its foundations are laid deep as hell, the hand of God can overthrow them. He can shake the firmest arches of the dungeon, and lay open all that laboured artificial darkness to the full lustre of truth and the gospel. May he hasten that happy time, when he will do it; that day, when the all-uniting religion of the blessed Jesus shall exert its genuine influence, and cement the divided kingdoms, that now call themselves his church, in holy friendship and fraternal affection! that happy day, when instead of preparing the instruments, and studying the arts, of destruction, they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea! Amen.

* I doubt not but many of my readers will know, that I here refer to what happened in Spain quickly after the Reformation, which we learn particularly from Paramus, in many [illegible] which we [illegible] as quoted by Dr. Gooding in the [illegible] of his [illegible] Tracts, p. 417, et seq. viz. That the Spanish troops sent by the emperor Charles the Fifth, and by son Philip the Second, into Germany, England, and Flanders, to convert the protestants in those parts to the Roman faith, were themselves converted from popery, and as they were persons of great parts and piety, returned into their native country full of zeal for its reformation; but were entirely destroyed by the inquisition, and together with many thousands converts which were the first-fruits of their ministry were massacred or ordered on scaffolds and at the stake. Dr. Gooding has preserved an account of some of the glorious leaders in that army of martyrs, which, short and incomplete as it is, deserves an attentive perusal.

SERMON XVII.

REFLECTIONS ON DIVINE PROVIDENCE IN THE CONCLUSION OF THE LATE WAR.*

PSALM cvii. 43.

Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord.

As almost all the nations of the earth have, from their first plantation upon it, had some forms of religion among them, (though alas, those forms have been too generally erroneous and superstitious,) it is observable, they have had recourse to their sacred solemnities, when they have been passing from peace to war, or from war to peace. Among some of the most celebrated of the ancients, war was proclaimed by the ministers of religion, and military expeditions were opened by devout processions and public sacrifices; whereby they seemed to appeal to their deities as witnesses of the justice of their cause, and professedly to put themselves under their protection.† And when the strife of war ceased, pacific treaties have generally been confirmed by the sanction of mutual oaths; and the festivities which have accompanied the conclusion of them, have crowded the temples with worshippers, as well as the streets and houses with tokens of rejoicing. Well then may such customs prevail in Christian states, where our dependence on Divine Providence is known to such advantage; and most suitable is it to a sovereign, who esteems it his honour to be called the defender of the faith, after having so often called us together to supplicate the divine blessing on his arms, thus to assemble us this day to return our thanks to the great Disposer of all events, for the success with which he has crowned our negociations of peace. And surely our cheerful compliance is the more evidently reasonable, as all the successes of the war abroad, glorious as some of them have indeed been, were so balanced by events of a different nature, that our governors (who sing not Te Deum in vain) did not think it convenient to appoint one day of general thanksgiving on the account of them.

As we well know Divine Providence to be concerned even in the minutest affairs of the animal or vegetable creation, we must certainly, on the most obvious principles, acknowledge its interposition where large communities of men are in question: with relation to these it is peculiarly said, I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil; I the Lord do all these things. And as a careful attention to Providence is always our duty and interest, it will especially appear so in proportion to the importance of the events it produces and directs. To such reflections therefore I would this day invite you, and I know not how to do it better than in the words of the text; which are the more suitable, as the vicissitudes to which they immediately relate are evidently of a public nature; circumstances, whereby men were on the one hand blessed with prosperity and plenty, or on the other hand diminished and brought low, through oppression, affliction, and sorrow, by such revolutions as did not only affect numbers of private persons, but poured contempt upon princes, and caused those that had once been distinguished, perhaps in cities, provinces, or armies, to wander forlorn in the trackless wilderness. All these things are supposed under a moral government and superintendency, which should at length cause the righteous to rejoice, and iniquity, how loudly soever it had for a while triumphed and insulted, to stop its mouth, confounded and ashamed. And then it is added, Whoso is wise, he will observe these things; so observe them, as to see the secret hand of God in them, even where the train of events is most natural: and they who attend to them in this light, shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord to them that fear him, which shall emerge gloriously out of every cloud that might seem for a while to darken it. Thus the psalm ends; and the prophecy of Hosea concludes with a passage exactly parallel to this, in which my text seems to be quoted and paraphrased: Who is wise, and he shall understand these things! prudent, and he shall know them! for the ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them; but the transgressors shall fall therein.

Permit me then solemnly to call you this day, to

* Preached at Northampton, April 25, 1749, being the day appointed by his Majesty for a General Thanksgiving on account of the Peace concluded with France and Spain.

† I am persuaded, that the 149th Psalm is an ode of this kind, that was sung when David's army was marching out to war against the remnant of the devoted nations, and first went up in solemn procession to the house of God, thereunto it were to consecrate the arms he put into their hands. The beds referred to, verse 5, on which they were to sing aloud, were probably the couches on which they lay at the banquet attending their sacrifices, which gives a noble sense to a passage for any other interpretation hardly intelligible.

make a serious pause, and to employ that recess from other business which the season and the place give, in looking back upon the series of events through which we have lately passed, as those that believing the universal government of God, would regard the works of the Lord, and consider the operation of his hands. The power of reflection is the glory of the rational nature. May we now be directed to a proper use of it! and it will afford us a calm pleasure, which, though in these circumstances not unchastised with pain, is nevertheless much to be preferred to all the joys of a licentious mirth, to the laughter of fools, which Solomon esteemed but as the crackling of thorns under a pot.

It would very ill become me, to pretend to a knowledge of the secret springs of those events which have lately passed before us, or to set up for any peculiar penetration in judging of things which are most apparent. But there are certain obvious remarks which arise from circumstances universally known, which, though they be important in proportion to the degree in which they are obvious, some for want of attention may not fall upon, and others may not discern in that connexion which is like to render them most useful. I think it therefore congruous to the relation in which I stand to you, and to the occasion of this day's assembly, to endeavour to guide your meditations to them, and to assist you in dwelling on the review.

Let me then mention several things which have lately passed before the eyes of all Europe, as worthy of your further remembrance and consideration. And I shall endeavour to do it without any unnecessarily severe reflections upon those of our neighbours, with whom we have lately been contending. When hostilities were once commenced, many of the events most grievous to us were justifiable by the laws of nations: and so far as ambition, or any other evil principle, might be the occasions of opening them, may the great Preserver of men forgive it, and make us and our new friends for the future wiser and happier! In the mean time, as the most solemn acts of mutual reconciliation have passed, it would be unworthy the generosity of Britons to rehearse the wrongs they could not but once apprehend and resent. But it is surely consistent with the sincerest reconciliation, and with all the rules of propriety and decency, on such an occasion as this, to commemorate the divine goodness to us in events, which during the breach were afflictive to those who were then our enemies: and it is with no unfriendly disposition that we wish, they likewise may remember them for their future instruction. I shall not therefore make any further apology for what of this nature may occur; but proceed to those reflections which may be naturally suggested from what we may easily recollect of the rise, progress, and conclusion of the war; reflections, which it may in many instances be pleasant to pursue, and I hope in all profitable to retain.

I. Let us recollect, how much we are obliged to the divine goodness, that the late war hath not proved our destruction, or that of our protestant neighbours.

Nothing is more common, than for those who have long been pampered with the blessings of peace, in the height of their spirits, to plunge themselves into war with a kind of wanton confidence, like that with which the horse rushes into the battle: but the issue has been so frequent, that it grew into a proverb many ages ago, They who take the sword perish with the sword. Let us adore the divine goodness, that Great Britain is not added to the instances which illustrate it. It is the more reasonable particularly to acknowledge it, considering how ill we were provided with some kind of preparations, and how destitute of alliances, when the war with Spain broke out; and how deplorably, I will not pretend to say by what sad fatality, we have since been disappointed in our expectations from some, who were most evidently joined with us in a community of public interest, had public interest been duly understood or regarded.

But it is sufficient to have hinted at this. Let me rather call back your thoughts this day to the storm that hung over us, when France was preparing for so formidable an invasion, and God blew with his wind, and scattered them, and strewed their own shores with the wreck of those ships and men, which had been armed for our destruction: an event, the importance of which there were few that then thoroughly understood, though what since happened opened the view more distinctly upon us. I here refer to that bold attempt, then concerted, and quickly after made, by the enemies of Britain at home, in concurrence with those abroad. And let me now more solemnly recall to your remembrance that day of alarm and consternation, when a little spring from the Northern mountains, which seemed in its rise beneath our notice, (and was unhappily too much despised,) swelled on a sudden into a torrent, that deluged half our land: when battalions of desperate and infatuated men, having consecrated their swords to our destruction, in blood ever to be lamented, bent on completing the ruin of their country, came pouring on us with such savage fury and unrestrained impetuosity, till it pleased God, according to the language in which he speaks of the proud Assyrian, to put a hook into their nose, and a bridle into their jaws, to turn them back by the way which they came, even like him to their own land, that they might perish there. Dwell, Sirs, on an idea, which I hope is already familiar to your mind, and ought for ever to be retained. Do you not even now tremble to think, what the consequence would probably have been, if those westerly winds which blew almost continually during the same season of the last year, had then been commissioned to detain our forces on the continent! What an æra had that been in the British history! What a spectacle to Europe! What a lamentation to ages unborn! But God wafted over to us speedy deliverance, so that not a company was kept back; nay, I think I may add, hardly a man or a horse miscarried. A deliverance greatly endeared to us by the hand that brought it, and by the remembrance of those importunate prayers which we had so often presented in the day of our distress. Pursue the reflection, and let your hearts this day feel anew the tender and lively gratitude which you owe to God, and to your human protectors.

It becomes us also this day most thankfully to recollect, in what undisturbed tranquillity we have generally lived, during this ten years' war; sitting as in the profoundest peace under our own vines and fig-trees; as entire strangers to those grievous desolations and horrid spectacles, which so many thousands of our neighbours have known, as if no sword had ever been unsheathed. We immediately owe it to the vigilance of our governors, and the advantages of our situation, in concurrence with the strength of our navy, and the conduct, courage, and fidelity of those to whom the command of it was entrusted, (and which the contrary character and behaviour of some in their station has, alas, too unhappily illustrated:) but let us remember, that the governors, the situation, the navy, the commanders, in which we rejoice, are the gifts of a kind Providence, and are to be acknowledged as such. Let the safety of Britain and its provinces, in consequence of all, be the subject of our repeated and continued thanksgivings. Nor let us be so unfeeling for the protestant in general, so forgetful of former benefits, so insensible even of our own present and future security, as not to rejoice, that our allies, and especially the United Provinces, have shared with us in the rescue God has been pleased to give us. Let us adore the Almighty that those prayers for their safety, which we had so much reason to unite with those for our own, have appeared to come up in remembrance before God; so that they are indeed as a brand plucked out of the burning. Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in our Sion, on all these accounts; and unto thee may our vows be performed! the vows, which we made when we were in trouble and perplexity, and lifted up our eyes unto thee, from whom our help cometh, even to the God that made heaven and earth. But amidst all the joy which these reflections may afford,

II. Let us humble ourselves in the review of those rebukes of Providence, which we experienced during the series of the late war.

I question, whether modern history * can produce an instance, in which a war has been entered into with more towering hopes, with more anticipated triumph, than that which we proclaimed against Spain; and probably, the wisest men amongst us thought that confidence no very good omen of our success. We seemed to think, we had nothing to do but to gird on our terrors, and make the earth tremble. As if, according to the beautiful manner in which Isaiah describes the pride of the Assyrian, we might at pleasure go to the nations that had offended us, as securely and irresistibly as to the nest of some little insignificant bird, and gather their riches, as one gathereth eggs that are left, and there should be none to move the wing, or to open the mouth, or to peep. But the event proved very different: we found there was such a thing as military prudence, and strength, and bravery among our enemies, as well as among ourselves: and after all the vain parade with which we set out, we returned, in repeated instances, disappointed and ashamed; so as to have evident reason, after such vast preparations, and such presumptuous confidence, to apply to several of our projects and attempts the words of Israel by the same prophet, We have been with child, we have been in pain; we have as it were brought forth wind; we have not wrought any deliverance in the earth, neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen before us. For succeeding years during our war with France, though the British soldiery to their immortal honour behaved so bravely, we heard not of one battle gained, of one town taken by us or our allies, on the continent; while on the other hand, we received repeated information of actions, in which we had greatly the disadvantage, and in which victory was snatched out of our hands by accidents so vexatious, that they are not, even at this distance, to be named; and of fine towns, more than memory can number, lost to the enemy almost as fast as their forces could march from one of them to another, some without any resistance, and most of the rest with only a feint of defence.

These, Sirs, are mortifying, but they are indisputable, truths; and they must stand upon record, not indeed to the shame of our forces or our generals, but for the instruction of generations to come, that with good advice they may make war; and that, how well soever the measures of it may seem to be concerted, they may not, while girding on their harness, boast as if they were putting it off. I know, that by the war some particular interests have been largely advanced, and many considerable advantages for commerce, while we remained so incontestably masters of the ocean, gained, which to those concerned in them have more than balanced their share in the public expense: but I cannot imagine, that had the nation distinctly foreseen all the consequences, they would have engaged in it with the eagerness they did, when I suppose the whole gain that can be set down at the foot of the account, to balance the loss of so many thousand lives, and so many millions of treasure, is this, that some of our neighbours are perhaps more exhausted than we, and are less able, should they immediately attempt it, to make themselves terrible to the liberties of Europe. On the whole, just as our cause, and upright and strenuous as our measures, were, it appears to have been the scheme of Providence, to save Great Britain from sinking into ruin, rather than to exalt it: and we have much greater reason to wonder, when we consider our circumstances in comparison with our characters, that ruin was averted, than that so few memorable advantages were gained, or some sensible inconveniences incurred. In these views,

* I say [illegible]

III. Let us acknowledge the divine interposition, which facilitated so equitable a peace as that which we this day celebrate.

I shall not enter into any large discourse on the blessings of peace in general; since, how proper soever it may be to recollect them at present, the subject is trite, and many of the most material thoughts which might illustrate it, sufficiently obvious. But I would hint at some things, which are peculiar to the present occasion. I am persuaded, distant posterity will wonder, that so equitable a treaty should take place, when they consider a variety of attending circumstances, and compare them with the great rapidity and extent of the French conquests, and the evident superiority with which they threatened the Low Countries, and by a necessary consequence Britain itself, and all its allies. To suppose this to have been owing to some sudden change in the spirits of men, moderating their ambitious views, and assuaging their thirst of plunder and of empire, would increase rather than abate the wonder; and there are incidents by which, on very different principles, the change of measures may be accounted for; but they are such as still leave room to say, especially when compared with each other, that it is the Lord's doing, and marvellous in our eyes.

In this view we shall naturally think of our late successes at sea, in the first place; whereby the designs of hostile powers were rendered abortive, and those naval preparations which were intended to ruin our colonies, were led home in triumph to our own shores, and made at length to pour that vengeance on themselves, which they had meditated against us; whilst the opportunity which our maritime force gave us of cutting off their trade, and at the same time of extending our own, added strength to the sinews of war amongst us, which it weakened amongst them. Nor are we to consider that ever-memorable series of providences which gave Cape Breton into our hands, as insignificant to this end. For though important reasons obliged the government to restore it, it is certain, the possession which we actually had of so valuable a jewel of the French crown must add great weight to our negociations, and equitably entitle us to many advantages which we might not otherwise have been able to obtain: not to say what influence our having so long held it, and intimately known its state, connexions, and dependences, may have on settling and conducting that colony to our adjacent province of Nova Scotia, which under the divine blessing, (to which I hope we shall fervently recommend it,) may be productive of signal advantages, and prove a happy equivalent for what it has been necessary to resign.

In these things the arm of the Lord hath been made bare; and lest the part which we ourselves have had in them should make us less sensible of it, God hath been pleased to interpose in other instances, where we could pretend to no share of glory. In this view, besides what I said of the renewed wonders of Providence in so favourable a disposition of the winds,* we have great reason to reflect on the scarcity of provisions in France, while we were enriched with plenty, for many successive years. And though in the mean time distempers reigned among our horned cattle, yet, blessed be God, never to such a degree, as in some neighbouring countries, where various provisions were raised to almost three times their former value. And the fertility of our sheep, as well as of our lands, while our kine have been visited and afflicted, is never to be reflected upon without grateful acknowledgment; as it hath not only moderated the price of our food, but furnished us abundantly for those manufactures, the trade of which has been carried on extensively abroad, so much to our national advantage; in consequence of which, we have been much better able to support the necessary expense of the war. And this has taught our enemies to look upon us, not as an exhausted, ruined people, but as those who had still resources sufficient to render them formidable, and whom it was not their interest to provoke to the last extremities.

I am indeed sensible, there are some, who being themselves surrounded with all the blessings of plenty, and attentive only to accidental personal advantages, or to the happy consequences which might have attended some successful action on the seas, or in the field, at a crisis like that which has lately occurred, regret the pacification in which we are this day called to rejoice. But such should temper these sanguine views, by remembering, how possible it was that another action might have been unsuccessful to us and our allies, and how dreadful the consequences of this must have been to the public cause, and even to Britain itself; whose army might then probably have been utterly cut off, and whose naval strength might not have been able to have defended it, if the wealth and shipping of Holland had fallen into the hand that was stretched out over them. The view indeed is so affecting, that it is painful to dwell upon it; and one trembles to think of casting the die for so deep a stake, had the chance been more equal than it seems to have been. But one of the first unhappy events which might have attended the risk, leads us to reflect on that signal interposition of Heaven, which, in the hour of extremity, and with a hand conspicuous to the whole world, raised the House of Orange to such distinguished dignity and power, whereby the strength of the Low Countries is drawn into a point, and a steadiness and weight is given to their councils; which will render them respectable in the eyes of all Europe, and must surely put it out of the power of any neighbouring states, to traverse our interest in them, and to deprive us of their important assistance, if future emergencies should arise. From this surprising event, with many others which have occurred of late years,

* See some illustration of the expression here used, in my sermon, preached on the Fast Day, 1758-9; and a much fuller in that excellent pamphlet, called Britain's Remembrancer.

IV. Let us take occasion to reflect on the vanity of human ambition.

Some of its fatal effects we immediately saw; and I persuade myself, the hostilities which were exchanged between us and our neighbours, could not so far steel our hearts against all sentiments of humanity, as that we should not tenderly regret on their side, as well as on our own, the many sacrifices which were made to that merciless demon. And who must not now be struck, to observe how it has repaid its votaries? We may hope, it will be a lesson of wisdom, moderation, and justice, to distant nations, and to future ages, when they hear and read, how after so vast an expense of blood and treasure, after so many fine provinces harassed, so many rich cities plundered, so many thousands and myriads slain in their prime, the consequence of all should be, to quit what had been thus violently usurped, with this only consolation, or little but this, that the places through which the sanguinary procession had passed, were left less populous, less beautiful, less opulent, than they had been found, and that perhaps a day had ruined what nature and art had been years in forming. Can we imagine, that if France could have foreseen, how France would have been lacerated, chastised, and exhausted, not to say in many instances disgraced, it would have purchased the disquiet of Flanders, of Germany, of Italy, of Britain, at so dear a rate? Surely it would be unjust to suspect that, or any nation under heaven, of so much disinterested malevolence. But, as in the instance of Edom, it may justly be said, The pride of their heart hath deceived them; and the men of their confederacy, the auxiliary forces on which they so much relied, have only brought them back to their own impoverished border. The river rose with impetuosity, and deluged the lands on either side; it bore down their ornaments, and their wealth, into a sea of destruction: and now its force and fury are spent, it runs, not unsullied, within its former channel.

While we reflect upon this, and perhaps suppress in our minds some of those reflections which will naturally arise upon it, let us pray, that wiser and more equitable, as well as more benevolent, measures and principles may prevail among the rulers of the earth. And let us rejoice, that the counsels of Britain, and the conduct of that generous prince who presides over them, may teach the nations honour and good faith. The glory of our sovereign in this respect must be the joy and boast of his people, far beyond what the trophies of conquest could yield: and it must give a satisfaction not to be paralleled by any little momentary advantages which a contrary conduct might promise, that posterity will testify for his Britannic majesty, how religiously his treaties have been observed, and his engagements fulfilled; in consequence of which his throne has stood firm against all efforts to shake it, supported by the grateful affection of a free people, supported, above all, by the omnipotent Guardian of justice and truth.

V. Let the scenes through which we have passed, teach us to value and cultivate peace at home.

The public virtues of a prince take off very much from the merit of loyalty; and in an assembly like this I need not urge, how much those of ours would increase the infamy of disaffection. May they who need such kind of lessons more, reflect how sadly our dissensions at home have weakened our strength and our importance abroad. Taught by what the common interest has suffered by them, let us exert the utmost influence of our examples, our persuasions, and our prayers, to unite all around us in attachment to our illustrious king and his family, and in unfeigned love to each other. And O that he, whose powerful influence alone can effect it, would so subdue every unkind suspicion and unfriendly prejudice, as to promote our civil and ecclesiastical union in degrees which have been hitherto unknown! A civil and political union seems so easy under a government like ours, that one would wonder any should oppose it, who have not some unnatural antipathy to liberty and pros-petty, or whose desperate circumstances and characters do not apparently give them an interest in the confusion of the public. In religious affairs, mistaken principles conscientiously admitted and retained may create mutual difficulties, which may embarrass the most faithful and affectionate counsellors of peace; not to say, how far secular interest may, in some cases, increase the embarrassment. But let us humbly look up to that universally acknowledged, but alas, almost as universally neglected, Head of the church, to whose all-healing energy no evils are incurable; that he may diffuse those gentle but powerful influences of the spirit of love, which may effectually prevent our reviling or suspecting, our judging and despising, each other. As for us, while under an unwilling necessity of continuing separate from our brethren, may we use, thankful, peaceful, and unenvied, the liberty which the laws of God and man allow! and may growing experience more fully teach protestants of every denomination, how good and pleasant it is for brethren, though perhaps in different habits and assemblies, to dwell together in unity; how much beauty, and pleasure, and strength, are added to the community, when it is cemented by such bonds! Which leads me to a yet more extensive reflection:

VI. Let what has passed, teach us to conduct ourselves, and all under our influence, by such rules of prudence and virtue, as may have a natural tendency to increase our national strength.

I would not cloud the festivity of a day like this, by any thing which might appear an inauspicious insinuation as to the peace so lately established: may it be as lasting as it is welcome to any who are concerned in it; and may Providence give our children's children to rejoice in its happy consequences! But we know, that all human affairs are uncertain; and it cannot easily be forgotten, that the peace with France towards the end of King William's reign, and that with Spain towards the end of Queen Anne's, did neither of them continue seven years. It is however evident, that nothing will tend more to perpetuate this pacification, than our being so provided against a contrary event, that none of our neighbours may find it their interest, if by a fatal relapse it should be their inclination, to disturb us.

There are natural and political precautions to be taken for this purpose, which will undoubtedly be the care of our governors, and concerning the particulars of which none but they who have the management of public affairs can competently judge: but there are others, and those on the whole not less important, which are of such a nature, as well becomes the teachers of religion to recommend and enforce; I mean, the cultivating those moral dispositions, without which we may venture to say, that none other can have a sufficient efficacy for the general safety.

And here no thought more readily occurs, than the necessity of endeavouring to curb that taste for luxury and pleasurable expense, which has done so much to enervate, disgrace, and impoverish us. One would imagine, that the degree to which our finances must necessarily have been exhausted during so long and expensive a war, should enforce a prudent frugality on all who have any regard for the public good. But instead of this, were we to judge from the glaring objects which every where strike us, a considerate man would be tempted to suspect, that the whole nation, if it acted on any scheme at all, was fallen into the unhappy artifice whereby so many particular persons have been undone; I mean, that of fancying a credit may be established among their neighbours, by making a gay figure, when there is least to support it. True prudence would certainly teach us to endeavour to retrieve our affairs, while there is a possibility of doing it, by imposing on ourselves those sumptuary laws, (if I may be allowed the expression,) which the indulgence of our superiors spare us; that a vain parade, and an excessive delicacy, in the articles of food and dress, of furniture and equipage, may not melt down our spirits, and increase our necessities, and so make us the more accessible to corruption, the more averse to those labours and dangers, which, if we know not now resolutely to face, we shall in consequence of that be forced to meet, and perhaps the sooner when we turn our backs upon an enemy to avoid them.

Permit me further to observe, of how great importance it is, that a wise and steady care be taken in the education of youth, that they may be trained up in the way in which they should go; a care to form them betimes to strenuous resolution and industry, to activity and self-denial, to reverence for laws, and obedience to just and equitable government, and in a word, to every generous sentiment with regard to the public good and the liberty of their country: that they may take an honest pleasure and pride (if I may be permitted to say it) in sacrificing to that every personal interest which may seem to oppose it. The more elevated and distinguished the station of any one in question may be, the more important will these precautions be found, and the more solicitously should such principles be inculcated: but even in lower life this care is necessary; that if those whose prerogative it is to set the fashion should fail, as amidst their strong temptations they so generally do, all may not be carried away by the torrent.

The like considerations call us to exert ourselves for the execution of those wholesome laws, which are enacted for the suppression of profaneness and vice, but which are so frequently violated, and audaciously insulted. Associations of worthy and public-spirited men are in this view very desirable; especially for restraining that licentiousness, which if not carried into an army, is so frequently brought out of it, even where it has in the main been well disciplined; and which in civil life, to which disbanded soldiers must return, is pregnant with many grievous and fatal consequences.

I might enlarge here; but these are hints of advice, easily suggested by one destitute of all religion, and which no prudent atheist would oppose or neglect. It becomes the servants of the living God, the ministers of the everlasting gospel, to lead your thoughts much further on such an occasion: I must therefore add,

VII. Let us all be engaged by the survey we have been taking, to repose ourselves on God, and to seek his protection and favour in the way he has graciously appointed.

We well know him to be the great disposer of all events, who speaks at pleasure, with an efficacious voice, concerning a nation, as well as a family, to plant or pluck up, to build or destroy it. Our highest wisdom must therefore consist in securing his favour, by a most grateful reception of his gospel, and a faithful and constant compliance with its great and blessed design. And indeed it is, as the apostle insinuates, absolutely necessary, that virtue should be grafted on faith in order to its flourishing. Permit me therefore this day, solemnly to renew the exhortation I have so often given you, that you submit to the authority of the word, and of the Son of God, and that you endeavour religiously to conform yourselves to the Christian institution; acting as in the presence of that Holy Majesty of heaven, who registers all our actions, and penetrates our hearts; feeling at all times the deepest and most affectionate sense of your infinite obligations to redeeming grace; and considering yourselves as continually on the borders of an eternal state, where happiness or misery awaits you complete and perpetual. These are motives and considerations, suited to produce that consistency, that uniformity, that elevation of goodness, which must never be expected on any other foundation.

And what glorious hopes might we not form for our dear country, if sentiments like these were generally to prevail! "O Britain, thou nation saved and favoured of the Lord! If God hath so powerfully rescued thee again and again, plunged as thou art into so many excesses and enormities; if his arm has been thus made bare in thy defence, whilst many who boast the most ancient hereditary honours, or whose achievements for their country's good have ennobled their line, deem it no stain to their greatness, to show their contempt of religion, and to teach every rank below them, to profane his sabbaths, to neglect his ordinances, or to affront them yet more by their irreverent attendance, and by every other method to dishonour and outrage that tremendous name, which is the awe of heaven, and the terror of hell;—if he not only spare, but by signal interpositions deliver and bless thee, while profaneness and riot walk through thy villages and cities uncontrolled, and almost unreproved too; and so many of thy watchmen themselves sleep over their charge, where they do not by false principles or scandalous examples cause their people to err,—what mightest thou not expect were a general reformation to prevail! What prosperity, what felicity would not attend thee, if thy princes and thy nobles appeared indeed to reverence the God of heaven; if his sabbaths were religiously observed, his name honoured, his worship devoutly celebrated, in the family as well as in the sanctuary; if pastors, to the strength of argument and the fervour of exhortation, publicly and from house to house, added the sanction of a blameless, an holy, and edifying example; and in consequence of this there were a general solicitude in those under their ministry, however they varied in opinions and in forms, to unite in adorning the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things!"

Surely the consequence must be, that a nation thus truly Christian, though far less distinguished by natural advantages than ours, would appear at once amiable and awful; or, in Solomon's sublime language, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners. Our neighbours would revere us; our God would protect us, and shower down his blessings upon us; the blessings of peace and plenty; which being traced up to their true source, being also moderately used, and equitably and generously distributed to those that were real and proper objects of compassion, would be far sweeter than ever. When our counsellors were faithful, and knew no interest of their own to be compared with that of the public; when our leaders, like that excellent man who so lately fell in our defence,* feared to sin, but not to die; and there was in the breast of every soldier a calm resignation to the will of God, a noble ambition of securing his approbation, a well grounded confidence in his favour, whether for time or eternity; what could we reasonably dread! Surely, bad as the world is, the enemies of such a people would be few; and God, their guardian, would make such enemies to know, that he who touched them touched the apple of his eye.

Whose heart does not kindle at such a representation! Who that loves his country would not form the most ardent wishes, that this may be its character and its felicity! May the repose God hath been pleased to give us be subservient to this blessed end! and now that our public counsellors are eased of many burthens, which the exigences and operations of the war must occasion, may their thoughts be directed to the happiest measures, whereby immoralities may be further curbed, and pure, genuine, catholic Christianity most effectually promoted and established among us! And may they who stand in the first rank of the ministers of Christ, be animated to lead the way, with a courage, magnanimity, and zeal, which may transmit their names with glory to the remotest ages, and through the grace of the gospel entitle them to more distinguished honours in the church above, than any constitution or prince upon earth can confer!

* See Colonel Gardiner's Life, § 11.

To conclude all, with the mention of what in this connexion may easily present itself to our mind,

VIII. Let the occasion of this day's assembly lead our thoughts to that universal peace of the church, which we expect in the latter day, and to the complete peace of the heavenly world.

How delightful is it to think, that whatever blemishes we for the present lament in churches, whatever desolations in states and kingdoms, there is a time approaching when all shall be remedied; a glorious, long expected time, for the manifestation of which the whole creation seems to travail and be in pain; when the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the channel of the sea, and the world shall learn by happy experience, what Christianity is, and what the invaluable blessings with which it is pregnant. Let us cheer our hearts with the lovely and glorious prospect of that day of grand and final pacification, when, once for all, those who have been armed for the destruction of each other, shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more, having so cordially learned the gospel of peace. Glorious period, when the religion of Jesus shall universally prevail over the whole human race, and disarm their fierce passions, and regulate their exorbitant desires, and inspire the most benevolent and generous sentiments! When men shall regard their fellow-men of all nations as their brethren, and desire to see all around them as happy as themselves; forgetting, with a nobleness of heart which nothing but the gospel of Christ can inspire, every personal, yea, I will add, every national, interest, which appears inconsistent with the happiness of the whole human species!

But who shall live when God doth this? when this great miracle shall close the scene of wonders, which the Christian revelation has opened? Probably a distant generation, by whom our names shall be forgotten, though the event itself be as certain as the divine oracles can render it. We will, at least, with the first-fruits of a temper which shall then so universally prevail, rejoice in the expected happiness of those who shall not so much as know that we ever existed.

And if some regard to personal engagements will, as it is so natural and so just, mingle themselves with sentiments like these, let me, on this good occasion, call your thoughts to the much nearer and more important prospects of the eternal world; prospects which, I hope, are familiar to the minds of many among us, and to which so many sad spectacles as daily present themselves here, concur to lead us. It is painful to a truly benevolent spirit, especially to one who considers the remoter consequences of things, to look round on what is generally the state of the present world, and to look back on the history of mankind in preceding times, ancient or modern. There is no branch of science with respect to which it may be so truly said, He who increaseth knowledge, increaseth sorrow in proportion to it. In this respect, they seem to have the greatest advantage, who know only the story of their own personal and domestic afflictions, and those of a little circle of near neighbours. Yet so is our nature constituted, that we delight and wish to know how it fares, and has fared, with others, though at the expense of a sad sympathy: but it is most comfortable to reflect, that, where God has given such a sensibility of heart, founded on true principles of piety and charity, he hath appointed, that the soul in which it dwells should not long inherit the infirmities and sorrows of human flesh, nor multiply years in the provinces of calamity and misery. He did not send those heaven-born graces down to earth, merely to teach men to weep the tears of humanity, though they have their intermingled sweetness too. Unfeigned universal love shall infallibly be the source of joy. Yet a little while, and God will draw a veil over all these mournful spectacles; or rather, he will raise us beyond the view of them, to a high and serene situation, from whence the penetrating eye shall command an ample prospect, beyond the present stretch even of thought, and nothing shall strike it but sights of bliss.

In the mean time, let our eyes be lifted up towards heaven, in humble hope, and in fervent prayer, for the public prosperity, for the prevalency of true Christianity in the whole world, especially in our own country; and above all, (as it is that in which we are first and most intimately concerned,) for its prevalency in our own hearts; that we may steadily retain it, that we may faithfully practise it, that we may daily advance in our conformity to it. So shall we understand the loving-kindness of the Lord, in the general conduct of present affairs; and though there may be mysteries of Providence which we cannot particularly explain, shall assuredly believe, that all the paths of it are mercy and truth, and find the truest and the securest peace in our passage to everlasting joy. Amen.

A HYMN,

Sung after the Sermon, to the Tune of the Old Fiftieth Psalm.

I.

Now let our songs address the God of peace,
Who bids the tumult of the battle cease.
The pointed spears to pruning-hooks he bends,
"And the broad faulchion in the plough-share ends."
His powerful word unites contending nations
In kind embrace and friendly salutations.

II.

Britain, adore the guardian of thy state;
Who high on his celestial throne elate,
Still watchful o'er thy safety and repose,
Frowned on the counsels of thy haughtiest foes:
Thy coasts secured from every dire invasion
Of fire and sword, and spreading desolation.

III.

When rebel-bands with desperate madness joined,
He wafted o'er deliverance with his wind;
Drove back the tide that deluged half our land,
And curbed their fury with his mightier hand:
Till dreadful slaughter and the last confusion
Taught those audacious sinners their delusion.

IV.

He gave our fleets to triumph o'er the main,
And scatter terrors cross wide ocean's plain;
Opposing leaders trembled at the sight,
Nor found their safety in the attempted flight:
Taught by their bonds, how vainly they pretended
Those to distress whom Israel's God defended.

V.

Fierce storms were summoned up in Britain's aid,
And meagre famine hostile lands o'erspread:
By sufferings bowed, their conquests they release,
Nor scorn the overtures of equal peace.
Contending powers congratulate the blessing,
Joint hymns of gratitude to Heaven addressing.

VI.

While we beneath our vines and fig-trees sit,
Or thus within thy sacred temples meet;
Accept, great God, the tribute of our song,
And all the mercies of this day prolong!
Then spread thy peaceful word thro' every nation,
That all the earth may hail thy great salvation.

SERMON XVIII.

DELIVERANCE OUT OF THE HANDS OF OUR ENEMIES URGED AS A MOTIVE TO OBEDIENCE.

Being the substance of two Sermons, preached at Northampton, February 9, 1776, on occasion of the precipitate flight of the Rebels from Stirling Castle.

Luke i. 74, 75.

That he would grant unto us, that we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life.

I should think myself inexcusable, if, after having publicly addressed you with so many admonitions, and so many encouragements, through the whole period of our late public alarms, I should be silent as to the favourable turn which our affairs seem now to be taking; and did not lead you to greet these first openings of deliverance which God is giving us, with your earliest hymns of grateful praise. Far be it from any of us to resemble the nine lepers, who though they had been so loud in their cries for mercy under their affliction as to be heard afar off, yet having received their cure returned not to give glory to God. I am indeed sensible, that our deliverance is not yet complete. Though our enemies are fled with so much precipitation before our forces, led on by that heroic prince whom Providence has raised so gloriously to command them, we are not as yet putting off our harness. But we have reason to hope, that the end of guiding it on is in a great measure answered, and it is certain that a becoming acknowledgment of these beginnings of mercy, will be the most probable means to secure the full accomplishment of our hopes. I have therefore chosen the words before us, with a particular view to this great and happy event; and it is obvious, that they will naturally lead me into suitable and important reflections upon it.

You will easily remember, that these are the words that celebrated song, in which Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, uttered his joys and his hopes on the birth of such a son, and in which he employed and consecrated the first accents of his recovered speech. This venerable priest, under the influence of the prophetic spirit, blesses the God of Israel, who had raised up a horn of salvation, (that is, who was just raising a powerful Saviour,) for them, in the house of his servant David, whose office and glory it should be, to perform the mercy promised to their fathers, the substance of which he comprehends in the words of my text; and thus to complete what he had so often engaged in effect, though not in express words, that Israel under his auspicious government, being delivered out of the hands of their enemies, and of all them that hated them, should serve him without fear, in a steady course of holiness and righteousness before him.

I will not take upon me to determine the exact idea, which Zacharias himself had to these words; whether he meant to refer to that great salvation from our spiritual enemies, which Christ gives, and to those influences of his Spirit on the hearts of his people, whereby they are effectually engaged to a persevering course of holiness and righteousness; or whether he might have his eye to some expected conquest over that Gentile power, by which Israel was then held in subjection, and to a temporal kingdom to be established in consequence of it, in which righteousness should reign in a more remarkable manner, than it had ever before done among the children of men. He, like others of the prophets, after having delivered their divine oracles, might have need of searching what the Spirit of Christ did particularly signify therein. But it is evident, that whether we take it in the one or the other of these views, it will afford us a just foundation for two remarks, most suitable to our present circumstances:—that to be delivered out of the hands of our enemies is a great favour of Divine Providence;—and that it loudly calls for a course of steady and cheerful obedience to God as our great Benefactor.

It will, therefore, be very agreeable to the general sentiments expressed in these words, that I should,

First, Endeavour to make you sensible of the greatness of this deliverance, which God has now granted us out of the hands of our enemies. And,

Secondly, Represent and enforce that return, which he most reasonably demands from us, and to which the text may naturally direct our thoughts.

Such representations are undoubtedly necessary: I pray God they may in this instance be as effectual as they are sincere. I am,

First, To endeavour to make you sensible of the greatness of this deliverance, which God has now granted us; by the pains with which he seems to have struck the leaders and abettors of that unnatural rebellion, which he hath permitted to arise amongst us: that so our hearts may be disposed to those returns of gratitude which he demands.

Now to this purpose I shall consider it,—first, in a more general view:—and then in some particular circumstances, which may further heighten our grateful sense of it.

I. I would consider the deliverance out of the hands of our enemies, which God is now opening upon us, in a more general view.

Here I shall take a view of it in general, with regard to the aspect which it has—upon our substance,—our liberties,—our religion,—and our posterity. And each view will convince us of its importance, and do its part towards awakening our gratitude.

To make you more sensible of this, let me now lead you to imagine, (though the imagination is painful and shocking,) what must have been our case, if the progress of the rebellious arms of our enemies had been carried on with a rapidity, like that which they at first boasted; if they had been supported by powerful succours from abroad; and if, according to their vain hopes, considerable numbers from the southern part of our island had joined them; so that they had marched on to our capital, and taken possession of it, either destroying or driving away that illustrious prince whom God has set over us, and those numerous branches of his royal family around him, whom we have so long beheld with delight as the pledges of peace and happiness to succeeding generations. Consider, how our possessions and liberties, our religion and posterity, would have been affected by such an event; and then judge, what an aspect our deliverance has upon each.

1. As to our worldly substance.

This, among so many dearer names, may seem less worthy of our mention. A generous and manly spirit will indeed bear the diminution of it with a calm steadiness; and the true Christian will be conscious of a better and more enduring substance, laid up beyond the reach of violence and rapine. Yet some value is justly to be set on what we here possess, as the gift of Providence, and as that by which we are enabled, not only to make some comfortable provision for those whom God has committed to our immediate care, but likewise to do good to many others, by a variety of humane and charitable actions, which may greatly adorn our religious profession. And whether our wealth be the acquisition of our own industry, or have descended to us by inheritance from our fathers, there is something in each of these considerations, which makes the loss of it grievous; how gradually soever it may be impaired, and though no circumstance of external violence deprive us of it, but we seem (according to the remarkable expression of the prophet) to put our money into a bag with holes. Much more grievous then must it be, to be stripped on a sudden, and above all, in such a way; to see our enemies possessed of what we just before called our own, and perhaps taking a malicious pleasure, not only to use, but to destroy it before our eyes.

The great Author of our nature, who most fully knows its frame, does sometimes mention this among the saddest consequences of invasion and conquest. So the distress and vexation of it is pathetically represented, in the message he sent to Israel by Moses: Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof; thine ass (the usual beast of burthen among them, and answering to our ordinary horses) shall be violently taken away before thy face, and shall not be restored to thee: thy sheep shall be given to thine enemies, and thou shalt have none to rescue them: the fruit of thy land, and all thy labours, shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up: so that thou shalt be mad, for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see.

While our enemies have been traversing the northern part of our island, and penetrating even to its centre, thousands have known the literal accomplishment of these words. And I hope we shall never forget that the cup was just passing to us: so that had not God, and that brave prince whom he made the instrument of our deliverance, turned them back, they had in a few hours entered our houses with haughty violence: and had we staid till they arrived there, we might have beheld our provisions greedily devoured, yea, protusely wasted; perhaps, too, had we not been sufficiently obsequious to these detestable inmates, our furniture wantonly destroyed; our houses plundered; our very garments stripped off; and, beyond all peradventure, heavy contributions levied, the amount of which, in one day, might have been much greater than the necessary taxes which the legislature, though with reluctance, are compelled, for the public safety, to demand; or than charity to the families of those who are gone out to fight our battles inclines us voluntarily to advance for their support. This might have been our fate in their march towards our capital; and in a more extreme degree, in their return. And when this tumultuous scene had been over, what could we have expected but much heavier exactions than even the present distress requires? with this painful difference, that instead of advancing our money for the assistance of those who guard and defend us, it must then have been given as a reward for our oppressors and spoilers; I had almost said, as a fee to our executioners. When, therefore, you enter your peaceful habitations, when you sit down to your plentiful tables, and repose yourselves as under your own vines and fig-trees, remember to whom you owe it, that you can call them your own, and be thankful for this deliverance out of the hands of your enemies: a deliverance which will be felt in proportion to the degree in which it is considered; and which we are next to view,

2. In the aspect which it bears on our liberties.

As bondage renders plenty and magnificence tasteless to a generous spirit; so poverty itself puts on a cheerful smile under the blessings of liberty, which makes, if I may allude to the words of David, a little that a freeman hath, better than the abundance of many slaves. Were liberty the portion of the whole human race, (and would to God that it were,) each of them should prize it as, next to religion, his choicest treasure. But it is well known, that, by the proud usurpation of princes or priests, and generally by their collusive combination to support the tyranny of each other, it has been almost entirely banished from the continent, and seems, if not to have sought its last refuge, at least to have fixed its favourite abode, in the British dominions; where it now reigns, in the person of our gracious sovereign, as its guardian genius, who understands the rights and the honours of royalty so well, as to make it his chief glory to be so. It is here, if I may be permitted so to speak, the law that rules supreme; and the greatest and best of our princes most justly esteem it the noblest point of their ambition, to be its protectors and vicegerents: as it is indeed a glorious ambition, to defend a system of wise and equitable laws, which the inhabitants of Britain, from age to age, in their own persons, or by their representatives, have chosen to impose on themselves and their posterity, for their common security and happiness.—And could we have borne to see them insolently trampled under foot, and arbitrary will established in their stead? I hope we could not have endured it; while heaven had left us any force to oppose it; but that, according to the animated expression of a celebrated writer, "we should rather have chosen to die the last of British freemen, than to live the first of British slaves." Yet what but slavery could we have expected, had our throne been filled by one trained up in the oppressive maxims of the French and the Roman courts, who had also some old arrears to discharge, that it is absolutely impossible he should have done it without impoverishing us to a degree which only a nation of slaves could have submitted to: for surely we must have been bound, before we could have permitted ourselves to have been stripped so bare.

Great reason indeed have we to believe, notwithstanding all his empty and absurd pretences "of establishing us in the possession of what we never lost,"* that if ever we should be so unhappy as to see the Pretender possessed of the power he so unreasonably claims, the manner of our king would be like what Samuel so strongly describes to the men of Israel; by whom (he tells them) their children would be abused, and their estates taken away, or the product of them subjected to such impositions, that they who retained the titulary right to them, would be little better than tenants and servants to their haughty monarch. Had we, like the Israelites, ourselves concurred in making such a king, we might like them have reasonably expected, that when we had cried out under this load of oppression, the Lord should not have heard us.

* See [illegible] Answer to the Protestant Association Manifesto, &c.

Let us always remember, that it is our indispensable duty, to exert ourselves to the utmost to prevent so fatal a change in our constitution: and let us bless God every day of our lives, that they who were weak or wicked enough to attempt it, have found themselves unable to perform their enterprise; and that, through the special care of Divine Providence, our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers, that the snare which would have hampered us, not only to our vexation, but to our destruction, is happily broken, and we are escaped free and unhurt. A simile, which in this application of it will appear more evidently just, when we survey our deliverance,

3. In the aspect which it has upon our religion.

If religion be any thing at all significant to a man, it is beyond all comparison more than every thing else. A nation does not easily change its gods, be they what they will; and to have merely some particular forms of a religion, in the main acknowledged to be true, obtruded contrary to a man's conscience, is an insufferable evil. What then must it be, to have our religion violently torn away from us, so far as it can be torn away; to see it at least injured, oppressed, and insulted, if not immediately borne down and extirpated? That pure, holy, and perfect religion, which Christ and his apostles planted upon earth; and which our pious forefathers have delivered down to us, in all its evidence, with such faithful care, sealed with the blood of so many martyrs and confessors!—To exchange this, (or to be urged at length by penal, perhaps by sanguinary, laws, to exchange it,) for so erroneous and superstitious, so absurd and idolatrous, a heap of tenets, ceremonies, and usages, that it seems almost profaning the word to call it a religion; to give up our Bibles to the flames; to lay aside this rational and devout manner of worshipping God (as we assuredly believe) in the most Scriptural and acceptable way, for the unintelligible jargon of a mass, to bow down to images, as if we had been trained up in the most stupid heathenism; and to adore a piece of bread as the Saviour of the world! How much is the thought worse than death! Yea, how beautiful must death appear, as met in opposition to such a change!

And is the supposition I am now making at all unnatural? We will make all the most candid allowances; we will suppose the disposition of all the branches of the aspiring family, which urges its divine right to rule us, to be ever so gentle; we will grant, (what indeed I very believe,) that many who have been bred up in popery, would abhor the cruelties of persecution, and grieve to see their protestant neighbours, among whom many of them have lived so long unmolested, perishing in jails, or expiring in flames. Yet were that corruption of Christianity restored amongst us, it would not be in their power to prevent it. The iniquity is established by a law; and (as several excellent writers have of late very seasonably demonstrated from the most authentic authority*) persecution is grown into the very vitals of their religion, and become not only an appendix to it, but an essential part of it. And indeed its absurdities are so great, that it is difficult to imagine, how it could subsist, if it were not thus supported. At least, we evidently see this to be fact, that wherever popery has prevailed, such methods have been used; and if any protestant churches remain within its dark domains, it is plainly for want of power to destroy them: for in many places we see, they have been barbarously exterminated, where every consideration of honour and gratitude, of public faith and national interest, must have loudly demanded, that they should be tolerated and sheltered.

The present deliverance therefore strongly calls upon us, in testimony of the gratitude we owe unto the Lord our God, to enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise; since we have so much reason to imagine, that if he had not put a stop to their designs, our enemies would have been advancing with hasty steps, to shut up those gates, and to make those courts desolate, or, (which is far worse than desolation,) to fill them with idolatrous altars. And if any should suggest, that "common policy, and indeed necessity, might have obliged them, even if they had been conquerors, to proceed by slow degrees in their attempts to compass a design of this nature;" I might answer, that no consideration of prudence can curb the sallies of blind zeal, which often calls it piety to set wisdom at defiance. I might also plead, that the first attempts of this kind must be grievous to every good man; and especially to such as have penetration enough to see whither those attempts would naturally lead. And this remark will appear to us with a great increase of weight, when we consider,

* See the Bishop of Oxford's excellent sermon on occasion of the [illegible] and Dr. Wesley's excellent preservative against popery. See also Mr. Whitehead's sermon and his Pretender.

4. The happy aspect which this deliverance wears, with respect to our posterity.

Should we suppose it possible, that we ourselves, while groaning under so many injuries and oppressions, might have been permitted to alleviate our sorrows, by attending divine ordinances in a pure and regular administration of them; yet ecclesiastical tyranny, the inseparable companion of civil, might have grown strong enough to have prohibited that attendance in the days of our children. Should the fiery trial come sooner, as it not improbably might, I am well persuaded, that religion, degenerate as the present age is, would not want its martyrs, of various denominations, ages, and circumstances. There are undoubtedly pastors who would lead on their flocks to this glorious combat, and multitudes of private Christians who would bravely follow, to defend the cause of truth and piety at the stake, when they could no longer defend it in the field, and to honour it with their blood, though unable to rescue it. But our dear offspring in the tender scenes of childhood and infancy, what would they do? Into whose hands would their education fall? How easily might their unexperienced eyes be struck and enchanted with the vain glitter of superstitious worship, in a ceremonial which looks as if it were chiefly intended to amuse children! How easily might their weak minds be seduced by the sophistry of error, or their soft hearts intimidated by the threatenings of cruelty! Yet all would most assuredly be tried upon them. And perhaps, before the parents themselves were driven away or destroyed, or their hearts broken by other calamities, the inhumanity so lately practised in France might be renewed in Britain. Children might be forced out of their parents' hands, to be educated in what is so unjustly called the catholic faith, and those words of the Mosaic threatening might in a dreadful sense be fulfilled with regard to them: Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given to another people, and thine eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them all the day long; and there shall be no might in thine hand. What parent's heart could bear the prospect, yea, what other humane and generous heart could bear it, and not bleed to look on these innocent victims, which must on that supposition so soon be devoted at idolatrous altars, and pass a wretched enslaved life, amidst temptations arising from their very religion itself, which might have so fatal a tendency to seduce them into the ways of eternal death?

When I reflect upon all these particulars in their connexion with each other, I am inclined to repeat what I said to you in public, when this rebellion first broke out: "that considering, on the whole, all the probable consequences of things as to both worlds, it would be better, that our whole island should sink into the ocean, and all its inhabitants perish at once in that general wreck, than it should remain to be through succeeding ages the theatre of such scenes, as our enemies are studying to prepare, and labouring to introduce." This at least I can most deliberately say, "that had their designs succeeded, they who seemed, and who were with regard to external blessings, the happiest of mankind, would have become of all others the most miserable." In the sad situation I have been supposing, the rich might envy the lot of those, who had no property to lose;—they who had been educated in the warmest sentiments of liberty, might think those comparatively happy, to whom the weight of chains was grown less sensible, by having been worn from their infancy;—and the parent of the most numerous and amiable family, might rather have blessed the womb that never bare, and the breasts that never gave suck. Only the sacred name of religion, amidst all our miseries, would still be delightful: and the happy soul that has felt its power, would in poverty, in servitude, in captivity, or in the most immediate views of martyrdom, rejoice in the unconquerable supports and glorious prospects it administers. Yet still, by such a one, the desolation of God's sanctuary, the slaughter of his servants, the seduction of the rising generation, with the apparent hazard of the protestant cause, when the strength of Great Britain was not only taken from it, but turned against it, would be felt with the most tender agony, and make a more painful impression than could be apprehended even from all the engines of popish cruelty.

Proportionable to the grief and terror of such a prospect, is the joy of our opening deliverance, when considered in these general and most important views. But I must not forget, that I am to remind you,

II. Of some particular circumstances, which may serve further to heighten it.

Deliverance from an enemy must be acknowledged a peculiar favour of Providence,—when his character is savage, and his rage exasperated;—when his heart has been elevated with repeated success;—when deliverance has been earnestly sought by prayer;—and when it is at last given, in a manner that renders the hand of God eminently conspicuous. A few words may suffice to show, that each of these considerations is applicable to the case before us.

All that are acquainted with the character of our rebellious enemies from Lochaber, and the neighbouring counties, know that they are numbered among the fiercest and most barbarous of the Highland clans. They have so much of the disposition of banditti in their very nature, that it had been terrible to have met a company of them in times of the profoundest peace; insomuch that their neighbours have long been forced to set a guard on their substance, lest these wretches should have broke in upon it, and carried it away: so that the words of Ezekiel seem the very description of them: Brutish men, skilful to destroy. And to whatever distinguished politeness our neighbours on the continent, who have joined them, may pretend, there are numerous instances in which it has appeared in fact, that their tender mercies are cruel. The nearly desperate situation of the Pretender's affairs, of which they well knew this to be the decisive crisis, might also have prompted them to a severity of rage, sufficient to double all the terrors of an ordinary war. The disappointment attending a former rebellion, with the death of some of their near relations who fell in the cause, either by the sword of battle, or by that of public justice, might also exasperate particular persons: and the supposed injuries sustained through so long a series of years, by him whom they call their prince, whom they have seen exiled, disowned, abjured, and outlawed, would be a more general cause of indignation against us; and (so far as the views of policy would admit) might very probably lead them to consider the greatest extremities of military execution, as not only justifiable, but meritorious.

The success they had gained in the ever to be lamented day of Prestonpans, together with the advantage which they seemed to have over our forces in the late action at Falkirk, would naturally tend to make them more insolent; as minds so base are always elated by prosperity to an outrageous kind of madness. At the same time, the grief into which we were thrown by our repeated disappointments, (of which their escape into Scotland was none of the least,) does further serve to render their sudden consternation and retreat at last, though their numbers are said to have amounted to above nine thousand, matter of more agreeable surprise, and more pleasing reflection. And so much the rather, as some tender minds might be ready to apprehend, that Heaven itself had declared against us a few days before, in pouring down showers of wrath upon us in the day of battle, so as to damp our fires; thereby in effect disarming us of the weapons in which we trusted, and delivering our artillery into the enemies' hands. A double pleasure must it be in such a circumstance, to view the appearance of a return of mercy: especially,

When we see in it God's gracious answer to our repeated prayers. Often have we cried to the Lord in our trouble; and he is now saving us out of our distresses. After long delay, he has seasonably appeared, and given us reason to own, that he hath not turned away our prayer from him, nor his mercy from us. Justly therefore may we say, We will love the Lord, because he hath heard our prayer and supplication, because he hath inclined his ear unto us, therefore will we call upon him as long as we live. And once more, the reflection and resolution are more evidently just,

As the hand of God is so remarkably apparent in the issue of this affair. Long has he seen, (and seen, I doubt not, with just displeasure,) how ready we are to ascribe the glory of success to ourselves, and to boast, that our own right hand and arm have gotten us the victory. He hath therefore (if I may use the expression) been digging deep to hide pride from us; seeming to make it the care of his providence to prevent such arrogance from taking place: and the mercy is great, in proportion to that care. To God we must surely ascribe it, that our enemies did not immediately come forward on their first success, while we were unprepared for our defence, and take advantage of the terror they had spread, before the arrival of our forces from abroad. To him we must ascribe it, that the politics of France and Spain were so infatuated, that they did not attempt to invade our coasts, in the midst of that consternation which the rebel army occasioned, when it was marching into the heart of our country: or if the delay was owing to the damage which their ships sustained in the late tempests, we owe it to the great Sovereign of the winds and seas. And to his powerful influence, which at pleasure takes away the spirit of the boldest, we may piously ascribe that sudden panic which seized the host of our enemies, so that (though so lately flushed with some visible advantage gained over us) they did not dare to look our army in the face; but fled with the utmost precipitation, destroying their artillery, and blowing up their own ammunition, though not without some circumstances of treacherous cruelty which have justly increased their infamy.

I am sensible, there are some views in which it might have appeared more desirable that they should have ventured a battle, which must in all human probability have proved fatal to them: but on the other hand, not to insist upon the possibility of another panic on our side, (which, in circumstances like those in which we then appeared, we had, I hope, no just cause to apprehend,) we may at least conclude, that many among them would have sold their lives dear when grown desperate, and have fought in the bitterness of their hearts. Now surely we must allow, that, after the deplorable losses we have already sustained since the war and the rebellion began, it is a very favourable circumstance, that the foe was defeated without a combat; and especially at a time, when every brave soldier, and much more every valiant and experienced officer, is (as the prophet speaks) more precious than the gold of Ophir. Your own thoughts prevent me, I doubt not, in applying what I now speak, to that heroic and amiable branch of the royal family, who was to have led our forces to the field, and whose safety is so eminently, and so justly, the public care. Had God permitted the hurtful sword to have approached him, (and how many swords would have been pointed at him!) surely the joy of complete victory and national deliverance would hardly have been felt, and our shouts would have been turned into one universal groan. But God has preserved him from the hazards of the field, and given him to vanquish by the terror of his name.*

I hope your hearts glow with gratitude, while you hear these imperfect hints of the many merciful circumstances with which God hath adorned this great deliverance, and are secretly crying out, What shall we render to him for these accumulated benefits? I have not left myself time to enlarge on the answer; but I would suggest it briefly under the other general head, where I am,

Secondly, To represent and enforce the return which God may reasonably expect from us, and which the text hints at in the concluding part: That we might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life.

I may take a just and natural occasion from hence, to exhort you—to consecrate yourselves to the service of God;—to set yourselves to walk before him in holiness and righteousness;—to pursue this course with cheerfulness;—and to persevere in it with unwearied constancy.

1. The deliverance which we are now receiving, calls upon us all to consecrate ourselves to the service of God.

It calls upon us, to be truly religious; to remember the blessed God as the great author of this and every mercy; and in consequence of this, not only to address some transient acknowledgment to him, but to serve him: to make an unfeigned regard to him the foundation of all our virtues, and the principle of all our actions. It particularly requires, that, conscious of our obligations to him, and our dependence upon him, we keep up a grateful commerce with him, as our Creator, our Redeemer, our Protector, and our Father; and daily address him in prayer and praise, as those who know that we are unto him a holy priesthood, and a peculiar people.† Let those therefore, who have neglected these important and delightful exercises, set themselves to approach the blessed God, through the great Mediator, and make a dedication of themselves to him, that their services may be accepted: let those who have already done it, renew it with pleasure: and let us all,

2. Take care to approve the sincerity of such solemn acts, by walking before him in holiness and righteousness.

As the God to whom we profess to devote ourselves, is holy, let us be holy in all manner of conversation; separating ourselves from every pollution both of the flesh and of the spirit, and religiously observing righteousness in all its branches; giving in the first place to the blessed God his due, and esteeming it an indispensable duty to abound in all the offices of justice and charity to our fellow-creatures. Thus let us behave ourselves, as before him; remembering that we are continually in the venerable presence of that glorious Being, from whom no artifice can conceal our actions, to whom no specious pretences can disguise them; who sees our ways, and counts all our steps. This will give a firmness and a consistency to our conduct, which it could not otherwise have; and will further dispose us, as we are required in the text,

3. To pursue this course with a holy cheerfulness and alacrity of spirit; to serve him without fear.

The filial fear of God is so essential a part of true religion, that it is often put for the whole of it; and the angel which John saw, flying through the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell on the earth, demanded it aloud. But there is a certain anxiety and servitude of spirit, which is beneath the genius of Christianity; a gloomy and ungenerous conception of the Deity, which is a kind of heavy chain upon the mind; which makes all its operations unwieldy, and painful. This the gentle and encouraging constitution of the gospel was intended to cure, by inspiring us with sentiments of gratitude, hope, and love. Fear hath torment; and therefore that perfection of love, to which so gracious a dispensation was intended to bring us, casteth it out. For we have not received the spirit of bondage, but of adoption; and full of filial affection and confidence, under the influences of that Spirit, we cry, Abba, Father. Having laid hold on the covenant of grace and peace in Christ, having secured our everlasting concerns by committing our souls into his faithful hand, and listing under him as the great Captain of our salvation, we ought not to be terrified, as if we every moment apprehended some fatal event; but should march on with cheerful courage, as those that expect to be more than conquerors. The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid? Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear. Renewed deliverance should encourage

* Two small incidents contributed very much to the great end. One was, that Cumberland, the head of the rebellion, was wounded in the action at Culloden, and obliged to give over the command, which all his brother would not. The other was, that Lord George Murray, Macdonald of Glengarry, Lochiel, and several of the principal officers at Prestonpans, was slain in the battle, killed or wounded many of his own men; and all that were going off on the first news of the victory, a great desertion followed, which had, no doubt, in every good measure taken place precipitation with which the rebel army fled. Carnage often, it was the terror of his Royal Highness's name, that completed the victory and salvation, so that, as a person of great eminence in those parts told me, whom I had the honour to be informed of these particulars by, every observer, he might say more than Cæsar, Veni, vidi, vici.

† As the word λειτουργια is used in the text, it evidently leads our thoughts to these views.

our hope and confidence in him, and should forbid that anxiety of spirit, which seasons of public alarm are too ready to occasion. Let this therefore be our character and temper: and to conclude the exhortation,

4. Let us constantly persevere in it, and carry it through all the days of our life.

It was the unhappy character of Israel, that though under the first impressions of his merciful appearances for them they sang God's praise, they soon forgat his works. But we ought to remember, that though this particular interposition and act of Divine Providence be a transient thing, the effects of it are solid and permanent. If (which I hope will be the case) we enjoy future tranquillity and liberty; if our religious rights continue unmolested, even to the end of our lives; and our posterity rise up to the same blessings after us; we are to ascribe it to this defeat of the common enemy. It ought therefore to be our care, to carry the substantial proofs of our gratitude through every remaining day of life; and, as far as in us lies, to transmit the impression to them that come after us; as it is the divine pleasure, that one generation should praise his works to another, and should declare his mighty acts. And indeed, if the gracious hand of God in our deliverance be forgot; if men either attempt no reformation at all, or soon return to their former indolence and wickedness; I fear, our case will be like that of the wretched demoniac in the parable, to whom the evil spirit, which had left him for a while, returned, with seven confederate spirits worse than himself, who rendered his last state more miserable than the former.

But this naturally leads me to mention some considerations, by which I shall further enforce the exhortation I have been addressing to you. And you will easily perceive, that they are very obvious; and the importance of them is equally apparent.—We shall otherwise make a most ungrateful return to God;—we shall be condemned even by the tenor of our own prayers;—we may reasonably expect, that God should renew his chastisements with greater severity;—or we may be assured, that to have alienated ourselves from his service after such a deliverance, will be matter of dreadful account at last to every particular person, however God may be pleased to deal with us as a nation.

1. Let your own consciences judge, whether it were not a most ungrateful return to the blessed God, for all the benefits we have received from him, to neglect the temper and conduct to which we have been exhorted.

What can we imagine he intended by this train of providences; by the alarm, and the rescue? Was it not to awaken us? Was it not to engage us to serve him?—What other end could his wisdom and goodness propose in it? Or what so worthy end can we ascribe to him? And shall we, so far as in us lies, frustrate this gracious design of Providence; a design, which indeed so greatly enhances the value of the mercy itself? Shall we go on in our sins, and act as if we really imagined, that we were delivered on purpose to repeat and aggravate our abominations? Surely we should think of it with detestation. According to that just and lively reasoning of the pious Ezra, After thou hast given us such a deliverance as this, should we again break thy commandments? God forbid.—Were this to be our conduct,

2. We should be condemned by the tenor of our own prayers.

Let me on this occasion seriously remind you of our late solemn assemblies, in public and in private; of the repeated and earnest supplications, which we have made it our professed business to pour out in the divine presence. And what was then the language of our lips, and of our hearts? Could we have presumed to say, "Lord, deliver us, that we may go on to offend thee? and lengthen out our tranquillity, that our minds may be as vain, our passions as irregular, and our lives as unprofitable as before!" No, far from this, it was our prayer, that God would by all this reform us; that he would reform us as a nation; and what vile hypocrisy, what profane contempt of the Divine Being, were it, to pretend to desire reformation as a nation, while we are unwilling to bear our part in it; nay, while we are throwing in the weight of our example, be it more or less, into the opposite scale! Alas, Sirs, you may forget your prayers, as soon as you have ended them; you may disregard the purport of them, even while you pretend by your bodily posture and appearance to be offering them to God: but they are all set down in the book of his remembrance; and his eye, which can never be eluded or imposed upon, discerns the consistency or inconsistency of your actions, when compared with them. If therefore these reasonable and grateful returns be not made, it follows by a natural connexion with the former consideration,

3. We may justly apprehend, that God will renew his chastisements with greater severity.

Such is the tenor of that dreadful scripture, If ye will not be reformed by me by these things, saith the Lord, (that is, by the calamities which had been spoken of before,) but will still walk contrary to me; then will I also walk contrary to you, and will punish you yet seven times more for your sins. And let us not imagine this impossible. Let us not act as if we thought, (what it is certain none of us can think,) that God hath no weapon but the sword, by which he can chastise us. Those arrows of his righteous displeasure which he is discharging against our cattle, such as in some instances have been a forerunner to the most terrible of all temporal judgments, a pestilence among men, may sensibly teach us the contrary.—Nor can we imagine, that if he chose to make the sword the instrument of his justice, he has no other hands to wield it, than those from which it now seems to be falling. Nay, even these falling hands can be strengthen. His almighty breath can in a moment blow up the dying embers into a flame, which shall spread from our cities to our villages, and consume our houses, our palaces, and our churches.—It is very observable, that when Jerusalem was just going to be destroyed, first by the Chaldeans, and several ages afterwards by the Romans, that a few months before the fatal blow came, the hostile armies which were encamped against the city, on a sudden raised the siege, and removed to some distance; which afforded a short triumph to the wretched inhabitants.* But alas, soon did they return with redoubled terror, and execute the divine judgments upon them, with a severity hardly to be equalled in the history of any other country. Let Britain bear and tremble: lest after having shared with Jerusalem in the rich blessings it received and abused, we also share with it in a proportionable vengeance. But whether that vengeance fall upon us as a kingdom, or not,

4. We may be assured, that to have alienated ourselves from the service of God, after having received such and so many deliverances, will be to each particular person matter of dreadful account before the tribunal of God at last.

Remember it, Sirs, the day is near; that awful important day, that will call you to the divine bar: and are not many of you every hour liable to be called thither, with the guilt of all your sins upon your head? Alas, how many have passed into eternity since this rebellion broke out, even of those who have not been exposed to the ravages of war, and the terrors of the sword! How many, that but a few weeks ago were as inquisitive after news, and as impatient to hear the event, as we, have been suddenly cut off in the midst of all the tumult and agitation of their various passions; and found perhaps, that, important as the affair was about the issue of which they were so solicitous, there was another of infinitely greater moment to them, which they neglected; and neglected to their eternal ruin!

We all know, that we must shortly be among the dead: and surely when we have that solemn interview with our Judge, he will remember through what a scene we have passed; and will distinctly attend to every circumstance, in his conduct towards us. And how justly may he expostulate with us, at least by the voice of our own conscience, in some such language as this? "What could I have done more for you, than I did? What methods did I not try upon you? By my kind providence you were born in a land, for its civil and religious privileges the glory of all lands. You grew up from your infancy in a profound peace, and only heard by a distant report of the calamities with which other nations were exercised. On you I tried gentler methods, sending to you all my servants, rising up early and sending them, with messages of the most evident importance; but ye would not hear. You still continued settled on your lees: and therefore, after long forbearance, I for a little while changed the dealings of my providence. I shook my rod over you: I permitted an enemy to invade you, and evil to rise up against you at home: and after long insensibility, you saw your danger extreme. But while it was pressing, you were too busy to mind religion. It was judged employment enough, to prepare for your security against the violence of man; whereas my displeasure was not apprehended, nor any serious measures taken to provide against it. I bore all this; and by a sudden turn in my providence I delivered and established you again: and you did indeed take some notice of it. You inquired into the circumstance; you talked of it for a while, as a remarkable story; but it proved a mere amusement. Your hearts were not struck; you returned not unto me; no man repented of his wickedness, so as seriously to say, What have I done? Therefore were you justly given up as incorrigible. I had reason to say, Why should ye be stricken any more? ye will revolt more and more. Wonder not therefore, that you are now given up to destruction, after having been thus solicited and alarmed, thus rescued and entreated again, in vain."

May divine grace preserve you from that dreadful sentence, which must succeed to such a remonstrance! May it inspire us all with better sentiments; that we may not only learn (what these insufferable disorders must, I think, teach the most stupid) to be sensible of the blessings we enjoy under his majesty's happy administration, and most loyally to exert ourselves to the utmost in its defence; but may we also learn, to submit ourselves most constantly to the government of God! May we all be engaged to search our ways and our hearts, that we may correct every thing that is amiss, and may act more worthy the signal blessings we continue to enjoy, and the gracious providence by which we are re-established in them!

I shall conclude, with one more general reflection and inference, which will ever be seasonable, and which most directly suits the text in its primary design, as uttered at the birth of John the forerunner of our Lord.

How incomparably great are our obligations to God, for that deliverance which he hath granted us by his Son; and how great will our guilt and condemnation be, if we do not improve it aright!

* See Jer. xxxvii. 5. 10. and Joseph. Bell. Jud. lib. v. cap. ult. [24.] § 6. 7.

The utmost rage of human enemies can only kill the body; but those spiritual enemies from whom Christ delivers us, are aiming at the everlasting destruction of the soul. By him God hath condescended to give us the most complete rule, and the most amiable example, of a pious, holy, and righteous life; enforced by every motive that can strike the most active of our passions. The stupid disregard of it which so generally prevails, is, next to the mad opposition which men of corrupt minds are making to it, the basest and most provoking ingratitude to the Divine Being. And the just displeasure of God against it will be irresistibly demonstrated, when he, whom men will not now receive as a deliverer, shall be revealed in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not his gospel.

But, I hope, many of us have been engaged by divine grace to comply with its design, and have the testimony of our consciences that we are walking before God in holiness and righteousness. Let such of us be animated to go on cheerfully in our way. Let our souls magnify the Lord, and our spirits rejoice in God our Saviour; persisting in his service, till we arrive at that world, where our disposition to it, and our happiness in it, shall meet with no interruption or allay; even at those peaceful and blissful regions, where no name of an enemy shall be heard but in songs of triumph; and where the utter destruction of the last of enemies shall furnish out matter for those songs.

POSTSCRIPT.

I add the hymn which was sung after the Sermon, as what may rationally and piously express those devout sentiments which I hope, rise in the mind of every attentive reader.

I.

SALVATION does to God belong,
His power and grace shall be our song
His hand hath dealt a secret blow,
And terror strikes the haughty foe.

II.

The Lord's avenging sword is nigh;
In uproar wild their legions fly:
And stores, so late their boast and joy,
Their own despairing hands destroy.

III.

Praise to the Lord, who bows his ear,
Propitious to his people's prayer;
And, though deliverance long delay,
Answers in his well-chosen day.

IV.

O may thy grace our land engage,
Rescued from fierce barbarian rage,
The tribute of its love to bring
To thee, our Saviour and our King!

V.

Our temples, guarded from the flame,
Shall echo thy triumphant name;
And every peaceful private home
To thee a temple shall become.

VI.

Still be it our supreme delight,
To walk as in thine honoured sight;
Still in thy precepts, and thy fear,
To life's last hour to persevere!

SERMON XIX.

THE ABSURDITY AND INIQUITY OF PERSECUTION FOR CONSCIENCE-SAKE.

PREFACE.

THE emissaries of the Roman see are so far from giving up their cause in this kingdom as lost, that the most distant prospects of success produce new and vigorous efforts to promote it. Some time since, they were very busy in town, and in many places in the country, perverting the common people, and making proselytes. These bold steps awakened the attention of those who have always manifested a warm and disinterested zeal for the Reformation: and gave occasion to that seasonable attempt, which was made the last year, by several eminent ministers, in a course of lectures at Salters Hall, to prevent the growth of popery. Our fathers beheld that mystery of iniquity with abhorrence and terror; but the present generation were not so well acquainted with its fatal tendency. It would, therefore, have been an inexcusable neglect, if, while the enemies were sowing tares, the servants had slept, or had not faithfully warned the rising age of their gross errors in doctrine, and of that superstition and idolatry with which they corrupt and defile the Christian worship.

I observed, with pleasure, that those sermons met with general acceptance. The vast demand for them, among persons of a different taste and education, is a full evidence of the masterly manner in which that important design was executed. And I cannot but look upon it as a singular happiness to the public, that the work fell into the hands of men who understood the true principles of liberty, and steadily pursued them through the whole performance; which has not always been the case of those who have gone before them in that controversy. The secular powers were not called upon to interpose with their authority; but a calm and sober appeal was made to the Holy Scriptures, and to the reason of mankind, as the only proper judges in these debates.

On a careful perusal of the following Discourse, I conceived it might be of service to publish it: and since it attacks one of the principal bulwarks of the popish usurpation, I apprehended it could not appear with greater advantage, than as an appendix to the above-mentioned Lectures, if my worthy brethren concerned should approve of it in that view.

It has been the great unhappiness of many protestant dissenters, that they have entertained too narrow sentiments of the right of private judgment; without which a separation from an establishment can never be rationally defended. The writings on that argument, in which the question, in all its circumstances, is examined, are so large, and the reasoning so abstracted, that I have long wished for something more immediately calculated for popular use: and so much the rather, as pious and well-disposed minds have been too much impressed with the pretences urged to justify religious severities, without considering the consequences to which they lead.

My known affection to the author may perhaps incline some to conclude, that I am prejudiced in his favour, and will readily recommend every composure which he offers to the world; but so far as I am capable of judging of this Discourse, it is the best I have ever seen on the subject in so narrow a compass; the case of persecution is so clearly stated, the absurdity and iniquity of it so fully exposed, and the reasons advanced in its defence, especially those drawn from the penal laws amongst the Jews, are so well answered, that, I am willing to believe, it will give satisfaction to all impartial and candid readers.

It is with a great deal of concern, that I have taken notice of some unwary expressions, dropped by our writers of the last age, which countenance restraints inconsistent with toleration in its largest extent. These have been industriously collected to upbraid and condemn us. And it has been artfully and maliciously insinuated, that when we are pleading for liberty, we are only struggling for power to deprive others of the privileges we claim for ourselves. I hope the ensuing pages, in concurrence with that ample testimony which has been borne to the same cause, by the most considerable persons amongst us, will silence our adversaries, and wipe off so unjust and invidious a reproach.

D. SOME

Harborough, Feb. 17, 1735-6.

LUKE ix. 55, 56.

But he turned and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of: for the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them.

IF popery be considered in a religious view, it must appear the just object of our contempt, as well as our abhorrence; but if we regard it as a political contrivance, to gratify the avarice and ambition of the clergy, it will appear very artfully adapted to answer that end. The wisdom of the serpent eminently prevailed when the innocence of the dove had long been lost. Cunning ecclesiastics, who were by their office obliged frequently to converse with persons under awakenings of conscience, and serious impressions, laid hold on that opportunity of improving themselves in an acquaintance with human nature; and on that foundation they gradually formed and completed a scheme, dexterously adapted to make the minds of their people easy, by the same notions and forms by which the clergy enriched themselves, and secured that temporal dominion and grandeur, for which they were contented to exchange true Christianity, and to make merchandise of the souls committed to their care.

Some of these principles were so evidently absurd, that the common sense of mankind, however bribed in their favour, must often have risen up in open opposition to them, had freedom of inquiry been allowed, and the Scriptures been left in the hands of the people. It was therefore one of their most important artifices to take away that key of knowledge, and to put out that light which would have exposed the folly and wickedness of their conduct. And further, to support that Babel which must otherwise have sunk under its own weight, the powers of this world were brought in, and its rulers taught to think it their highest honour, to employ their sword against those obstinate miscreants who were disobedient to the faith, as the priests thought fit to explain it. To injure the weaker part of their subjects in their religious rights, was represented as an ample atonement for violating the civil liberties of them all; and thus the mouths of gainsayers were most easily and effectually stopped. From some countries the reformation was utterly excluded, in others it was stifled in its very infancy, and in some rooted out, after it had for a while been happily advanced.

This is undoubtedly the grand bulwark of popery, even to this very day; and were it removed, the anathemas of the church would become as incapable of giving terror, as they are of doing any real mischief. And therefore one of the most effectual methods which can be taken to secure and promote the Reformation, is to convince men, if possible, of the absurdity and iniquity of persecution for conscience-sake, in all its kinds and in all its degrees.

This is what, by the divine assistance, I purpose to attempt this day; nor could we at any time more properly examine the subject;* since it is to the repeated deliverances of this day, that we owe our exemption from those usurpations and inhumanities, which would have deprived us of the liberty of arguing, or even of complaining. How justly the church of Rome is charged with persecuting principles and practices, you have heard; and blessed be God that you have only heard it.† How absurd those principles and how criminal those practices are, I am now to show you. And amongst a variety of scriptures, which might have been prefixed to such a discourse, I could think of none more proper than this which I have now been reading.

Our Lord was now going up to Jerusalem, at one of the great feasts; probably that of tabernacles: and as he then came from Galilee, he thought it proper to pass through Samaria. This was the directest road which it was then perhaps necessary for him to take, in order to his being at Jerusalem in due time. You well know that in this country, i. e. on Mount Gerizim, there was a temple built as a rival to that on Mount Zion, to which the Samaritans, who, after their way, kept the three great annual feasts appointed by Moses, were probably at this time preparing to resort. But as our Lord appeared to be passing by this temple, and setting his face towards that where the Jews worshipped, these bigoted Samaritans denied him the common rites of hospitality, and would not suffer him and his attendants so much as to refresh themselves at any of their inns; which seems to be all the favour they now asked. This was indeed very outrageous and inhumane treatment, and the apostles James and John, who were now present, resented it with a great deal of warmth. Full of zeal, and, as they imagined, of piety, and of faith too, they only ask leave of our Lord to command fire from heaven upon these unreasonable and wicked men, assuring themselves that if an affront offered to the prophet Elijah, even by the express command of the king of Israel, were once and again thus severely avenged, the artillery of heaven would be yet more ready to plead the cause of the Son of God, when thus affronted, perhaps by some of the meanest of the people.

How far they would have extended the execution, if our Lord had favoured their motion, we cannot certainly say; perhaps it had reached further than the persons from whom the offence directly came, and might have laid the whole city in ashes. It is certain that a judgment, inflicted in such a miraculous way, would have been less liable to objection, than if secular power had been armed on the occasion. Yet our gentle and compassionate Redeemer, far from indulging their request, very faithfully reproves it, and expressly says, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of; i. e. "You neither consider the difference which there is between the genius of the Mosaic and the Christian dispensation; nor do you sufficiently weigh the secret motives which influence you on this occasion; for, if you did, you would see there is something of pride and personal revenge mingling itself with your zeal for God, your affection to me, and my kingdom. Your proposal is, on the whole, most unsuitable; and, as such, I absolutely reject it. For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. The general design of my appearance is most benevolent and gracious, and I am determined still to act agreeably to it, and to exert my miraculous power in works of kindness rather than of terror; for the preservation of mankind, and not for their destruction."

Now, surely, if our Lord thus severely rebuked his disciples for the proposal they here made, he would have censured them with much greater displeasure if they had talked of using his interest amongst the Jews, to raise an army to ravage Samaria by fire and sword; and, on the same principle, to spread desolation over the face of the whole earth, wherever they and their doctrine had not met with a favourable reception. The argument urged in the text would have concluded against this with equal and superior force: The Son of man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them.

You see then, how properly these words may be used, to introduce a discourse against persecution on any religious account: I shall therefore, without any further preface, go on,

* N. B. This sermon was preached Nov. 5, 1745.

† N. B. This particularly refers to a sermon on the persecuting principles and practices of the church of Rome, which I had preached and published a few months before against popery and you. Most expected on that occasion than was done, with much greater advantage, in Dr. Grosvenor's sermon at Salters Hall on the same subject, which is full of that easy, but penetrating and convincing eloquence, of which he is so eminent a master.

I. To state what I apprehend to be the Christian doctrine on this head, as opposed both to the tenets and practices of the Romish church, with regard to it.

II. To show, by some plain arguments, the absurdity and iniquity of persecution for conscience-sake.

III. To answer some of the most plausible considerations which have been urged in defence of it. After which I shall,

IV. Conclude with some practical improvements of the whole.

I should abundantly exceed the limits of a single discourse, if I were not to content myself with a few short hints on each of these heads, which have furnished out copious matter for several large volumes. And I hope those who have had an opportunity of inquiring most accurately into the subject, and of perusing what has been written upon it, by some of the most celebrated persons of our age and nation, will not be displeased with such a short survey of what seems most material on both sides the question. And it may be highly necessary for others, who have not such leisure or abilities, and who, for want of having the matter fairly and clearly stated, may fall into sentiments very injurious to the honour of their profession, and the peace of their minds.

I. I am to propose what I take to be the Christian doctrine on this head; and to offer some previous remarks towards stating the question aright, and preventing mistakes which often embarrass it.

I say, the Christian doctrine, lest, if I call it the protestant, any should question the propriety of the expression. It is indeed too plain, that our first reformers, when they separated from other corruptions of the Romish church, retained this unhappy principle: "That error and heresy are to be extirpated by violence; and that the conduct of some pious princes amongst the Jews, in destroying idolaters, is to be a model for Christian magistrates." This was not the opinion of the pious Calvin alone, whatever pleasure some may now take in heaping distinguished infamy on him; but it is much easier to make a large catalogue of those in England, as well as abroad, who maintained this tenet, than of those who opposed it. Nor indeed can we justly wonder, that the whole system of truth did not break in upon them at once. We have great reason to be thankful, that they were enabled to lay such a foundation, and that others, in succeeding ages, have, in any measure, raised and improved the superstructure; yet I will not presume to say, that all protestants are now agreed in what I take to be the truth here: it would be much for the credit, and much for the interest, of their cause, if they were; and we ought earnestly to pray, that God, by his Spirit of goodness and love, would purge out the remainder of that old leaven, which still sours the hearts of some. But, I persuade myself, I am about to represent sentiments, in which multitudes of worthy and excellent men, of all parties amongst us, concur; and they seem to be breaking in on men's minds with a growing light: may it shine more and more, until the perfect day! The protestant doctrine on this head, so far as protestants are consistent with themselves, seems plainly to be this: "That none are to be subjected to any kind or degrees of civil penalties, merely on account of their religious opinions, or for any practices arising from them, if those practices be not detrimental to the peace of society, which the magistrate, by his office, stands engaged to preserve."

We readily allow, that if any man's religious principles carry him on to any actions injurious to others, in their persons or properties, he is to be restrained and punished, as any other offender might be. Should any man, for instance, offer his son as a sacrifice to Moloch, he would justly be treated as a murderer, notwithstanding any plea of conscience which he might pretend to make. For the magistrate has no business with conscience, which is entirely under the jurisdiction of God, but must never be allowed as an excuse for an action injurious to others; for this very obvious reason, that if it should be so allowed, there would be no room for any penal laws at all, and consequently all civil government would be overthrown. For a bold and impudent malefactor would never fail to have recourse to this easy and unanswerable apology, if his judges were so weak as to admit it. Nor can we indeed imagine any blacker villanies, than those which some have pretended to commit for conscience-sake.

We likewise grant, on the same principle as before, that if any man's religion necessarily subject him to the obedience of a foreign prince, the government under which he is born and protected, has a right, by the grand law of self-preservation, to insist on some more than ordinary security for his good behaviour in such circumstances. And this is evidently the case of the papists amongst us. They are under such obligations in conscience to obey the pope, and to submit themselves to whatsoever prince he shall see fit to establish here, that they are at best but very precarious subjects to that royal family which the gracious providence of the Almighty has been pleased to fix on the throne of these nations; especially while there is a Pretender to that throne devoted to the see of Rome, and espoused by it. Justly therefore may the present government insist on such security from them as it does not demand from other subjects. And if in consequence of this, some hardships should fall on a few peaceable and well-disposed persons, who are too wise and honest to act to the utmost of what their own principles would warrant, it must be borne as an inconvenience inseparable from present circumstances. And perhaps it is an inconvenience less than those very persons might suffer, from the establishment of a religion so oppressive and tyrannical, as popery always appears, when it comes to be arrayed with the robe of the magistrate, and armed with his sword. However, it is a pleasure to every good-natured protestant, to think, that what they can suffer by the laws put in execution against them, is not very extreme; and that they suffer this, not for believing transubstantiation, or purgatory, nor for praying to saints, or bowing down before images; but merely for acknowledging the supremacy of the pope, a doctrine so hurtful to all other supreme authority, that it is amazing all the princes in Europe have not long ago renounced it with the utmost disdain.

Allowing for such cases as these, which are not properly exceptions, we still maintain our proposition in its utmost extent; and assert, that unless God, the searcher of hearts, is pleased to interpose by a special revelation, (which there is now no reason to believe he will ever do,) taking the matter on the principle of human reason, or of the Christian religion, no man is to suffer the least degree of punishment, either in his person or property, on account of his religious opinions, or of any practice consequent upon them, which is not an overt act, plainly inconsistent with the public peace, and punishable in another subject. They who are for a toleration limited, as good Mr. Baxter used unhappily to express it, "to errors which are not quite intolerable;" and would have such punished at least with fines and imprisonments, if not with greater severities, seem not to be aware of the consequences of their own scheme; and, as Dr. Owen very forcibly speaks, in his excellent treatise of toleration,* "they had need to examine their light; for their tenet must lead down to the chambers of blood." We do not indeed pretend to say, that the magistrate is obliged to make such provision for maintaining and accommodating those whom he apprehends to be teachers of error, as he may for those who are of his own sentiments, and consequently, whom he believes on the side of truth. This would be carrying matters to an excess; but surely he has no right to inflict any penalties upon them, nor in any degree to abridge them in those liberties, which peaceable subjects are entitled to. And if he may exclude any from such places of civil trust, as their capacity, experience, and fidelity, might otherwise qualify them for, merely because their religious persuasions, and their modes of worship, differ from his own, it is upon principles which I am yet to learn: nor can I perceive at present how they are to be reconciled with those of a Christian and a protestant.

You will easily imagine, what reason I had to be thus particular in stating and in guarding my proposition. I proceed,

II. To offer some obvious but important considerations, for the proof of it.

And here I shall particularly show, that persecution for conscience' sake, in all its kinds and degrees, is built on the absurd supposition,—that one man has a right to judge for another in matters of religion;—that it contradicts the grand principle of doing to others as we would think it reasonable they should do to us;—that it is by no means calculated to answer the end pretended to be aimed at by it;—but, on the other hand, tends to introduce a great deal of mischief and confusion, to overthrow truth and religion in the world.—On these accounts, it is inconsistent with natural religion;—and it appears from the whole tenor of the Christian revelation, that it is most contrary to that.

1. Persecution for conscience-sake, i. e. inflicting penalties on men, merely for their religious principles or worship, is plainly founded on an absurd supposition, that one man has a right to judge for another in matters of religion.

How absurd this supposition is, has been fully proved at large, by many excellent writers in this controversy; and you have, no doubt, often heard, how contemptibly weak those arguments are, by which the Romish church would appropriate this right to itself. Nevertheless, absurd as their pretence to infallibility is, I confess there is much more consistency in the persecutions of those who claim such a privilege, than of those who acknowledge they are destitute of it. Can any man, with the least colour of reason, pretend that I have a right to judge for myself, and yet punish me for using it?—that is, for doing that which he acknowledges I have a right to do. To plead for it, would be a direct contradiction in terms. And if it should be said, as some have most weakly asserted, that the erroneous are to be punished, not for their opinions, but for their actions in consequence of those opinions, I would then inquire, For what actions? and how are these actions condemned? Not on account of their tendency to disturb and annoy the public; for that case has already been excluded from the charge of persecution: and, when that is excluded, I repeat the question, how are those actions condemned? Why, the persecutor must say, "I know them to be contrary to the divine law." But how do you prove that you are not mistaken? If you allow of argument on the head, you give up the cause of persecution so far. If you wave argument, you only in effect say, "the actions are wrong, because I condemn them, i. e. in other words, I am infallible; I am to judge for myself and you, and, by a parity of reason, for all the world besides." And who might not make that pretence? Or, how should it ever be decided but by the sword, in the present circumstances?

* Would by the way, some large principles as Mr. Locke [illegible], and embrace what is most essential in the [illegible]

2. Persecution is most evidently inconsistent with that obvious and fundamental principle of morality, that we should do to others as we could reasonably desire they should do to us.

This is a rule which carries its own demonstration along with it; and it was intended on purpose to take off that bias of self-love, which would draw us aside from the straight line of equity, and lead us to be partial judges between our neighbours and ourselves. Now I would ask the advocate of wholesome severities, how he would relish his own arguments, if they were turned upon himself? What if he were to go abroad into the world, amongst papists, if he be a protestant; amongst Mahometans, if he be a Christian? Supposing he was to behave like an honest man, like a good neighbour, like a peaceable subject; avoiding whatever would injure and provoke, and taking all opportunities to serve and oblige those about him: would he think that, merely because he refused to follow his neighbours to their altars, or their mosques, he should be seized and imprisoned, his goods confiscated, and his person condemned to tortures or death? Undoubtedly he would complain of this as a very great hardship. And what if one, who heard him plead for religious severities at home, were to remind him of it, would he not be wounded with his own arrows? What could he answer? "I am in the right, and these people are in the wrong." "Nay," would not the inquisitor or the Turk cry full as loudly as he, "but we are in the right;" and they might justly add, "with what face can you complain of us, for treating you in such a manner, as, you must confess, you should think yourself bound in conscience to treat us, if we were in your power, as you are in ours?" Surely, a man would see the absurdity and injustice of such a treatment, when it fell upon him; when with such measure as he had meted to others, it was measured to him again. And accordingly, I must observe, as many have done, that the effect of this argument is so cogent, that those who, when they have had the power in their own hands, have been least willing to tolerate others, have immediately found new light breaking in upon them, as soon as they have needed toleration themselves.

3. Persecution is evidently absurd, as it is, by no means, calculated to answer the end which its patrons profess to intend by it

I say, which they profess to intend: for if the priests do really intend to make the laity slaves, that they may exalt their own empire, and increase their possessions, it may indeed very probably answer that end, and these holy men may make themselves fat with the sin and plunder of the people, and purchase church-lands with the price of their blood. But, to save appearances at least, they profess to intend the glory of God, and the salvation of men; for so you know the forms of the inquisition run, "To answer to sundry questions relating to their souls' health, as well as the correction of their manners and excess." Now, I beseech you, let it be seriously considered, how persecution can be like to do good to men's souls.

To be sure, if it does them good at all, it must be by making them truly religious. But what is true religion? Is it to repeat a creed, or subscribe a confession, to wear a name, or perform a ceremony? If it be, I am sure religion is much changed from what it was, when the Scriptures were written; and the nature of God must be entirely changed too, before such a religion can be acceptable to him, or before it can have the least value in his sight.

True religion must be founded in the inward conviction of the mind, or it is impossible it should be what yet it must be, a reasonable service. And pray let it be considered what violence and persecution can do, towards producing such an inward conviction. It cannot to be sure do it immediately by its own power; because it is a demonstration, that will at the same moment suit both the parts of a contradiction. And it is certain a man cannot reasonably expect to bind an immaterial spirit with a cord, or to beat down a wall by an argument, as to convince the understanding by threats or by tortures. They may indeed make a man mad, but it is the hardest thing in the world to imagine how they should ever make him wise.

Not immediately, you will say: we grant that. But mediately they may; as by these severities his mind may be awakened to attend to arguments; thus a rational conviction may be introduced: and the rod and reproof may give wisdom. But I confess I cannot see how a man is the more likely to judge of an argument because he hears it on the back of it, because he sees the lash, or perhaps the sword over his head, and trembles lest he should not believe it. Far from opening the mind to fair conviction, methinks it should rather prejudice a man against it; as it would give him some aversion even to a draught otherwise agreeable, to have it forced down by such methods as a draught is given to a horse. There is, if you will pardon the expression, a kind of an elasticity in the human mind: and the more violently it is pressed down and bent, the more forcibly does it endeavour to expand itself again. But if this were to be put out of the question, we may depend upon it that men will ever have the better opinion of any religion because it makes its professors very bad men: and so they will undoubtedly think their persecutors bad.

Nay, indeed I should rather think that if they were pretty well satisfied in the religion of their country before, the very thought of its being defended and obtruded on by others in this brutish and unnatural way, would be enough to raise some secret suspicions to its disadvantage:* suspicions which perhaps might prevail, and impress the mind more strongly, where men were not allowed to give any vent to them; or even to propose their doubts, lest it should be looked upon as a crafty way of insinuating their heresies, and should be a word spoken against their estates, or perhaps against their lives. On the whole, as you have often been told, persecution is much more likely to make men hypocrites than sincere converts. They may perhaps, if they have not a firm integrity and heroic courage, change their profession, while they retain their sentiments; and, supposing them before to have been unwarily in the wrong, may learn, I will not say to barter away honesty for truth, (though that were a traffic which no wise man would covet,) but rather to add falsehood and villany to error. How glorious a prize after all! especially when we consider at what an expense it is gained. Which leads me to add,

4. That persecution evidently tends to produce a great deal of mischief and confusion in the world.

It may truly be said, where persecution is, and that zeal and rage which is inseparable from it, there is confusion, and every evil work. It is mischievous to those on whom it falls, and in its consequences mischievous to others too; so mischievous, that one would wonder, that any wise princes should ever have admitted it into their dominions; or that they should not immediately banish it thence. This follows, in part, from what I said under the former head of my discourse: even where it succeeds so far, as to produce a change in men's forms of worship, it generally makes them no more than hypocritical professors of what they do not believe; and this must undoubtedly debauch their characters: so that having been villains in one respect, it is very probable they will be so in another; and having brought deceit and falsehood into their religion, they will easily bring it into their conversation and commerce.

This effect persecution will have where it is yielded to. In other respects, it will be yet more immediately and apparently mischievous where it is opposed. And it is probable it will be often opposed, by those who have certainly a title to the greatest protection and favour of the government; I mean upright and conscientious men. An honest mind, zealous for what it apprehends to be the cause of truth, and animated by the thoughts of the divine presence and protection, will learn to say of bonds and imprisonments, and even of tortures, as St. Paul did, None of these things move me, in such a cause, neither count I my life dear unto me. As Mr. Boyle very justly and finely expresses it:† "Personal sufferings, which a well-meaning man undergoes for his conscience, are but such a kind of burthen to his mind, as feathers to an eagle or a falcon; which though in themselves considered they have a weight, in the situation in which they are placed about him, enable him to soar towards heaven, and to reach a height which makes him praised and wondered at by beholders." Nay, perhaps where there is no true religion, a native sense of honour in a generous mind may encourage it to endure some hardships for the cause of truth: not to say, that sometimes on the principles we hinted above, "obstinacy may rise as the understanding is oppressed, and continue its opposition, for a while, merely to avenge the cause of its injured liberty."‡

And it is further to be remembered, that where the persecution is not very extreme, and sometimes even where it is, spectators are brought to judge more favourably of the cause thus violently opposed, when they observe the fortitude with which the patrons of it endure hardships and severities, from which they might otherwise deliver themselves at so easy a rate. Thus Tertullian boasts to Scapula, under all the butcheries he exercised at Carthage; "Our sect (says he) is built up by your endeavours to destroy it. The very sight of our patience in sufferings awakens men's consciences to inquire into the cause of it; and that inquiry leads them to discover the truth, and embrace it, even though it expose them to the same sufferings."§ This made the blood of the martyrs, what it was so often called, the seed of the church. And something of the same spirit has appeared in succeeding ages. Now in proportion to the degree in which a prohibited religion spreads, persecution must spread and propagate itself, and its desolations. And at this rate, if the persecution be severe, (as it must be in order to a victory,) how many persons, how many families, must be undone by it! For it is apparent, that in many instances what one suffers for the case of his conscience, draws ruin on a family, perhaps on many families dependent on him, wherein some may hardly know their right hand from their left. I might also mention the encouragement hereby given to informers, who generally in such cases are the vilest and most infamous of mankind: and might discourse copiously

* In terris, heu, certe, via nulla reperiri potest, qua religio, quæ fides, quæ superstitio, quæ error, quæ pietas, quæ veritas, quæ falsitas, quæ scelus, quæ pietas, ut non ad se vi, minis, terroribus, mortibus, tormentisque perducat. Sed non ita Deus. Non vult servitium fidei, voluntarium vult. Sanct. Cypr. Ad Scap. p. 107.

† Occas. Medit. p. 147. ‡ Locke's Let. p. 356.

§ Nec tamen occultari hæc secta potest, cum tot nostrorum adspectu accendat ad testimonium quemque, ut eligendo exitum vindicet. Quæ ergo ista tam contemptrix apud vos, et ubique nisi penes vos, persecutionum et dominatrix veritas, quod est de causa, et ubi cognoverit veritatem, et ipsa statim sequitur. Tert. ad Scap. ad fin.

on the animosities hereby raised amongst neighbours, on the discouragement of honest industry, and the injury done to trade and commerce? But I rather choose to refer these and many more calamities, which stream forth from this bitter fountain, to your own reflection, which may easily enlarge on the melancholy subject.

Now when so much must be sacrificed to public orthodoxy and uniformity, who can wonder if such a degree of oppression make a wise man mad, and force multitudes into desperate measures, most destructive to the community? Who can wonder if an injured and persecuted people rise up, I will not say in rebellion, for it deserves not that infamous name, but in a just and generous vindication of their liberties; and even when the event is most hazardous, choose rather to die warm with their swords in their hands, than to perish perhaps by the artificial cruelties of a lingering execution, or to starve in the darkness and solitude of a dungeon?

How many wars, and how great confusions, have by this means arisen in Great Britain, Ireland, France, Germany, the Low Countries, and various other places, even since the opening of the Reformation, it is not for a few moments, or indeed a few hours, to recount. But I take it for granted, that few of you are entirely unacquainted with these things, which make up one of the most instructive, though at the same time the most melancholy, parts of history. As the consequence of all, it has generally been found both at home and abroad, that ecclesiastical and civil tyranny has been either established or expelled together; and that wherever this dragon has kept its seat, it has devoured the glory of the land around it, and heaped infamy and misery on its inhabitants. It has marked its way by desolations; so that one may well apply to the bands of persecutors, what Joel says of the armies of locusts and caterpillars, when the country is like the garden of Eden before them, it is behind them a desolate wilderness. And surely were not the remainder of their wrath to be restrained, religion and truth would be buried in the ruins. Which leads me to add,

5. The Christian religion, which we here suppose to be the cause of truth, must, humanly speaking, be not only obstructed but destroyed, should persecuting principles universally prevail.

Let us for argument's sake suppose, what I am sure we have no reason to believe, that in some particular countries it might be a means of promoting and establishing the purity of the Gospel, yet it must surely be a great impediment to its progress. What wise prince who was a heathen or a Mahometan, would ever admit Christian preachers, if he knew that it was a principle of their religion, that as soon as the majority of the people were converted by arguments, the rest, and himself amongst them, if he continued obstinate, must be proselyted or extirpated by fire and sword? Surely if this were known to be the case, the secular power would at once seize on such missionaries as public enemies, and condemn the whole sect on this single tenet, whatever their other doctrines or precepts might be.

Nay further, if it be, as the advocates for persecution generally suppose, a dictate of the law of nature, that the true religion is to be propagated by the sword, then it is certain that a Mahometan or an idolater with the same notion, supposing himself to have truth on his side, (as no doubt many of them do suppose, and also admitting the principle we contest,) must think himself obliged in conscience, if he have an opportunity to do it, to arm his powers for the extirpation of Christianity. Thus a holy war must commence over the face of the whole earth, in which nothing but a miracle could render Christians successful against so vast a disproportion in numbers. Now I think it hard to believe that to be a truth, which would naturally lead to the extirpation of truth in the world; or that a divine religion should carry in its bowels the principle of its own destruction.

If these reasonings be admitted, then persecution will by the light of nature appear so absurd, so unjust, and so mischievous a thing, that it ought to be rejected with abhorrence; unless it should be warranted and required by a divine revelation, which had such degrees of evidence as should be sufficient to overbalance that strong objection against it, which would arise from the consideration we have now been urging. But on this head we need have no apprehension, for I am to show you,

6. That persecution is so far from being required or encouraged by the gospel, that it is most directly contrary to many of its precepts, and indeed to the whole genius of it.

A Mahometan may perhaps prove from his Alcoran,† that the true faith is to be propagated by the sword, and that heretics and unbelievers are to be cut off or made tributary; but if a Christian plead in favour of persecution, while he has his New Testament in his hand, in an intelligible language, he must be condemned out of his own mouth. He is condemned by the example of Christ, who went about doing good, who came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them; who waved the exercise of his miraculous power against his enemies, not only in this instance in the text, but even when they

* I doubt not but on this occasion many of my readers will be pleased that the Dutch were some of the first protestant states who allowed a universal toleration, to which, as Sir William Temple most justly observes, "they owe the continued and unmolested peace of their government, and the mighty increase of their people: whereon will appear to consist chiefly the vast growth of their trade and riches, and consequently, the strength and greatness of their state." Temple's Accounts, vol. i. p. 208.

† Alcoran, cap. 2. 4. 8. 47.

most unjustly and cruelly assaulted him: and never exerted it in one single instance that we read of, to inflict death or any corporal punishment even on those who had almost justly deserved it. his doctrine also, as well as his example, has taught us to be harmless as doves, to love our enemies, to do good to them that hate us, and to pray for them that despitefully use us and persecute us. And will a maxim like that allow us to persecute others? When Peter desired leave to smite with the sword, though drawn in so just a cause, Christ commanded him to put it up in its sheath again; and he declared before Pilate, that his kingdom was not of this world; which he expressly mentions as a reason why he did not arm secular power to plant or to defend it.

As for the apostles, they declared, agreeably to the example and precepts of their Master, that the power they had received was for edification, and not for destruction, that the weapons of their warfare were not carnal, and that the servant of the Lord, the Christian minister, was not to strive, but in meekness to instruct those who opposed themselves. They inculcated it as of the highest importance, that religion must be a reasonable service, and that bodily exercise, which is the utmost persecution can extort, profited but little, and was a thing of a most different nature from true godliness. That the strong ought to bear with the infirmities of the weak. And in a word, that Christians must in the whole of their conversation be harmless, as well as holy and undefiled, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, shining amongst them, by these amiable examples, as lights in the world, and so hold forth the word of life.

You well know, that these passages are but a little specimen of those which might be produced on such an occasion. Most prudently therefore do the popish clergy wrest the New Testament out of the hands of their people, before they venture to arm them with a sword, to destroy others for their religious opinions.

These are the principal arguments against persecution which have occurred to my mind. You easily see they are chiefly pointed at high severities; but if you consider them attentively, you will find that they proportionably conclude against every degree of it, not excepting the lightest pecuniary fines, or civil incapacities. I am,

III. To touch on the chief arguments which are urged in defence of penal laws enacted for the pretended security and advancement of religion.

Persecution is so harsh and so infamous a word, that few will defend it. But under this milder name they maintain the thing, by pleading the glory of God and the good of mankind, (sacred prostituted names!) the penal laws of the Jewish constitution, and a few tortured passages of the New Testament; which one would think mentioned to expose the cause, rather than seriously to serve it.

1. The glory of God is generally pleaded as an apology for persecution.

The time is come, when those that slay his servants are supposing they offer him an acceptable service. "God, say they, is the God of truth; and therefore the cause of truth is his cause; and the magistrate, who is in his sphere the minister of God, is to be a nursing father to his church, and to point the sword he has received from him against those impious persons, who will no otherwise be restrained from perverting the right ways of the Lord."

Now it is most evident, this is taking for granted the innocence and morality of the thing in the general, as well as the infallibility of the magistrate, or of the priest, whose executioner he must be. But if, as we have endeavoured to prove above, persecution in general is contrary to the light of nature, and to the Christian revelation, it must be great impiety to pretend to consecrate it to the divine glory. And a man might on the same principle lie and plunder, or even murder, his neighbour, could he but persuade himself that God would be honoured, as the truth might be promoted by it; and take it for granted, that the goodness of the end must sanctify the badness of the means. Paul evidently determines the matter otherwise, when he introduces a man as excusing his own lie, by its tendency to promote the truth of God; and overrules that plea by observing, that if it were allowed, we might do evil that good may come. Which he accounted so abominable a maxim, that he says that the damnation of such is just.

Yet, after all, if the preceding arguments were to be waved, and we were to begin our inquiry with examining what would be most for the glory of God, and the advancement of truth, I am fully persuaded that persecution, instead of being established, must, on this foundation, be exploded and condemned. For, not to repeat what I said above, of the improbability of fixing any rational conviction by this means; it is plainly a dishonour to truth, and therefore to God, to suppose, that it needs the supports of secular terrors, and that its enemies must be suppressed by violence. We then sanctify the Lord our God in our hearts, when we are ready to give an answer to those that inquire into the foundations of our religion, and our hope, with meekness and fear; and when we use those methods with others, which are likely most effectually to engage them to render him a rational service. But when we drag men to his altars, as unwilling victims, and attempt to bind them otherwise than with the cords of a man, and the bonds of love, he may surely reject our forward and officious zeal, as an affront, and say, Who has required these things at your hands? The same answer will, in a great measure, serve for the second plea in favour of persecution: which is,

2. That it may tend to promote the happiness of mankind.

If we will believe those, who have sometimes a crocodile's tear to shed over those whom they are devouring, all the severity they use to men's bodies is in mere mercy to their souls. But it is hard to say, how this can be an argument for putting them to death, in what they call a damnable error; as an ill-natured man may call any error, and an inquisitor must, of course, call that which he makes capital. I know they will answer, it is for the good of others, that they may be deterred from the like pestilent heresy. But I endeavoured to show before, that such a course was much more likely to prejudice, and to exasperate, and to debauch men's minds, than to recover or secure them. And here their most plausible answer is, that though it should be granted, that the first converts of violence are insincere, yet at least succeeding generations, being educated in the bosom of the church, and the forms of the true religion, may cordially imbibe it, even to their everlasting salvation. A rich equivalent, as some may think, for present inconveniences to others! But I see not that we can be obliged to introduce so much confusion and misery in our own days, out of regard to posterity, any more than to burn up the produce of our own fields and plantations, that the ashes may meliorate the soil, and render it more fruitful to those that come after us. If such an expedient were not likely to answer even that end, it illustrates the subject so much the more. For we may naturally expect to find, in the hearts of children, a deep resentment of the wrong done to their parents, and even to their remoter ancestors: nor is it any uncommon case at all, for an aversion or attachment to particular notions and forms, to prove hereditary; especially when young persons, so exceedingly jealous of their liberty, as at their age they are, apprehend a religion to be forced upon them, contrary to that which their ancestors bravely defended, at the expense of their estates and their lives; or which they unwillingly seemed to renounce, for the preservation of them. It is exceeding probable, that the penal laws, by which idolatry was imposed on the Jews, in some years of the Babylonish captivity, might contribute greatly to give them that aversion to it, which has been transmitted through so many following ages. And the contempt, which both the Spaniards and Portuguese put on those whom they call new Christians, (that is, whose ancestors, most of them above two hundred years ago,* were obliged by violence to profess Christianity,) seems plainly to intimate, that they secretly suspect them to be Jews or Mahometans in their hearts, as many of them declare themselves to be, when they escape into a land of liberty.†

Yet, perhaps, many of more pious dispositions, and more tender tempers than those of whom I have been now speaking, may be ready to plead, that unlimited toleration will leave room for writing and publishing the most pernicious books; whereby the principles of young and unexperienced minds may easily be corrupted, and heresy and profaneness introduced into the rising generation; and with it that licentiousness of practice, which generally attends such an apostasy from the truth.

I acknowledge, that the plea seems to have a considerable weight; but I desire it may be seriously examined, whether the mischief of such a restraint be not yet greater than the advantages of it? Might not the most excellent and useful writings of the best men be suppressed on this principle? Nay, is it not on this principle, that the Bible itself is prohibited in popish countries? Some inconveniences arise from every imaginable constitution: it is the part of wisdom to choose that which is attended by the fewest and the least, and to apply the most proper remedies to them. If toleration be abused, as the means of sowing tares amongst the wheat, let it teach all, and especially those who have the care of young persons, to be so much the more watchful over their charge, to keep them out of the way of infection, or to furnish them with proper antidotes against it. But let not those, who would approve themselves the patrons of truth, act as if they thought religion such a scandalous cause, that it must suffer by the freedom of inquiry, and could only be safe under the covert of darkness.

On the whole, let the friends of the truth fairly propose its evidences, and show its influence too, by the candour of their temper, and the benevolence and usefulness of their lives; and if its enemies raise objections, as against what cause may not objections be raised? let us give them a fair consideration, and endeavour to expose the sophistry and weakness of them, in a plain, rational, and convincing manner, in the spirit of meekness and serenity. We may then hope, through the concurrent influences of divine grace, that the souls of men will be established, even by the attempts made to pervert them: and that, in another sense than the apostle originally intended the phrase, the trial of that faith, which is far more precious than the purest gold, (which, in succeeding ages, perishes and wears out, though it have been tried in the fire,) will be found to praise and glory. And if (which may very probably be the case) some who will eagerly listen to every objection against the truth, will not have the patience to hear or examine its defence, we must leave them to the final judgment of him, who searches the hearts, and tries the reins of the children of men. With so dishonest a temper, a name, or a form, whatever it had been, could have done them but very little good. It is impossible for us to save men against their own wills: and I cannot see, that it will be any part of Christian charity, to put out their eyes, or tie up their hands, lest they should use them to the injury of themselves or others.

* The Moriscos were expelled Spain, A. D. 1492 [illegible] upon them erected about four years after.

If any should pretend that we are to punish heretics and infidels, that we may not make ourselves partakers of other men's sins, and draw down the judgments of God on the nation in which we live: I answer, that this argument so evidently takes it for granted, that persecution is for the glory of God, and will be a proper expedient for promoting the true religion, that what I have said, under the former heads, is an abundant answer to it. I shall not, therefore, enlarge on this as a distinct topic, but proceed to another of much greater importance.

3. The most plausible argument in favour of the doctrine we oppose, is taken from the penal laws, which made a part of the Jewish constitution.

It is urged here, that God did, in the strongest terms, expressly appoint, that all who taught or practised idolatry amongst the Jews, should be punished with death; and that many severe executions were accordingly done on this statute: not only by the prophet Elijah, an extraordinary divine messenger, but likewise by Jehu, and Josiah, and other princes amongst them; who, far from being censured, were applauded and rewarded on this account.

If we answer here, as we most easily and naturally do, that the merciful genius of the Christian dispensation is so different from the rigour and severity of the Mosaic law, that no argument can be drawn from one to the other: it is pleaded, that this will at least serve to overthrow the greater part of our discourse, which was intended to prove the natural absurdity and immorality of persecution; unless we will allow, what surely no Christian can, that a natural immorality was made an essential part of a divine institution.

It will be proper, therefore, to examine this matter a little more largely; which I shall the rather do, because I think it has seldom been handled with the accuracy which it requires. Now I apprehend the solution of this difficulty will depend on considering, on the one hand, the limitations attending these penal laws; and, on the other, the peculiar circumstances of the Jews, to whom they were given.

1. Let us consider the limitations which attended these penal laws.

They affected only the inhabitants of the land of Canaan; and animadverted only on some overt act, whereby they publicly declared a revolt from God to idols.

There was no commission given to the Jews, to arm themselves for the propagation of their faith amongst their heathen neighbours; nor was there any express law to pursue any Israelite with the sword, who, settling among idolaters in foreign countries, should conform to the religion of them. Though, for reasons afterwards to be mentioned, his part in the land of Israel would undoubtedly have been forfeited. And, it is further to be remembered, that even with regard to the inhabitants themselves, the law only took cognizance of some overt act of revolt. Had God given a large confession of faith to the Jews, to every article of which he had required them, on some high penalties, to subscribe their assent, a much stronger objection against what I have advanced would have arisen from such a constitution. But this was so far from being the case, that the Sadducees, erroneous as they were in some of the most important articles of natural, as well as revealed, religion, were not only tolerated, but, without any direct violation of the Mosaic law, were frequently promoted to offices of high dignity and authority. Now there is a most evident difference between a law thus limited, and an universal allowance of religious severities, to Jews or others, in any such circumstance as they should think fit. And, were the particular reasons ever so unknown, the former might be allowed, as consistent with the divine perfections, without laying a foundation to infer that the latter might be so. As there was an apparent difference between God's requiring Abraham to sacrifice Isaac, and his publishing a general declaration, allowing any parents whatsoever to sacrifice their children, whenever they should suppose that the glory of God, and the interest of religion, would be advanced by it. Thus the limitation of these penal laws destroys the argument which might be drawn from them, in favour of persecution in general. And, if it still appear a difficulty, that, even with these limitations, they should be enacted, I hope the point may be yet more fully cleared up, by considering,

2. The peculiar circumstances whereby the Jews were distinguished from all other people.

Now here, the extraordinary discoveries which God made of himself amongst them, and the peculiar manner in which he stood related to them, as their King, concur both to vindicate the equity of the laws in question, and to prove that no reasonable consequence can be drawn from them, in favour of persecution, in any other nation upon earth.

It is surely of some importance, to recollect the extraordinary discoveries which God had made of himself to them, though the whole stress of the point does not lie here. The miracles which he had wrought amongst them, in order to prove his deity, and the vanity of idols, were of the most awakening and convincing nature; and these were not only delivered to them by credible report, as they are now delivered to us; but God was, from age to age, raising up prophets, with a power of renewing these wonders before their eyes. Nay, he had interwoven into their constitution certain periodical, and most extensive and obvious miracles, not only in the extraordinary fruitfulness of every sixth year; (when, after the ground had been exhausted in the five preceding years, the poorest harvest must naturally have been expected;) but also in the safety of their borders, though surrounded with enemies, when all the males were gone up to worship, even in the very heart of their country, as they were obliged to do three times in the year, between the beginning of March and the end of September, which is the most proper time for armies to be abroad.

Now God, the searcher of all hearts, might know, that nothing but obstinate and incorrigible wickedness could make a man an idolater in such circumstances as these. And consequently, he might righteously condemn him to death, and appoint his fellow-creatures to execute the sentence. But no argument can be drawn from thence for inflicting the like punishment on another person, who is not as expressly sentenced by the divine law, and whose opportunities of better knowledge are not, and cannot be, entirely the same.

But it is further to be considered, as of the utmost weight in the present argument, that God also stood in a peculiar relation to the people of Israel, as he was their temporal King, as well as their God. Their government, as you well know, was different from that of all other nations: it was indeed a Theocracy, as Josephus very justly calls it; their whole system of civil laws being enacted by God, and their magistrates appointed by him. And when they came to have kings, as other nations had, yet even these kings were to be considered but as the viceroys of God: as appears by their being obliged to transcribe his law, when they began their reign; to consult his oracle on all extraordinary exigences; and from his interposing in various cases, both in Judah and Israel, to transfer the crown from one person and family to another.

Now, in consequence of this peculiar system of government, God thought it proper, as it apparently was, to annex certain temporal privileges to their obedience to him; and they held their estates and possessions in the fine country they inhabited, not by one absolute donation to them, and their heirs for ever; but through succeeding generations, as tenants to the crown, upon an express condition of certain homages to be paid to God, as the great proprietor; renouncing all dependence upon, and all subjection to, any of his competitors. Now it was plainly equitable, that, as the counterpart of these advantages, they should be subjected to some peculiar temporal punishments; if, while they claimed these privileges, they falsified that allegiance which was the condition of them; in which case they suffered, not merely as idolaters, but as traitors.

I will further add, that as God was determined, in the course of his providence, to send national judgments upon them, in case of a national revolt to idolatry, which he accordingly always did, it was a merciful as well as just severity, thus to animadvert upon the first appearances of this aggravated crime, to which they were strongly inclined; and by which, if it prevailed amongst them, they must be universally undone.

But as all these circumstances were peculiar to the Jews, I hope you are, by this time, fully convinced, that it is absurd to draw arguments in favour of religious severities in general, from the penal laws of the Mosaic institution.* I have been so large on this head, that I must only hint at those weak and contemptible arguments which are brought,

4. From some abused passages in the New Testament.

And indeed I should hardly mention them, but to expose them; and to show to what wretched straits ingenious and interested men must be brought, when they will condescend to make use of such arguments: for, after all, to their shame I must say, the chief texts which I find produced for their purpose, by popish writers, are two; which I am persuaded, a wise and honest man might have read a thousand times before he had ever dreamt of such a consequence from them. Christ gave Peter a commission to feed his sheep; and that must, say some, imply a power in the church, and especially in the pope, as the head of it, to kill wolves, that is, heretics. As if an argument, from this figurative expression, to so distant a circumstance, could be allowed against such strong evidence, both of Scripture and reason. But I must do them the

* I have not mentioned the argument which some have drawn from Job's saying, that adultery is a [illegible] to be punished by the judges: Job xxxi. 28. because it was evident, that Job [illegible] with the [illegible] in the [illegible] and [illegible] Jews. And I think it very [illegible] in the [illegible] Arabia, as many [illegible] of that nation [illegible] constitution from those [illegible] Jews [illegible] Judah's sentence against Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 24. that there was then a divine law for executing [illegible] they were [illegible] justice to say, their grand argument is behind, and it is couched in those words, Compel them to come in. But, what compulsion and violence must be offered to these words, before they will be of any service in the cause of persecution! How often have they been told, that this relates only to friendly importunity, like that which the disciples used to engage Christ to spend the evening with them at Emmaus, when, as the evangelist expresses it, they constrained him? And how absurd it would be to suppose servants sent out with sword in hand to force in guests to an entertainment, I think you will easily apprehend.* Another argument, a little more specious than either of these, might be brought from the corporal punishments inflicted on blasphemers in the apostle's times; but it is to be considered that these were the effects of a miraculous power, and consequently had a proper tendency to convince the understanding of the sufferers and spectators, of the divine mission of those with whom the hand of the Lord thus remarkably was. It is therefore most absurd to talk of substituting the power of the magistrate instead of these extraordinary penalties, unless the magistrate can inflict them the same way; and then we will acknowledge they merit not the name of persecution, but come under that singular exception which we admitted in the beginning of the discourse.

I have the pleasure to assure you, that these wretched arguments, or rather empty shadows of argument, are the most material which I have seen produced from the New Testament in favour of religious severities. It is the glory of that sacred book, that it affords no better arguments in so infamous a cause. And I cannot forbear observing, that the silence of the New Testament on this head is a strong argument against persecution, and would have been so, had the apostles omitted the many passages before quoted, in which they seem directly to oppose it.

I know it may be said, the sacred writers did not advise the primitive Christians to use violence, because their religion was then in its infancy, and they had no power in their hands. Yet, one would imagine, that if the apostles would have approved themselves honest men on the scheme we oppose, they should have laid in some directions for future times, and have instructed Christians in the use of their secular power, when it was obtained; as the Jews were particularly directed in the management of theirs. Especially since this is a case in which the wrath of man, which worketh not the righteousness of God, is so ready to throw about firebrands, arrows, and death.

Nor will it here be improper to remind you, that there was at least one prince converted to Christianity in the apostles' time; I mean Sergius Paulus, proconsul of Cyprus; yet we do not find St. Paul exhorting him to proselyte his subjects by violence, or even to inflict any penalties on Elymas the sorcerer, though he had been convicted of error in so miraculous a way, and though an inspired apostle had called him, in his presence, a child of the devil, and an enemy of all righteousness.

I must also add here, that it is well known masters amongst the Greeks and Romans had an unlimited power over the persons and lives of their slaves. Now if corporal severities were ordinarily to have been used to promote the gospel, we might have expected that the apostles writing, as they so often do, of the duty of masters, should have added some exhortations to them to compel their slaves to embrace it. Yet nothing of that kind occurs, which I think makes the negative arguments as strong as one can well suppose a negative argument to be.

IV. I must conclude my discourse with touching on those reflections which I have left myself but little time to enlarge upon.

1. Let us bless God that we are free from the guilt of persecuting others, and the misery of being persecuted ourselves.

Had we been born in Spain or Portugal, education and example might have corrupted our judgment so much, that without further inquiry we might have taken it for granted, as a first principle, (as many there seem to do,) that heretics are to be punished with death. And on this foundation we might have practised or applauded the greatest inhumanities, perhaps towards the best of men. We might have been presenting to God what is much worse than robbery, even murder for a burnt-offering; and trusting in that for the expiation of our other offences, which is itself in the number of the greatest enormities which human nature can commit. In such a case I fear the blindness and ignorance of our zeal would not have been allowed as an excuse for its pernicious consequences. St. Paul calls himself the chief of sinners for those severities which he exercised on Christians ignorantly, and while he verily thought that it was his duty to do many things against the name of Jesus of Nazareth. And indeed, as Mr. Baxter well expresses it, in his masculine and lively manner,† "If charity be a grace most necessary to salvation, then certainly it will not keep any man from damnation, that he had malice and uncharitableness enough to persuade him, that the members of Christ were children of the devil, though he persecuted them under that notion."

Let us be thankful that we are preserved from

* I think the word [illegible] has [illegible] in the New Testament. Matt. xxii. 3. Mark vi. 25. Luke xiv. 23. Acts xxvi. 11. 2 Cor. x. 11. God is [illegible] to 12. [illegible] and both of those places [illegible] rather [illegible] [illegible] Luke xxiv. 29. Acts xvi. 15. [illegible] those places [illegible] than friendly importunity.

† Rest. Pract. Works, Vol. I. page 612.

that guilt, and let us also acknowledge it as an instance of the divine goodness to us, that we are not suffering by persecution; that we are not plundered and banished, or perhaps imprisoned and tortured, for conscience-sake; and so brought under a formidable temptation, to make shipwreck of that as well as of faith. Let this day remind us of the frequent dangers of this kind to which we have been exposed; and let us gratefully own God's watchful care over us, and that powerful hand exerted in our favour, to which we owe it, that our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers, which was once and again spread for our lives: the snare is broken and we are escaped. Let the memory of those who were the glorious instruments of our deliverance be ever dear to us, and the persons of those who, under God, are the great guardians of our civil and religious liberties, be regarded with becoming reverence, affection, and obedience.

2. Let us envy none that liberty of conscience which they enjoy on such equitable principles.

While we rejoice in a toleration ourselves, we were inexcusable if we were grieved that many who most widely differ from us share in the same common benefit. A variety of opinions must be expected, and debates will unavoidably arise from it; but when we are pressed by the arguments of our opponents, or, it may be, provoked by what we think their obstinacy; let us not indulge even a secret wish, that there were a sword in our hand to slay them, or a chain to bind them. Far from complaining of it as an evil, let us rather rejoice in it as the peculiar glory and happiness of our age and country, perhaps beyond any other, that our neighbours, as well as we, enjoy a freedom of choosing their religion for themselves; and amidst all the diversity of that choice, sit every one under his own vine and fig-tree, and have none on that account to make them afraid.

And I will add, let not private malice and uncharitableness assume the place of public severities. Let those who are in the superior relations of life, lay aside a rigorous and imposing temper towards those who are under their care. In matters of conscience, let not the husband pretend to determine for the wife, nor the parent for the child, nor the master for the servant; but if fair argument and love will not fix a conviction on their mind in favour of what we apprehend to be right, let us leave them to worship God in their own way, without absolutely insisting upon it that they should do it in ours.

Once more, let not neighbours and equals be severe on one another upon account of religious differences, but make the most candid allowances which the case will bear for the errors and weaknesses of each other. Far from injuring and reviling each other, and refusing the mutual offices of humanity and friendship, let us study to abound in them more and more. Let us pray, that if any are otherwise minded, than truth, reason, and Scripture would teach, God would in his own method, and time, reveal unto them whatever it may be of importance for them to know; and in the mean time let us endeavour to act on the great principles of virtue and benevolence, which, blessed be God, are not peculiar to any distinguishing forms of religious profession amongst us. And I heartily pray, that domestic persecution may never be the guilt or the misery of any, who by the laws of our country are protected from public violence.

Lastly, Let us be very cautious that we do not abuse that religious liberty which, by the singular favour of Providence, we enjoy.

Let us remember, that as the best blessings may be perverted, it is too possible that even this may be turned into licentiousness. It is true, that our consciences are under no human jurisdiction, but let it be considered they are not without law, but under law, to God. He who searches men's hearts, knows how to judge of the sincerity and impartiality of our inquiries into truth, though none else can do it. Let us therefore be wary in our determinations in matters of importance, and let us earnestly pray for the enlightening influences of God's Holy Spirit, to preserve us from erroneous principles, and superstitious worship.

And, once more, let us be very careful that we do not abuse our religious liberties by trifling with opportunities for spiritual improvement, either absenting ourselves from them, or attending them in a careless and unprofitable manner. Let us remember, the servant who knows his master's will, and prepares not himself to act according to it, will be beaten with many stripes. The freest profession of the purest religion on earth will signify nothing, if it be no more than a profession; and all that zeal for liberty which is consistent with being the slave of sin, is only a natural haughtiness of spirit, which will aggravate a man's guilt rather than extenuate it. The Lord grant that none of us may reject the truth, and that none may hold it in unrighteousness: lest the time come, when we wish for that excuse which they will have, who have known the restraints and discouragements of persecutions; and another day reflect with horror, even on those repeated deliverances, for which we are this day returning our public acknowledgments.

HYMNS

FROM

VARIOUS TEXTS IN THE HOLY SCRIPTURES

PREFACE.

THE author of the following Hymns, well known to the world by many excellent and useful writings, was much solicited by his friends to print them in his life-time, from a hope they might be serviceable to the interest of religion, by assisting the devotion of Christians in their social and secret worship: and, had God continued his life till his Family Expositor on the Epistles had been published, it is probable he would have complied with their request: but this and many other pious and benevolent purposes were broken off by his much-lamented death. During the last hour I spent with him, a few weeks before that mournful event, he honoured me with some particular directions about transcribing and publishing them. I have at length, through the good hand of my God upon me, finished them, and present them to the world with a cheerful hope, that they will promote and diffuse a spirit of devotion, and, together with other assistances human and divine, prepare many to join with the devout author in the nobler and everlasting anthems of heaven.

These Hymns being composed to be sung after the author had been preaching on the texts prefixed to them, it was his design, that they should bring over again the leading thoughts in the sermon, and naturally express and warmly enforce those devout sentiments, which he hoped were then rising in the minds of his hearers, and help to fix them on the memory and heart: accordingly, the attentive reader will observe, that most of them illustrate such sentiments as a skilful preacher would principally insist upon, when discoursing from the texts on which they are founded. There is a great variety in the form of them: some are devout paraphrases on the texts; others expressive of lively acts of devotion, faith, and trust in God, love to Christ, desire of divine influences, and good resolutions of cultivating the temper and practising the duties recommended; others proclaim a humble joy and triumph in the gracious promises and encouragements of Scripture, particularly in the discovery and prospect of eternal life. The nature of the subjects will easily account for the difference of composure, why some are more plain and artless, others more lively, sublime, and full of poetic fire. If any of them should at first reading appear flat or obscure, it may well be supposed they would affect the mind in a stronger manner, when used in a religious assembly after sermons upon the texts, in which the context hath been considered, (if that were necessary,) parallel places compared, the design of the inspired writer judiciously opened, and the beauty, propriety, and emphasis of the several clauses of the text illustrated: they therefore who use them in their devout retirements, should first read and consider the texts and contexts: and if they would consult some Expositor upon them, particularly the author's on the subjects taken from the New Testament, they will see a spirit and elegance in these composures, which may otherwise be overlooked, and be more likely to reap real and lasting advantage by them.

In this collection there are many hymns formed upon passages in the Old Testament, particularly in the Prophets, directly relating to the case of the Israelites, or some particular good man among them, which the author hath accommodated to the circumstances of Christians, where he thought there was a just and natural resemblance; and he apprehended, that the practice of the inspired writers of the New Testament warranted such accommodations.* He experienced this to be a very acceptable and useful method of preaching on the Old Testament, and accordingly recommended it to his pupils, as what would afford them an opportunity of explaining the design of the prophecies, displaying the wisdom, faithfulness, and grace of God, and suggesting many striking and important instructions: this method would at the same time occasion an agreeable variety in their discourses, prevent their confining themselves to general or common-place subjects, or (in order to avoid a frequent repetition of well-known arguments) running into dry and abstruse speculations, which the capacities of the generality of their hearers could not comprehend, nor their hearts relish and feel: a fashion in preaching too prevalent, and, considering its apparent unprofitableness, much to be lamented.

Those young ministers, who are desirous of entering into the spirit and copiousness of Scripture, may find this work greatly useful to them, by directing them to many very suitable texts, and to some natural thoughts and useful reflections, to be insisted upon in discoursing from them.

There are several hymns in this collection suited to special and extraordinary occasions, for which there was not before a sufficient provision: such as, for opening a new place of worship, the vacancy and settlement of churches, the ordination of ministers, their removal from our world, &c. especially for days of fasting and humiliation on account of actual or apprehended calamities; the want of which during the late rebellion and war was much regretted by many ministers and private Christians.

* Compare Hebrews xiii. 5, 6, and Family Expositor in loc. note (c). There are also some good remarks on this subject in Dr. Watts's Harmony of Times, Places, &c. Diss. V. especially Prop. 15.

In these compositions I hope few low or trivial expressions will be found: nothing appears unsuitable to the gravity and dignity of a worshipping assembly; nothing likely to darken or damp the devotion of the humble Christian, or excite passions merely sensual. There is nothing that savours of a party-spirit, or carries an appearance of designing to confine their use to any of the sects into which Christians are unhappily divided. The materials are divine, and the author's soul was never more enlarged, than when he was promoting a spirit of piety and candour in their just connexion.

I choose to place these Hymns in the order in which the several texts lie in the Bible, as that prevents the necessity of another index, and there appeared no particular reason for disposing them in any different order. In a few places where words occur not sufficiently intelligible to common readers, I have added some more plain and familiar ones in the margin, that they may be read and sung with understanding; preferring this method to that of some authors, who have collected and explained them in a particular index.

As these Hymns were composed during a series of many years, amidst an uncommon variety and daily succession of most important labours, by a man who had no ear for music, and as they want his retouching hand, the reader will be candid to what inaccuracies he may discover: particularly the repetition of the same thoughts and phrases, which in a few instances will be found; and indeed some of them could scarcely be avoided on subjects so nearly resembling, without the exclusion of the most suitable and affecting sentiments or aspirations, for which the introduction of a new or more poetic thought and phrase would not have been an equivalent. There may perhaps be some improprieties, owing to my not being able to read the author's manuscript in particular places, and being obliged, without a poetic genius, to supply those deficiencies, whereby the beauty of the stanza may be greatly defaced, though the sense is preserved.

These Hymns being originally designed for the use of a congregation of plain unlearned Christians, it cannot be expected they should entertain those, who may peruse them merely for the sake of the poetry: yet I think many of them will stand the test of a critical examination, and appear at least equal to other compositions of the like kind; and I am persuaded they will all be delightful and beneficial to those, who desire to have their devotions enlivened, their souls filled with divine love, and who are ambitious to live up to the rules of the gospel; and that they will, through the influences of the Holy Ghost, spread a spirit of fervent piety in such congregations where they may be introduced.

I have nothing to add but my earnest wishes and prayers, that they may be subservient to the glory of God, the more delightful celebration of divine ordinances, and the edification of my fellow Christians. Amen.

JOB ORTON.

Shop, January 1, 1755.

A TABLE

TO FIND OUT

ANY HYMN BY THE FIRST LINE OF IT.

	HYMN
A
Accept, great God, thy Britain's song	46
Alas for Britain, and her sons	186
Alas! how fast our moments fly	127
All-conquering faith, how high it rose	181
All-glorious God, what hymns of praise	298
All hail, mysterious King	359
All hail, victorious Saviour, hail!	354
Aloud I sing the wondrous grace	217
Amazing beauteous change	100
Amazing grace of God on high	99
Amazing plan of sovereign love	124
And are we now brought near to God	228
And art thou with us, gracious Lord	98
And doth the Son of God complain	104
And is salvation brought so near	262
And shall we still be slaves	227
And why do our admiring eyes	252
And will the great eternal God	49
And will the Judge descend	189
And will the Majesty of heaven	144
And will the eternal King	263
Approach, ye children of your God	315
A present God is all our strength	18
Arise, my tenderest thoughts, arise	64
Assist us, Lord, thy name to praise	255
Attend, mine ear, my heart rejoice	187
Attend, my soul, the voice divine	12
Attend, my soul, with reverent awe	159
Awake, my drowsy soul, awake	199
Awake, my soul, stretch every nerve	296
Awake, my soul, to meet the day	362
Awake, our souls, and bless his name	228
Awake, ye saints, and raise your eyes	264
B
Backsliding Israel, hear the voice	122
Behold God's great incarnate Son	337
Behold I come, the Saviour cries	343
Behold I come, the Saviour cries	361
Behold, O Israel's God	141
Behold our God, he owns his name	86
Behold the amazing sight	233
Behold the bleeding Lamb of God	242
Behold the glass the gospel lends	327
Behold the gloomy vale	32
Behold the great eternal God	15
Behold the great Physician stands	223
Behold the path that mortals tread	27
Behold the Son of God appears	314
Behold the Son of God's delight	141
Behold, with pleasing ecstasy	124
Beneath thy mighty hand, O God	338
Beset with snares on every hand	207
Blest be the Lamb, whose blood was spilt	312
Blest Jesus, bow thine ear	301
Blest Jesus, source of grace divine	221
Blest men, who stretch their willing hands	247
Blest Saviour, to my heart more dear	139
Bridegroom of souls, how rich thy love	293
Bright source of intellectual rays	116
C
Captives of Israel, hear	105
Come, our indulgent Saviour, come	254
Come, thou celestial Spirit, come	245
D
Descend, immortal Dove	259
Do not I love thee, O my Lord	246
E
Eternal and immortal King	321
Eternal God, our humbled souls	154
Eternal God, our wondering souls	1
Eternal King, thy robes are white	165
Eternal source of every joy	43
Eternal source of life and thought	322
Exalted Prince of life, we own	248
F
Father divine, the Saviour cried	130
Father divine, thy piercing eye	177
Father of lights, we sing thy name	176
Father of men, thy care we bless	2
Father of mercies, in thy house	289
Father of mercies, send thy grace	205
Father of peace, and God of love	326
Father of spirits, from thy hand	13
Flow on my tears in rising streams	129
Fountain of comfort and of love	271
G
God of eternity, from thee	292
God of Manasseh, wilt thou scorn	371
God of my life, through all its days	71
God of my life, thy constant care	139
God of salvation, we adore	40

	HYMN
God of the ocean, at whose voice	117
Go, saith the Lord, proclaim my grace	219
Grace! 'tis a charming sound	286
Great Father of each perfect gift	251
Great Father of mankind	113
Great Former of this various frame	54
Great God, did pious Abraham pray	3
Great God of heaven and nature rise	369
Great God of hosts attend our prayer	84
Great God, we sing that mighty hand	257
Great Leader of thine Israel's host	306
Great Lord of angels, we adore	166
Great object of thine Israel's hope	131
Great Ruler of all nature's frame	92
Great Sovereign of the human heart	256
Great source of being and of love	147
Great source of life, our souls confess	59
Great Spirit of immortal love	331
Great Teacher of thy church, we own	175
Guardian of Israel, source of peace	368

H

Hail, everlasting Prince of peace	282
Hail, everlasting spring	170
Hail, gracious Saviour, all divine	238
Hail, progeny divine	200
Hail to Emanuel's ever-honoured name	299
Hail to the Prince of life and peace	351
Hark! for the great Creator speaks	114
Hark! for 'tis God's own Son that calls	226
Hark! for 'tis Wisdom's voice	73
Hark the glad sound, the Saviour comes	203
Hark! 'tis our heavenly Leader's voice	353
Hear, gracious Sovereign from thy throne	145
Hearken, ye children of your God	300
Heaven has confirmed the great decree	313
He comes, the royal Conqueror comes	213
He comes, thy God, O Israel, comes	156
Henceforth let each believing heart	241
High let us swell our tuneful notes	201
House of our God, with cheerful anthems ring	67
How free the fountain flows	360
How gentle God's commands	340
How glorious, Lord, art thou	77
How gracious and how wise	143
How keen the tempter's malice is	216
How long shall dreams of creature-bliss	105
How rich thy bounty, King of kings	275
How rich thy favours, God of grace	341
How swift the torrent rolls	164

I

I am thy God, Jehovah said	319
Jehovah! 'tis a glorious name	20
Jesus, I love thy charming name	325
Jesus, I sing thy matchless grace	290
Jesus, mine advocate above	345
Jesus, my Lord, how rich thy grace	188
Jesus, our souls' delightful choice	197
Jesus, the Lord, our souls adore	311
Jesus, we own thy saving power	204
Jesus, we own thy sovereign hand	231
Immense eternal God	10
Immortal God, on thee we call	307
Indulgent God, with pitying eye	61
Indulgent Sovereign of the skies	120
In glad amazement, Lord, I stand	70
In one harmonious cheerful song	232
Inquire, ye pilgrims, for the way	137
In raptures let our hearts ascend	244
Interval of grateful shade	363
In thy rebukes, all-gracious God	109
In what confusion earth appears	212
I own, my God, thy sovereign grace	240
Israel, thy tribute bring	357
Is there a sight in earth or heaven	224
It is my Father's voice	90
It is the Lord of glory calls	126

L

Legions of foes beset me round	31
Let heaven burst forth into a song	103
Let Jacob to his Maker sing	102
Let Zion's watchmen all awake	324
Lift up, ye saints, your weeping eyes	358
Listen, ye hills, ye mountains, hear	158
Look back, my soul, with grateful love	58
Look down, O Lord, with pitying eye	146
Lord, dost thou show a corner-stone	334
Lord of the sabbath, hear our vows	310
Lord of the vineyard, we adore	237
Lord, we adore thy wondrous name	55
Lord, we have broke thy holy laws	157
Lord, we have wandered from thy way	65
Lord, when iniquities abound	7
Lord, when thine Israel we survey	83
Lord, when thy hand is lifted up	88
Loud be thy name adored	283
Loud let the tuneful trumpet sound	50
Loud to the Prince of heaven	31

M

Mark the soft-falling snow	111
Mine inward joys, suppressed too long	330
My God, and is thy table spread	171
My God, assist me while I raise	266
My God! how cheerful is the sound	297
My God, the covenant of thy love	21
My God, thy service well demands	364
My God, what silken cords are thine	152
My God, whose all-pervading eye	45
My gracious Lord, I own thy right	294
My helper God, I bless his name	19
My Jesus, while in mortal flesh	280
My Lord, didst thou endure such smart	276
My Saviour, didst thou die for me	103
My Saviour, I am thine	267
My Saviour, let me hear thy voice	179
My sins, alas! how foul the stains	348
My soul, review the trembling days	68
My soul, the awful hour will come	39
My soul triumphant in the Lord	33
My soul, with all thy wakened powers	320
My soul, with joy attend	231
My various powers, awake	347
My wakened soul, extend thy wings	342

N

Now be that sacrifice surveyed	291
Now let a true ambition rise	178
Now let my soul with transport rise	261
Now let our cheerful eyes survey	8
Now let our mourning hearts revive	17

	HYMN
Now let our songs address the God of peace	367
Now let our songs proclaim abroad	318
Now let our voices join	69
Now let the feeble all be strong	269
Now let the gates of Zion sing	182
Now let the listening world around	74
Now let the sons of Belial hear	80
Now to that sovereign grace	326

O

O God of Jacob, by whose hand	4
O happy Christian, who can boast	349
O happy day, that fixed my choice	23
O injured Majesty of heaven	142
O Israel, blest beyond compare	16
O Israel, thou art blest	78
O praise ye the Lord, prepare a new song	366
O righteous God, thou Judge supreme	14
O thou that hast redemption wrought	24
Our banner is the eternal God	6
Our eyes salvation see	202
Our God ascends his lofty throne	82
Our heavenly Father calls	346
Our souls with pleasing wonder view	34
Our souls with reverence, Lord, bow down	339
O where is sovereign mercy gone	116
O ye immortal throng	304
O Zion, tune thy voice	118

P

Parent of universal good	47
Peace, all ye sorrows of the heart	235
Peace, 'tis the Lord Jehovah's hand	42
Perfection! 'tis an empty name	63
Perpetual source of light and grace	151
Praise to our Shepherd's gracious name	229
Praise to the Lord of boundless might	274
Praise to the Lord on high	273
Praise to the Lord whose mighty hand	272
Praise to the radiant source of bliss	101
Praise to the Sovereign of the sky	162
Praise to thy name, eternal God	344

R

Raise, thoughtless sinner, raise thine eye	148
Remark, my soul, the narrow bounds	52
Repent, the voice celestial cries	254
Return, my roving heart, return	29
Return, my soul, and seek thy rest	57

S

Salvation doth to God belong	374
Salvation! O melodious sound	36
Satan, the dire invader, came	308
Saviour divine, we know thy name	132
Saviour of men, and Lord of love	184
Searcher of hearts, before thy face	250
See how the Lord of mercy spreads	185
See Israel's gentle Shepherd stand	198
See the destruction is begun	94
See the fair structure wisdom rears	76
See the old dragon from his throne	356
Shepherd of Israel, bend thine ear	372
Shepherd of Israel, thou dost keep	123
Shine forth, eternal source of light	150
Shine on our souls, eternal God	53
Shout! for the battlements are fallen	278
Sing to the Lord above	167
Sing to the Lord a new melodious song	220
Sing to the Lord, who loud proclaims	30
Sing, ye redeemed of the Lord	96
So firm the saints' foundations stand	161
Sovereign of all the worlds on high	281
Sovereign of heaven, thine empire spreads	180
Sovereign of life, before thine eye	25
Sovereign of life, I own thy hand	60
Sovereign of nature! all is thine	14
Spring up my soul, with ardent flight	268
Stupendous grace! and can it be	287
Supreme in mercy, who shall dare	160
Supreme of beings, with delight	355

T

The covenant of a Saviour's love	236
The creatures, Lord, confess thy hand	5
The darkened sky, how thick it lowers	66
The day approacheth, O my soul	317
The deluge at the Almighty's call	336
The ever-living God	89
The glorious Lord is Israel's hope	95
The great Jehovah! who shall dare	26
The King of heaven his table spreads	211
The Lord from his exalted throne	28
The Lord! how kind are all his ways	149
The Lord, how rich his comforts are	277
The Lord Jehovah calls	309
The Lord into his vineyard comes	174
The Lord of glory reigns supremely great	44
The Lord of life exalted stands	225
The Lord on mortal worms looks down	172
The Lord, our Lord! how rich his grace	106
The Lord with pleasure views his saints	37
The promises I sing	316
The righteous Lord, supremely great	128
These mortal joys, how soon they fade	209
The sepulchres, how thick they stand	243
The swift-declining day	130
The eternal God, his name how great	24
The vineyard of the Lord, how fair	81
Thou God of Jabez, hear	370
Thou, Lord, through every changing scene	51
Thou, mighty Lord, art God alone	253
Thrice happy souls, who born from heaven	79
Thrice happy state, where saints shall live	215
Thus hath the son of Jesse said	365
Thus saith Jehovah, from his seat	91
Thy flock, with what a tender care	230
Thy judgments cry aloud	115
Thy piercing eye, O God, surveys	138
Thy presence, everlasting God	279
'Tis mine the covenant of his grace	22
To all his flock, what wondrous love	239
To-morrow, Lord, is thine	329
To thee, great Architect on high	305
To thee, my God, my days are known	38
To thee, O God, we homage pay	178
Transporting tidings, which we hear	362
Tremendous Judge, before thy bar	373
Triumphant, Lord, thy goodness reigns	35
Triumphant Zion, lift thy head	107

V

Viler than dust, O Lord, am I	145

	HYMN
Ungrateful sinners, whence this scorn	258
Unite, my roving thoughts, unite	48

W

	HYMN
Wait on the Lord, ye heirs of hope	93
Weary, and weak, and faint	87
We bless the eternal source of light	352
We praise the Lord for heavenly bread	222
We sing the deep mysterious plan	284
What bosom moved with pious zeal	9
What doleful accents do I hear	192
What haughty scorner, saith the Lord	168
What mysteries, Lord, in thee combine	350
What venerable sight appears	214
When at this distance, Lord, we trace	183
While on the verge of life I stand	295
Whose words against the Lord are stout	136
Why flow these torrents of distress	196
Why should our mourning souls delight	260
Why will ye lavish out your years	206
Wide o'er all worlds the Saviour reigns	195
With ecstasy of joy	333
With flowing eyes, and bleeding hearts	270
With humble pleasure, Lord, we trace	11
With pity, Lord, thy servant view	62
With reverend awe, tremendous Lord	133
With transport, Lord, our souls proclaim	323
With what delight I raise mine eyes	85

Y

	HYMN
Ye armies of the living God	265
Ye golden lamps of heaven, farewell	119
Ye hearts with youthful vigour warm	75
Ye heavens, with sounds of triumph ring	303
Ye humble souls, rejoice	72
Ye humble souls, that seek the Lord	194
Ye little flocks, whom Jesus feeds	208
Ye mourning saints, whose streaming tears	112
Ye prisoners who in bondage lie	169
Yes, Britain seemed to ruin doomed	155
Ye servants of the Lord	210
Ye sinners, bend your stubborn necks	328
Ye sinners, on backsliding bent	153
Yes, it is sweet to taste his grace	332
Ye sons of men, with joy record	56
Yes, the Redeemer rose	218
Yes, 'tis the voice of love divine	163
Ye subjects of the Lord proclaim	108
Ye weak inhabitants of clay	79

HYMNS

ON VARIOUS TEXTS IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.

HYMN I.

Enoch's piety and translation. Gen. v. 24. Heb. xi. 5.

1 Eternal God, our wondering souls
Admire thy matchless grace;
That thou wilt walk, that thou wilt dwell,
With Adam's worthless race.

2 O lead me to that happy path,
Where I my God may meet;
Though hosts of foes begird it round,
Though briers wound my feet.

3 Cheered with thy converse, I can trace
The desert with delight:
Through all the gloom one smile of thine
Can dissipate the night.

4 Nor shall I through eternal days
A restless pilgrim roam;
Thy hand, that now directs my course,
Shall soon convey me home.

5 I ask not Enoch's rapturous flight
To realms of heavenly day;
Nor seek Elijah's fiery steeds
To bear this flesh away.

6 Joyful my spirit will consent
To drop its mortal load;
And hail* the sharpest pangs of death,
That break its way to God.

HYMN II.

God's gracious approbation of a religious care of our families. Gen. xviii. 19.

1 Father of men, thy care we bless,
Which crowns our families with peace:
From thee they sprung, and by thy hand
Their root and branches are sustained.

2 To God, most worthy to be praised,
Be our domestic altars raised;
Who, Lord of heaven, scorns not to dwell
With saints in their obscurest cell.

3 To thee may each united house,
Morning and night, present its vows:
Our servants there, and rising race,
Be taught thy precepts, and thy grace.

4 O may each future age proclaim
The honours of thy glorious name;
While pleased, and thankful, we remove
To join the family above.

HYMN III.

Abraham's intercession for Sodom. Gen. xviii. 32.

1 Great God! did pious Abra'm pray
For Sodom's vile abandoned race?
And shall not all our souls be roused
For Britain to implore thy grace?

2 Base as we are, does not thine eye
Its chosen thousands here survey,
Whose souls, deep humbled, mourn the crowds
Who walk in sin's destructive way?

3 O Judge supreme, let not thy sword
The righteous with the wicked smite;
Nor bury, in promiscuous heaps,
Rebels, and saints thy chief delight.

4 For these thy children spare the land,
Avert the thunders big with death;
Nor let the seeds of latent‡ fire
Be kindled by thy flaming breath.

* Salute or welcome.

‡ Hidden, secret.

5 Oh! be not angry, mighty God,
While dust and ashes seek thy face;
But, gently bending from thy throne,
Renew, and still increase, the grace.

6 Jesus the intercessor hear,
And for his sake thy grace impart,
Which, while it stops the fiery stream,
Dissolves the most obdurate heart.

7 Sodom shall change to Zion then,
And heavenly dews be scattered round,
That plants of paradise may spring
Where baleful* poisons cursed the ground.

HYMN IV.

Jacob's vow. Gen. xxviii. 20—22.

1 O God of Jacob, by whose hand
Thine Israel still is fed,
Who through this weary pilgrimage
Hast all our fathers led.

2 To thee our humble vows we raise,
To thee address our prayer,
And in thy kind and faithful breast
Deposit all our care.

3 If thou, through each perplexing path,
Wilt be our constant guide;
If thou wilt daily bread supply,
And raiment wilt provide;

4 If thou wilt spread thy shield around,
Till these our wanderings cease,
And at our Father's loved abode
Our souls arrive in peace:

5 To thee, as to our covenant God,
We'll our whole selves resign;
And count, that not our tenth alone,
But all we have is thine.

HYMN V.

The hand of the Lord upon the cattle. Exod. ix. 3.

1 The creatures, Lord, confess thy hand,
Through earth and sky, through sea and land.
And all their meanest orders share
Their Maker's pity and his care.

2 O look from thine exalted throne,
And hear our panting cattle moan:
Prone† o'er the untasted food they lie,
Groan out their agonies, and die.

3 What have these harmless creatures done?
To draw this sore chastisement down?
'Tis human guilt for vengeance calls,
And heavy on the herds it falls.

4 From them to us the stroke might pass,
And mow down thousands of our race;
Till desolation reigned around,
Our cities void, untilled our ground.

5 Prevent the ruin by thy grace,
And melt our hearts to seek thy face:
Blest fruit of thy correcting rod,
To lose our beasts, and find our God.

HYMN VI.

Israel and Amalek. Exod. xvii. 11.

For a Fast-day.

1 Our banner is the eternal God,
Nor will we yield to fear;
Amidst ten thousand fierce assaults,
His mighty aid is near.

2 To him the hands of faith we stretch,
And plead experienced grace:
To him the voice of prayer we raise,
Nor will he hide his face.

3 No more, proud Amalek, thy boast,
"God's arm is feeble grown:"
His sword shall lop off every hand
That dares insult his throne.

4 Awake, tremendous Judge, awake,
Our nation's cause to plead;
Nor let thine Israel's foes, and thine,
By wickedness succeed.

5 Our fainting hands, how soon they droop!
But thou the weak canst raise;
And in the mount of prayer canst leave
An altar to thy praise.

HYMN VII.

Against following a multitude to do evil.
Exod. xxiii. 2.

1 Lord, when iniquities abound,
And growing crimes appear;
We view the deluge rising round
With sorrow, and with fear.

2 Yet when its waves most fiercely beat,
And spread destruction wide,
Thy Spirit can a standard raise
To stem ‡ the roaring tide.

3 May thy triumphant arm awake,
Thy sacred cause to plead;
And let the multitude confess
That thou art God indeed

4 Their hearts shall in a moment turn,
Like water, by thy hand;

* Destructive. † Stretched out on the ground. ‡ Restrain.

One word shall bow their stubborn necks
To own thy high command.

5 Our feeble souls at least support,
And there thy power display;
Then multitudes shall strive in vain
To draw us from thy way.

HYMN VIII.

Christ's intercession typified by Aaron's breast-plate. Exod. xxviii. 29.

1 Now let our cheerful eyes survey
Our great High Priest above,
And celebrate his constant care,
And sympathetic love.

2 Though raised to a superior throne,
Where angels bow around,
And high o'er all the shining train
With matchless honours crowned;

3 The names of all his saints he bears
Deep graven on his heart;
Nor shall the meanest Christian say
That he hath lost his part.

4 Those characters shall fair abide,
Our everlasting trust,
When gems, and monuments, and crowns
Are mouldered down to dust.

5 So, gracious Saviour, on my breast
May thy dear name be worn,
A sacred ornament and guard,
To endless ages borne.

HYMN IX.

Who is on the Lord's side? Exod. xxxiii. 26.

1 What bosom moved with pious zeal
Doth for its God's dishonour feel?
What heart with generous ardour glows
To plead his cause against his foes?

2 Great God, what bosom can be cold?
What coward must not here grow bold?
While honour, interest, truth, and love,
Concur our inmost souls to move?

3 Around thy standard, Lord, we press,
Thine injured honour to redress,
And with determined voice demand
The signal of thy conquering hand.

4 Thou shalt these sacred weapons bless,
And lead through war to endless peace;
Nor death itself our souls shall dread,
For thine own arm shall raise the dead.

HYMN X.

God's presence desirable. Exod. xxxiii. 15.

1 Immense, eternal God!
How marvellous thy name!
Thy presence all abroad
Pervades* all nature's frame:
Heaven, earth, and air,
And the dark cell,
Where devils dwell
In long despair.

2 Yet thou hast chosen ways
To make thy presence known,
To favourites of thy grace,
To upright souls alone:
This glory, Lord,
My soul would see,
This grace to me,
My God, afford.

3 If thou thy lustre veil,
The charms of nature fade:
All withered, weak, and pale,
They bow their languid head:
My Father, shine;
For thou canst give
The dead to live
By beams divine.

4 Even Eden's blissful lands
Would in thine absence mourn:
But thou wild Afric's† sands
To Paradise canst turn.
If God be there
The gloom is bright;
But noon is night,
Till thou appear.

5 Come, for my spirit glows
With infinite desire!
Strong love impatient grows,
And sets my heart on fire.
My Father, come,
That presence give
On which I live,
Or call me home.

HYMN XI.

Moses's view of the divine glory. Exod. xxxiii. 18.

1 With humble pleasure, Lord, we trace
The ancient records of thy grace;
And our own consolation draw
From what thy servant Moses saw.

2 May we behold thy glory shine
With gentle beams of love divine;
And hear thy secret voice proclaim
The various wonders of thy name.

3 If feeble nature faint to endure
A voice so sweet, a ray so pure;
Its dissolution would delight,
While death would wear a form so bright.

* Penetrates through our souls.
† Africa, a part of the earth, remarkable for sandy barren deserts.

4 Death shall unveil that world above,
Where the dear children of thy love,
Attempered* all to heavenly day,
Bear and reflect the immediate ray.

HYMN XII.

The proclamation of God's name to Moses; or, Divine mercy and justice. Exod. xxxiv. 6–8.

1 Attend, my soul, the voice divine,
And mark what beaming glories shine
Around thy condescending God!
To us, to us, he still proclaims
His awful, his endearing names:
Attend, and sound them all abroad.

2 "Jehovah I, the sovereign Lord,
The mighty God, by heaven adored,
Down to the earth my footsteps bend:
My heart the tenderest pity knows,
Goodness full-streaming wide o'erflows,
And grace and truth shall never end.

3 "My patience long can crimes endure:
My pardoning love is ever sure,
When penitential sorrow mourns;
To millions, through unnumbered years,
New hope and new delight it bears;
Yet wrath against the sinner burns."

4 Make haste, my soul, the vision meet,
All-prostrate at thy Sovereign's feet,
And drink the tuneful accents in;
Speak on, my Lord, repeat the voice,
Diffuse these heart-expanding joys,
Till heaven complete the rapturous scene.

HYMN XIII.

The God of spirits sought to supply vacancies in the congregations of his people. Numb. xxxvii. 15–17.

1 Father of spirits, from thy hand,
Our souls immortal came;
And still thine energy† divine
Supports the ethereal‡ flame.

2 By thee our spirits all are known;
And each remotest thought
Lies wide expanded to his eye,
By whom their powers were wrought.

3 To thee, when mortal comforts fail,
Thy flock deserted flies;
And, on the eternal Shepherd's care,
Our cheerful hope relies.

4 When o'er thy faithful servant's dust
Thy dear assemblies mourn,
In speedy tokens of thy grace,
O Israel's God, return.

5 The powers of nature all are thine,
And thine the aids of grace;
Thine arm has borne thy churches up
Through every rising race.

6 Exert thy sacred influence here,
And here thy suppliants bless,
And change, to strains of cheerful praise,
Their accents of distress.

7 With faithful heart, with skilful hand,
May this thy flock be fed;
And with a steady growing pace,
To Zion's mountain led.

* Fitted and enabled to bear.
† Power. ‡ Heavenly.

HYMN XIV.

The Lord's people his portion. Deut. xxxii. 9.

1 Sovereign of nature, all is thine,
The air, the earth, the sea:
By thee the orbs celestial§ shine,
And cherubs live by thee.

2 Rich in thy own essential store:
Thou call'st forth worlds at will:
Ten thousand, and ten thousand more,
Would hear thy summons still.

3 What treasure wilt thou then confess?
And thy own portion call?
What by peculiar right possess,
Imperial Lord of all?

4 Thine Israel thou wilt stoop to claim,
Wilt mark them out for thine:
Ten thousand praises to thy name
For goodness so divine!

5 That I am thine, my soul would boast,
And boast its claim to thee:
Nor shall God's property be lost,
Nor God be torn from me.

HYMN XV.

The eternal God his people's refuge and support. Deut. xxxiii. 27.

1 Behold the great eternal God
Spreads everlasting arms abroad,
And calls our souls to shelter there.
Wonders of mingled power and grace
To all his Israel he displays,
Guarded from danger and from fear.

2 Thither my feeble soul shall fly,
When terrors press, and death is nigh,
And there will I delight to dwell:
On that high tower I rear my head
Serene, nor knows my heart to dread,
Amidst surrounding hosts of hell.

§ The heavenly bodies.

3 The shadow of the Almighty's wings
Composure unmolested brings,
While threatening horrors round me crowd;
In vain the storms of rattling hail
The walls of this retreat assail,
And the wild tempest roars aloud.

4 In louder strains my fearless tongue
Shall warble its victorious songs,
My Father's graces to proclaim;
He bears his infant offspring on
To glory radiant as his throne,
And joys eternal as his name.

HYMN XVI.

The happiness of God's Israel. Deut. xxxiii. 29.

1 O ISRAEL, blest beyond compare!
Unrivalled all thy glories are:
Jehovah deigns* to fill thy throne,
And calls thine interest all his own.

2 He is thy Saviour; he thy Lord;
His shield is thine; and thine his sword:
Review in ecstasy of thought
The grand redemption he has wrought.

3 From Satan's yoke he sets thee free,
Opens thy passage through the sea;
He through the desert is thy guide,
And heaven for Canaan will provide.

4 Not Jacob's sons of old could boast
Such favours to their chosen host;
Their glories which through ages shine,
Are but dim shades and types of thine.

5 Celestial Spirit, teach our tongue
Sublimer strains than Moses sung,
Proportioned to the sweeter name
Of God the Saviour, and the Lamb.

HYMN XVII.

Support in the gracious presence of God, under the loss of ministers and other useful friends. Josh. i. 2, 4, 5.

1 Now let our mourning hearts revive,
And all our tears be dry;
Why should those eyes be drowned in grief,
Which view a Saviour nigh?

2 What though the arm of conquering death
Does God's own house invade?
What though the prophet, and the priest,
Be numbered with the dead?

3 Though earthly shepherds dwell in dust,
The aged and the young,
The watchful eye in darkness closed,
And mute the instructive tongue.

* Condescends.

4 The eternal Shepherd still survives,
New comfort to impart;
His eye still guides us, and his voice
Still animates our heart.

5 "Lo, I am with you," saith the Lord,
"My church shall safe abide;
For I will ne'er forsake my own,
Whose souls in me confide."

6 Through every scene of life and death,
This promise is our trust;
And this shall be our children's song,
When we are cold in dust.

HYMN XVIII.

God insensibly withdrawn. Judges xvi. 20.

1 A PRESENT God is all our strength,
And all our joy and hope;
When he withdraws, our comforts die,
And every grace must droop.

2 But flattering trifles charm our hearts
To court their false embrace,
Till justly this neglected Friend
Averts his angry face.

3 He leaves us, and we miss him not,
But go presumptuous on;
Till baffled, wounded, and enslaved,
We learn that God is gone.

4 And what, my soul, can then remain
One ray of light to give?
Severed from him, their better life,
How can his children live?

5 Hence, all ye painted forms of joy,
And leave my heart to mourn:
I would devote these eyes to tears,
Till cheered by his return.

6 Look back, my Lord, and own the place,
Where once thy temple stood;
For lo, its ruins bear the mark
Of rich atoning blood.

HYMN XIX.

Ebenezer; or, God's helping hand reviewed and acknowledged. 1 Sam. vii. 12.

For New-year's Day.

1 My helper God! I bless his name;
The same his power, his grace the same,
The tokens of his friendly care
Open, and crown, and close the year.

2 I midst ten thousand dangers stand,
Supported by his guardian hand;
And see, when I survey my ways,
Ten thousand monuments of praise

3 Thus far his arm hath led me on;
Thus far I make his mercy known:
And, while I tread this desert land,
New mercies shall new songs demand.

4 My grateful soul, on Jordan's shore,
Shall raise one sacred pillar more:
Then bear, in his bright courts above,
Inscriptions of immortal love.

HYMN XX.

The saint encouraging himself in the Lord his God.
1 Sam. xxx. 6.

1 JEHOVAH, 'tis a glorious name,
Still pregnant with delight;
It scatters round a cheerful beam,
To gild the darkest night.

2 What though our mortal comforts fade,
And droop like withering flowers?
Nor time nor death can break that band,
Which makes Jehovah ours.

3 My cares, I give you to the wind,
And shake you off like dust;
Well may I trust my all with him,
With whom my soul I trust.

HYMN XXI.

Support in God's covenant under domestic troubles.
2 Sam. xxiii. 5.

1 My God, the covenant of thy love
Abides for ever sure,
And in his matchless grace I feel
My happiness secure.

2 What though my house be not with thee,
As nature could desire?
To nobler joys than nature gives,
Thy servants all aspire.

3 Since thou, the everlasting God,
My Father art become;
Jesus my Guardian and my Friend,
And heaven my final home;

4 I welcome all thy sovereign will,
For all that will is love;
And, when I know not what thou dost,
I wait the light above.

5 Thy covenant in the darkest gloom
Shall heavenly rays impart,
Which, when my eyelids close in death,
Shall warm my chilling heart.

HYMN XXII.

Support in God's covenant in the near views of death. 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. and 5. compared.

1 'Tis mine, the covenant of his grace,
And every promise mine!
All sprung from everlasting love,
And sealed by blood divine.

2 On my unworthy favoured head,
Its blessings all unite;
Blessings more numerous than the stars,
More lasting and more bright.

3 Death, thou mayst tear this rag of flesh,
And sink my fainting head,
And lay my ruins in the grave,
Among my kindred dead:

4 But death and hell in vain shall strive
To break that sacred rest,
Which God's expiring children feel,
While leaning on his breast.

5 The enlarged soul thou canst not reach,
Nor rend from Christ away;
Though o'er my mouldering dust thou boast
The triumphs of a day.

6 The night is past, my morning dawns;
My covenant God descends,
And wakes that dust to join my soul
In bliss that never ends.

7 That covenant the last accents claims
Of this poor faltering tongue;
And that shall the first notes employ
Of my celestial song.

HYMN XXIII.

Rejoicing in our covenant engagements to God.
2 Chron. xv. 15.

1 O HAPPY day, that fixed my choice
On thee my Saviour and my God!
Well may this glowing heart rejoice,
And tell its raptures all abroad.

2 O happy bond, that seals my vows
To him, who merits all my love!
Let cheerful anthems * fill his house,
While to that sacred shrine † I move.

3 'Tis done; the great transaction 's done:
I am my Lord's, and he is mine:
He drew me, and I followed on,
Charmed to confess the voice divine.

4 Now rest my long divided heart,
Fixed on this blissful centre rest;
With ashes who would grudge to part,
When called on angels' bread to feast?

5 High Heaven that heard the solemn vow,
That vow renewed shall daily hear:
Till in life's latest hour I bow,
And bless in death a bond so dear.

* Hymns of praise. † Altar or place of worship.

HYMN XXIV.

God stirring up the spirit of Cyrus to redeem Israel. Ezra i. 1. compared with Isa. xliv. 1—4.

1 The eternal God! his name how great!
How deep his counsels! how complete!
The hearts of kings his power can sway;
His word unconscious* they obey.

2 Summoned of old in distant days
To serve his schemes, and show his praise,
Cyrus, illustrious prince, appears,
His people frees, his temple rears.

3 Through legions armed he breaks his way,
And tramples generals down like clay;
The bars of steel he cuts in twain,
And brazen gates oppose in vain.

4 But to Jehovah's accents mild
The hero, pliant as a child,
Lays the new gates of empire by,
Till Zion rise and shines on high.

5 Thus, mighty God, shall every heart,
(If thou thine influence there exert,)
Throw its own fondest schemes aside,
And follow where thy hand shall guide.

6 The foremost sons of fame shall boast
To raise thy temples from their dust;
Princes shall shout thy name aloud,
And new-born priests thine altars crowd.

HYMN XXV.

A glance from God bringing us down to the solitude of the grave. Job vii. 8.

1 Sovereign of life, before thine eye,
Lo, mortal men by thousands die!
One glance from thee at once brings down
The proudest brow that wears a crown.

2 Banished at once from human sight
To the dark grave's unchanging night,
Imprisoned in that dusty bed,
We hide our solitary head.

3 The friendly band† no more shall greet,
Accents familiar once, and sweet:
No more the well-known features trace,
No more renew the fond embrace.

4 Yet if my Father's faithful hand
Conduct me through this gloomy land,
My soul with pleasure shall obey,
And follow where he leads the way.

5 He nobler friends than here I leave,
In brighter, surer worlds can give;
Or by the beamings of his eye
A lost creation well supply.

* Without intending it. Isa. x. 7. † Company.

HYMN XXVI.

The impossibility of prospering while men harden themselves against God. Job ix. 4.

1 The great Jehovah! who shall dare
With him to tempt unequal war?
What heart of steel shall dare to oppose,
And league among his hardened foes?

2 At his command the lightnings dart,
And swift transfix‡ the rebel heart:
Earth trembles at his look, and cleaves,
And legions sink in living graves.

3 Where are the haughty monarchs now,
Who scorned his word with lowering brow?
Where are the trophies of their reigns;
Or where their ruins' last remains?

4 See Pharaoh sinking in the tide,
See Babel's tyrant, mad with pride,
Graze with the beasts! hear Herod roar,
While worms his deity devour!

5 See, from the turrets of the skies,
Tall cherubs sink, no more to rise;
And trace their rank on thrones of light,
By heavier chains, and darker night!

6 Great God! and shall this soul of mine
Presume to challenge wrath divine?
Trembling, I seek thy mercy-seat,
And lay my weapons at thy feet.

HYMN XXVII.

The great journey. Job xvi. 22.

1 Behold the path that mortals tread
Down to the regions of the dead!
Nor will the fleeting moments stay,
Nor can we measure back our way.

2 Our kindred and our friends are gone;
Know, O my soul, this doom thy own;
Feeble as theirs my mortal frame,
The same my way, my house the same.

3 From vital air, from cheerful light,
To the cold grave's perpetual night,
From scenes of duty, means of grace,
Must I to God's tribunal pass!

4 Important journey! awful view!
How great the change! the scenes how new!
The golden gates of heaven displayed,
Or hell's fierce flames, and gloomy shade!

5 Awake, my soul; thy way prepare,
And lose in this each mortal care:
With steady feet that path be trod,
Which through the grave conducts to God.

‡ Pierce through.

6 Jesus, to thee my all I trust,
And, if thou call me down to dust,
I know thy voice, I bless thy hand,
And die in smiles at thy command.

7 What was my terror is my joy;
These views my brightest hopes employ,
To go, ere many years are o'er,
Secure I shall return no more.

HYMN XXVIII.

The penitent brought back from the pit.
Job xxxiii. 27, 28.

1 The Lord, from his exalted throne,
In majesty arrayed,
Looks with a melting pity down
On all that seek his aid.

2 When, touched with penitent remorse,
Our follies past we mourn,
With what a tenderness of love
He meets our first return!

3 From heaven he sent his only Son
To ransom us with blood,
To snatch us from the burning pit,
When on its brink we stood.

4 From death and hell he leads us up
By a delightful way;
And the bright beams of endless life,
Doth round our path display.

5 Great God, we wonder and adore;
And, to exalt such grace,
We long to learn the songs of heaven,
Ere yet we reach the place.

HYMN XXIX.

Communing with our hearts. Psalm iv. 4.

1 Return, my roving heart, return,
And chase these shadowy forms no more;
Seek out some solitude to mourn,
And thy forsaken God implore.

2 Wisdom and pleasure dwell at home;
Retired and silent seek them there:
True conquest is ourselves to o'ercome,
True strength to break the tempter's snare.

3 And thou, my God, whose piercing eye
Distinct surveys each deep recess,
In these abstracted hours draw nigh,
And with thy presence fill the place.

4 Through all the mazes* of my heart
My search let heavenly wisdom guide,
And still its radiant beams impart,
Till all be searched and purified.

5 Then, with the visits of thy love,
Vouchsafe my inmost soul to cheer;
Till every grace shall join to prove
That God hath fixed his dwelling there.

* Windings, perplexities

HYMN XXX.

God's name the encouragement of our faith
Psalm ix. 10.

1 Sing to the Lord, who loud proclaims
His various and his saving names;
O may they not be heard alone,
But by our sure experience known!

2 Let great Jehovah be adored,
The eternal, all-sufficient Lord!
He through the world most high confessed,
By whom 'twas formed, and is possessed.

3 Awake our noblest powers to bless,
The God of Abraham, God of peace;
Now by a dearer title known,
Father and God of Christ his Son.

4 Through every age his gracious ear
Is open to his servants' prayer;
Nor can one humble soul complain,
That it hath sought its God in vain.

5 What unbelieving heart shall dare
In whispers to suggest a fear,
While still he owns his ancient name!
The same his power, his love the same!

6 To thee our souls in faith arise,
To thee we lift expecting eyes;
And boldly through the desert tread,
For God will guard where God shall lead.

HYMN XXXI.

Triumph in God's protection. Psalm xviii. 2.

1 Legions of foes beset me round,
While marching over this dangerous ground;
Yet in Jehovah's aid I trust,
And in his power superior boast.

2 My buckler he; his shield is spread
To cover this defenceless head:
Now let the fiercest foes assail,
Their darts I count as rattling hail.

3 He is my rock, and he my tower;
The base† how firm! the walls how sure!
The battlements how high they rise!
And hide their summits‡ in the skies.

4 Deliverances to God belong;
He is my strength, and he my song;
The horn of my salvation he,
And all my foes dispersed shall flee.

† Foundation ‡ Top

5 Through the long march my lips shall sing
My great Protector and my King,
Till Zion's mount my feet ascend,
And all my painful warfare end.

6 Raised on the shining turrets there,
Through all the prospect wide and fair,
A land of peace his hosts survey,
And bless the grace that led the way.

HYMN XXXII.

Support in death. Psalm xxiii. 4.

1 Behold the gloomy vale,
Which thou, my soul, must tread,
Beset with terrors fierce and pale,
That leads thee to the dead.

2 Ye pleasing scenes, adieu,*
Which I so long have known:
My friends, a long farewell to you,
For I must pass alone.

3 And thou, beloved clay,
Long partner of my cares,
In this rough part art torn away
With agony and tears.

4 But see, a ray of light,
With splendours all divine,
Breaks through these doleful realms of night,
And makes its horrors shine.

5 Where death and darkness reigns,
Jehovah is my stay:
His rod my trembling feet sustains,
His staff defends my way.

6 Dear Shepherd, lead me on;
My soul disdains to fear;
Death's gloomy phantoms all are flown,
Now life's great Lord is near.

HYMN XXXIII.

The good man's prospect for time and eternity.
Psalm xxiii. 6.

1 My soul, triumphant in the Lord,
Shall tell its joys abroad.
And march with holy vigour on,
Supported by its God.

2 Through all the winding maze† of life,
His hand hath been my guide,
And in that long-experienced care,
My heart shall still confide.

3 His grace through all the desert flows,
An unexhausted stream:
That grace on Zion's sacred mount
Shall be my endless theme.‡

4 Beyond the choicest joys of earth
These distant courts I love;
But O! I burn with strong desire
To view thy house above.

5 Mingled with all the shining band,
My soul would there adore;
A pillar in thy temple fixed,
To be removed no more.

HYMN XXXIV.

The goodness which God has wrought and laid up for his people. Psalm xxxi. 1.

1 Our souls with pleasing wonder view
The bounties of thy grace;
How much bestowed! how much reserved
For them that seek thy face!

2 Thy liberal hand with worldly bliss
Oft makes their cup run o'er;
And in the covenant of thy love
They find diviner store.

3 Here mercy hides their numerous sins;
Here grace their souls renews;
Here thy own reconciled face
Doth heavenly beams diffuse.

4 But O! what treasures yet unknown
Are lodged in worlds to come!
If these the enjoyments of the way,
How happy is their home!

5 And what shall mortal worms reply?
Or how such goodness own?
But 'tis our joy that, Lord, to thee,
Thy servants' hearts are known.

6 Thine eyes shall read those grateful thoughts
No language can express:
Yet, when our liveliest thanks we pay,
Our debts do most increase.

7 Since time 's too short, all-gracious God,
To utter half thy praise,
Loud to the honour of thy name
Eternal hymns we'll raise.

HYMN XXXV

Relishing the divine goodness. Psal. xxxiv. 8, 9

1 Triumphant Lord, thy goodness reigns
Through all the wide celestial plains;
And its full streams redundant flow
Down to the abodes of men below.

2 Through nature's works its glories shine:
The cares of providence are thine:
And grace erects our ruined frame
A fairer temple to thy name.

3 O give to every human heart
To taste and feel how good thou art;

* Farewell. † Wilderness ‡ Subject

With grateful love and reverent fear,
To know how blest thy children are.

4 Let nature burst into a song:
Ye echoing hills, the notes prolong:
Earth, seas, and stars, your anthems raise,
All vocal* with your Maker's praise.

5 Ye saints, with joy the theme pursue;
Its sweetest notes belong to you;
Chose by this condescending King
For ever round his throne to sing.

HYMN XXXVI.

God saying to the soul, that he is its salvation. Psalm xxxv. 3.

1 Salvation! O melodious sound
To wretched dying men!
Salvation, that from God proceeds,
And leads to God again!

2 Rescued from hell's eternal gloom,
From fiends,† and fires, and chains:
Raised to a paradise of bliss,
Where love and glory reigns!

3 But O! may a degenerate soul,
Sinful and weak as mine,
Presume to raise a trembling eye
To blessings so divine?

4 The lustre of so bright a bliss
My feeble heart o'erbears;
And unbelief almost perverts
The promise into tears.

5 My Saviour God, no voice but thine
These dying hopes can raise:
Speak thy salvation to my soul,
And turn its tears to praise.

6 My Saviour God, this broken voice
Transported shall proclaim,
And call on the angelic harps
To sound so sweet a name.

HYMN XXXVII.

God's complacency in the prosperity of his servant. Psalm xxxv. 27.

1 The Lord with pleasure views his saints,
And calls them all his own;
And low he bows to their complaints,
And pities every groan.

2 In all the joys they here possess
He takes a tender part;
And when they rise to heavenly bliss
Complacence fills his heart.

3 My God, are all my pleasures thine,
My comforts thy delight?
O be thy happiness divine
Most precious in thy sight.

4 They most in all thy bliss shall share,
Whose hearts can love thee most;
O could I vie ‡ in ardour here
With all the angelic host!

HYMN XXXVIII.

The days of the upright known to God, and their everlasting inheritance. Psalm xxxvii. 18.

1 To thee, my God, my days are known,
My soul enjoys the thought;
My actions all before thy face,
Nor are my faults forgot.

2 Each secret breath devotion vents,
Is vocal to thine ear;
And all my walks of daily life
Before thine eye appear.

3 The vacant hour, the active scene,
Thy mercy shall approve;
And every pang of sympathy,
And every care of love.

4 Each golden hour of beaming light
Is guided by thy rays;
And dark affliction's midnight gloom
A present God surveys.

5 Full in thy view through life I pass,
And in thy view I die;
And when each mortal bond is broke,
Shall find my God is nigh.

6 Stripped of its little earthly all,
My soul in smiles shall go;
And in a heavenly heritage
Its Father's bounty know.

HYMN XXXIX.

Our desire and groaning before God, when proceeding from the greatest distress. Psalm xxxviii. 9, 10.

1 My soul, the awful hour will come,
Apace it passeth on,
To bear this body to the tomb,
And thee to scenes unknown.

2 My heart, long labouring with its woes,
Shall pant and sink away;
And you, my eyelids, soon shall close
On the last glimmering ray.

3 Whence in that hour shall I receive
A cordial for my pain,

* Sounding as if endowed with speech. † Evil spirits. ‡ Endeavour to be equal

When, if earth's monarchs were my friends,
Those friends would weep in vain?

4 Great King of nature and of grace,
To thee my spirit flies,
And opens all its deep distress
Before thy pitying eyes.

5 All its desires to thee are known,
And every secret fear,
The meaning of each broken groan
Well noticed by thine ear.

6 O fix me by that mighty power
Which to such love belongs,
Where darkness veils the eyes no more,
And groans are changed to songs.

HYMN XL.

God magnified by those that love his salvation.
Psalm xl. 16.

1 God of salvation, we adore
Thy saving love, thy saving power:
And to our utmost stretch of thought
Hail the redemption thou hast wrought.

2 We love the stroke that breaks our chain,
The sword by which our sins are slain:
And while abased in dust we bow,
We sing the grace that lays us low.

3 Perish each thought of human pride:
Let God alone be magnified:
His glory let the heavens resound,
Shouted from earth's remotest bound.

4 Saints, who his full salvation know,
Saints, who but taste it here below,
Join every angel's voice to raise
Continued never-ending praise.

HYMN XLI.

The triumph of Christ in the cause of truth, meekness and righteousness. Psalm xlv. 3, 4.

1 Loud to the Prince of heaven
Your cheerful voices raise;
To him your vows be given,
And fill his courts with praise.
With conscious worth
All clad in arms,
All bright in charms,
He sallies forth.

2 Gird on thy conquering sword,
Ascend thy shining car,*
And march, Almighty Lord,
To wage thy holy war.
Before his wheels,
In glad surprise,
Ye valleys rise,
And sink, ye hills.

3 Fair truth, and smiling love,
And injured righteousness,
In thy retinue move,
And seek from thee redress.
Thou in their cause
Shalt prosperous ride,
And far and wide
Dispense thy laws.

4 Before thine awful face
Millions of foes shall fall,
The captives of thy grace,
That grace which conquers all.
The world shall know,
Great King of kings,
What wondrous things
Thine arm can do.

5 Here to my willing soul
Bend thy triumphant way;
Here every foe control,
And all thy power display.
My heart, thy throne,
Blest Jesus, see,
Bows low to thee,
To thee alone.

* Christ.

HYMN XLII.

Quietness under affliction, a proper acknowledgment of God. Psalm xlvi. 10.

1 Peace, 'tis the Lord Jehovah's hand
That blasts our joys in death;
Changes the visage once so dear,
And gathers back our breath.

2 'Tis he, the Potentate supreme
Of all the worlds above,
Whose steady counsels wisely rule,
Nor from their purpose move.

3 'Tis he whose justice might demand
Our souls a sacrifice:
Yet scatters with unwearied hand
A thousand rich supplies.

4 Our covenant God and Father he
In Christ our bleeding Lord;
Whose grace can heal the bursting heart
With one reviving word.

5 Fair garlands of immortal bliss
He weaves for every brow;
And shall tumultuous passions rise,
If he correct us now?

6 Silent I own Jehovah's name,
I kiss thy scourging hand,
And yield my comforts and my life
To thy supreme command.

HYMN XLIII.

The year crowned with the divine goodness. Psalm lxv. 11.

For New-year's Day

1 Eternal source of every joy!
Well may thy praise our lips employ,
While in thy temple we appear,
Whose goodness crowns the circling year.

2 While as the wheels of nature roll,
Thy hand supports the steady pole:
The sun is taught by thee to rise,
And darkness when to veil the skies.

3 The flowery spring at thy command
Embalms the air, and paints the land;
The summer rays with vigour shine
To raise the corn, and cheer the vine.

4 Thy hand in autumn richly pours
Through all our coasts redundant stores;
And winters, softened by thy care,
No more a face of horror wear.

5 Seasons, and months, and weeks, and days
Demand successive songs of praise;
Still be the cheerful homage paid
With opening light and evening shade.

6 Here in thy house shall incense rise,
As circling sabbaths bless our eyes;
Still will we make thy mercies known,
Around thy board, and round our own.

7 O may our more harmonious tongues
In worlds unknown pursue the songs;
And in those brighter courts adore,
Where days and years revolve no more.

HYMN XLIV.

Rebels against the supreme Sovereign admonished. Psalm lxvi. 7.

1 The Lord of glory reigns supremely great.
And o'er heaven's arches builds his royal seat.
Thro' worlds unknown his sovereign sway extends,
Nor space nor time his boundless empire ends.
His eye beholds the affairs of every nation,
And reads each thought thro' his immense creation.

2 Lightnings and storms his mighty word obey,
And planets roll where he has marked their way;
Unnumbered cherubs veiled before him stand,
At his first signal all their wings expand:
His praise gives harmony to all their voices,
And every heart through the full choir* rejoices.

3 Rebellious mortals, cease your tumults vain,
Nor longer such unequal war maintain:

* Company of singers

4 Let clay with fellow-clay in combat strive,
But dread to brave the power by which you live:
With contrite hearts fall prostrate, and adore him,
For if he frowns, ye perish all before him.

HYMN XLV.

God the happiness of his people, and their support in the extremest distress. Psalm lxxiii. 25, 26.

1 My God, whose all-pervading† eye
Views earth beneath, and heaven above,
Witness, if here or there thou seest
An object of mine equal love.

2 Not the gay scenes, where mortal men
Pursue their bliss, and find their woe,
Detain my rising heart, which springs
The nobler joys of heaven to view.

3 Not all the fairest sons of light,
That lead the army round thy throne,
Can bound its flight: it presseth on,
And seeks its rest in God alone.

4 Fixed near the immortal source of bliss,
Dauntless and joyous it surveys
Each form of horror and distress,
That earth, combined with hell, can raise.

5 This feeble flesh shall faint, and die;
This heart renew its pulse no more:
Even now it views the moment nigh,
When life's last movements all are o'er.

6 But come, thou vanquished king of dread,
With thy own hand thy power destroy;
'Tis thine to bear my soul to God,
My portion, and eternal joy.

HYMN XLVI.

The rage of enemies restrained, and overruled to the divine glory. Psalm lxxvi. 10.

Thanksgiving for the suppression of the Rebellion, 1746

1 Accept, great God, thy Britain's songs,
While grateful joy unites our tongues,
To own the work thy hand hath done:
Thy hand hath crushed our cruel foes,
When in rebellious troops they rose,
And swore to tread our glory down.

2 With hell confederate on their side,
People and prince their rage defied,
And in proud hope devoured us all:
Thy hand its banner hath displayed,
Beckoned its hero to our aid,
And in one day their legions fall.

3 Thus shalt thou still maintain thy throne,
And prove, that thou art God alone,
Though earth and hell new efforts try:

† All seeing

'Midst all the tumults they can raise,
Envenomed wrath exalts thy praise,
Till hushed at thy rebuke it die.

5 So swell the surges* of the sea,
And roar in their impetuous way,
As they would deluge earth again:
So strike they on the unshaken rock,
Dashed by the fierceness of their shock,
And foam to feel their fury vain.

HYMN XLVII.

God furnishing a table in the wilderness. Psalm lxxviii. 19, 20.

1 Parent of universal good,
We own thy bounteous hand,
Which does so rich a table spread
Even in this desert land.

2 Struck by thy power, the flinty rocks
In gushing torrents flow;
The feathered wanderers of the air
Thy guiding instinct know.

3 The pregnant clouds, at thy command,
Rain down delicious bread;
And by light drops of pearly dew
Are numerous armies fed.

4 Supported thus, thine Israel marched
The promised land to gain;
And shall thy children now begin
To seek their God in vain?

5 Are all thy stores exhausted now?
Or does thy mercy fail?
That faith should languish in our breasts,
And anxious cares prevail?

6 Ye base unworthy fears, be gone,
And wide disperse in air;
Then may I feel my Father's rod,
When I suspect his care.

HYMN XLVIII.

God speaketh peace to his people. Psalm lxxxv. 8.

1 Unite, my roving thoughts, unite
In silence soft and sweet:
And thou, my soul, sit gently down
At thy great Sovereign's feet.

2 Jehovah's awful voice is heard.
Yet gladly I attend;
For lo! the everlasting God
Proclaims himself my friend.

3 Harmonious accents to my soul
The sounds of peace convey.
The tempest at his word subsides
And winds and seas obey.

4 By all its joys, I charge my heart,
To grieve his love no more;
But, charmed by melody divine,
To give its follies o'er.

HYMN XLIX.

The church the birth-place of the saints, and God's care of it. Psalm lxxxvii. 5.

On opening a new place of worship.

1 And will the great eternal God
On earth establish his abode?
And will he from his radiant throne
Avow our temples for his own?

2 We bring the tribute of our praise,
And sing that condescending grace,
Which to our notes will lend an ear,
And call us sinful mortals near.

3 Our Father's watchful care we bless
Which guards our synagogues in peace,
That no tumultuous foes invade,
To fill our worshippers with dread.

4 These walls we to thy honour raise;
Long may they echo with thy praise;
And thou descending fill the place
With choicest tokens of thy grace.

5 Here let the great Redeemer reign
With all the graces of his train;
While power divine his word attends
To conquer foes, and cheer his friends.

6 And in the great decisive day,
When God the nations shall survey,
May it before the world appear,
That crowds were born to glory here.

HYMN L.

The Gospel jubilee. Psalm lxxxix. 15. compared with Lev. xxv. and Isa. lxi. 2.

1 Loud let the tuneful trumpet sound,
And spread the joyful tidings round;
Let every soul with transport hear,
And hail the Lord's accepted year.

2 Ye debtors, whom he gives to know
That you ten thousand talents owe,
When humbled at his feet ye fall,
Your gracious Lord forgives them all.

3 Slaves, that have borne the heavy chain
Of sin and hell's tyrannic reign,
To liberty assert your claim,
And urge the great Redeemer's name.

* Great waves.

4 The rich inheritance you lost,
Restored, improved, you now may boast
Fair Salem your arrival waits,
To golden streets, and pearly gates.

5 Her blest inhabitants no more
Bondage and poverty deplore:
No debt, but love immensely great,
Whose joy still rises with the debt.

6 O happy souls, that know the sound!
God's light shall all their steps surround;
And show that jubilee begun,
Which through eternal years shall run.

HYMN LI.

God the dwelling-place of his people through all generations. Psalm xc. 1.

1 Thou, Lord, through every changing scene,
Hast to thy saints a refuge been:
Through every age, eternal God,
Their pleasing home, their safe abode.

2 In thee our fathers sought their rest;
In thee our fathers still are blest;
And while the tomb confines their dust,
In thee their souls abide, and trust.

3 Lo, we are risen, a feeble race,
A while to fill our fathers' place;
Our helpless state with pity view,
And let us share their refuge too.

4 Through all the thorny paths we trace
In this uncertain wilderness,
When friends desert, and foes invade,
Revive our heart, and guard our head.

5 So when this pilgrimage is o'er,
And we must dwell in flesh no more,
To thee our separate souls shall come,
And find in thee a surer home.

6 To thee our infant race we leave:
Them may their fathers' God receive;
That voices yet unformed may raise
Succeeding hymns of humble praise.

HYMN LII.

Reflections on our waste of years. Psalm xc. 9.

For New-years Day.

1 Remark, my soul, the narrow bounds
Of the revolving year!
How swift the weeks complete their rounds!
How short the months appear!

2 So fast eternity comes on,
And that important day,
When all that mortal life has done
God's judgment shall survey.

3 Yet like an idle tale we pass
The swift advancing year;
And study artful ways to increase
The speed of its career.

4 Waken, O God, my trifling heart
Its great concern to see;
That I may act the Christian part,
And give the year to thee.

5 So shall their course more grateful roll,
If future years arise;
Or this shall bear my smiling soul
To joy, that never dies.

HYMN LIII.

Joy and prosperity from the presence and blessing of God. Psalm xc. 17.

1 Shine on our souls, eternal God,
With rays of beauty shine:
O let thy favour crown our days,
And all their round be thine.

2 Did we not raise our hands to thee,
Our hearts might toil in vain;
Small joy success itself could give,
If thou thy love restrain.

3 With thee let every week begin,
With thee each day be spent,
For thee each fleeting hour improved,
Since each by thee is lent.

4 Thus cheer us through this desert road,
Till all our labours cease;
And heaven refresh our weary souls
With everlasting peace.

HYMN LIV.

The mutability of the creation, and the immutability of God. Psalm cii. 25—28.

1 Great Former of this various frame,
Our souls adore thine awful name;
And bow and tremble, while they praise
The Ancient of eternal days.

2 Thou, Lord, with unsurprised survey,
Sawest nature rising yesterday,
And, as to-morrow, shall thine eye
See earth and stars in ruin lie.

3 Beyond an angel's vision bright,
Thou dwellest in self-existent light;
Which shines with undiminished ray,
While suns and worlds in smoke decay.

4 Our days a transient period run,
And change with every circling sun;
And in the firmest state we boast
A moth can crush us into dust.

5 But let the creatures fall around:
Let death consign us to the ground:
Let the last general flame arise,
And melt the arches of the skies.

6 Calm as the summer's ocean, we
Can all the wreck* of nature see,
While grace secures us an abode,
Unshaken as the throne of God.

HYMN LV.

The frailty of human nature, and God's gracious regard to it. Psalm ciii. 14.

1 LORD, we adore thy wondrous name,
And make that name our trust,
Which raised at first this curious frame
From mean and lifeless dust.

2 By dust supported, still it stands,
Wrought up to various forms,
Prepared by thy creating hands
To nourish mortal worms.

3 Awhile these frail machines endure,
The fabric of a day;
Then know their vital powers no more,
But moulder back to clay.

4 Yet, Lord, whate'er is felt or feared,
This thought is our repose,
That he, by whom this frame was reared,
Its various weakness knows.

5 Thou viewest us with a pitying eye,
While struggling with our load:
In pains and dangers thou art nigh,
Our Father, and our God.

6 Gently supported by thy love,
We tend to realms of peace;
Where every pain shall far remove,
And every frailty cease.

HYMN LVI.

God adored for his goodness, and his wonderful works to the children of men. Psalm cvii. 31.

1 Ye sons of men, with joy record
The various wonders of the Lord,
And let his power and goodness sound
Through all your tribes the earth around.

2 Let the high heavens your songs invite,
Those spacious fields of brilliant light,
Where sun, and moon, and planets roll,
And stars, that glow from pole to pole.

3 Sing earth in verdant robes arrayed,
Its herbs and flowers, its fruit and shade;
Peopled with life of various forms,
Fishes and fowl, and beasts and worms.

1 View the broad sea's majestic plains
And think how wide its Maker reigns!
That band remotest nations joins,
And on each wave his goodness shines.

5 But O! that brighter world above,
Where lives and reigns incarnate love!
God's only Son in flesh arrayed,
For man a bleeding victim† made.

6 Thither, my soul, with rapture soar;
There in the land of praise adore;
This theme demands an angel's lay,
Demands an undeclining day.

HYMN LVII.

The holy soul returning to its rest in a grateful sense of divine bounties. Psalm cxvi. 7.

1 RETURN, my soul, and seek thy rest
Upon thy heavenly Father's breast:
Indulge me, Lord, in that repose
The soul which loves thee only knows.

2 Lodged in thine arms, I fear no more
The tempest's howl, the billows' roar:
Those storms must shake the Almighty's seat,
Which violate the saint's retreat.

3 Thy bounties, Lord, to me surmount
The power of language to recount;
From morning dawn, the setting sun
Sees but my work of praise begun.

4 The mercies all my moments bring,
Ask an eternity to sing;
What thanks those mercies can suffice,
Which through eternity shall rise?

5 Rich in ten thousand gifts possessed,
In future hopes more richly blessed,
I'll sit and sing till death shall raise
A note of more proportioned praise.

HYMN LVIII.

Deliverance celebrated. Psalm cxvi. 8.

1 Look back, my soul, with grateful love
On what thy God has done
Praise him for his unnumbered gifts,
And praise him for his Son.

2 How oft hath his indulgent hand
My flowing eye-lids dried,
And rescued from impending death,
When I in danger cried!

3 When on the bed of death I lay,
With sickness sore oppressed,
How oft hath he assuaged my grief,
And lulled my eyes to rest!

* Destruction.

† Sacrifice.

4 Back from destruction's yawning pit
At his command I came.
He fed the expiring lamp anew,
And raised its feeble flame.

5 My broken spirit he hath cheered,
When torn with inward grief;
And when temptations pressed me sore
Hath brought me swift relief.

6 My soul from everlasting death
Is by his mercy brought,
To tell in Zion's sacred gates
The wonders he hath wrought.

7 Still will I walk before his face,
While he this life prolongs;
Till grace shall all its work complete,
And teach me heavenly songs.

HYMN LIX.

Deliverance celebrated, and good resolutions formed. Psalm cxvi. 8, 9.

1 Great source of life, our souls confess
The various riches of thy grace;
Crowned with thy mercy we rejoice,
And in thy praise exalt our voice.

2 By thee heaven's shining arch was spread;
By thee were earth's foundations laid,
And all the charms of men's abode
Proclaim the wise, the gracious God.

3 Thy tender hand restores our breath,
When trembling on the verge of death;
Gently it wipes away our tears,
And lengthens life to future years.

4 These lives are sacred to the Lord;
Kindled by him, by him restored;
And while our hours renew their race,
Still would we walk before his face.

5 So when by him our souls are led Through unknown regions of the dead,
With joy triumphant shall they move
To seats of nobler life above.

HYMN LX.

Praise for recovery from sickness. Psalm cxviii. 18, 19.

1 Sovereign of life, I own thy hand
In every chastening stroke;
And while I smart beneath thy rod,
Thy presence I invoke.

2 To thee in my distress I cried,
And thou hast bowed thine ear;
Thy powerful word my life pronounced
And brought salvation near.

3 Unfold, ye gates of righteousness,
That, with the pious throng,
I may record my solemn vows,
And tune my grateful song.

4 Praise to the Lord, whose gentle hand
Renews our labouring breath:
Praise to the Lord, who makes his saints
Triumphant even in death.

5 My God, in thine appointed hour
Those heavenly gates display,
Where pain and sin, and fear and death,
For ever flee away.

6 There, while the nations of the blessed
With raptures bow around,
My anthems to delivering grace
In sweeter strains shall sound.

HYMN LXI.

Regard to Scripture pressed upon young persons that they may cleanse their way. Psalm cxix. 9.

1 Intelligent God, with pitying eye
The sons of men survey,
And see how youthful sinners sport
In a destructive way.

2 Ten thousand dangers lurk around
To bear them to the tomb;
Each in an hour may plunge them down,
Where hope can never come.

3 Reduce, O Lord, their wandering minds,
Amused with airy dreams,
That heavenly wisdom may dispel
Their visionary schemes.

4 With holy caution may they walk,
And be thy word their guide;
Till each, the desert safely passed,
On Zion's hill abide.

HYMN LXII.

Desires of being quickened by the word of God. Psalm cxix. 25.

1 With pity, Lord, thy servant view,
As in the dust I lie,
Nor while I raise my plaintive voice,
Disdain the broken cry.

2 Fain would I mount on eagle's wings,
And view thy lovely face;
But cumbrous burthens drag me down
From thine adored embrace.

3 Thy quickening energy diffuse
O'er all my inmost frame;
And animate these languid lips
To celebrate thy name.

4 Thy living word has wonders wrought
Those wonders here renew;
And pour fresh vigour through my soul,
While I its glories view.

5 From thee, great ever-flowing spring,
Let vital streams descend;
And cheer me to begin these songs,
Which death shall never end.

HYMN LXIII.

Human perfection no where to be found. Psalm cxix. 96.

1 Perfection! 'tis an empty name,
Nor can repay our cares;
And he that seeks it here below,
Must end the search with tears.

2 Great David, on his royal throne,
The beauteous, and the strong,
Rich in the spoils of conquered foes,
Amidst the applauding throng;

3 With all the mind's capacious powers,
Pursued the shade in vain;
Nor heard it his melodious voice,
Or harp's angelic strain.

4 From public to domestic scenes
The impatient monarch turns;
The friend, the husband, and the sire*
In sad succession mourns.

5 At length thy law, eternal God,
He through his tears descries,†
And wrapt amidst those sacred folds,
He finds the heavenly prize.

6 There will I seek perfection too,
Where David's God is known;
Nor envy, with this volume blest,
His treasures and his throne.

HYMN LXIV.

Beholding transgressions with grief. Psalm cxix. 136, 158.

1 Arise, my tenderest thoughts, arise;
To torrents melt my streaming eyes;
And thou, my heart, with anguish feel
Those evils, which thou canst not heal.

2 See human nature sunk in shame;
See scandals poured on Jesus' name;
The Father wounded through the Son,
The world abused, the soul undone.

3 See the short course of vain delight
Closing in everlasting night;
In flames that no abatement know,
Though briny tears for ever flow.

4 My God, I feel the mournful scene,
My bowels yearn o'er dying men;
And fain my pity would reclaim,
And snatch the firebrands from the flame.

5 But feeble my compassion proves,
And can but weep, where most it loves;
Thy own all-saving arm employ,
And turn these drops of grief to joy.

HYMN LXV.

The wandering sheep recovered. Psal. cxix. 176

1 Lord, we have wandered from the way,
Like foolish sheep, we've gone astray;
Our pleasant pastures we have left,
And of their guard our souls bereft.;

2 Exposed to want, exposed to harm,
Far from our gentle Shepherd's arm:
Nor will these fatal wanderings cease,
Till thou reveal the paths of peace.

3 O seek thy thoughtless servants, Lord,
Nor let us quite forget thy word;
Our erring souls do thou restore,
And keep us, that we stray no more.

HYMN LXVI.

The weeping seed-time, and joyful harvest. Psalm cxxvi. 5, 6.

1 The darkened sky, how thick it lowers!
Troubled with storms, and big with showers.
No cheerful gleam of light appears,
But nature pours forth all her tears.

2 Yet let the sons of grace revive;
God bids the soul that seeks him live:
And from the gloomiest shade of night
Calls forth a morning of delight.

3 The seeds of ecstasy unknown,
Are in these watered furrows sown:
See the green blades, how thick they rise,
And with fresh verdure bless our eyes.

4 In secret foldings they contain
Unnumbered ears of golden grain;
And heaven shall pour its beams around,
Till the ripe harvest load the ground.

5 Then shall the trembling mourner come,
And find his sheaves, and bear them home:
The voice long broke with sighs shall sing,
Till heaven with hallelujahs ring.

HYMN LXVII.

Thanks to God for his ever-enduring goodness.
Psalm cxxxvi. 1.

For New-year's Day.

1 House of our God, with cheerful anthems ring,
While all our lips and hearts his graces sing

* Father. † Discerns.

The opening year his graces shall proclaim.
And all its days be vocal with his name.
The Lord is good, his mercy never ending:
His blessings in perpetual showers descending.

2 The heaven of heavens he with his bounty fills:
Ye seraphs bright on ever-blooming hills,
His honours sound: you to whom good alone,
Unmingled, ever-growing, has been known.
Through your immortal life, with love increasing,
Proclaim your Maker's goodness never ceasing.

3 Thou earth, enlightened by his rays divine,
Pregnant with grass, and corn, and oil, and wine,
Crowned with his goodness, let thy nations meet,
And lay their crowns at his paternal feet:
With grateful love that liberal hand confessing,
Which through each heart diffuseth every blessing.

4 Zion, enriched with his distinguished grace,
Blest with the rays of thine Emanuel's face,
Zion, Jehovah's portion, and delight,
Graven on his hands, and hourly in his sight,
In sacred strains exalt that grace excelling,
Which makes thy humble hill his chosen dwelling.

5 His mercy never ends: the dawn, the shade
Still see new bounties through new scenes displayed:
Succeeding ages bless this sure abode,
And children lean upon their fathers' God.
The deathless soul through its immense duration,
Drinks from this source immortal consolation.

6 Burst into praise, my soul; all nature join;
Angels and men in harmony combine:
While human years are measured by the sun,
And while eternity its course shall run,
His goodness, in perpetual showers descending,
Exalt in songs, and raptures never ending.

HYMN LXVIII.

God strengthening the souls of his praying people.
Psalm cxxxviii. 3.

1 My soul, review the trembling days,
In which my God I sought:
I cried aloud for aid divine,
And aid divine he brought.

2 Through all my weak and fainting heart
His secret strength he spread,
And clasped me in his arms of love,
And raised my drooping head.

3 He called himself my covenant God,
His promises he showed;
And wide displayed their solemn seal
In the great Surety's blood.

4 I heard his people shout around,
And joined their cheerful song;
And saw from far the shining seats
Which to his saints belong.

5 My God, what inward strength thou giv'st,
I to thy service vow;
And in thy strength would upward march,
Till at thy throne I bow.

HYMN LXIX.

Singing in the ways of God. Psalm cxxxviii. 5.

1 Now let our voices join
To form one pleasant song:
Ye pilgrims in Jehovah's ways,
With music pass along.

2 How straight the path appears!
How open, and how fair!
No lurking gins to entrap our feet;
No fierce destroyer there.

3 But flowers of paradise
In rich profusion spring;
The sun of glory gilds the path,
And dear companions sing.

4 See Salem's golden spires
In beauteous prospect rise;
And brighter crowns than mortals wear,
Which sparkle through the skies.

5 All honour to his name,
Who drew the shining trace,
To him, who leads the wanderers on,
And cheers them with his grace.

6 Reduce the nations, Lord,
Teach all their kings thy ways,
That earth's full choir the notes may swell,
And heaven resound the praise.

HYMN LXX.

The innumerable mercies of God thankfully acknowledged. Psalm cxxxix. 17, 18.

1 In glad amazement, Lord, I stand,
Amidst the bounties of thy hand.
How numberless those bounties are!
How rich, how various, and how fair!

2 But oh! what poor returns I make!
What lifeless thanks I pay thee back!
Lord, I confess with humble shame,
My offerings scarce deserve the name.

3 Fain would my labouring heart devise
To bring some nobler sacrifice:
It sinks beneath the mighty load:
What shall I render to my God?

4 To him I consecrate my praise,
And vow the remnant of my days:
Yet what at best can I pretend
Worthy such gifts from such a friend?

5 In deep abasement, Lord, I see
My emptiness and poverty

Enrich my soul with grace divine,
And make it worthier to be thine.

6 Give me at length an angel's tongue,
That heaven may echo with my song:
The theme, too great for time, shall be
The joy of long eternity.

HYMN LXXI.

Praising God through the whole of our existence. Psalm cxlvi. 2.

1 God of my life, through all its days
My grateful powers shall sound thy praise;
The song shall wake with opening light,
And warble to the silent night.

2 When anxious cares would break my rest,
And griefs would tear my throbbing breast,
Thy tuneful praises raised on high,
Shall check the murmur and the sigh.

3 When death o'er nature shall prevail,
And all its powers of language fail,
Joy through my swimming eyes shall break,
And mean the thanks I cannot speak.

4 But O, when that last conflict 's o'er,
And I am chained to flesh no more,
With what glad accents shall I rise,
To join the music of the skies!

5 Soon shall I learn the exalted strains,
Which echo o'er the heavenly plains;
And emulate, with joy unknown,
The glowing seraphs round thy throne.

6 The cheerful tribute will I give,
Long as a deathless soul can live;
A work so sweet, a theme so high,
Demands, and crowns eternity.

HYMN LXXII.

The meek beautified with salvation. Psal. cxlix. 4.

1 Ye humble souls, rejoice,
And cheerful triumphs sing;
Wake all your harmony of voice:
For Jesus is your King.

2 That meek and lowly Lord,
Whom here your souls have known,
Pledges the honour of his word
To avow you for his own.

3 He brings salvation near,
For which his blood was paid
How beauteous shall your souls appear
Thus sumptuously arrayed!

4 Sing, for the day is nigh,
When near your Leader's seat
The tallest sons of pride shall lie,
The footstool of your feet.

5 Salvation, Lord, is thine:
And all thy saints confess,
The royal robes, in which they shine,
Were wrought by sovereign grace.

HYMN LXXIII.

The reproofs of wisdom mingled with promises and threatenings, to reclaim wandering sinners. Prov. i. 23.

1 Hark! for 'tis Wisdom's voice
That breaks in gentle sound:
Listen, ye sons of earth and sin,
And gather all around.

2 What though she speak rebukes,
That pierce the soul with smart;
True love through all her chastenings runs,
By pain to mend the heart.

3 "Ye that have wandered long
In sin's destructive ways,
Turn, turn," the heavenly charmer cries,
"And seize the offered grace.

4 "I know your souls are weak,
And mortal efforts vain
To grapple with the prince of hell,
And break his cursed chain.

5 "But I 'll my Spirit pour
In torrents from above,
To arm you with superior strength,
And melt your hearts in love.

6 "Come, while these offers last,
Ye sinners, and be wise;
He lives who hears this friendly call,
But he that slights it, dies."

HYMN LXXIV.

The voice of Christ addressed to the children of men. Prov. viii. 4.

1 Now let the listening world around
In silent reverence hear;
While from on high the Saviour's voice
Thus strikes the attentive ear.

2 "To you, O sons of men, I call,
And from my lofty throne,
Reclined in gentle pity, bow
To bring salvation down.

3 "Ye thoughtless sinners, hear my voice
Attend my words and live;
My words conduct to solid joys,
And endless blessings give.

4 "Each faithful minister is sent
This message to proclaim:
In every various providence
The language is the same.

5 "And could the pale forgotten dead,
Though deep in dust they lie,
Arise in visionary crowds,
They 'd join the solemn cry.

6 "Forgetful mortals, yet be wise,
While o'er the grave ye stand;
Lest long-neglected love provoke
The vengeance of my hand.

7 "In glad submission bow ye down,
Nor steel that stubborn heart;
Till mine inexorable voice
Pronounce the word, Depart."

8 Blest Jesus, may thy Spirit breathe
On souls which else must die;
For, till thy grace reflect the sound,
Thy word in vain will cry.

HYMN LXXV.

The encouragement young persons have to seek and to love Christ. Prov. viii. 17.

1 Ye hearts, with youthful vigour warm,
In smiling crowds draw near,
And turn from every mortal charm,
A Saviour's voice to hear.

2 He, Lord of all the worlds on high,
Stoops to converse with you;
And lays his radiant glories by,
Your friendship to pursue.

3 "The soul, that longs to see my face,
Is sure my love to gain;
And those that early seek my grace,
Shall never seek in vain."

4 What object, Lord, my soul should move,
If once compared with thee?
What beauty should command my love,
Like what in Christ I see?

5 Away, ye false delusive toys,
Vain tempters of the mind!
'Tis here I fix my lasting choice,
And here true bliss I find.

HYMN LXXVI.

The house and feast of wisdom. Prov. ix. 1—6.

1 See the fair structure Wisdom rears,
Her messengers attend,
And charmed by her persuasive voice,
To her your footsteps bend.

2 "Hear me, ye simple ones, (she cries,)
That lured * by folly stray,
And languish to eternal death
In her detested way.

* Seduced.

3 "Enter my hospitable gate,
And all my banquet share;
For heavenly wine surrounds my board.
And angels' food is there.

4 "Freely of every dainty taste;
Taste, and for ever live;
And mingle with your joys the hopes
Of all a God can give.

5 "But if, seduced by Folly's arts,
Ye seek her poisonous food;
Know, that the dreadful moment hastes,
Which pays the feast with blood."

HYMN LXXVII.

The excellency of the righteous with regard to their temper. Prov. xii. 26. Part I.

1 How glorious, Lord, art thou!
How bright thy splendours shine!
Whose rays reflected gild thy saints
With ornaments divine.

2 With lowliness and love,
Wisdom and courage meet;
The grateful heart, the cheerful eye,
How reverend and how sweet!

3 In beauties such as these
Thy children now are drest;
But brighter habits shall they wear
In regions of the blest.

4 In nature's barren soil,
Who could such glories raise?
We own, O God, the work is thine,
And thine be all the praise.

HYMN LXXVIII.

The excellency of the righteous with regard to their relations, employments, pleasures, and hopes. Prov. xii. 26. Part II.

1 O Israel, thou art blest;
Who may with thee compare?
Thine excellences stand confessed;
How bright thy glories are!

2 O God of Israel, hear,
And make this bliss our own;
Make us the children of thy care,
The members of thy Son.

3 Thus honoured, thus employed,
By these great motives fired,
Be paradise on earth enjoyed,
And brighter hopes inspired.

4 Thy people, Lord, we love;
Their God our souls embrace;
So may we find in worlds above
Among thy saints a place.

HYMN LXXIX.

Walking with God; or being in his fear all the day long. Prov. xxiii. 17.

1 Thrice happy souls, who born from heaven,
While yet they sojourn here,
Thus all their days with God begin,
And spend them in his fear!

2 So may our eyes with holy zeal
Prevent the dawning day;
And turn the sacred pages* o'er,
And praise thy name, and pray.

3 'Midst hourly cares may love present
Its incense to thy throne;
And while the world our hands employs,
Our hearts be thine alone.

4 As sanctified to noblest ends
Be each refreshment sought;
And by each various providence
Some wise instruction brought.

5 When to laborious duties called,
Or by temptations tried,
We 'll seek the shelter of thy wings,
And in thy strength confide.

6 As different scenes of life arise,
Our grateful hearts would be
With thee, amidst the social band,
In solitude with thee.

7 At night we lean our weary heads
On thy paternal breast;
And safely folded in thine arms,
Resign our powers to rest.

8 In solid pure delights, like these,
Let all my days be past:
Nor shall I then impatient wish,
Nor shall I fear the last.

HYMN LXXX.

The obstinate sinner alarmed. Prov. xxix. 1

1 Now let the sons of Belial † hear
The thunders of the Lord:
Unfold their long rebellious ear,
And tremble at his word.

2 Now let the iron sinew bow,
And take his easy yoke;
Lest sudden vengeance lay it low
By one resistless stroke.

3 Though yet the great Physician wait,
And healing balm be found,
One hour may seal their endless fate,
And fix a deadly wound.

4 Swift may thy mercy, Lord, arise,
Ere justice stop their breath:
And lighten those deluded eyes,
That sleep the sleep of death.

HYMN LXXXI.

God's reasonable expectations from his vineyard. Isa. v. 1—7.

1 The vineyard of the Lord, how fair!
Planted by his peculiar care;
Behold its branches spread, and fill
The borders of his sacred hill.

2 His eye hath marked the chosen ground;
His mighty hand hath fenced it round;
His servants by his order wait,
To watch and aid its tender state.

3 But when the vintage he demands
For all the labour of their hands,
What clusters doth his vine produce?
The grapes are wild, and sour the juice.

4 Well might he tear its fence away,
And leave it to the beasts of prey,
Might give it to the wild again,
And charge his clouds to cease their rain.

5 But spare our land, our churches spare,
Thy vengeance long-provoked forbear;
Let the true vine its influence give,
And bid our withering branches live.

HYMN LXXXII.

Isaiah's obedience to the heavenly vision. Isa. vi. 8.

1 Our God ascends his lofty throne,
Arrayed in majesty unknown;
His lustre all the temple fills,
And spreads o'er all the ethereal ‡ hills.

2 The holy, holy, holy Lord,
By all the seraphim adored,
And while they stand beneath his seat,
They veil their faces and their feet.

3 And can a sinful worm endure
The presence of a God so pure!
Or these polluted lips proclaim
The honours of so grand a name!

4 O for thine altar's glowing coal
To touch my lips, to fire my soul,
To purge the sordid dross away,
And into crystal turn my clay!

5 Then, if a messenger thou ask,
A labourer for the hardest task;
Through all my weakness and my fear,
Love shall reply, "Thy servant 's here."

* The Holy Scriptures. † Disobedient, rebellious. ‡ Heavenly.

6 Nor should my willing soul complain,
Though all its efforts seemed in vain;
Its ample recompence shall be,
But to have wrought, my God, for thee.

HYMN LXXXIII.

The stupidity of Israel and of Britain lamented. Isa. vi. 9—12.

For a Fast day.

1 LORD, when thine Israel we survey,
We in their crimes discern our own;
And if thou turn our prayer away,
Our misery must, like theirs, be known.

2 To us thy prophets have been sent
With words of terror and of love;
But not the vengeance nor the grace
Ten thousand stubborn hearts will move.

3 Our eyes are blind, and deaf our ears;
Our hearts are hardened into stone;
As we would bar thy mercy out,
And leave a way for wrath alone.

4 Justly our God might give us up
To plague, and famine, and the sword;
Till towns and cities, rich and fair,
Lay desolate without a lord.

5 O'er bleeding wounds of slaughtered friends
Rivers of helpless grief might flow,
Till the fierce conqueror's haughty rage
Dragged us to chains and slaughter too.

6 But spare a nation long thy own,
And show new miracles of grace;
'Tis thine to heal the deaf and blind,
And wake the dead to life and praise.

HYMN LXXXIV.

Confederate nations defied by those who sanctify God. Isa. viii. 9—14.

For a Fast day.

1 GREAT God of hosts, attend our prayer,
And make the British isles thy care:
To thee we raise our suppliant cries,
When angry nations round us rise.

2 Fain would they tread our glory down,
And in the dust dethe our crown,
Deluge our houses with our blood,
And burn the temples of our God.

3 But 'midst the thunders of their rage,
We thy protection would engage:
O raise thy saving arm on high,
And bring renewed deliverance nigh.

4 May Britain, as one man, be led
To make the Lord her fear and dread;
Our souls no other fear shall know,
Though earth were leagued with hell below.

5 Give ear, ye countries from afar:
Ye proud associate nations hear;
While fixed on him, who rules the sky,
Our hearts your threatened war defy.

6 Ye people, gird yourselves in vain,
Your scattered force unite again;
Again shall all that force be broke,
When God with us shall deal the stroke.

7 Now he records our humble tears,
With ardent vows for future years,
And destines for approaching days
Victorious shouts, and songs of praise.

8 Emanuel's land shall safe remain,
Blest with its Saviour's gentle reign;
Till every hostile rumour cease
In the fair realms of perfect peace.

HYMN LXXXV.

Christ the steward of God's family. Isa. xxii. 22—24. compared with Rev. iii. 7.

1 WITH what delight I raise my eyes,
And view the courts where Jesus dwells!
Jesus, who reigns beyond the skies,
And here below his grace reveals.

2 Of David's royal house the key
Is borne by that majestic hand;
Mansions and treasures there I see,
Subjected all to his command.

3 He shuts, and worlds might strive in vain
The mighty obstacle to move;
He looses all their bars again,
And who shall shut the gates of love!

4 Fixed in omnipotence he bears
The glories of his Father's name,
Sustains his people's weighty cares,
Through every changing age the same.

5 My little all I there suspend,
Where the whole weight of heaven is hung:
Secure I rest on such a Friend,
And into rapture wake my tongue.

HYMN LXXXVI.

The rich provision and happy effects of the Gospel. Isa. xxv. 6—9.

1 BEHOLD our God, he owns his name;
Jehovah all our songs proclaim
With shouts of wonder and of joy:
Long have we waited for his grace,
No longer now his love delays
For Zion his own arm to employ

2 We charge our souls the joy to feel;
We charge our tongues his praise to tell:
The Almighty Saviour! This is he!
He pours his streams of grace abroad,
Till all the earth confess the God,
And lands remote his glory see.

3 Dainties how rich his stores afford!
How pure the wine that crowns his board!
While welcome nations flock around;
He takes the veil of grief away;
Through thickest shades he darts the day,
And not one weeping eye is found.

4 All-conquering death, no longer boast
O'er millions humbled in the dust;
Our God with scorn thy triumph sees:
Soon as he aims one shaft * at thee,
Swallowed and lost in victory,
Thine empire and thy name shall cease.

HYMN LXXXVII.

The peaceful state of the soul that trusteth in God. Isa. xxvi. 3.

1 Weary, and weak, and faint,
I cast mine eyes around;
My joints all tremble, and my feet
Sink deep in miry ground.

2 Despairing help below,
To heaven I raise my cries;
God hears, and his almighty arm
Out-stretches from the skies.

3 I on that arm repose,
And all my fears are o'er;
New strength diffused through all my soul
Attests its vital power.

4 My mind in perfect peace
Thy guardian care shall keep:
I'll yield to gentle slumbers now,
For thou canst never sleep.

5 Happy the souls alone
On thee securely stayed!
Nor shall they be in life alarmed,
Nor be in death dismayed.

HYMN LXXXVIII.

Israel's obstinacy under God's lifted hand. Isa. xxvi. 11.

1 Lord, when thy hand is lifted up,
The wicked will not see;
But they shall see with glowing shame,
Though they obdurate be.

2 How few the weighty stroke regard,
And seek their Maker's face!
In vain may providence correct,
If not enforced by grace.

3 Exert thy mighty influence, Lord,
And melt the stony breast;
Then shall thy justice be adored,
Thy mercy stand confessed.

4 The scorner then shall mourn in dust,
And put his sins away,
No more resist his Maker's hands,
But lift his own to pray.

HYMN LXXXIX.

God quickening the dead. Isa. xxvi. 19.

1 The ever-living God
The expiring church shall raise;
Our hearts his promises receive,
And wake a shout of praise.

2 Death shall not always reign,
Where grace hath fixed his throne;
His soft compassion views the dust
He once hath called his own.

3 "Yes," saith the God of truth,
"My dead shall live again;
The foe shall see their Leader's breath
Reanimate the slain.

4 "The dew of heaven shall fall
In rich abundance round,
And a redundant harvest rise
To clothe the teeming ground.

5 "Now from your dust awake,
And burst into a song;
Then spurn the earth, and mount the skies
In a triumphant throng."

6 Thy Zion, Lord, believes
A promise so divine,
And looks through all her flowing tears
To see the glory shine.

HYMN XC.

The godly man's ark. Isa. xxvi. 20.

1 It is my Father's voice,
And O how sweet the sound!
It makes my inmost powers rejoice,
My trembling heart rebound.

2 "Mark, the black tempest lowers,
And gathers round the sky;
Retire, and shun the sweeping showers
Of indignation nigh.

3 "Come, my dear children, come,
And seek your Father's arms;
There is your shelter, there your home
'Midst all these dire alarms.

4 "Enter at his command;
Close in your ark remain,

* Arrow.

And wait the signal of his hand
To call you forth again.

5 "The moments to beguile,
A cheerful song begin;
Nor let the roaring thunders spoil
The harmony within.

6 "Ere long the sky shall clear,
The clouds be chased away,
And grace shall shine in radiance fair
Through an eternal day."

HYMN XCI.

Laying hold on God's strength, that we may be at peace with him. Isa. xxvii. 5.

1 Thus saith Jehovah, from his seat,
"Who shall presume my wrath to meet?
What rebel men or angels dare
To wage with me unequal war?

2 "Close let the thorns and briers stand,
In thick array on either hand;
Forth shall my flaming terrors fly;
At once they kindle, blaze, and die.

3 "Presumptuous sinners, yet be wise
Ere this o'erwhelming ruin rise;
Your vain tumultuous efforts cease,
And seek in suppliant crowds for peace."

4 Great God, we bless the gentle sound
And bow submissive to the ground,
Thy prostrate foes let pity raise,
And form a people to thy praise.

5 His thundering storms are silent now;
Calm are the terrors of his brow,
Since Jesus makes the Father known,
Our guardian shield, our cheering sun.

HYMN XCII.

The divine goodness in moderating afflictions. Isa. xxvii. 8.

1 Great Ruler of all nature's frame,
We own thy power divine:
We hear thy breath in every storm,
For all the winds are thine.

2 Wide as they sweep their sounding way,
They work thy sovereign will;
And awed by thy majestic voice,
Confusion shall be still.

3 Thy mercy tempers* every blast
To them that seek thy face;
And mingles with the tempest's roar
The whispers of thy grace.

* Moderates.

4 Those gentle whispers let me hear,
Till all the tumult cease;
And gales of paradise shall lull
My weary soul to peace.

HYMN XCIII.

God waiting to be gracious. Isa. xxx. 18.

1 Wait on the Lord, ye heirs of hope,
And let his word support your soul:
Well can he bear your courage up,
And all your foes and fears control.

2 He waits his own well-chosen hour
The intended mercy to display;
And his paternal bowels move,
While wisdom dictates the delay.

3 With mingled majesty and love
At length he rises from his throne;
And while salvation he commands,
He makes his people's joy his own.

4 Blest are the humble souls that wait,
With sweet submission to his will;
Harmonious all their passions move,
And in the midst of storms are still.

5 Still, till their Father's well-known voice
Wakens their silence into songs;
Then earth grows vocal with his praise,
And heaven the grateful shout prolongs.

HYMN XCIV.

The different views of good and bad men, in times of public danger. Isa. xxxiii. 14–17.

1 See, the destruction is begun,
And heaps of ruin spread the ground;
With hasty strides it marches on,
And scatters consternation round.

2 Sinners in Zion take the alarm,
The hypocrites astonished cry,
Who with devouring flames can dwell?
Who in eternal burnings lie?

3 God's gracious voice the saints revives;
How sweet the heavenly accents sound!
"Dwell thou on high, my child, (he says,)
Where rocks shall guard thee all around.

4 "There shall my hand thy wants supply,
Thy water and thy bread are sure;
There shall my visits make thee glad,
While these alarming scenes endure.

5 "Then, led in joyous triumph forth,
Thine eyes the distant land shall view,
Shall see thy King in beauty drest,
And share his royal honours too."

6 My soul the oracle receives,
And feels its energy to cheer;

A promised heaven, a present God,
Forbids my grief, forbids my fear.

HYMN XCV.

God the defence of his people from invading enemies. Isa. xxxiii. 21–23.

1 The glorious Lord! his Israel's hope!
How well he bears their courage up!
How wide his saving power extends!
His princely titles will we sing,
Our Judge, our Lawgiver, our King,
He guards his subjects as his friends.

2 Around the mountain where they dwell,
Lo, at his word new waters swell
To deluge the invading foe!
Opened by him that rules the skies,
Mark the broad rivers how they rise,
And with what rapid strength they flow!

3 To gain the well-defended shores
In vain the galley spreads its oars,
And the proud ship her sails displays:
The sails are rent, the masts are broke,
The shattered oars all drop their stroke,
And lightnings through the tacklings blaze.

4 Shout your Hosaunahs to the Lord:
Thus shall he still his Zion guard,
Till the last foe be trampled down:
High as the heavens exalt his praise:
High as the heavens his hand shall raise
The soul that here his grace hath known.

HYMN XCVI.

The high way to Zion. Isa. xxxv. 8–10.

1 Sing, ye redeemed of the Lord,
Your great Deliverer sing:
Pilgrims for Zion's city bound,
Be joyful in your King.

2 See the fair way his hand hath raised;
How holy, and how plain!
Nor shall the simplest travellers err,
Nor ask the track in vain.

3 No ravening lion shall destroy,
Nor lurking serpent wound;
Pleasure and safety, peace and praise,
Through all the path are found.

4 A hand divine shall lead you on
Through all the blissful road:
Till to the sacred mount you rise,
And see your smiling God.

5 There garlands of immortal joy
Shall bloom on every head;
While sorrow, sighing, and distress,
Like shadows all are fled.

6 March on in your Redeemer's strength;
Pursue his footsteps still;
And let the prospect cheer your eye,
While labouring up the hill.

HYMN XCVII.

The greatness and majesty of God, and the meanness of the creatures. Isa. xl. 15–17.

1 Ye weak inhabitants of clay,
Ye trifling insects of a day,
Low in your native dust bow down
Before the Eternal's awful throne.

2 With trembling heart, with solemn eye,
Behold Jehovah seated high;
And search, what worthy sacrifice
Your hands can give, your thoughts devise.

3 Let Lebanon her cedars bring,
To blaze before the sovereign King;
And all the beasts that on it feed,
As victims at his altar bleed.

4 Loud let ten thousand trumpets sound,
And call remotest nations round,
Assembled on the crowded plains,
Princes and people, kings and swains.

5 Joined with the living, let the dead
Rising the face of earth o'erspread;
And while his praise unites their tongues,
Let angels echo back the songs.

6 The drop that from the bucket falls,
The dust that hangs upon the scales,
Is more to sky, and earth, and sea,
Than all this pomp, O God, to thee.

HYMN XCVIII.

The timorous saint encouraged by the assurance of the divine presence and help. Isa. xli. 10.

1 And art thou with us, gracious Lord,
To dissipate our fear?
Dost thou proclaim thyself our God,
Our God for ever near?

2 Doth thy right hand, which formed the earth,
And bears up all the skies,
Stretch from on high its friendly aid,
When dangers round us rise?

3 Dost thou a father's bowels feel
For all thy humble saints;
And in such tender accents speak
To soothe their sad complaints?

4 On this support my soul shall lean,
And banish every care;
The gloomy vale of death must smile,
If God be with me there.

7 While I his gracious succour prove 'Midst all my various ways,
The darkest shades through which I pass
Shall echo with his praise.

HYMN XCIX.

The humiliation and exaltation of God's Israel Isa. xli. 14, 15.

1 Amazing grace of God on high!
And will the Lord look down
On sinners, while in dust they lie,
And dread his awful frown?

2 Weaker than worms, O Lord, are we,
And viler far than they;
Yet in these reptiles,* weak and vile,
Dost thou thy power display.

3 Jehovah's sovereign voice is heard,
The worm lifts up its head,
And mountains, that would crush it down,
Before the worm are fled.

4 Thou Holy One, thine Israel's King,
Thou our Redeemer art;
Nor shall the blessings of thy hand
From thy redeemed depart.

5 Thy love shall its own work fulfil,
And grace shall rise on grace,
Till worms of earth around thy throne
With angels find a place.

HYMN C.

The wilderness transformed, or the effects of the gospel. Isa. xli. 18, 19. compared with xxxv. 1, 2; ix. 6—9; lv. 13, &c.

1 Amazing, beauteous change!
A world created new!
My thoughts with transport range
The lovely scene to view;
In all I trace,
Saviour divine,
The work is thine,
Be thine the praise.

2 See crystal fountains play
Amidst the burning sands;
The river's winding way
Shines through the thirsty lands;
New grass is seen,
And o'er the meads
Its carpet spreads
Of living green.

3 Where pointed brambles grew
Entwined with horrid thorn,
Gay flowers for ever new
The painted fields adorn;
The blushing rose,
And lily there,
In union fair
Their sweets disclose.

4 Where the bleak mountain stood,
All bare and disarrayed,
See the wide-branching wood
Diffuse its grateful shade;
Tall cedars nod,
And oaks and pines,
And elms and vines,
Confess the God.

5 The tyrants of the plain
Their savage chase give o'er:
No more they rend the slain,
And thirst for blood no more:
But infant hands
Fierce tigers stroke,
And lions yoke
In flowery bands.

6 O when, Almighty Lord,
Shall these glad scenes arise;
To verify thy word,
And bless our wondering eyes!
That earth may raise,
With all its tongues,
United songs
Of ardent praise.

HYMN CI.

The blind and weak led and supported in God's way Isa. xlii. 16.

1 Praise to the radiant source of bliss,
Who gives the blind their sight,
And scatters round their wondering eyes
A flood of sacred light.

2 In paths unknown he leads them on
To his divine abode,
And shows new miracles of grace
Through all the heavenly road.

3 The ways all rugged and perplexed
He renders smooth and straight,
And strengthens every feeble knee
To march to Zion's gate.

4 Through all the path I 'll sing his name,
Till I the mount ascend,
Where toils and storms are known no more
And anthems never end.

HYMN CII.

God calling his Israel by name, and leading them through water and fire. Isa. xliii. 1, 2.

1 Let Jacob to his Maker sing,
And praise his great redeeming King

* Creeping things.

Called by a new, a gracious name,
Let Israel loud his God proclaim.

2 He knows our souls in all their tears,
And gently wipes our falling tears,
Forms trembling voices to a song,
And bids the feeble heart be strong.

3 Then let the rivers swell around,
And rising floods o'erflow the ground;
Rivers and floods and seas divide,
And homage pay to Israel's guide.

4 Then let the fires their rage display,
And flaming terrors bar the way;
Unburnt, unsinged, he leads them through,
And makes the flames refreshing too.

5 The fires but on their bonds shall prey,*
The floods but wash their stains away,
And grace divine new trophies† raise
Amidst the deluge and the blaze.

HYMN CIII.

The riches of pardoning grace celebrated. Isa. xliv. 22, 32.

1 Let heaven burst forth into a song;
Let earth reflect the joyful sound;
Ye mountains, with the echo ring,
And shout, ye forests, all around.

2 The Lord his Israel hath redeemed,
Hath made his mourning people glad,
And the rich glories of his name
In their salvation hath displayed.

3 Unnumbered sins like sable clouds,
Veiled every cheerful ray of joy,
And thunders murmured through the gloom,
While lightnings pointed to destroy.

4 He spoke, and all the clouds dispersed,
And heaven unveiled its shining face;
The whole creation smiled anew,
Decked in the golden beams of grace.

5 Israel, return with humble love,
Return to thy Redeemer's breast,
And charmed by his melodious voice,
Compose thy weary powers to rest.

HYMN CIV.

The little success which attended the personal ministry of Christ. Isa. xlix. 4.

1 And doth the Son of God complain,
"Lo, I have spent my strength in vain,
And stretched my hands whole days and years
To those who slight my words and tears!"

2 O stubborn hearts, that could withstand
Such efforts from a Saviour's hand!
O gracious Saviour, who wouldst bleed,
When words and tears could not succeed!

3 Fall down, my soul, in humble woe,
That thou hast wronged his goodness so;
Now let his grace resistless move
To melt the stubborn flint to love.

4 All-glorious Lord, march forth and reign,
And reap the fruit of all thy pain;
And, till a nobler scene appear,
Begin the happy conquest here.

HYMN CV.

God's captives released; applied to spiritual deliverances. Isa. li. 14, 15.

1 Captives of Israel, hear,
Who now as exiles‡ mourn,
See your Almighty God appear
To hasten your return.

2 Jehovah is his name,
Lord of celestial hosts;
Let heaven that saving power proclaim
In which his Israel trusts.

3 Though helpless now ye lie,
As in a dungeon thrown,
When parched with painful thirst ye cry,
And when your bread is gone.

4 Deliverance comes apace;
Ye shall not there expire;
Prepare to sing redeeming grace
With his triumphant choir.

5 He smote the raging sea,
Midst its tumultuous roar,
And paved his chosen troops a way
Safe to its distant shore.

6 In him let Israel hope,
At whose supreme command
Graves yield their breathless captives up,
And seas become dry land

HYMN CVI.

The cup of fury exchanged for the cup of blessing. Isa. li. 22.

1 The Lord, our Lord, how rich his grace!
What stores of sovereign love
For humble souls, that seek his face,
And to his footstool move!

2 He pleads the cause of all his saints
When foes against them rise;
He listens to their sad complaints,
And wipes their streaming eyes.

* Allusion to the story in Dan. iii. 19, &c. † Monuments of [illegible]

‡ Babylonish captives

3 He takes away that dreadful cup
Of fury and of plagues,
Which justice sentenced them to drink,
And wring the bitter dregs.

4 He gave it to their Saviour's hand,
And filled it to the brim;
Their Saviour drank the liquid death,
That they might live by him.

5 "Now take the cup of life, (he cries,)
Where heavenly blessings flow:
Drink deep, nor fear to drain the spring,
To which the draught ye owe."

6 We drink, and feel our life renewed,
And all our woes forget:
We drink, till that transporting hour,
When we our Lord shall meet.

HYMN CVII.

The holy city purified and guarded. Isa. liii. 1, 2.

1 Triumphant Zion, lift thy head
From dust, and darkness, and the dead:
Though humbled long, awake at length,
And gird thee with thy Saviour's strength.

2 Put all thy beauteous garments on,
And let thy various charms be known;
The world thy glories shall confess,
Decked in the robes of righteousness.

3 No more shall foes unclean invade,
And fill thy hallowed walls with dread;
No more shall hell's insulting host
Their victory and thy sorrows boast.

4 God from on high thy groans will hear,
His hand thy ruins shall repair;
Reared and adorned by love divine,
Thy towers and battlements shall shine.

5 Grace shall dispose my heart and voice
To share, and echo back her joys;
Nor will her watchful Monarch cease
To guard her in eternal peace.

HYMN CVIII.

God's government, Zion's joy. Isa. lii. 7

1 Ye subjects of the Lord, proclaim
The royal honours of his name:
Jehovah reigns, be all our song.
'Tis he, thy God, O Zion reigns,
Prepare thy most harmonious strains
Glad hallelujahs to prolong.

2 Ye princes, boast no more your crowns,
But lay the glittering trifles down
In lowly honour at his feet;
A span your narrow empire bounds,
He reigns beyond created rounds,
In self-sufficient glory great.

3 Tremble, ye pageants of a day,
Formed like your slaves of brittle clay,
Down to the dust your sceptres bend:
To everlasting years he reigns,
And undiminished pomp maintains,
When kings, and suns, and time shall end.

4 So shall his favoured Zion live:
In vain confederate nations strive
Her sacred turrets to destroy;
Her Sovereign sits enthroned above,
And endless power, and endless love,
Ensure her safety, and her joy.

HYMN CIX.

Divine mercies and judgment compared. Is. liv.

1 In thy rebukes, all-gracious God,
What soft compassion reigns!
What gentle accents of thy voice
Assuage thy children's pains!

2 "When I correct my chosen sons,
A father's bowels move:
One transient moment bounds my wrath,
But endless is my love."

3 Our faith shall look through every tear,
And view thy smiling face,
And hope amidst our sighs shall tune
An anthem to thy grace.

4 Gather at length my weary soul
To join thy saints above,
For I would learn a song of praise
Eternal as thy love.

HYMN CX.

Divine teachings, and their happy consequences. Isa. liv. 13.

1 Bright source of intellectual rays,
Father of spirits, and of grace,
O dart with energy unknown
Celestial beamings from thy throne.

2 Thy sacred book we would survey,
Enlightened with that heavenly day,
And ask thy Spirit, with the word,
To teach our souls to know the Lord.

3 So shall our children learn the road,
That leads them to their fathers' God;
And, formed by lessons so divine,
Shall infant minds with knowledge shine.

4 So shall the haughtiest soul submit,
With children placed at Jesus' feet:
The noisy swell of pride shall cease,
And thy sweet voice be heard in peace.

HYMN CXI.

Fruitful showers, emblems of the salutary effects of the gospel. Isa. lv. 10–12.

1 Mark the soft-falling snow,
And the diffusive rain:
To heaven from whence it fell,
It turns not back again;
But waters earth
Through every pore,
And calls forth all
Its secret store.

2 Arrayed in beauteous green
The hills and valleys shine,
And man and beast is fed
By Providence divine;
The harvest bows
Its golden ears,
The copious seed
Of future years.

3 "So," saith the God of grace,
"My gospel shall descend
Almighty to effect
The purpose I intend;
Millions of souls
Shall feel its power,
And bear it down
To millions more.

4 "Joy shall begin your march,
And peace protect your ways,
While all the mountains round
Echo melodious praise:
The vocal groves
Shall sing the God,
And every tree
Consenting nod."

HYMN CXII.

Comfort for pious parents, who have been bereaved of their children. Isa. lvi. 4, 5.

1 Ye mourning saints, whose streaming tears
Flow o'er your children dead,
Say not, in transports of despair,
That all your hopes are fled.

2 While cleaving to that darling dust,
In fond distress ye lie,
Rise, and with joy and reverence view
A heavenly Parent nigh.

3 Though, your young branches torn away,
Like withered trunks ye stand,
With fairer verdure shall ye bloom,
Touched by the Almighty's hand.

4 "I 'll give the mourner," saith the Lord,
"In my own house a place
No names of daughters and of sons
Could yield so high a grace.

5 "Transient and vain is every hope
A rising race can give;
In endless honour and delight
My children all shall live."

6 We welcome, Lord, those rising tears,
Through which thy face we see,
And bless those wounds, which through our hearts
Prepare a way for thee.

HYMN CXIII.

The stranger entertained in God's house of prayer. Isa. lvi. 6. 7. compared with Matt. xxi. 13. and Eph. ii. 19.

1 Great Father of mankind,
We bless that wondrous grace,
Which could for Gentiles find
Within thy courts a place.
How kind the care
Our God displays,
For us to raise
A house of prayer!

2 Though once estranged far,
We now approach the throne;
For Jesus brings us near,
And makes our cause his own:
Strangers no more,
To thee we come,
And find our home,
And rest secure.

3 To thee our souls we join
And love thy sacred name;
No more our own, but thine,
We triumph in thy claim:
Our Father-king,
Thy covenant grace
Our souls embrace,
Thy titles sing.

4 Here in thy house we feast
On dainties all divine:
And, while such sweets we taste,
With joy our faces shine.
Incense shall rise
From flames of love,
And God approve
The sacrifice.

5 May all the nations throng
To worship in thy house;
And thou attend the song,
And smile upon their vows:
Indulgent still,
Till earth conspire
To join the choir
On Zion's hill.

HYMN CXIV.

Peace proclaimed, and the fruit of the lips created, by a gracious God. Isa. lvii. 19.

1 Hark! for the great Creator speaks:
In silence let the earth attend;
And, when his words of grace are heard,
In grateful adoration bend.

2 "'Tis I create the fruit of praise,
And give the broken heart to sing;
Peace, heavenly peace, my lips proclaim,
Pleased with the happy news they bring."

3 Receive the tidings with delight,
Ye Gentile nations from afar;
And you, the children of his love,
Whom grace hath brought already near.

4 To these, to those, his sovereign hand
Its healing energy imparts:
Peace, peace, be echoed from your tongues,
And echoed from consenting hearts.

5 Enjoy the health which God hath wrought:
Nor let the daily tribute cease,
Till changed for more exalted songs
In regions of eternal peace.

HYMN CXV.

The duty of remonstrating against sin, when judgments are threatened. Isa. lviii. 1.

1 Thy judgments cry aloud,
O ever-righteous God,
And in the sight of all our land
Thou liftest up thy rod.

2 Aloud thy servants cry,
Commissioned from thy throne,
And like a trumpet raise their voice
To make thy judgments known.

3 But who that cry attends,
And makes his safety sure?
Rocked by the tempest they should flee,
They sleep the more secure.

4 Another trumpet, Lord,
The stupid slumberers need;
Nor will they hear a feebler voice
Than that which wakes the dead.

HYMN CXVI.

Unsuccessful fasts accounted for. Isa. lviii. 3. compared with 1–8.

For a Fast-day.

1 Oh! where is sovereign mercy gone?
Whither is Britain's God withdrawn?
That through long years she should complain,
She fasts, and mourns, and cries in vain!

2 Hast thou not seen her suppliant hands
Through all her coasts extend their hands?
Or has their oft-repeated prayer
Escaped thine ever-listening ear?

3 Thine ear hath heard, thine eye hath seen
But guilt hath spread a cloud between;
And rising still before thy face,
Averts thy long-entreated grace.

4 Dispel that cloud by rays divine,
And cause thy cheering face to shine;
Our isle shall shout from shore to shore,
And dread encroaching foes no more.

5 Our light shall like the morning spring;
Healing and joy our God shall bring;
Justice shall in our front appear,
And glory gather up our rear.

HYMN CXVII.

The standard of the Spirit lifted up. Isa. lix. 19.

1 God of the ocean, at whose voice
The threatening floods are heard no more,
Behold their madness and their noise,
And silence the tumultuous roar.

2 Her streams of poisonous error swell;
There rages vice in every form;
They join their tide, led on by hell,
And Zion trembles at the storm.

3 Almighty Spirit, raise thine arm,
And lift the Saviour's standard high;
Thy people's hearts with vigour warm,
And call thy chosen legions nigh.

4 Waked by thy well-known voice they come,
And round the sacred banner throng;
Zion prepare the Conqueror room,
While triumph bursts into a song.

5 "The Lord on high, when billows roar,
Superior majesty displays,
And, by one breath of sovereign power,
Hushes the noise of foaming seas."

HYMN CXVIII.

The glory of the church in the latter day. Isa. lx. 1.

1 O Zion, tune thy voice,
And raise thy hands on high;
Tell all the earth thy joys,
And boast salvation nigh.
Cheerful in God,
Arise and shine,
While rays divine
Stream all abroad.

2 He gilds thy mourning face
With beams that cannot fade;
His all-resplendent grace
He pours around thy head.

The nations round
Thy form shall view,
With lustre new Divinely crowned.

3 In honour to his name
Reflect that sacred light;
And loud that grace proclaim,
Which makes thy darkness bright:
Pursue his praise,
Till sovereign love
In worlds above
The glory raise.

4 There on his holy hill
A brighter sun shall rise,
And with his radiance fill
Those fairer, purer skies;
While round his throne
Ten thousand stars
In nobler spheres*
His influence own.

HYMN CXIX.

God the everlasting light of the saints above. Isa. lx. 20.

1 Ye golden lamps of heaven,† farewell,
With all your feeble light:
Farewell, thou ever-changing moon,
Pale empress of the night.

2 And thou, refulgent orb of day,‡
In brighter flames arrayed,
My soul, that springs beyond thy sphere,
No more demands thine aid.

3 Ye stars are but the shining dust
Of my divine abode,
The pavement of those heavenly courts,
Where I shall reign with God.

4 The Father of eternal light
Shall there his beams display;
Nor shall one moment's darkness mix
With that unvaried day.

5 No more the drops of piercing grief
Shall swell into mine eyes;
Nor the meridian§ sun decline
Amidst those brighter skies.

6 There all the millions of his saints
Shall in one song unite,
And each the bliss of all shall view
With infinite delight.

HYMN CXX.

God entreated for Zion. Isa. lxii. 6, 7.

For a Fast-day, or a day of prayer for the revival of religion.

1 Indulgent Sovereign of the skies,
And wilt thou bow thy gracious ear!

* Orbs, or paths in which the stars move.
† The stars. ‡ The sun § Noon-day

While feeble mortals raise their cries,
Wilt thou, the great Jehovah, hear!

2 How shall thy servants give thee rest,
Till Zion's mouldering walls thou raise!
Till thy own power shall stand confessed,
And make Jerusalem a praise!

3 For this, a lowly suppliant crowd
Here in thy sacred temple wait:
For this, we lift our voices loud,
And call, and knock, at mercy's gate.

4 Look down, O God, with pitying eye,
And view the desolation round;
See what wide realms in darkness lie,
And hurl their idols to the ground.

5 Loud let the gospel trumpet blow,
And call the nations from afar;
Let all the isles their Saviour know,
And earth's remotest ends draw near.

6 Let Babylon's proud altars shake,
And light invade her darkest gloom;
The yoke of iron bondage break,
The yoke of Satan, and of Rome.

7 With gentle beams on Britain shine,
And bless her princes, and her priests;
And, by thine energy divine,
Let sacred love o'erflow their breasts.

8 Triumphant here let Jesus reign,
And on his vineyard sweetly smile;
While all the virtues of his train
Adorn our church, adorn our isle.

9 On all our souls let grace descend,
Like heavenly dew, in copious showers,
That we may call our God our friend,
That we may hail salvation ours.

10 Then shall each age and rank agree
United shouts of joy to raise:
And Zion, made a praise by thee,
To thee shall render back the praise.

HYMN CXXI.

A nation born in a day; or the rapid progress of the Gospel desired. Isa. lxvi. 8.

1 Behold with pleasing ecstasy
The gospel standard lifted high,
That all the nations from afar
May in the great salvation share.

2 Why then, Almighty Saviour, why
Do wretched souls in millions die!
While wide the infernal tyrant reigns
O'er spacious realms in ponderous‖ chains.

3 And shall he still go on to boast
Thy cross its energy hath lost!

‖ Heavy

And shall thy servants still complain,
Their labours and their tears are vain?

4 Awake, all-conquering arm, awake,
And hell's extensive empire shake;
Assert the honours of thy throne,
And call the ruined world thy own.

5 Thine all-successful power display;
Produce a nation in a day;
For at thy word this barren earth
Shall travail with a general birth.

6 Swift let thy quickening Spirit breathe
On these abodes of sin and death;
That breath shall bow ten thousand minds,
Like waving corn before the winds.

7 Scarce can our glowing hearts endure
A world, where thou art known no more;
Transform it, Lord, by conquering love;
Or bear us to the realms above.

HYMN CXXII.

Backsliding Israel invited to return to God.
Jer. iii. 12, 13.

1 Backsliding Israel, hear the voice
Of thy forgiving God,
Nor force such goodness to exert
The terrors of the rod.

2 Thus saith the Lord, "My mercy flows
An unexhausted stream,
And, after all its millions saved,
Its sway is still supreme.

3 "One moment's wrath with weighty crush
Might sink you quick to hell;
Yet mercy points the happy path,
Where life and glory dwell.

4 "Own but the follies thou hast done,
And mourn thy sins in dust,
And soon thy trembling heart shall learn
To hope, and love, and trust."

5 All-gracious God, thy voice we own;
And, prostrate at thy feet,
Our souls in humble silence wait
A pardon there to meet.

HYMN CXXIII.

The goodness of God acknowledged in giving pastors after his own heart. Jer. iii. 15.

At the Settlement of a Minister.

1 Shepherd of Israel, thou dost keep
With constant care thy humble sheep;
By thee elected pastors rise
To feed our souls, and bless our eyes.

2 To all thy churches such impart,
Modelled by thy own gracious heart;
Whose courage, watchfulness, and love
Men may attest, and God approve.

3 Fed by their active tender care,
Healthful may all thy sheep appear,
And, by their fair example led,
The way to Zion's pastures tread.

4 Here hast thou listened to our vows,
And scattered blessings on thy house.
Thy saints are succoured, and no more
As sheep without a guide deplore.

5 Completely heal each former stroke,
And bless the shepherd and the flock;
Confirm the hopes thy mercies raise,
And own this tribute of our praise.

HYMN CXXIV.

God's gracious methods of adopting love.
Jer. iii. 19.

1 Amazing plan of sovereign love!
And doth our God look down
On rebels whom his wrath might doom
To perish at his frown?

2 Doth he project a wondrous scheme
In such a way to save,
That justice, majesty, and grace,
May one joint triumph have?

3 One look the stubborn heart subdues
And at his feet they fall;
They own their Father with delight,
And he receives them all.

4 Numbered amongst his dearest sons,
The pleasant land they share;
On earth secured by power divine,
Till crowned with glory there.

5 Father, in thine embraces lodged,
Our heaven begun we feel,
And wait the hour, which thou shalt mark
Thy counsels to fulfil.

HYMN CXXV.

Creatures vain, and God the salvation of his people.
Jer. iii. 23.

1 How long shall dreams of creature bliss
Our flattering hopes employ,
And mock our fond deluded eyes
With visionary joy?*

2 Why from the mountains and the hills
Is our salvation sought,
While our eternal Rock 's forsook,
And Israel's God forgot?

3 The living spring neglected flows
Full in our daily view,

* The Author [illegible]

Yet we with anxious fruitless toil
Our broken cisterns hew.

4 These fatal errors, gracious God,
With gentle pity see:
To thee our roving eyes direct,
And fix our souls on thee.

HYMN CXXVI.

Invitation to return to the Lord, and put away abominations. Jer. iv. 1, 2.

1 It is the Lord of glory calls,
O let his Israel hear:
"Stop, ye revolters, in your course,
And hearken, and come near.

2 "What though in sin's delusive paths
Ye from your youth have strayed;
What though my messages of love
Have been with scorn repaid;

3 "At last return, and grace divine
Your wanderings shall forget,
If loyal zeal and love dethrone
Each idol from its seat.

4 "Return, and dwell secure on earth,
As in your Lord's embrace,
Till in the land of perfect joy
Ye find a nobler place."

5 Father of mercies, lo, we come,
Subdued by such a call;
O let the hand of grace divine
Reduce and bless us all!

6 So will we teach the world that love
Which we are made to see:
And wanderers shall with us return,
And bless themselves in thee.

HYMN CXXVII.

Misimproved privileges, and disappointed hopes Jer. viii. 20.

1 Alas, how fast our moments fly!
How short our months appear!
How swift through various seasons hastes
The still revolving year.

2 Seasons of grace, and days of hope,
While Jesus waiting stands,
And spreads the blessings of his love
With wide-extended hands.

3 But O how slow our stupid souls
These blessings to secure!
Blessings, which through eternal years
Unwithering shall endure.

4 Beneath the word of life we die;
We starve amidst our store
And what salvation should impart
Heightens our ruin more.

5 Pity this madness, God of love,
And make us truly wise:
So from the pregnant seeds of grace
Shall glorious harvests rise.

HYMN CXXVIII.

Glorying in God alone. Jer. ix. 23, 24.

1 The righteous Lord, supremely great,
Maintains his universal state:
O'er all the earth his power extends;
All heaven before his foot-stool bends.

2 Yet justice still with power presides,
And mercy all his empire guides;
Such works are pleasing in his sight,
And such the men of his delight.

3 No more, ye wise, your wisdom boast;
No more, ye strong, your valour trust:
Nor let the rich survey his store,
Elate* with heaps of shining ore.

4 Glory, my soul, in this alone,
That God, thy God, to thee is known,
That thou hast owned his sovereign sway,
That thou hast felt his cheering ray.

5 My wisdom, wealth, and power I find
In one Jehovah all combined!
On him I fix my roving eyes,
Till all my soul in rapture rise.

6 All else, which I my treasure call,
May in one fatal moment fall;
But what his happiness can move,
Whom God the blessed deigns† to love?

HYMN CXXIX.

Jeremiah's tears over the captive flock. Jer. xiii. 15–17.

1 Flow on, my tears, in rising streams,
Ye briny fountains, flow;
While haughty sinners steel their hearts,
Nor will Jehovah know.

2 The flock of God is captive led
In Satan's heavy chains;
Led to the borders of the pit,
Where endless horror reigns.

3 Look back, ye captives, and invoke
Jehovah's saving aid;
Give him the glory of his name,
Whose hand your nature made.

4 O turn, ere yet your erring feet
On death's dark mountain fall,
Cry, and your gentle Shepherd's ear
Will hearken to your call.

* Exult. † Condescends.

5 Then shall those hearts with pleasure spring
Which now in sorrow melt;
And deep repentance yield a joy
Proud guilt hath never felt.

6 Almighty grace, exert thy power,
And turn these slaves of sin;
And, when they bring thy tribute due,
Shall their own bliss begin.

HYMN CXXX.

Giving glory to God, before darkness comes upon us. Jer. xiii. 16

1 The swift declining day,
How fast its moments fly!
While evening's broad and gloomy shade
Gains on the western sky.

2 Ye mortals, mark its pace,
And use the hours of light;
And know, its Maker can command
An instantaneous night.

3 His word blots out the sun
In its meridian blaze;
And cuts from smiling vigorous youth
The remnant of its days.

4 On the dark mountain's brow
Your feet shall quickly slide;
And from its airy summit dash
Your momentary pride.

5 Give glory to the Lord,
Who rules the whirling sphere:
Submissive at his footstool bow,
And seek salvation there.

6 Then shall new lustre break
Through horror's darkest gloom,
And lead you to unchanging light
In a celestial home.

HYMN CXXXI.

The fatal consequences of forsaking the hope of Israel. Jer. xvii. 13, 14

1 Great object of thine Israel's hope,
Its Saviour, and its praise,
Attend, while we to thee devote
The remnant of our days.

2 How wretched they that leave the Lord
And from his word withdraw
That lose his gospel from their sight
And wander from his law!

3 O thou eternal spring of good,
Whence living waters flow,
Let not our thirsty erring souls
To broken cisterns go.

4 Like characters inscribed in dust
Are sinners borne away,
And all the treasures they can boast,
The portion of a day.

5 But, Lord, to thee my heart shall turn
To heal it, and to save;
The joys, that from thy favour flow,
Shall bloom beyond the grave.

HYMN CXXXII.

Christ the Lord our righteousness. Jer. xxiii. 6

1 Saviour divine, we know thy name,
And in that name we trust;
Thou art the Lord our righteousness,
Thou art thine Israel's boast.

2 Guilty we plead before thy throne,
And low in dust we lie,
Till Jesus stretch his gracious arm
To bring the guilty nigh.

3 The sins of one most righteous day
Might plunge us in despair;
Yet all the crimes of numerous years
Shall our great Surety clear.

4 That spotless robe, which he hath wrought
Shall deck us all around;
Nor by the piercing eye of God
One blemish shall be found.

5 Pardon, and peace, and lively hope
To sinners now are given;
Israel and Judah soon shall change
Their wilderness for heaven.

6 With joy we taste that manna now,
Thy mercy scatters down!
We seal our humble vows to thee,
And wait the promised crown.

HYMN CXXXIII.

The efficacy of God's word. Jer. xxiii. 29

1 With reverend awe, tremendous Lord,
We hear the thunders of thy word;
The pride of Lebanon it breaks:
Swift the celestial fire descends,
The flinty rocks in pieces rends,
And earth to its deep centre shakes.

2 Arrayed in majesty divine,
Here sanctity and justice shine,
And horror strikes the rebel through;
While loud this awful voice makes known
The wonders which thy sword hath done,
And what thy vengeance yet shall do.

3 So spread the honours of thy name:
The terrors of a God proclaim;
Thick let the pointed arrows fly

Till sinners, humbled in the dust
Shall own the execution just,
And bless the hand by which they die.

4 Then clear the dark tempestuous day,
And radiant beams of love display;
Each prostrate soul let mercy raise:
So shall the bleeding captives feel,
Thy word, which gave the wound, can heal,
And change their groans to songs of praise.

HYMN CXXXIV.

The possibility of dying this year. Jeremiah xxviii. 16.

For New-year's Day.

1 God of my life, thy constant care
With blessings crowns each opening year;
This guilty life dost thou prolong,
And wake anew mine annual song.

2 How many precious souls are fled
To the vast regions of the dead,
Since from this day the changing sun
Through his last yearly period run!

3 We yet survive; but who can say,
Or through the year, or month, or day,
"I will retain this vital breath;
Thus far at least in league with death?"*

4 That breath is thine, eternal God;
'Tis thine to fix my soul's abode;
It holds its life from thee alone,
On earth, or in the world unknown.

5 To thee our spirits we resign,
Make them and own them still as thine;
So shall they smile, secure from fear,
Though death should blast the rising year.

6 Thy children, eager to be gone,
Bid time's impetuous tide roll on,
And land them on that blooming shore,
Where years and death are known no more.

HYMN CXXXV.

God's complacency in his thoughts of peace towards his people. Jer. xxix. 11.

1 Viler than dust, O Lord, are we;
And doth thine anger cease?
And doth thy gracious heart o'erflow
With purposes of peace?

2 And dost thou with delight reflect
On what thy grace shall do?
And with complacency of soul
Enjoy the distant view?

3 And can thy often injured love
So kind a message send,

* Isaiah xxxvi. 18.

Lest thou to all our lengthened woe
Wilt give the expected end?

4 Why droop our hearts? why flow our eyes
While such a voice we hear?
Why rise our sorrows and our fears,
While such a friend is near?

5 To all thy other favours add
A heart to trust thy word,
And death itself shall hear us sing,
While resting on the Lord.

HYMN CXXXVI.

The impudent rebellion of the Jewish refugees at Pathros. Jer. xliv. 16, 17, 28.

1 Whose words against the Lord are stout
Or who presume to say,
"That sovereign law which God proclaims,
I dare to disobey."

2 Ten thousand actions every where
The impious language speak:
Yet power omnipotent stands by,
Nor do its thunders break.

3 But oh! the dreadful day draws near,
When God's avenging hand
Shall show if feeble mortals' breath,
Or God's own word, shall stand.

4 My soul, with prostrate reverence fall
Before the voice divine;
And all those interest and thy powers
To its command resign.

5 Speak, mighty Lord, thy servant waits
The purport of thy will:
My heart with secret ardour glows
Its mandates † to fulfil.

6 Let the vain sons of Belial boast,
Their tongues and thoughts are free;
My noblest liberty I own,
When subject most to thee.

HYMN CXXXVII.

Asking the way to Zion, in order to join in covenant with God. Jer. l. 5.

1 Inquire, ye pilgrims, for the way
That leads to Zion's hill;
And thither set your steady face
With a determined will.

2 Invite the strangers all around
Your pious march to join;
And spread the sentiments you feel
Of faith and love divine.

3 Come, let us to his temple haste
And seek his favour there.

* [illegible]

Before his footstool humbly bow,
And pour out fervent prayer.

4 Come, let us join our souls to God
In everlasting bands,
And seize the blessings he bestows
With eager hearts and hands.

5 Come, let us seal without delay
The covenant of his grace;
Nor shall the years of distant life
Its memory efface.*

6 Thus may our rising offspring haste
To seek their fathers' God,
Nor e'er forsake the happy path
Their youthful feet have trod.

HYMN CXXXVIII.

Searching and trying our ways. Lam. iii. 40

1 Thy piercing eye, O God, surveys
The various windings of our ways;
Teach us their tendency to know,
And judge the paths in which we go.

2 How wild, how crooked have they been!
A maze of foolishness and sin!
With all the light we vainly boast,
Leaving our guide, our souls are lost.

3 Had not thy mercy been our aid,
So fatally our feet had strayed,
Stern justice had its prisoners led
Down to the chambers of the dead.

4 O turn us back to thee again,
Or we shall search our ways in vain;
Shine, and the path of life reveal,
And bear us on to Zion's hill.

5 Roll on, ye swift revolving years,
And end this round of sins and cares;
No more a wanderer would I roam,
But near my Father fix at home.

HYMN CXXXIX.

The breath of our nostrils taken in the pits of the enemy; applied to Christ. Lam. iv. 20

1 Blest Saviour, to my heart more dear
Than balmy gales of vital air;
Were thy soul-cheering presence gone,
What use of breath, unless to groan?

2 Thy Father's royal hand hath shed,
In rich profusion on thy head,
Ten thousand graces: thou alone
Canst share, and canst adorn his throne.

3 But see the sovereign Captive led,
Snared in the pit which traitors made,
Fettered with ignominious bands
And murdered by rebellious hands.

4 Ye saints, to your expiring King
Your tributary sorrows bring;
In loyal crowds assemble round,
And bathe in tears each precious wound.

5 But from the caverns of the grave
He springs omnipotent to save;
The captive King ascends and reigns,
And drags his conquered foes in chains.

6 Beneath his shade our souls shall live,
In all the rapture heaven can give;
Where Zion never shall deplore,
And heathens vex his church no more.

HYMN CXL.

Of lamenting national sins. Ezek. ix. 4—6.

For a Fast day.

1 O righteous God, thou judge supreme,
We tremble at thy dreadful name;
And all our crying guilt we own
In dust and tears before thy throne.

2 So manifold our crimes have been,
Such crimson tinctore dyes our sin,
That, could we all its horrors know,
Our streaming eyes with blood might flow.

3 Britain, the land thine arm hath saved,
That arm most impiously hath braved;†
Britain, the isle its God hath loved,
A rebel to that love hath proved.

4 Estranged from reverential awe,
We trample on thy sacred law:
And though such wonders grace had done,
Anew we crucify thy Son.

5 Justly might this polluted land
Prove all the vengeance of thy hand;
And, bathed in heaven,‡ thy sword might come
To drink our blood, and seal our doom.

6 Yet hast thou not a remnant here,
Whose souls are filled with pious fear?
O bring thy wonted mercy nigh,
While prostrate at thy feet they lie.

7 Behold their tears, attend their moan,
Nor turn away their secret groan:
With these we join our humble prayer,
Our nation shield, our country spare.

8 But if the sentence be decreed,
And our dear native land must bleed,
By thy sure mark may we be known,
And save in life or death thy own.

* Deut. xxvi. 17.

† Isaiah xxxvi. 7.

HYMN CXLI

The iniquity of sacrificing God's children: or, the evil of a bad or neglected education. Ezek. xvi 20, 21.*

1 Behold, O Israel's God,
From thine exalted throne,
And view the desolate abode,
Thou once hast called thy own.

2 The children of thy flock,
By early covenant thine,
See how they pour their bleeding souls
On every idol's shrine! †

3 To indolence and pride
What piteous victims made!
Crushed in their parents' fond embrace,
And by their care betrayed.

4 By pleasure's polished dart
What numbers here are slain!
What numbers there for slaughter bound
In Mammon's golden chain!

5 O let thine arm awake,
And dash the idols down:
O call the captives of their power
Thy treasure and thy crown.

6 Thee let the fathers own,
And thee the sons adore,
Joined to the Lord by solemn vows,
To be forgot no more.

HYMN CXLII.

The humility and submission of a penitent. Ezek. xvi. 63.

1 O injured Majesty of heaven
Look from thy holy throne,
While prostrate rebels own with grief
What treasons they have done.

2 Thy grace, when sin abounded most,
Reigns with superior sway;
And pardons, bought with Jesus' blood,
To rebels doth display.

3 While love its grateful anthems tunes,
Tears mingle with the song;
My heart with tender anguish bleeds,
That I such grace should wrong.

4 How shall I lift these guilty eyes
To mine offended Lord?
Or how, beneath his heaviest strokes,
Pronounce one murmuring word?

5 Remorse and shame my lips have sealed:
But O, my Father, speak!
And all the harmony of heaven
Shall through the silence break.

* Alluding to the cruel custom among some heathen nations of sacrificing their children to their gods, to which there is frequent allusion in Scripture.

† 420r

HYMN CXLIII.

God bringing his people into the covenant under the rod. Ezek. xx. 37.

1 How gracious and how wise
Is our chastising God!
And O! how rich the blessings are,
Which blossom from his rod!

2 He lifts it up on high
With pity in his heart,
That every stroke his children feel
May grace and peace impart.

3 Instructed thus they bow,
And own his sovereign sway;
They turn their erring footsteps back
To his forsaken way.

4 His covenant love they seek,
And seek the happy bands,
That closer still engage their hearts
To honour his commands.

5 Dear Father, we consent
To discipline divine;
And bless the pains, that make our souls
Still more completely thine.

HYMN CXLIV.

God's condescension in becoming the shepherd of men. Ezek. xxxiv. 31

1 And will the Majesty of heaven
Accept us for his sheep?
And with a shepherd's tender care
Such worthless creatures keep?

2 And will he spread his guardian arms
Round our defenceless head?
And cause us gently to lie down
In his refreshing shade?

3 And will he lead our weary souls
To that delightful scene,
Where rivers of salvation flow
Through pastures ever green?

4 What thanks can mortal man repay
For favours great as thine?
Or how can tongues of feeble clay
Proclaim such love divine?

5 Eternal God, how mean are we!
How richly gracious thou!
Our souls, o'erwhelmed with humble joy
In silent transports bow.

HYMN CXLV

Seeking to God for the communication of the Spirit. Ezek. xxxvi. 37

1 Hear, gracious Sovereign, from thy throne
And send thy various blessings down:

While by thine Israel thou art sought,
Attend the prayer thy word hath taught

2 Come, sacred Spirit, from above,
And fill the coldest heart with love;
Soften to flesh the rugged stone,
And let thy godlike power be known

3 Speak thou, and from the haughtiest eyes
Shall floods of pious sorrow rise.
While all their glowing souls are borne
To seek that grace which now they scorn.

4 O let a holy flock await,
Numerous around thy temple gate,
Each pressing on with zeal to be
A living sacrifice to thee.

5 In answer to our fervent cries,
Give us to see thy church arise;
Or, if that blessing seem too great,
Give us to mourn its low estate.

HYMN CXLVI

Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones. Ezek. xxxvii. 3.

1 Look down, O Lord, with pitying eye;
See Adam's race in ruin lie;
Sin spreads its trophies o'er the ground,
And scatters slaughtered heaps around.

2 And can these mouldering corpses live?
And can these perished bones revive?
That, mighty God, to thee is known;
That wondrous work is all thy own.

3 Thy ministers are sent in vain
To prophesy upon the slain;
In vain they call, in vain they cry,
Till thine almighty aid is nigh.

4 But if thy Spirit deign to breathe,
Life spreads through all the realms of death;
Dry bones obey thy powerful voice;
They move, they waken, they rejoice.

5 So when thy trumpet's awful sound
Shall shake the heavens, and rend the ground,
Dead saints shall from their tombs arise,
And spring to life beyond the skies.

HYMN CXLVII.

*The waters of the sanctuary healing the dead sea. Ezek. xlvii. 8, 9.

1 Great source of being and of love,
Thou waterest all the worlds above
And all the joys we mortals know,
From thine exhaustless fountain flow

2 A sacred spring, at thy command,
From Zion's mount, in Canaan's land,
Beside thy temple, cleaves the ground,
And pours its limpid stream around.

3 The limpid stream with sudden force
Swells to a river in its course;
Through desert realms its windings play,
And scatter blessings all the way.

4 Close by its banks in order fair,
The blooming trees of life appear.
Their blossoms fragrant odours give,
And on their fruit the nations live.

5 To the dead sea the waters flow,
And carry healing as they go.
Its poisonous dregs their power confess,
And all its shores the fountain bless.

6 Flow, wondrous stream, with glory crowned,
Flow on to earth's remotest bound;
And bear us on thy gentle wave
To him, who all thy virtues gave.

* The sea, or lake, where Sodom, Gomorrah, &c. had stood, was now pastoral and picturesque, and ancient writers say that on its south bank

HYMN CXLVIII

Tekel, or, The sinner weighed in God's balances, and found wanting. Dan. v. 27.

1 Raise, thoughtless sinner, raise thine eye,
Behold God's balance lifted high:
There shall his justice be displayed,
And there thy hope and life be weighed.

2 See in one scale his perfect law;
Mark with what force its precepts draw
Wouldst thou the awful test sustain,
Thy works how light! thy thoughts how vain

3 Behold the hand of God appears,
To trace these dreadful characters;
"Tekel, thy soul is wanting found,
And wrath shall smite thee to the ground."

4 Let sudden fear thy nerves unbrace;
Let horror shake thy tottering knees;†
Through all thy thoughts let anguish roll,
And deep repentance melt thy soul.

5 One only hope may yet prevail!
Christ hath a weight to turn the scale:
Still doth the gospel publish peace,
And show a Saviour's righteousness.

6 Great God, exert thy power to save,
Deep on the heart these truths engrave
The ponderous load of guilt remove,
That trembling lips may sing thy love.

† Compare verse 6.

HYMN CXLIX.

The backslider recollecting himself in his affliction. Hosea ii. 6, 7.

1 The Lord, how kind are all his ways
When most they seem severe!

He frowns, and scourges, and rebukes,
That we may learn his fear.

2 With thorns he fences up our path,
And builds a wall around,
To guard us from the death, that lurks
In sin's forbidden ground.

3 When other lovers, sought in vain,
Our fond address despise,
He opens his indulgent arms
With pity in his eyes.

4 Return, ye wandering souls, return,
And seek his tender breast;
Call back the memory of the days
When there you found your rest.

5 Behold, O Lord, we fly to thee,
Though blushes veil our face,
Constrained our last retreat to seek
In thy much injured grace.

HYMN CL

The advantages of seeking the knowledge of God. Hosea vi. 3.

1 Shine forth, eternal source* of light,
And make thy glories known;
Fill our enlarged adoring sight
With lustre all thy own.

2 Vain are the charms, and faint the rays
The brightest creatures boast;
And all their grandeur and their praise
Is in thy presence lost.

3 To know the Author of our frame
Is our sublimest skill:
True science is to read thy name,
True life to obey thy will.

4 For this I long, for this I pray,
And following on pursue,
Till visions of eternal day
Fix and complete the view.

HYMN CLI

Inconstancy in religion. Hosea vi. 4.

1 Perpetual source of light and grace,
We hail thy sacred name
Through every year's revolving round
Thy goodness is the same.

2 On us, all worthless as we are,
Its wondrous mercy pours;
Sure as the heaven's established course,
And plenteous as the showers.

3 Inconstant service we repay,
And treacherous vows renew;
False as the morning's scattering cloud
And transient as the dew.

4 In flowing tears our guilt we mourn,
And loud implore thy grace,
To bear our feeble footsteps on
In all thy righteous ways.

5 Armed with this energy divine,
Our souls shall steadfast move,
And with increasing transports press
On to thy courts above.

6 So by thy power the morning sun
Pursues his radiant way,
Brightens each moment in his race,
And shines to perfect day.

HYMN CLII

Gratitude the spring of true religion. Hosea xi. 4.

1 My God, what silken cords are thine!
How soft, and yet how strong!
While power, and truth, and love combine
To draw our souls along.

2 Thou sawest us crushed beneath the yoke
Of Satan and of sin;
Thy hand the iron bondage broke
Our worthless hearts to win.

3 The guilt of twice ten thousand sins
One moment takes away,
And grace, when first the war begins,
Secures the crowning day.

4 Comfort through all this vale of tears
In rich profusion flows,
And glory of unnumbered years
Eternity bestows.

5 Drawn by such cords we onward move,
Till round thy throne we meet;
And captives in the chains of love,
Embrace our Conqueror's feet.

HYMN CLIII

The relentings of God's heart over his backsliding people. Hosea xi. 7, 8, 9.

1 Ye sinners, on backsliding bent,
God's gracious call attend;
Shall not compassion so divine
Each stubborn spirit bend?

2 "How shall I give mine Israel up
To ruin and despair!
How pour down showers of flaming wrath,
And make a Sodom there!

3 "My bowels strong relentings feel,
My heart is pained within
I will not all my wrath exert,
Nor visit all their sin.

* Fountain, or origin?

4 "The mercy of a God restrains
The thunders of his hand:
Come, seek protection from that power,
Which you can ne'er withstand."

5 With trembling haste, O God, to thee
Let sinners wing their flight;
As doves, when birds of prey pursue,
Down on their windows light.

6 Father, we seek thy gracious arm,
All melted at thy voice:
O may thy heart, that feels our woes,
In our return rejoice.

HYMN CLIV.

God's controversy by fire, Amos iv. 11.

On occasion of a dreadful Fire.

1 Eternal God, our humbled souls
Before thy presence bow:
With all thy magazines of wrath,
How terrible art thou!

2 Fanned by thy breath, whole sheets of flame
Do like a deluge pour;
And all our confidence of wealth
Lies mouldered in an hour.

3 Led on by thee in horrid pomp,
Destruction rears its head;
And blackened walls, and smoking heaps,
Through all the street are spread.

4 Lord, in the dust we lay us down,
And mourn thy righteous ire;*
Yet bless the hand of guardian love,
That snatched us from the fire.

5 O that the hateful dregs of sin
Like dross had perished there,
That in fair lines our purged souls
Might thy bright image bear.

6 So shall we view with dauntless eyes
The last tremendous day,
When earth and seas, and stars and skies,
In flames shall melt away.

HYMN CLV.

Britain unreformed by remarkable deliverances.
Amos iv. 11.

For a Fast-day.

1 Yes, Britain seemed to ruin doomed,
Just like a burning brand;
Till snatched from hence surrounding flames
By God's indulgent hand.

2 "Once more (he says) I will suppress
The wrath, that sin would wake;
Once more my patience shall attend,
And call my Britain back."

3 But who this clemency reverses?
Or feels this melting grace?
Who stirs his languid spirit up
To seek thine awful face?

4 On days like these we pour our cries
And at thy feet we mourn;
Then rise to tempt thy wrath again,
And to our sins return.

5 Our nation far from God remains,
Far, as in distant years;
And the small remnant that is found,
A dying aspect wears.

6 Chastened and rescued thus in vain,
Thy righteous hand severe
Into the flames might hurl us back,
And quite consume us there.

7 So, by the light our burning gives,
Might neighbouring nations read,
How terrible thy judgments are,
And learn our guilt to dread.

8 Yet 'midst the cry of sins like ours,
Incline thy gracious ear;
And thy own children's feeble cry
With soft compassion hear.

9 O by the sacred Spirit's breath
Kindle a holy flame;
Refine the land thou mightst destroy,
And magnify thy name.

HYMN CLVI.

Preparing to meet God. Amos iv. 12, 13.

1 He comes, thy God, O Israel, comes;
Prepare thy God to meet:
Meet him in battle's force arrayed,
Or humbled at his feet.

2 He formed the mountains by his strength;
He makes the winds to blow;
And all the secret thoughts of man
Must his Creator know.

3 He shades the morning's opening rays:
He shakes the solid world;
And stars and angels from their seats
Are by his thunder hurled.

4 Eternal Sovereign of the skies,
And shall thine Israel dare
In mad rebellion to arise,
And tempt the unequal war?

5 Lo, nations tremble at thy frown,
And faint beneath thy rod;
Crushed by its gentle movement down,
They fall, tremendous God.

* Ange

6 Avert the terrors of thy wrath.
And let thy mercy shine;
While humble penitence and prayer
Approve us truly thine.

HYMN CLVII.

Jonah's faith recommended. Jonah ii. 4.

1 LORD, we have broke thy holy laws,
And slighted all thy grace;
And justly thy vindictive* wrath
Might cast us from thy face.

2 Yet while such precedents appear
Marked in thy sacred book,
We from these depths of guilt and fear
Will to thy temple look.

3 To thee, in our Redeemer's name,
We raise our humble cries;
May these our prayers, perfumed by him,
Like grateful incense rise.

4 O never may our hopeless eyes
An absent God deplore,
Where the dear temples of thy love
Shall stand revealed no more.

5 Far from those regions of despair
Appoint our souls a place,
Where not a frown through endless years
Shall veil thy lovely face.

HYMN CLVIII.

God's controversy with Britain stated and pleaded.
Micah vi. 1—3.

For a Fast-day.

1 LISTEN, ye hills; ye mountains, hear;
Jehovah vindicates his laws:
Trembling in silence at his bar,
Thou earth, attend thy Maker's cause.

2 Israel, appear; present thy plea;
And charge the Almighty to his face;
Say, if his rules oppressive be;
Say, if defective be his grace.

3 Eternal Judge, the action cease;
Our lips are sealed in conscious shame;
'Tis ours, in sackcloth to confess,
And thine, the sentence to proclaim.

4 Ten thousand witnesses arise,
Thy mercies, and our crimes appear,
More than the stars that deck the skies,
And all our dreadful guilt declare.

5 How shall we come before thy face,
And in thine awful presence bow?
What offers can secure thy grace,
Or calm the terrors of thy brow?

6 Thousands of rams in vain might bleed
Rivers of oil might blaze in vain,
Or the first-born's devoted head
With horrid gore thine altar stain.

7 But thy own Lamb, all gracious God,
Whom impious sinners dared to slay,
Hath sovereign virtue in his blood
To purge the nation's guilt away.

8 With humble faith to that we fly;
With that be Britain sprinkled o'er;
Trembling no more in dust we lie,
And dread thy hand and bar no more.

HYMN CLIX.

Hearing the voice of God's rod. Micah vi. 9.

1 ATTEND, my soul, with reverent awe,
The dictates of thy God;
Silent and trembling hear the voice
Of his appointed rod.

2 Now let me search and try my ways,
And prostrate seek his face,
Conscious of guilt before his throne
In dust my soul abase.

3 Teach me, my God, what 's yet unknown,
And all my crimes forgive;
Those crimes would I no more repeat,
But to thy honour live.

4 My withered joys too plainly show,
That all on earth is vain;
In God my wounded heart confides
True rest and bliss to gain.

5 Father, I wait thy gracious call,
To leave this mournful land,
And bathe in rivers of delight,
That flow at thy right hand.

HYMN CLX.

God's incomparable mercy celebrated. Micah vii. 18, 19, 20.

1 SEE! LORD, in mercy, who shall dare
With thy compassion to compare?
For thy own sake wilt thou forgive,
And bid the trembling sinner live.

2 Millions of our transgressions past
Cancelled behind thy back are cast;
Thy grace, a sea without a shore,
O'erflows them, and they rise no more.

3 And lest new legions should invade
And make the pardoned souls afraid,
Our inbred lusts thou wilt subdue
And form degenerate hearts anew.

* Avenging.

1 Our leader God, our songs proclaim:
We lift our banners in his name;
With songs of triumph forth we go,
And level the gigantic foe.

5 His truth to Jacob shall prevail;
His oath to Abraham cannot fail:
The hope of saints in ancient days,
Which ages yet unborn shall praise.

HYMN CLXI.

The impoverished saint rejoicing in God. Hab. iii. 17, 18.

1 So firm the saint's foundations stand,
Nor can his hopes remove;
Sustained by God's almighty hand,
And sheltered in his love.

2 Fig-trees and olive-plants may fail,
And vines their fruit deny,
Famine through all his fields prevail,
And flocks and herds may die.

3 God is the treasure of his soul,
A source of sacred joy;
Which no affliction can control,
Nor death itself destroy.

4 Lord, may we feel thy charming beams,
And taste thy saints' repose,
We will not mourn the perished streams,
While such a fountain flows.

HYMN CLXII.

God's afflicted poor trusting in his name. Zeph. iii. 12.

1 Praise to the Sovereign of the sky,
Who from his lofty throne
Looks down on all that humble lie,
And calls such souls his own.

2 The haughty sinner he disdains,
Though gems his temples crown;
And from the seat of pomp and pride
His vengeance hurls him down.

3 On his afflicted pious poor
He makes his face to shine:
He fills their cottages of clay
With lustre all divine.

4 Among the meanest of thy flock
There let my dwelling be,
Rather than under gilded roofs,
If absent, Lord, from thee.

5 Poor and afflicted though we are,
In thy strong name we trust;
And bless the hand of sovereign love,
Which lifts us from the dust.

HYMN CLXIII.

God comforting and rejoicing over Zion. Zeph. iii. 16, 17.

1 Yes, 'tis the voice of love divine!
And O! how sweet the accents sound!
Afflicted Zion, rise and shine,
Fair mourner, prostrate on the ground.

2 The mighty God, thy glorious King,
Tender to pity, strong to save,
Hath sworn he will salvation bring,
Though sorrow press me to the grave.

3 He all a father's pleasure knows
To fold thee in his dear embrace:
His heart with secret joy o'erflows,
And cheerful smiles adorn his face.

4 At length the inward ecstasy
In heavenly music breaks its way;*
Jehovah leads the harmony,
And angels teach their harps the lay.†

5 Fain would my lips the chorus‡ join,
And tell the listening world my joys,
But condescension so divine
In silence swallows up my voice.

HYMN CLXIV.

Practical reflections on the state of our fathers Zech. i. 5.

1 How swift the torrent rolls,
That bears us to the sea!
The tide that bears our thoughtless souls
To vast eternity!

2 Our fathers, where are they,
With all they called their own?
Their joys and griefs, and hopes and cares
And wealth and honour gone.

3 But joy or grief succeeds
Beyond our mortal thought,
While the poor remnant of their dust
Lies in the grave forgot.

4 There, where the fathers lie,
Must all the children dwell;
Nor other heritage possess,
But such a gloomy cell.

5 God of our fathers, hear,
Thou everlasting Friend!
While we, as on life's utmost verge,§
Our souls to thee commend.

6 Of all the pious dead
May we the footsteps trace,
Till with them in the land of light
We dwell before thy face.

* See the marginal reading. † Song.
‡ Company of singers. § Edge or border.

HYMN CLXV.

Joshua the high priest's change of raiment, applied to Christian privileges. Zech. iii. 4.

1 Eternal King, thy robes are white
In spotless rays of heavenly light;
Adoring angels round are seen,
Yet in thy presence are not clean.

2 What then are we, the sons of earth,
That draw pollution from our birth?
Our fleshly garments, Lord, how mean!
O'erspread with hateful spots of sin.

3 Hail to that condescending grace,
Which shows a Saviour's righteousness!
Eternal honours to that name,
Which covers all our guilt and shame!

4 His blood, an overflowing sea,
Shall purge our deepest stains away:
Our souls, renewed by grace divine,
Shall in their Lord's resemblance shine.

5 Yet, while these rags of flesh we wear,
Pollution will again appear:
Come, death, and ease me of the load;
Come, death, and bear my soul to God.

6 The King of heaven will there bestow
A richer robe than monarchs know;
Dress all his saints in glittering white;
Not Joshua's mitre shone so bright.

7 The grave its trophies shall resign,
Christ will the mouldering dust refine;
And death, the last of foes, shall be
Swallowed and lost in victory.

8 My faith, on towering pinions borne,
Anticipates that glorious morn;
And, with celestial raptures strong,
Gives mortal lips the immortal song.

HYMN CLXVI.

Joshua the high priest's zeal and fidelity rewarded with a station among the angels. Zech. iii. 6, 7.

For the Ordination of a Minister

1 Great Lord of angels, we adore
The grace, that builds thy courts below,
And through ten thousand sons of light,
Stoops to regard what mortals do.

2 Amidst the wastes of time and death
Successive pastors thou dost raise,
Thy charge to keep, thy house to guide,
And form a people for thy praise.

3 The heavenly natives with delight
Hover around the sacred place;
Nor scorn to learn from mortal tongues
The wonders of redeeming grace.

4 At length, dismissed from feeble clay,
Thy servants join the angelic band;
With them through distant worlds they fly,
With them before thy presence stand.

5 O glorious hope! O blest employ!
Sweet lenitive* of grief and care!
When shall we reach those radiant courts,
And all their joy and honour share!

6 Yet while these labours we pursue,
Thus distant from thy heavenly throne,
Give us a zeal and love like theirs,
And half their heaven shall here be known.

HYMN CLXVII.

The completing of the spiritual temple. Zech. iv. 7.

1 Sing to the Lord above,
Who deigns on earth to raise
A temple to his love,
A monument of praise.
Ye saints around,
Through all its frame,
The builder's name
Harmonious sound.

2 He formed the glorious plan,
And its foundation laid,
That God might dwell with man,
And mercy be displayed.
His Son he sent,
Who, great and good,
Made his own blood
The sweet cement.

3 Beneath his eye and care
The edifice shall rise
Majestic, strong, and fair,
And shine above the skies.
There shall he place
The polished stone,
Ordained to crown
This work of grace.

HYMN CLXVIII.

The error of despising the day of small things. Zech. iv. 10.

1 "What haughty scorner," saith the Lord,
"Shall humble things despise,
When he beholds them with delight,
Who reigns beyond the skies!

2 "I from a chaos dark and wild
Made heavens bright host appear:
I from the small unnoticed seeds
The loftiest cedars rear.

3 "From Eden's dust I Adam formed,
The noblest human frame:

* What easeth or assuageth. * Genesis i. 1-7.

And in his humble sons display
The honours of my name.

4 "From fishermen, in number few,
In human arts untaught,
All the wild realms my church can boast,
My potent hand hath brought.

5 "The pious poor, by men despised,
In dearest bonds are mine;
Once hardly drest in humble weeds,*
They now like angels shine."

6 Lord, if such trophies raised from dust
Thy sovereign glory be,
Here in my heart thy power may find
Materials fit for thee.

HYMN CLXIX.

Prisoners delivered from the pit by the blood of the covenant. Zech. ix. 11.

1 Ye prisoners, who in bondage lie,
In darkness and the pit,
Behold the grace that sets us free,
And to that grace submit.

2 The tidings of deliverance hear,
Confess the covenant good,
And bless the ransom God hath found
In our Emanuel's blood.

3 Justice no more asserts its claim
Your forfeit lives to take;
But smiling mercy quick descends
Your heavy chains to break.

4 We walk at large, and sing the hand,
To which we freedom owe;
And drink those rivers with delight,
Which through this desert flow.

5 He, that hath liberty bestowed,
Will give a kingdom too;
He, that hath loosed the bonds of death,
The path of life will show.

HYMN CLXX.

The fountain of life. Zech. xiii. 1.

1 Hail, everlasting spring!
Celestial fountain, hail!
Thy streams salvation bring,
The waters never fail;
Still they endure,
And still they flow,
For all our woe
A sovereign cure.

2 Blest be his wounded side,
And blest his bleeding heart,
Who all in anguish died
Such favours to impart.

His sacred blood
Shall make us clean
From every sin,
And fit for God.

3 To that dear source of love
Our souls this day would come:
And thither from above,
Lord, call the nations home;
That Jew and Greek
With rapturous songs
On all their tongues
Thy praise may speak.

HYMN CLXXI.

God's name profaned when his table is treated with contempt. Mal. i. 12.

Applied to the Lord's Supper

1 My God, and is thy table spread?
And does thy cup with love o'erflow?
Thither be all thy children led,
And let them all its sweetness know.

2 Hail, sacred feast, which Jesus makes!
Rich banquet of his flesh and blood!
Thrice happy he, who here partakes
That sacred stream, that heavenly food!

3 Why are its dainties all in vain
Before unwilling hearts displayed?
Was not for you the victim slain?
Are you forbid the children's bread?

4 O let thy table honoured be,
And furnished well with joyful guests,
And may each soul salvation see,
That here its sacred pledges taste.

5 Let crowds approach with hearts prepared,
With hearts inflamed let all attend;
Nor, when we leave our Father's board,
The pleasure or the profit end.

6 Revive thy dying churches, Lord,
And bid our drooping graces live;
And more that energy afford,
A Saviour's blood alone can give.

HYMN CLXXII.

God's gracious regard to active attempts to revive religion. Mal. iii. 16, 17.

1 The Lord on mortal worms looks down,
From his celestial throne;
And, when the wicked swarm around,
He well discerns his own.

2 He sees the tender hearts, that mourn
The scandals of the times;
And join their efforts to oppose
The wide prevailing crimes.

3 Low to the social band he bows
His still attentive ear;

* Garments.

And, while his angels sing around,
Delights their voice to hear.

4 The chronicles of heaven shall keep
Their words in transcript fair,
In the Redeemer's book of life
Their names recorded are.

5 "Yes, (saith the Lord,) the world shall know
These humble souls are mine:
These, when my jewels I produce
Shall in full lustre shine.

6 "When deluges of fiery wrath
My foes away shall bear,
That hand, which strikes the wicked through,
Shall all my children spare."

HYMN CLXXIII.

Christ the Sun of righteousness. Mal. iv. 2.

1 To thee, O God, we homage pay,
Source of the light that rules the day;
Who, while he gilds all nature's frame,
Reflects thy rays, and speaks thy name.

2 In louder strains we sing that grace,
Which gives the Sun of righteousness;
Whose noble light salvation brings,
And scatters healing from his wings.

3 Still on our hearts may Jesus shine:
With beams of light and love divine;
Quickened by him our souls shall live,
And cheered by him shall grow and thrive.

4 O may his glories stand confessed
From north to south, from east to west:
Successful may his gospel run,
Wide as the circuit of the sun.

5 When shall that radiant scene arise,
When fixed on high in purer skies,
Christ all his lustre shall display
On all his saints through endless day!

HYMNS

ON VARIOUS TEXTS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.

HYMN CLXXIV.

The axe laid to the root of unfruitful trees. Matt. iii. 13.

1 The Lord into his vineyard comes
Our various fruit to see:
His eye, more piercing than the light,
Examines every tree.

2 Tremble, ye sinners, at his frown,
If barren still ye stand;
And fear that keenly-wounding axe,
Which arms his awful hand.

3 Close to the root behold it laid,
To make destruction sure:
Who can resist the mighty stroke
Or who the fire endure?

4 Lord, we adore thy sparing love,
Thy long-expecting grace:
Else had we low in ruin fallen,
And known no more our place.

5 Succeeding years thy patience waits;
Nor let it wait in vain;
But form in us abundant fruit,
And still this fruit maintain.

HYMN CLXXV.

The light of good examples, the means of leading others to glorify God. Matt. v. 16.

1 Great Teacher of thy church below
Thy precepts all divinely wise:
O may thy mighty power be shown
To fix them still before our eyes.

2 Deep on our hearts thy law engrave,
And fill our breasts with heavenly zeal,
That, while we trust thy power to save,
We may that sacred law fulfil.

3 Adorned with every heavenly grace,
May our examples brightly shine,
And the sweet lustre of thy face
Reflected beam from each of them.

4 These lineaments,* divinely fair,
Our heavenly Father shall proclaim;
And men, that view his image there,
Shall join to glorify his name.

HYMN CLXXVI.

Providential bounties surveyed and improved. Matt. v. 45.

1 Father of Lights, we sing thy name,
Who kindlest up the lamp of day;†
Wide as he spreads his golden flame,
His beams thy power and love display.

2 Fountain of good, from thee proceed
The copious drops of genial‡ rain,
Which through the hills, and through the meads,
Revive the grass, and swell the grain.

3 Through the wide world thy bounties spread;
Yet millions of our guilty race,
Though by thy daily bounty fed,
Affront thy law, and spurn thy grace.

4 Not so may our forgetful hearts
O'erlook the tokens of thy care;
But, what thy liberal hand imparts,
Still own in praise, still ask in prayer.

5 So shall our suns more grateful shine,
And showers in sweeter drops shall fall,
When all our hearts and lives are thine,
And thou, our God, enjoyed in all.

6 Jesus, our brighter sun, arise;
In plenteous showers thy Spirit send;
Earth then shall grow a paradise,
And in the heavenly Eden end.

HYMN CLXXVII.

Secret prayer. Matt. vi. 6.

1 Father divine, thy piercing eye
Shoots through the darkest night;
In deep retirement thou art nigh;
With heart-discerning sight.

2 There shall that piercing eye survey
My duteous homage paid,
With every morning's dawning ray,
And every evening's shade.

3 O may thy own celestial fire
The incense still inflame:
While my warm vows to thee aspire,
Through my Redeemer's name.

4 So shall the visits of thy love
My soul in secret bless;
So shalt thou deign in worlds above
Thy suppliant to confess.

* Lineaments. † The sun. ‡ Making fruitful.

HYMN CLXXVIII.

Seeking first the kingdom of God, &c. Matt. vi.

1 Now let a true ambition rise,
And ardour fire our breast,
To reign in worlds above the skies,
In heavenly glories drest.

2 Behold Jehovah's royal hand
A radiant crown display,
Whose gems with vivid lustre shine,
While stars and suns decay.

3 Away, each grovelling anxious care,
Beneath a Christian's thought;
I spring to seize immortal joys,
Which my Redeemer bought.

4 Ye hearts with youthful vigour warm,
The glorious prize pursue;
Nor shall ye want the goods of earth,
While heaven is kept in view.

HYMN CLXXIX.

Pardon spoken by Christ. Matt. ix. 2

1 My Saviour, let me hear thy voice,
Pronounce these words of peace;
And all my warmest powers shall join
To celebrate the grace.

2 With gentle smiles call me thy child,
And speak my sins forgiven;
The accents mild shall charm mine ear
All like the harps of heaven.

3 Cheerful, where'er thy hand shall lead
The darkest path I'll tread;
Cheerful I'll quit these mortal shores,
And mingle with the dead.

4 When dreadful guilt is done away,
No other fears we know;
That hand, that scatters pardons down,
Shall crowns of life bestow.

HYMN CLXXX.

The relapsing demoniac. Matt. xii. 43–45.

1 Sovereign of heaven, thine empire spreads
O'er all the worlds on high:
And at thy frowns the infernal powers
In wild confusion fly.

2 Like lightning from his glittering throne
The great arch-traitor fell,
Driven with enormous ruin down
To infamy and hell.

3 Permitted now to range at large,
And traverse§ earth and air,
O'er captive human souls he reigns,
And boasts his kingdom there.

§ Wander through.

4 Yet thence thy grace can drive him out
With one Almighty word:
O send thy potent sceptre forth,
And reign victorious, Lord.

5 Let wretched prisoners be released
The smiling light to view;
Nor let the vanquished foe return,
Their bondage to renew.

6 May grace complete that wondrous work,
Which thy own power begun,
And fill, from Satan's gloomy realms,
The kingdom of thy Son.

HYMN CLXXXI.

The faith of the Syrophœnician woman recommended. Matt. xv. 26, 27.

1 All-conquering faith, how high it rose,
When heaven itself might seem to oppose!
All-gracious Lord, who didst appear
Most merciful, when most severe!

2 Thus at thy feet our souls would fall
And loudly thus for mercy call,
"Thou Son of David, pity show,
And save us from the infernal foe."

3 Though viler than the brutes we be,
Our longing eyes would wait on thee;
Who dost to dogs this grace afford,
To taste thy crumbs beneath thy board.

4 But thou the humble soul wilt raise,
And all its sorrows turn to praise,
Each self-abasing broken heart,
Shall with thy children share a part.

HYMN CLXXXII.

The church built on a rock, and secured against the gates of hell. Matt. xvi. 18.

1 Now let the gates of Zion sing,
And challenge all her spiteful foes;
She triumphs in her Saviour-king,
In him, who from the dead arose.

2 He is the rock, on whom we rest,
And firm on that foundation stand,
Divine compassion fills his breast,
His word is sure, and strong his hand.

3 Hell and its host may rage in vain;
Vain are their counsels and their power;
Grim death may marshal all his train,
And boast the conquest of an hour.

4 Breathless and pale his servants lie,
And know their former place no more;
Their children raise his praises high,
And o'er their fathers' dust adore.

5 Their fathers' dust the Lord shall raise,
And burst the barriers of the grave;
Parents and children join his praise,
Who through eternity can save.

HYMN CLXXXIII.

Christ's transfiguration. Matt. xvii. 1.

1 When at this distance, Lord, we trace
The various glories of thy face,
What transport pours o'er all our breast,
And charms our cares and woes to rest!

2 With thee in the obscurest cell
On some bleak mountain would I dwell,
Rather than pompous courts behold,
And share their grandeur and their gold.

3 Away, ye dreams of mortal joy!
Raptures divine my thoughts employ!
I see the King of glory shine,
And feel his love, and call him mine.

4 On Tabor* thus his servants viewed
His lustre, when transformed he stood:
And, bidding earthly scenes farewell,
Cried, "Lord, 'tis pleasant here to dwell."

5 Yet still our elevated eyes
To nobler visions long to rise;
That grand assembly would we join,
Where all thy saints around thee shine.

6 That mount how bright! those fields how fair!
'Tis good to dwell for ever there:
Come death, dear envoy† of my God,
And bear me to that blest abode.

HYMN CLXXXIV.

The grace of Christ is sufficient for us, and shines for us. Matt. xx. 28.

1 Saviour, of mercy, and Lord of love,
How sweet thy gracious name
With joy that errand we review,
On which thy mercy came.

2 While all thy own angelic bands
Stood waiting on the wing,
Charmed with the honour to obey
The word of such a King,

3 For us mean, wretched, sinful men
Thou hadst that glory lay,
First in our mortal flesh to serve
Then in that flesh to die.

4 Bought with thy service and thy blood
We doubly, Lord, are thine;
To thee our lives we would devote,
To thee our death resign.

* The mount on which Christ was transfigured.
† Messenger or ambassador.

4 Blest man, who in thy cause consumes
His vigorous days with zeal!
Then with the last slow ebb of blood
Is called thy truth to seal!

HYMN CLXXXV.

Christ's compassionate readiness to gather souls. Matt. xxiii. 37, 38.

1 See how the Lord of mercy spreads
His gentle hands abroad;
And warns us of the circling foes,
That thirst to drink our blood!

2 "Fly to the shelter of mine arms,
And dwell secure from fear;
Nor earth nor hell shall pluck you thence,
Or reach and wound you there."

3 With anxious heart the parent-bird
Thus calls her offspring round,
When horrid vultures beat the air,
And slaughter stains the ground.

4 The trembling brood, by nature taught,
Fly to the known retreat,
Beneath her downy wings are safe,
And find the shelter sweet.

5 But men, alas! more thoughtless men,
Refuse to lend an ear;
Their only refuge madly fly,
And rather die than hear.

6 They spurn the Saviour's offered grace,
Till they his wrath inflame;
Then desolation lays them low
In agony and shame.

HYMN CLXXXVI.

The abounding of iniquity, and coldness of Christ's love. Matt. xxiv. 12.

Isa's Fast day.

1 Alas for Britain, and her sons!
What hath she not to fear!
The sins, that ruined Sodom once,
O how triumphant here!

2 Alas the strong o'erflowing tide!
How fiercely doth it rage!
And each foreboding symptom joins
In terrible presage.

3 Yet who hath eyes that can discern!
Or who an ear to hear!
Whose heart is trembling for the ark!
Or for his country dear!

4 Cold is the love of Christian breast
If Christian breasts remain;
And dying the last sparks of zeal
Or its last efforts vain.

5 O Britain, oft chastised and saved,
What shall the end be found?
Shall not the sword, that waves so long,
Inflict the deeper wound?

6 O stay thine arm, all-gracious God,
Thy Spirit largely pour;
He can the streams of guilt restrain,
And dying love restore.

HYMN CLXXXVII.

The final sentence, and happiness of the righteous. Matt. xxv. 34.

1 Attend, mine ear, my heart, to hear,
While Jesus from his throne,
Begirt with all the angelic hosts,
Makes his last sentence known.

2 When sinners, cursed from his face,
To raging flames are driven,
His voice, with melody divine,
Thus calls his saints to heaven.

3 "Blest of my Father, all draw near,
Receive the large reward;
And rise with raptures to possess
The kingdom love prepared.

4 "Ere earth's foundations first were laid,
This sovereign purpose wrought,
And reared those palaces divine,
To which you now are brought.

5 "There shall you reign unnumbered years
Protected by my power,
While sin and hell, and pains and cares
Shall vex your souls no more."

6 Come, dear majestic Saviour, come,
This jubilee proclaim,
And teach us accents fit to praise
So great, so dear a name.

HYMN CLXXXVIII.

Redeeming Christ to his poor saints. Matt. xxv. 40.

1 Jesus, my Lord, how rich thy grace!
Thy bounties how complete!
How shall I count the matchless sum!
How pay the mighty debt!

2 High on a throne of radiant light
Dost thou exalted shine;
What can my poverty bestow,
When all the worlds are thine!

3 But thou hast brethren here below,
The partners of thy grace,
And wilt confess their humble names
Before thy Father's face.

4 In them thou mayst be clothed and fed,
And visited and cheered.

And in their accents of distress
My Saviour's voice is heard

5 Thy face with reverence and with love
I in thy poor would see:
O, rather let me beg my bread,
Than hold it back from thee.

HYMN CLXXXIX.

The final sentence and misery of the wicked. Matt. xxv. 41.

1 And will the Judge descend?
And must the dead arise?
And not a single soul escape
His all-discerning eyes?

2 And from his righteous lips
Shall such a sentence sound?
And through the millions of the damned
Spread black despair around?

3 "Depart from me, accursed,
To everlasting flame,
For rebel angels first prepared,
Where mercy never came."

4 How will my heart endure
The terrors of that day,
When earth and heaven before his face
Astonished shrink away?

5 But ere that trumpet shakes
The mansions of the dead,
Hark! from the gospel's gentle voice
What joyful tidings spread!

6 Ye sinners, seek his grace,
Whose wrath ye cannot bear;
Fly to the shelter of his cross,
And find salvation there.

7 So shall that curse remove
By which the Saviour bled,
And the last awful day shall pour
His blessings on your head.

HYMN CXC.

Christ's submission to his Father's will. Matt. xxvi. 42.

1 "Father divine," (the Saviour cried,
While horrors pressed on every side,
And prostrate on the ground he lay,)
"Remove this bitter cup away.

2 "But if these pangs must still be borne,
Or helpless man be left forlorn,
I bow my soul before thy throne,
And say, Thy will, not mine, be done.'

3 Thus our submissive souls would bow,
And, taught by Jesus, lie as low;
Our hearts, and not our lips alone,
Would say, Thy will, not ours, be done.

4 Then, though like him to dust we be,
We'll view the blissful moment nigh,
Which, from our portion in his pains,
Calls to the joy in which he reigns.

HYMN CXCI.

Reflections on the disciples forsaking Christ when he was betrayed. Matt. xxvi. 56.

1 Behold the Son of God's delight
His smiles how sweet! his rays how bright!
A friend of tenderness unknown:
To the last breath he loved his own.

2 But lo, his friends, his brethren dear,
Fled, when they saw his danger near;
And not one generous heart remains
To shield his life, or share his pains.

3 So frail is man; so frail are we,
When unsupported, Lord, by thee;
Thus shrinks our faith; thus droops our love;
And thus our vows abortive prove.

4 Blest Jesus, thy own power impart,
And bind in cords of love my heart
The fugitive no more shall flee,
But keep through death its hold on thee.

HYMN CXCII.

Christ's complaint of his Father's forsaking him on the cross. Matt. xxvii. 46.

1 What doleful accents do I hear?
What piercing cry invades mine ear!
Loaded with shame, and bathed in blood,
Who calls to a forsaking God?

2 Amazing and heart-rending sight!
'Tis his own darling and delight,
Who once in his embraces lay,
Dearer than all the sons of day!

3 Yet when this Jesus died for me,
Distended on the cursed tree,
God stood afar, nor would afford
One pitying look, one cheering word.

4 What then, my soul, must there have felt,
If pressed with all thy load of guilt,
Beneath whose weight the Saviour cries,
Who formed the earth, and built the skies?

5 But in that dark tremendous hour
Unconquered faith exerts its power;
My God, my Father, cried aloud,
And heaven the endearing name avowed.

6 From death, from earth, he raised his Son,
And gave him for his cross a throne;
Triumphant there the sufferer reigns,
And reaps the harvest of his pains.

7 Eternal raptures there are known
Nor flows the joy on him alone,
But for his sake the Lord hath sworn
To leave the meanest saint no more.

HYMN CXCIII.

The same. Matt. xxvii. 40.

1 My Saviour, didst thou die for me
For me send forth that bitter cry?
With bleeding heart thy wounds I see,
Prepared at thy command to die.

2 By all thine anguish on the cross,
When God thy Father stood afar,
Rich in thy temporary loss,
Thy church is brought for ever near.

3 From far the beamings of thy throne
Revived my sympathizing heart
Thy love made sinners' griefs thy own
Mine in thy joys must take its part.

4 Midst all the splendours of thy reign
Think on the sorrows thou hast felt;
Nor let a mourner weep in vain,
For whom thy precious blood was spilt.

5 While through earth's darkest gloom I trace,
Dart to my soul a cheering ray;
And on the confines of the dead,
Thy power, as Lord of life, display.

HYMN CXCIV.

The angel's reply to the women that sought Christ.
Matt. xxvii. 5, 6.

1 Ye humble souls, that seek the Lord,
Chase all your fears away,
And bow with pleasure down to see
The place where Jesus lay.

2 Thus low the Lord of life was brought
Such wonders love can do;
Thus cold in death that bosom lay,
Which throbbed and bled for you.

3 A moment give a loose to grief
Let grateful sorrows rise,
And wash the bloody stains away
With torrents from your eyes.

4 Then raise your eyes, and tune your songs
The Saviour lives again,
Not all the bolts and bars of death
The Conqueror could detain.

5 High o'er the angelic bands he soars
His once dishonoured head;
And through unnumbered years he reigns
Who dwelt among the dead.

6 With joy like his shall every saint
His empty tomb survey;
There rise with his ascending Lord
Through all his shining way.

HYMN CXCV.

Christ ever present with his ministers and churches.
Matt. xxviii. 20.

1 While o'er all worlds the Saviour reigns
Unmoved his power and Love remains;
And on his arm his church shall rest
Fair Zion, joyful in her King,
Through every changing age shall sing
With his perpetual presence blest.

2 Tyrannic death, in vain thy rage,
Thy triumphs new in every age,
O'er the first heroes of his host;
Conscious of more than mortal aid,
Our bleeding hearts are not dismayed
But an immortal Leader boast.

3 Though buried deep in dust they lie,
Whose tuneful voices raised on high
Led the sweet anthems to his name;
The children learn the fathers' song,
And unformed tongues shall still prolong
The ever-present Saviour's fame.

4 The present Saviour, he shall give Millions of future saints to live,
And crowd the temples of his grace:
The present Saviour, lo, he comes
To call whole legions from their tombs,
And teach their dust sublimer praise.

HYMN CXCVI.

Departed saints asleep. Mark v. 39.

1 "Why flow these torrents of distress?"
(The gentle Saviour cries;)
"Why are my sleeping saints surveyed
With unbelieving eyes?

2 "Death's feeble arm shall never boast
A friend of Christ is slain;
Not e'en their meanest part in dust
A lasting power retain.

3 "I come, on wings of love I come,
The slumberers to awake;
My voice shall reach the deepest tomb,
And all its bonds shall break.

4 "Touched by my hand in smiles they rise
They rise to sleep no more;
But robed with light, and crowned with joy
To endless day they soar."

5 Jesus, our faith receives thy word;
And, though fond nature weep,
Grace learns to hail the pious dead
And emulate their sleep.

6 Our willing souls thy summons wait
With them to rest and praise;
So let thy much loved presence cheer
These separating days.

HYMN CXCVII.

The struggle between faith and unbelief. Mark ix. 24.

1 JESUS, our souls' delightful choice,
In thee believing we rejoice;
Yet still our joy is mixed with grief
While faith contends with unbelief.

2 Thy promises our hearts revive,
And keep our fainting hopes alive;
But guilt, and fears, and sorrows rise
And hide the promise from our eyes.

3 O let not sin and Satan boast,
While saints lie mourning in the dust;
Nor see that faith to ruin brought,
Which thy own gracious hand hath wrought.

4 Do thou the dying spark inflame;
Reveal the glories of thy name;
And put all anxious doubts to flight,
As shades dispersed by opening light.

HYMN CXCVIII.

Christ's condescending regard to little children.
Mark x. 14.

1 SEE Israel's gentle Shepherd stand
With all-engaging charms;
Hark how he calls the tender lambs,
And folds them in his arms!

2 "Permit them to approach, he cries;
Nor scorn their humble name;
For 'twas to bless such souls as these,
The Lord of angels came."

3 We bring them, Lord, in thankful hands,
And yield them up to thee:
Joyful, that we ourselves are thine,
Thine let our offspring be.

4 Ye little flock, with pleasure hear,
Ye children, seek his face;
And fly with transports to receive
The blessings of his grace.

5 If orphans they are left behind,
Thy guardian care we trust;
That care shall heal our bleeding hearts
If weeping o'er their dust.

HYMN CXCIX.

Christian watchfulness. Mark xiii. 37.

1 AWAKE, my drowsy soul, awake,
And view the threatening scene:
Legions of foes encamp around,
And treachery lurks within.

2 'Tis not this mortal life alone
These enemies assail
All thine eternal hopes are lost
If their attempts prevail.

3 Now to the work of God awake
Behold thy Master near;
The various arduous task pursue
With vigour and with fear.

4 The awful register goes on,
The account will surely come,
And opening day, or closing night,
May bear me to my doom.

5 Tremendous thought! how deep it strikes!
Yet like a dream it flies,
Till God's own voice the slumbers chase
From these deluded eyes.

HYMN CC.

The nativity of Christ. Luke ii. 10, 12.

1 HAIL, progeny of divine!
Heal, virgin's wondrous son!
Who, for that humble shrine,
Didst quit the Almighty's throne.
The infant Lord,
Our voices sing,
And be the King
Of grace adored.

2 Ye princes, disappear
And boast your crowns no more,
Lay down your sceptres here,
And in the dust adore:
Where Jesus dwells,
The manger bare
In lustre far
Your pomp excels.

3 With Bethlehem's shepherds mild
The angels bow their head;
And round the sacred child
Their guardian wings they spread;
They knew, that where
Their Sovereign lies
In his disguise,
Heaven's court is there.

4 Thither, my soul, repair,
And earthly homage pay
To thy Redeemer's cradle,
As on his natal day.
I kiss thy feet,
And, Lord, would be
A child like thee,
Whom thus I greet.

HYMN CCI.

The angels' song at Christ's birth. Luke ii. 13, 14.

1 Hush! let us swell our tuneful notes
And join the angelic throng;
For angels no such love have known
To awake a cheerful song.

2 Good will to sinful men is shown
And peace on earth is given;
For lo, the incarnate Saviour comes
With messages from heaven.

3 Justice and grace with sweet accord
His rising beams adorn;
Let heaven and earth in concert join,
Now such a child is born.

4 Glory to God in highest strains
In highest worlds be paid;
His glory by our lips proclaimed,
And by our lives displayed.

5 When shall we reach those blissful realms,
Where Christ exalted reigns,
And learn of the celestial choir
Their own immortal strains?

HYMN CCII.

Simeon's song and declaration to the Virgin Mary. Luke ii. 30—35.

1 Our eyes salvation see,
Prepared by grace divine:
How wide its splendours are diffused!
How bright its glories shine!

2 Through distant heathen lands
It darts a vivid* ray,
And to the realms where Satan reigned
Imparts celestial day.

3 The Israel of the Lord
In Christ their glory boast,
And on the honours of his name
Their whole salvation trust.

4 By him shall millions rise
To an immortal crown,
And millions, that his grace despise,
Shall sink in ruin down.

5 Our reckoning is begun,
And on the account will go
Till closed in everlasting joy
Or never ending woe.

HYMN CCIII.

Christ's messenger. Luke iv. 18, 19.

1 Hark the glad sound! the Saviour comes,
The Saviour promised long!
Let every heart prepare a throne,
And every voice a song.

2 On him the Spirit largely poured,
Exerts its sacred fire;
Wisdom and might, and zeal and love,
His holy breast inspire.

3 He comes the prisoners to release
In Satan's bondage held;
The gates of brass before him burst,
The iron fetters yield.

4 He comes from thickest films of vice
To clear the mental ray,
And on the eye-balls of the blind,
To pour celestial day.

5 He comes the broken heart to bind,
The bleeding soul to cure,
And with the treasures of his grace
To enrich the humble poor.

6 His silver trumpets publish loud
The jubilee of the Lord;†
Our debts are all remitted now,
Our heritage restored.

7 Our glad Hosannas, Prince of peace,
Thy welcome shall proclaim;
And heaven's eternal arches ring
With thy beloved name.

HYMN CCIV.

The recovered demoniac, an emblem of a [illegible] sinner. Luke viii. 35.

1 Jesus, we own thy saving power,
And thy victorious hand;
Hell's legions tremble at thy feet,
And fly at thy command.

2 O'er souls, by passion's uproar filled
With anarchy; unknown,
The nobler powers restored by thee,
Ascend their peaceful throne.

3 No more they rend their clothing off;
No more their wounds repeat;
But gentle and composed they wait
Attentive at thy feet.

4 O'er thousands more, where Satan rules,
May we such triumphs see;
And be their rescued souls and ours
Devoted, Lord, to thee.

HYMN CCV.

The good Samaritan. Luke x. 30—37.

1 Father of mercies, send thy grace,
All-powerful from above,
To form in our obedient souls
The image of thy love.

* Lucas.

† Or acceptable year of the Lord, i. e. the year of Divine favour. Lord xiv. 19. Deuteronomy and Isaiah lxi.

2 O may our sympathizing breasts
That generous pleasure know,
Kindly to share in others' joy
And weep for others' woe!

3 When the most helpless sons of grief
In low distress are laid,
Soft be our hearts their pains to feel
And swift our hands to aid.

4 So Jesus looked on dying men,
When throned above the skies,
And 'midst the embraces of his God,
He felt compassion rise.

5 On wings of love the Saviour flew
To ease us from the ground,
And made the richest of his blood
A balm for every wound.

HYMN CCVI

The care of the soul the one thing needful. Luke x. 42.

1 Why will ye lavish out your years
Amidst a thousand trifling cares?
While in this various range of thought
The one thing needful is forgot?

2 Why will ye chase the fleeting wind
And famish an immortal mind,
While angels with regret look down
To see you spurn a heavenly crown?

3 The eternal God calls from above,
And Jesus pleads his bleeding love:
Awakened conscience gives you pain;
And shall they join their pleas in vain?

4 Not so your dying eyes shall view
Those objects, which you now pursue:
Not so shall heaven and hell appear,
When the decisive hour is near.

5 Almighty God, thy power impart
To fix convictions on the heart:
Thy power unveils the blindest eyes,
And makes the haughtiest sinner wise.

HYMN CCVII

Mary's choice of the better part. Luke x. 42.

1 Beset with snares on every hand,
In life's uncertain path I stand:
Saviour divine, diffuse thy light
To guide my doubtful footsteps right.

2 Engage this roving treacherous heart
To fix on Mary's better part,
To scorn the trifles of a day
For joys that none can take away.

3 Then let the wildest storms arise,
Let tempests mingle earth and skies,
No fatal shipwreck shall I fear,
But all my treasures with me bear.

4 If thou, my Jesus, still be nigh,
Cheerful I live, and joyful die
Secure, when mortal comforts flee,
To find ten thousand worlds in thee.

HYMN CCVIII

Christ's little flock comforted with the views of his kingdom. Luke xii. 32.

1 Ye little flock, whom Jesus feeds,
Dismiss your anxious cares;
Look to the Shepherd of your souls
And smile away your fears.

2 Though wolves and lions prowl around
His staff is your defence:
Midst sands and rocks your Shepherd knows
Calls streams and pastures thence.

3 Your Father will a kingdom give,
And give it with delight;
His feeblest child his love shall call
To triumph in his sight.

4 Ten thousand praises, Lord, we bring
For sure supports like these:
And o'er the grave should we sing
Thy living promises.

5 For all we hope, and they enjoy,
We bless a Saviour's name;
Nor shall that stroke disturb the song,
Which breaks this mortal frame.

HYMN CCIX

Preaching how that men must die. Luke xii. 20.

1 Fierce mortal joys, how soon they fade!
How swift they pass away!
The dying flower reclines its head,
The beauty of a day!

2 The bags are rent, the treasures lost,
We fondly called our own:
Scarce could we the possession boast,
And strait we found it gone.

3 But there are joys that cannot die,
Which God laid up in store;
Treasure beyond the changing sky,
Brighter than golden ore.

4 To that my rising heart aspires,
Sooner to soar its rest,
And glories in each wish desires
Of all their wish possessed.

5 The seeds, which piety and love
Have scattered here below,
In the fair fertile fields above
To ample harvests grow.

6 The more my willing hands can give,
At Jesus' feet I lay;
Grace shall the humble gift receive,
And heaven at large repay.

HYMN CCX.

The active Christian. Luke xii. 35–38

1 Ye servants of the Lord,
Each in his office wait,
Observant of his heavenly word
And watchful at his gate.

2 Let all your lamps be bright,
And trim the golden flame;
Gird up your loins, as in his sight,
For awful is his name.

3 Watch, 'tis your Lord's command!
And while we speak, he 's near:
Mark the first signal of his hand,
And ready all appear.

4 O happy servant he
In such a posture found!
He shall his Lord with rapture see,
And be with honour crowned.

5 Christ shall the banquet spread
With his own royal hand,
And raise that favourite servant's head
Amidst the angelic band.

HYMN CCXI.

Room at the gospel feast. Luke xiv. 22.

1 The King of heaven his table spreads,
And dainties crown the board;
Not paradise with all its joys
Could such delight afford.

2 Pardon and peace to dying men,
And endless life are given,
And the rich blood that Jesus shed,
To raise the soul to heaven.

3 Ye hungry poor, that long have strayed
In sin's dark mazes, come:
Come from the hedges and highways,
And grace shall find you room.

4 Millions of souls, in glory now,
Were fed and feasted here;
And millions more, still on the way,
Around the board appear.

5 Yet is his house and heart so large,
That millions more may come:
Nor could the wide assembling world
O'er fill the spacious room.

6 All things are ready; come away,
Nor weak excuses frame;
Crowd to your places at the feast,
And bless the founder's name.

HYMN CCXII.

The present and future state of the saint and sinner compared. Luke xvi. 25.

1 In what confusion earth appears!
God's dearest children bathed in tears
While they, who heaven itself deride,
Riot in luxury and pride.

2 But patient let my soul attend
And, ere I censure, view the end:
That end, how different, who can tell!
The wide extremes of heaven and hell.

3 See the red flames around him twine
Who did in gold and purple shine!
Nor can his tongue one drop obtain
To allay the scorching of his pain.

4 While round the saint, so poor below,
Full rivers of salvation flow:
On Abraham's breast he leans his head,
And banquets on celestial bread.

5 Jesus, my Saviour, let me share
The meanest of thy servants' fare;
May I at last approach to taste
The blessings of thy marriage feast.

HYMN CCXIII.

Rebels against Christ executed. Luke xix. 27.

1 He comes, the royal Conqueror comes;
His legions fill the sky;
Angelic trumpets rend the tombs,
And loud proclaim him nigh.

2 Ye rebel hosts, how vain your rage
Against this sovereign Lord!
What madness bears you on to engage
The terrors of his sword!

3 "Bring forth (he cries) those sons of pride,
That scorned my gentle sway,
To prove the arm they once defied
Omnipotent to slay."

4 Tremendous scene of wrath divine
How wide the vengeance spreads!
His pointed darts of lightning shine
Round their defenceless heads.

5 Now let the rebels seek that face,
From which they cannot flee!
And thou, my soul, adore the grace
That sweetly conquered thee.

HYMN CCXIV.

The Redeemer's tears wept over lost souls. Luke xix. 41, 42.

1 What venerable sight appears!
The Son of God dissolved in tears!
Trace, O my soul, with sad surprise,
The sorrows of a Saviour's eyes.

2 For whom, blest Jesus, we would know
Doth such a sacred torrent flow?
What brother, or what friend of thine,
Is graced and mourned with drops divine

3 Not brother, there, nor friend I see,
But sons of pride and cruelty
Who like rapacious tigers stood
Insatiate panting for thy blood.

4 Dear Lord, and did thy gushing eyes
Thus stream o'er dying enemies?
And can thy tenderness forget
The sinner humbled at thy feet?

5 With deep remorse our bowels move
That we have wronged such matchless love.
Thy gentle pity, Lord, display,
And smile these trembling fears away.

6 Give us to shine before thy face,
Eternal trophies of thy grace;
Where songs of praise thy saints employ,
And mingle with a Saviour's joy.

HYMN CCXV.

Departed saints living to God. Luke xx. 38.

1 Thrice happy state, where saints shall live
Around their Father's throne,
In every joy, that heaven can give,
And live to God alone!

2 Unnumbered bands of kindred minds,
That dwelt in feeble clay,
Us and our woes have left behind
To reign in endless day.

3 Immortal vigour now they breathe,
And all the air is peace;
They chide our tears, that mourn the death,
Which brought their souls release.

4 Thus shall the grace of Christ prevail,
Till all his chosen meet;
And not the meanest servant fail
His household to complete.

5 To that blest goal* with ardent haste
Our active souls would tend;
Nor feel their sorrows, as they passed
To such a blissful end.

HYMN CCXVI.

Christ's admonition to, and care of, Peter, under his approaching trials. Luke xxii. 31, 32.

1 How keen the tempter's malice is!
How artful and how great!
Though not one grain shall be destroyed,
Yet will he sift the wheat.

2 But God can all his power control,
And gather in his chain;
And, where he seems to triumph most,
The captive soul regain.

3 There is a Shepherd kind and strong,
Still watchful for his sheep;
Nor shall the infernal lion rend,
Whom he vouchsafes to keep.

4 Blest Jesus, intercede for us,
That we may fall no more;
O raise us, when we prostrate lie,
And comfort lost restore.

5 Thy secret energy impart,
That faith may never fail
But midst whole showers of fiery darts
That tempered shield prevail.

6 Secured ourselves by grace divine,
We'll guard our brethren too;
And, taught their frailty by our own,
Our care of them renew.

HYMN CCXVII.

Christ's prayer for his enemies. Luke xxiii. 34.

1 Around I sing the wondrous grace
Christ to his murderers bare;
Which made the tottering cross its throne,
And hung its trophies there.

2 Father, forgive, his mercy cried
With his expiring breath,
And drew eternal blessings down
On those who wrought his death.

3 How may I hope for pardon, Lord,
Though I have pierced the Lord,
Blest Jesus, in my favour speak
That all-prevailing word.

4 I knew not what my madness did
While I remained thy foe:
Soon as I saw the wounds were mine
My tears began to flow.

5 Melted by goodness so divine,
I would (in humble trust)
And, while beneath thy cross I stand,
My forced foes embrace.

HYMN CCXVIII.

The resurrection of Christ. Luke xxiv. 5.

1 Yes, the Redeemer rose:
The Saviour left the dead,
And o'er our hellish foes
High raised his conquering head.
In wild dismay
The guards around
Fell to the ground,
And sank away.

2 Lo, the angelic bands
In full assembly wait,
To wait his high commands,
And worship at his feet.

Joyful they come,
And wing their way
From realms of day
To such a tomb.

3 Then back to heaven they fly,
And the glad tidings bear;
Hark! as they soar on high,
What music fills the air!
Their anthems say,
"Jesus who bled
Hath left the dead,
He rose to-day."

4 Ye mortals, catch the sound,
Redeemed by him from hell,
And send the echo round
The globe on which you dwell:
Transported cry,
"Jesus who bled
Hath left the dead;
No more to die."

5 All hail, triumphant Lord,
Who savest us with thy blood!
Wide be thy name adored,
Thou rising, reigning God!
With thee we rise,
With thee we reign,
And empires gain
Beyond the skies.

HYMN CCXIX.

The gospel first preached at Jerusalem. Luke xxiv. 47.

1 "Go, (saith the Lord,) proclaim my grace
To all the sons of Adam's race,
Pardon for every crimson sin,
And at Jerusalem begin.

2 "There, where my blood, not fully dry,
Stands warm upon mount Calvary:
That blood shall purge away their guilt,
By whom so lately it was spilt.

3 "Now let the daring rebels turn,
And o'er their bleeding Sovereign mourn;
Their bleeding Sovereign shall forgive,
And bid the rebels look and live."

4 Is this thy voice, all gracious Lord?
And did the rebels hear thy word?
And did they fall beneath thy feet,
And on their knees forgiveness meet?

5 Then may I hope for mercy too,
Such love can my hard heart subdue,
And give this guilty soul a place,
Among these captives of thy grace.

6 Here be it daily mine employ
To bathe thy wounds with tears of joy,
Till 'midst the new Jerusalem
In one full choir we sing thy name.

HYMN CCXX.

God's love to the world in sending Christ for our redemption. John iii. 16.

1 Sing to the Lord a new melodious song;
Assist the choir, ye tribes of every tongue:
Wide as the world his sovereign mercy reigns
Wide as the world resound his rapturous strains.
Ye angels, join the joyful acclamation,
And sing the love that brings to men salvation.

2 His gracious eye beheld in full survey
Where Adam's race in mingled ruin lay:
No human aid the danger could avert;
No angel's hand could soothe the raging smart:
In his own breast divine compassion rises,
And the grand scheme the court of heaven surprises.

3 God's only Son, with peerless* glories bright,
His Father's fairest image and delight,
Justice and grace the victim have decreed,
To wear our flesh, and in that flesh to bleed.
Prostrate in dust, ye sinners, all adore him,
And tremble, while your hearts rejoice before him.

4 The wondrous work is done; the covenant stood,
And Jesus expiates human guilt with blood;
Nailed to the tree he bows his sacred head;
A mangled corpse he sojourns with the dead;
Rising, the gospel sends through every nation:
Sinners believe, and gain complete salvation.

5 Father of grace, accept our humble praise;
O let it run through everlasting days!
And thou, blest Saviour, spotless Lamb of God,
Accept the souls dear-ransomed with thy blood.
And to those songs form all our feeble voices,
In which the choir round thy bright throne rejoices.

HYMN CCXXI.

The Spirit's influence compared to living water. John iv. 10.

1 Blest Jesus, source of grace divine,
What soul-refreshing streams are thine!
O bring these healing waters nigh,
Or we must droop, and fall, and die.

2 No traveller through desert lands,
'Midst scorching suns, and burning sands,
More eager longs for cooling rain,
Or pants the current to obtain.

3 Our longing souls aloud would sing,
Spring up, celestial fountain, spring:
To a redundant river flow,
And cheer this thirsty land below.

* Unequalled.

1 May this blest torrent near my side
Through all the desert gently glide
Then in Emanuel's land above
Spread to a sea of joy and love

HYMN CCXXII.

The Christian's sacred feast. John iv. 32

1 We praise the Lord, for heavenly bread
With which immortal souls are fed:
We praise thee for that heavenly feast,
Which Jesus with delight could taste.

2 He, while he sojourned here below,
Had meat, which strangers could not know
That meat he to his people gives,
And he that tastes the banquet lives.

3 So let me live, sustained by grace,
Regaled with fruits of righteousness
Enter my heart, all-gracious Lord,
And sup with me, and deck thy board.

4 Devotion, faith, and zealous love,
And hope, that bears the soul above,
Be these my dainties, till I rise,
And taste the joys of paradise.

HYMN CCXXIII.

The paralytic at Bethesda. John v. 6

1 Behold the great Physician stands,
Whose skill is ever sure;
And loud he calls to dying men,
And free he offers cure.

2 And will ye hear his gracious voice,
While sore diseased ye lie?
Or will ye all his grace despise,
And trifle till ye die?

3 Blest Jesus, speak the healing word,
And inward vigour give:
Then, raised by energy divine,
Shall helpless mortals live.

4 With cheerful pace our trembling feet
In thy blest paths shall run,
Till Zion's healthful hill they gain,
Where no complaint is known.

HYMN CCXXIV.

God's purposes effectual, and Christ's invitation sincere. John vi. 37

1 Is there a sight in earth or heaven
Can such delight impart,
As Jesus' wide-extended arms
And softly-melting heart?

2 "All that my heavenly Father gives
Shall come, (the Saviour cries,)
And every weakest soul, that comes,
Find favour in mine eyes

3 "I 'll not reject him with disdain,
Nor hurl him down to hell;
But folded in my kind embrace,
He safe and blest shall dwell."

4 Hearken, ye dying sinners all;
All hasten, while ye hear;
For crowds of wretched souls at once
May find their refuge there.

5 I hear thy voice, and I obey;
Low at thy feet I fall;
Nor shall the tempter's voice prevail
Against the Saviour's call.

HYMN CCXXV.

Christ's invitation to thirsty souls. John vii. 37.

1 The Lord of life exalted stands,
Aloud he cries, and spreads his hands:
He calls ten thousand sinners round,
And sends a voice from every wound.

2 "Attend, ye thirsty souls, draw near,
And satiate all your wishes here:
Behold the living fountain flows
In streams as various as your woes.

3 "An ample pardon here I give,
And bid the sentenced rebel live,
Show him my Father's smiling face,
And lodge him in his dear embrace.

4 "I purge from sin's detested stain
And make the crimson white again,
Lead to celestial joys refined,
And lasting as the deathless mind.

5 "Must I know my pity prove?
Witness the words of melting love,
The gushing tear, the labouring breath,
And all these scars of bleeding death."

6 Blest Saviour, I can doubt no more;
I hear, and wonder, and adore:
Panting I seek that fountain-head,
Whence waters so divine proceed.

7 Clear spring of life, flow on, and roll
With growing swell from pole to pole,
Till flowers and fruits of paradise
Round all the winding current rise.

8 Still near thy stream may I be found,
Long as I tread this earthly ground,
Cheer with thy wave each thirsty soul
Then through the fields of Canaan [illegible]

HYMN CCXXVI.

True liberty given by Christ. John viii. 32

1 Hark! the [illegible] Son [illegible] sounds
To life and liberty;

Transported fall before his feet.
Who makes the prisoners free.

2 The cursed bonds of sin he breaks,
And breaks old Satan's chain:
Smiling he deals those pardons round,
Which free from endless pain.

3 Into the captive heart he pours
His Spirit from on high;
We lose the terrors of the slave,
And Abba, Father, cry.

4 Shake off your bonds, and sing his grace:
The sinner's friend proclaim;
And call on all around to seek
True freedom by his name.

5 Walk on at large, till you attain
Your Father's house above!
There shall you wear immortal crowns,
And sing redeeming love.

HYMN CCXXVII.

The same. John viii. 36.

1 And shall we still be slaves,
And in our fetters lie,
When summoned by a voice divine
To assert our liberty.

2 Did the great Saviour bleed
Our freedom to obtain,
That we should trample on his blood,
And glory in our chain?

3 Alas, the sordid mind!
How all its powers are broke!
Proud of a tyrant's haughty sway,
And practised to the yoke!

4 Divine Redeemer, hear,
Thy sovereign power impart,
And let thy generous Spirit wake
True ardour in our heart.

5 Then shall the sons of death,
That in the dungeon lie,
Spring to the throne of pardoning grace,
And Abba, Father, cry.

HYMN CCXXVIII.

Christ the door. John x. 9

1 Awake, our souls, and bless his name,
Whose mercies never fail;
Who opens wide a door of hope
In Achor's gloomy vale.*

2 Behold the portal wide displayed,
The buildings strong and fair:
Within are pastures fresh and green
And living streams are there.

* Hosea ii. 15.

3 Enter, my soul, with cheerful haste,
For Jesus is the door;
Nor fear the serpent's wily arts,
Nor fear the lion's roar.

4 O may thy grace the nations lead,
And Jews and Gentiles come;
All travelling through one beauteous gate,
To one eternal home.

HYMN CCXXIX.

Abundant life by Christ our Shepherd. John x. 10

1 Praise to our Shepherd's gracious name,
Who on so kind an errand came;
Came, that by him his flock might live,
And more abundant life receive.

2 Hail, great Emanuel from above,
High seated on thy throne of love!
O pour the vital torrent down,
Thy people's joy, their Lord's renown.

3 Scarce half alive we sigh and cry;
Scarce raise to thee our languid eye!
Kind Saviour, let our dying state
Compassion in thy heart create.

4 The Shepherd's blood the sheep must heal;
O may we all its influence feel;
Till inward deep experience show,
Christ can begin a heaven below.

HYMN CCXXX.

Christ's sheep described. John x. 27

1 Thy flock, with what a tender care,
Blest Jesus, dost thou keep!
Fain would my weak, my wandering soul
Be numbered with thy sheep.

2 Gentle, and tractable, and plain
My heart would ever be,
Averse to harm, propense to help,
And faithful still to thee.

3 The gentle accents of thy voice
My listening soul would hear;
And, by the signals of thy will,
I all my course would steer.

4 I follow where my Shepherd leads,
And mark the path he drew;
My Shepherd's feet mount Zion treads,
And I shall reach it too.

HYMN CCXXXI.

The happiness and security of Christ's sheep. John x. 28

1 My soul, with joy attend,
While Jesus silence breaks:

No angel's harp such music yields,
As what my Shepherd speaks.

2 "I know my sheep, (he cries,)
My soul approves them well:
Vain is the treacherous world's disguise
And vain the rage of hell.

3 "I freely feed them now
With tokens of my love,
But richer pastures I prepare,
And sweeter streams above.

4 "Unnumbered years of bliss
I to my sheep will give:
And, while my throne unshaken stands,
Shall all my chosen live.

5 "This tried almighty hand
Is raised for their defence,
Where is the power shall reach them there?
Or what shall force them thence?"

6 Enough, my gracious Lord,
Let faith triumphant cry,
My heart can on this promise live,
Can on this promise die.

HYMN CCXXXII.

Christ's sheep given by the Father, and guarded by Omnipotence. John x. 29, 30.

1 In one harmonious cheerful song,
Ye happy saints, combine;
Loud let it sound from every tongue,
The Saviour is divine.

2 The least, the feeblest of the sheep
To him the Father gave;
Kind is his heart the charge to keep,
And strong his arm to save.

3 In Christ the Almighty Father dwells,
And Christ and he are one;
The rebel power which Christ assails,
Attacks the eternal throne.

4 That hand, which heaven and earth sustains,
And bars the gates of hell,
And rivets Satan down in chains,
Shall guard his chosen well.

5 Now let the infernal lion roar,
How vain his threats appear!
When he can match Jehovah's power,
I will begin to fear.

HYMN CCXXXIII.

The attractive influence of a crucified Saviour.
John xii. 32.

1 Behold the amazing sight,
The Saviour lifted high!
Behold the Son of God's delight
Expire in agony!

2 For whom, for whom, my heart,
Were all these sorrows borne?
Why did he feel that piercing smart,
And meet that various scorn?

3 For love of us he bled,
And all in torture died;
'Twas love that bowed his fainting head,
And oped his gushing side.

4 I see, and I adore
In sympathy of love!
I feel the strong attractive power
To lift my soul above.

5 Drawn by such cords as these,
Let all the earth combine
With cheerful ardour to confess
The energy divine.

6 In thee our hearts unite,
Nor share thy griefs alone,
But from thy cross pursue their flight
To thy triumphant throne.

HYMN CCXXXIV.

Christ's mysterious conduct to be unfolded hereafter.
John xiii. 7.

1 Jesus, we own thy sovereign hand,
Thy faithful care we own:
Wisdom and love are all thy ways,
When most to us unknown.

2 By thee the springs of life were formed,
And by thy breath are broke,
And good as every awful word
Our gracious Lord hath spoke.

3 To thee we yield our comforts up,
To thee our lives resign;
In straits and dangers rich and safe,
If we and ours are thine.

4 Thy saints in earlier life removed,
In sweeter accents sing;
And bless the swiftness of their flight,
That bore them to their King.

5 The burthens of a lengthened day
With patience we would bear
Till evening's welcome hour shall show
We were our Master's care.

HYMN CCXXXV.

Christ's pity and consolation for his [illegible]
John xiv. 1–4.

1 Peace, all ye sorrows of the heart
And all my tears, be dry:
That Christian ne'er can be forlorn,
That views his Jesus nigh.

2 "Let not your bosoms throb, the slave
Nor be your souls afraid!
Trust in your God's almighty name
And trust your Saviour's aid.

3 "Fair mansions in my Father's house
For all his children wait;
And I, your elder brother, go
To open wide the gate.

4 "And if I thither go before,
A dwelling to prepare,
I surely shall return again,
That I may fix you there.

5 "United in eternal love,
My chosen shall remain,
And with rejoicing hearts shall share
The honours of my reign."

6 Yes, Lord, thy gracious words we hear,
And cordial joys they bring:
Frail nature may extort a groan,
But faith shall learn to sing.

HYMN CCXXXVI.

The Christian's life connected with that of Christ. John xiv. 19.

1 THE covenant of a Saviour's love
Shall stand for ever good,
And thus his life shall guard the souls
He purchased with his blood.

2 "I live for ever, (saith the Lord,)
And you shall therefore live;
Receive with pleasure every pledge
My power and love can give."

3 We own the promise, Prince of grace;
Though earthly helpers die;
And animate our fainting hearts,
While Christ our friend is nigh.

4 The king of fears can do no more
Than stop our mortal breath;
But Jesus gives a nobler life,
That cannot yield to death.

HYMN CCXXXVII.

Abiding in Christ necessary to our fruitfulness. John xv. 4.

1 LORD of the vineyard, we adore
That power and grace divine
Which plants our wild, our barren souls
In Christ the living vine.

2 For ever may they there abide,
And, from that vital root
Be influence spread through every branch
To form and feed the fruit.

3 Shine forth, my God, the clusters warm
With rays of sacred love;
Till Eden's soil, and Zion's streams
The generous plant improve.

HYMN CCXXXVIII.

Our prayers effectual when we abide in Christ, and his word abideth in us. John xv. 8.

1 HAIL, gracious Saviour, all divine!
Mysterious ever-living vine!
To thee united may we live,
And nourished by thine influence thrive.

2 Still may our souls in thee abide,
Torn by no tempests from thy side;
Nor from its place within our heart
Thy promise or thy law depart.

3 Then shall our prayers accepted rise,
Through thee a grateful sacrifice,
And all our sighs before thy throne
Descend in ample blessings down.

4 In silent hope our souls shall wait
Their pension from thy mercy's gate;
Nor can our lips or hearts express
A wish proportioned to thy grace.

HYMN CCXXXIX.

Continuing in Christ's love. John xv.

1 To all his flock, what wondrous love
Doth our kind Shepherd bear!
As he to his great Father's heart,
So we to his are dear.

2 So sure, so constant, and so strong,
Do his endearments prove:
O may their energy prevail
To fix us in his love.

3 No more let my divided heart
From this blest centre turn:
But fired by such all-potent rays,
With flames immortal burn.

4 Descend, and all thy power display,
And all thy love reveal;
That the warm streams of Jesus' blood
Thus frozen heart may feel.

HYMN CCXL.

The apostle's call to Christians chosen by Christ to bring forth permanent fruit. John xv. 16.

1 LORD, my God, thy sovereign grace,
And bring the praise to thee;
If thou my chosen portion art,
Thou first hast chosen me.

2 My gracious Counsellor and Guide
Will hear me when I pray;

Nor, while I urge a Saviour's name,
Will frown my soul away.

3 Blest Jesus, animate my heart
With beams of heavenly love,
And teach that cold unthankful soul
The heavenly seed to improve.

4 In copious showers thy Spirit send
To water all the ground;
So to the honour of thy name
Shall lasting fruit be found.

HYMN CCXLI

Peace in Christ amidst tribulations. John xvi. 33.

1 Henceforth let each believing heart
From anxious sorrows cease:
Though storms of trouble rage around
In Jesus we have peace.

2 His blood from wrath to come redeems
And his almighty grace,
By bitterest draughts of deep distress
Its healing power displays.

3 Jesus, our Captain, marched before
To lead us to the fight;
And now he reacheth out the crown
With heavenly glories bright.

4 Lord, 'tis enough; thy voice we hear,
That crown by faith we see:
No sorrows shall o'erwhelm our souls
Since none divide from thee.

HYMN CCXLII

Christ sanctifying himself, that his people may be sanctified. John xvii. 19.

1 Behold the bleeding Lamb of God
Our spotless sacrifice!
By hands of barbarous sinners nailed
Nailed to the cross, he dies.

2 Blest Jesus, whence this streaming blood?
And whence this God descent?
Whence all these pointed thorns, that rend
Thy venerable brow?

3 "I sanctify myself, he cries,
That thou mayst holy be.
Come, trace my life, come, trace my love,
And learn to copy me."

4 Dear Lord, we pant for holiness,
And inbred sin we mourn:
To the bright path of thy commands
Our wandering footsteps turn.

5 Not more sincerely would we wish
To climb the heavenly hill,
Than here, with all our utmost power,
Thy model to imbibe.

HYMN CCXLIII

Meditations on the sepulchre of the saviour. John xix. 41.

1 Full sepulchres I [illegible]
Through all the road on either hand!
And here upon the earthen shelf
In every garden of delight!

2 Thither the winding alleys tend;
There all the flowery borders end;
And [illegible]
Fragrance and music [illegible]

3 Deep in that grassy [illegible]
My fathers and my brethren dwell;
Beneath its broad and gloomy shade
My kindred and my friends are laid:

4 But, while I tread the solemn way,
My faith that Saviour would survey,
Who deigned to sojourn in the tomb
And left behind a rich perfume.

5 My thoughts with ecstasy unknown,
While from his grave they view his throne,
Through my own sepulchre can see
A paradise [illegible]

HYMN CCXLIV

Christ ascending to his Father and God and our God. John xx. 17.

1 In raptures let our hearts ascend
Our heavenly seats to view,
And grateful trace that shining path
Our rising Saviour drew.

2 "I go to my Father and my God,
I go, thus Conqueror rose,
Up to my Father, and your God,
My [illegible]

3 And doth the Lord of glory call
Such worms his brethren dear?
[illegible]
And show our Father there?

4 And doth he touch my trembling lyre
That tuneful sound, my God?
And breathe his Spirit on my heart
To shed his grace abroad?

5 O world, prepare a gentler life
And thou shalt have my love:
Till then, my Father claims it all,
And Christ, who dwells above.

6 Dear Jesus, still [illegible]
That struggles with its clay,
And [illegible]
To sing [illegible]

HYMN CCXLV

The disciples joy at Christ's appearance to them after his resurrection. John xx. 19, 20.

1 Come, our unslaughter'd Saviour, come
Illustrious Conqueror o'er the tomb
Hear thine assembled servants bless,
And fill our hearts with sacred peace.

2 O come thyself, most gracious Lord,
With all the joy thy wounds afford
Reveal the beauties of thy face,
And make us feel thy vital grace.

3 With rapture kneeling round we greet
Thy pierced hands, thy wounded feet,
And from the scar that marks thy side,
We see our life's warm torrent glide.

4 Enter our hearts, Redeemer blest;
Enter, thou ever honoured guest,
Not for one transient hour alone,
But there to fix thy lasting throne.

5 Own this mean dwelling as thy home;
And, when our life's last hour is come,
Let us but die, as in thy sight,
And death shall vanish in delight.

HYMN CCXLVI.

Appeal to Christ for sincerity of love to him.
John xxi. 15.

1 Do not I love thee, O my Lord?
Behold my heart and see,
And turn each cursed idol out,
That dares to rival thee.

2 Do not I love thee from my soul?
Then let me nothing love;
Dead be my heart to every joy,
When Jesus cannot move.

3 Is not thy name melodious still
To mine attentive ear;
Doth not each pulse with pleasure bound
My Saviour's voice to hear?

4 Hast thou a lamb in all thy flock
I would disdain to feed?
Hast thou a foe, before whose face
I fear thy cause to plead?

5 Would not mine ardent spirit vie
With angels round the throne,
To execute thy sacred will,
And make thy glory known?

6 Would not my heart pour forth its blood
In honour of thy name?
And challenge the cold hand of death
To damp the immortal flame.

7 Then knowest I love thee, dearest Lord;
But O! I long to soar
Far from the sphere of mortal joys,
And learn to love more.

HYMN CCXLVII.

Zeal for the cause of Christ; or, Peter and John following their Master. John xxi. 19–24.

1 Blest men, who stretch their willing hands,
Submissive to their Lord's commands,
And yield their liberty and breath
To him, that loved their souls in death!

2 Lead me to suffer, and to die,
If thou, my gracious Lord, art nigh:
One smile from thee my heart shall fire,
And teach me smiling to expire.

3 If nature at the trial shake,
And from the cross or flames draw back,
Grace can its feeble courage raise,
And turn its tremblings into praise.

4 While scarce I dare, with Peter, say,
"I'll boldly tread the bleeding way;"
Yet in thy steps, like John, I'd move
With humble hope, and silent love.

HYMN CCXLVIII.

Christ exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour.
Acts v. 31.

1 Exalted Prince of life, we own
The royal honours of thy throne
'Tis fixed by God's almighty hand,
And seraphs bow at thy command.

2 Exalted Saviour, we confess
The sovereign triumphs of thy grace,
Where beams of gentle radiance shine,
And temper majesty divine.

3 Wide thy resistless sceptre sway,
Till all thine enemies obey:
Wide may thy cross its virtue prove,
And conquer millions by its love.

4 Mighty to vanquish, and forgive!
Thine Israel shall repent and live;
And loud proclaim thy healing breath,
Which works them life, who wrought the death.

HYMN CCXLIX.

The believer committing his departing spirit to Jesus.
Acts vii. 58.

1 O Christ, that hast redemption wrought,
Patron of souls, thy blood hath bought
To thee our spirits we commend,
Mighty to succour from the end.

2 Millions of blissful souls above
In realms of purity and love
With songs of endless praise proclaim
The honours of thy faithful name.

3 When all the powers of nature failed
Thy ever constant care prevailed;
Courage and joy thy friendship spoke
When every mortal bond was broke.

4 We on that friendship, Lord, repose
The healing balm of all our woes;
And we, when sinking in the grave
Trust thine omnipotence to save.

5 O may our spirits by thy hand
Be gathered to that happy band
Who midst the blessings of thy reign
Lose all remembrance of their pain.

6 In raptures there divinely sweet
Give us our kindred souls to meet
And wait with them that brighter day
Which all thy triumph shall display.

HYMN CCL

Peter's admonition to Simon Magus — Acts viii 21—24

1 Searcher of hearts, before thy face
I all my soul display;
And, conscious of its innate* arts,
Entreat thy strict survey.

2 If lurking in its inmost folds,
I any sin conceal,
O let a ray of light divine
The secret guile reveal.

3 If tinctured with that odious gall
Unknowing I remain,
Let grace, like a pure silver stream,
Wash out the accursed stain.

4 If in these fatal fetters bound,
A wretched slave I lie,
Smite off my chains and wake my soul
To light and liberty.

5 To humble penitence and prayer
Be gentle pity given:
Speak ample pardon to my heart,
And seal its claim to heaven.

HYMN CCLI

The descent of the Spirit ... on his ordination days — Acts x. 44

1 Great Father of each perfect gift,
Behold thy servants wait
With longing eyes and lifted hands.
We flock around thy gate.

2 O shed abroad that royal gift,
Thy Spirit from above,
To bless our eyes with sacred light,
And fire our hearts with love.

3 With speedy wings may he descend
And solid comfort bring,
And o'er our languid souls extend
His all-reviving wing.

4 Blest earnest of eternal joy
Declare our sins forgiven,
And bear with sweet assay before
Our raptured thoughts to heaven.

5 Dismiss, O God, [illegible]
That earth its fruit may yield,
And change this barren wilderness
To Carmel's flowery field!

HYMN CCLII

The need of salvation — Acts xvi. 30

1 And why do our admiring eyes
Those gospel-glories see?
And whence, doth every heart reply,
Salvation sent to me?

2 In fatal shades of midnight gloom
Ten thousand wretches stray;
And Satan blinds ten thousand more
Amidst the blaze of day.

3 Millions of ranging souls around
[illegible]
Harmonious sounds of grace transformed
To [illegible]

4 And dost thou, Lord, address my heart
And show my sins forgiven,
And hear thy embassy to me
Amongst the lusts of heathens?

5 [illegible]
We sing the Saviour's name;
And, while the long salvation lasts,
[illegible]

HYMN CCLIII

The unknown God — Acts xvii. 23

1 Thou mighty Lord, or God alone,
A King of majesty unknown,
And O! [illegible]
Beyond the reach of mortal view.

2 Yet through the [illegible]
Some [illegible]
And, where thy gracious gospel shines
We read [illegible]

3 But O! [illegible]
How learned thy nature and thy ways

While thousands, even in fields of light
Are buried in Egyptian night.

4 They tread thy courts, thy word they hear
And to thy solemn rites draw near
Yet, though salvation seems so nigh
Because they know not God, they die.

5 Send thy victorious gospel forth,
Wide from these regions of the north;
And through thy churches graces impart
To write thy name on every heart.

HYMN CCLIV.

God's command to all men to repent. Acts xvii. 30.

1 REPENT, the voice celestial cries,
No longer dare delay:
The wretch that scorns the mandate* dies,
And meets a fiery day.

2 No more the sovereign eye of God
O'erlooks the crimes of men:
His heralds are despatched abroad
To warn the world of sin.

3 The summons reach through all the earth.
Let earth attend and fear:
Listen, ye men of royal birth,
And let their vassals† hear.

4 Together in his presence bow,
And all your guilt confess;
Accept the offered Saviour now,
Nor trifle with the grace.

5 Bow, ere the awful trumpet sound,
And call you to his bar:
For mercy knows the appointed bound,
And turns to vengeance there.

6 Amazing love, that yet will call,
And yet prolong our days!
Our hearts subdued by goodness fall,
And weep, and love, and praise.

HYMN CCLV.

Paul's solicitude to finish his course with joy. Acts xx. 24.

1 ASSIST us, Lord, thy name to praise
For this rich gospel of thy grace
And, that our hearts may love it more,
Teach them to feel its vital power.

2 With joy may we our course pursue,
And keep the crown of life in view;
That crown, which in our heav'n repays
The labour of ten thousand days.

3 Should bands of death obstruct our way,
Unmoved their terrors we 'll survey;
And the last hour improve for thee
The last of life or liberty.

4 Welcome those bonds, which may unite
Our souls to their supreme delight!
Welcome that death, whose parental stroke
Hears us to Christ, our better life!

HYMN CCLVI.

Paul preaching and Felix trembling. Acts xxiv. 25.

1 GREAT Sovereign of the human heart,
Thy mighty energy impart,
Which darts at once through breasts of steel,
And makes the nether millstone‡ feel.

2 Let sinners tremble at thy word,
Struck by the terrors of the Lord;
And, while they tremble, let them flee,
And seek their help, their life, from thee.

3 O let them seize the present day,
Nor risk salvation by delay;
To-morrow, Lord, to thee belongs:
This night may vindicate thy wrongs.

4 This night may stop their fleeting breath,
And seal them to eternal death,
May veil redemption from their sight,
And give them flames instead of light.

5 Or should succeeding years remain,
Years, with their sabbaths, all in vain
Before their darkened eyes may roll,
And more obdurate leave the soul.

6 Great Saviour, let thy pity rise,
And make the wretched trifflers wise,
Lest pangs and tremblings felt in vain,
Hasten and feed immortal pain.

HYMN CCLVII.

Help obtained of God. Acts xxvi. 22.

For a New-year's Day.

1 GREAT God, we sing that mighty hand
By which supported still we stand:
The opening year thy mercy shows
That mercy crowns it, till it close.

2 By day, by night, at home, abroad,
Still are we guarded by our God
By his incessant bounty fed,
By his unerring counsel led.

3 With grateful hearts the past we own,
The future, all to us unknown,
We to thy guardian care commit,
And peaceful leave before thy feet.

4 In scenes exalted or depressed,
Thou art our joy, and thou our rest

* Command. † Subjects. ‡ [illegible]

Thy goodness all our hopes shall raise
Adored through all our changing days.

5 When death shall interrupt these songs
And seal in silence mortal tongues,
Our helper God, in whom we trust,
In better worlds our souls shall boast.

HYMN CCLVIII

Treasuring up wrath by despising mercy. Rom. ii. 4, 5.

1 Ungrateful sinners, whence this scorn
Of long-extended grace?
And whence this madness, that insults
The Almighty to his face?

2 Is it because his patience waits,
And pitying bowels move,
You multiply audacious crimes,
And spurn his richest love?

3 Is all the treasured wrath so small
You labour still for more,
Though not eternal rolling years
Can e'er exhaust the store?

4 Swift doth the day of vengeance come
That must your sentence seal;
And righteous judgment now unknown
In all its pomp reveal.

5 Alarmed and melted at thy voice,
Our conquered hearts would bow;
And, to escape the thunderer then,
Embrace the Saviour now.

HYMN CCLIX

The love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Spirit. Rom. v. 5

1 Descend, immortal Dove,
Spread thy kind wings abroad,
And, wrapt in flames of holy love,
Bear all my soul to God.

2 Jesus, my Lord, reveal
In charms of grace divine,
And be thyself the sacred seal
That pearl of price is mine.

3 Behold my heart expands
To catch the heavenly fire,
It longs to feel the gentle bands,
And groans with strong desire.

4 Thy love, my God, appears
And brings salvation down,
My cordial through this vale of tears,
In paradise my crown.

HYMN CCLX

Christians quickened and raised by the Spirit. Rom. viii. 11

1 Why should our mourning thoughts delight
To grovel on the dust?
Or why should streams of tears run
Around the expiring pile?

2 Did not the Lord our Saviour die
And triumph o'er the grave?
Did not our Lord ascend on high,
And prove his power to save?

3 Doth not the sacred Spirit come,
And dwell in all the saints?
And should the temples of his grace
Resound with long complaints?

4 Awake, my soul, and like the sun
Burst through each sable cloud,
And thou, my voice, though broke with sighs,
Tune forth thy songs aloud.

5 The Spirit raised my Saviour up,
When he had bled for me,
And spite of death and hell shall raise
Thy pious friends and thee.

6 Awake, ye saints, that dwell in dust,
Your hymns of victory sing;
And let his dying servants trust
Their ever-living King.

HYMN CCLXI

God's readiness to give all things with the gift of his Son. Rom. viii. 32

1 Now let my soul with transport rise
And range through earth, and travel the skies,
And view each various form of good,
Where angels hold their high abode.

2 I give my thoughts unbounded scope,
On equal pinions soars my hope;
My faith at noblest objects aims,
And what she sees she wants to claim.

3 Hath not the bounteous King of heaven
From his embrace already given
That Son of his eternal love,
Who filled the brightest throne above;

4 Behold his hand on Jesus laid!
Behold that Lamb a victim made!
And what should move his hand to bless
Yet sinners unreconciled with his love?

5 My soul, with heavenly faith embrace
The sacred covenant of his grace;
Then in delightful silence wait
The issues of a love so great.

HYMN CCLXII

Redeeming with the heart and confessing with the mouth necessary to salvation. Rom. x. 9, 10.

1 And is salvation brought so near,
Where sinful men expiring lie?
Triumph, my soul, the sound to hear,
And shout it joyous to the sky.

3 I ask not, who to heaven shall soar,
That Christ the Saviour thence may come
Or who earth's inmost depths assail
To bring him from the dreary tomb.

3 From heaven on wings of love he flew
And conqueror from the tomb he sprung
My heart believes the witness true,
And dictates to my faithful tongue.

4 I sing salvation brought so near,
No more on earth expiring lie;
I teach the world my joys to hear,
And shout them to the echoing sky.

HYMN CCLXIII.

The living sacrifice. Rom. xii. 1.

1 And will the eternal King
So mean a gift reward?
That offering, Lord, with joy we bring,
Which thy own hand prepared.

2 We own thy various claim,
And to thine altar move,
The willing victims of thy grace,
And bound with cords of love.

3 Descend celestial fire,
The sacrifice inflame;
So shall a grateful odour rise,
Through our Redeemer's name.

HYMN CCLXIV.

The near approach of salvation, an engagement to diligence and love. Rom. xiii. 11.

1 Awake, ye saints, and raise your eyes,
And raise your voices high;
Awake, and praise that sovereign love,
That shows salvation nigh.

2 On all the wings of time it flies,
Each moment brings it near;
Then welcome each declining day!
Welcome each closing year!

3 Not many years their rounds shall run,
Nor many mornings rise,
Ere all its glories stand revealed
To our admiring eyes.

4 Ye wheels of nature, speed your course
Ye mortal powers, decay;
Fast as ye bring the night of death
Ye bring eternal day.

HYMN CCLXV.

The God of peace bruising Satan. Rom. xvi. 20.

1 Ye armies of the living God,
In his all-conquering name,
Lift up your banners, and aloud
Your Leader's grace proclaim.

2 What though the prince of hell invade
With showers of fiery darts,
And join to the fierce lion's roar
The serpent's wily arts?

3 Jesus, who leads his hosts to war,
Shall tread the monster down,
And every faithful soldier share
The triumph and the crown.

4 So Israel on the haughty necks
Of Canaan's tyrants trod,
And sung their Joshua's conquering sword,
And sung their faithful God.*

HYMN CCLXVI.

Christ our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption. 1 Cor. i. 30, 31.

1 My God, assist me, while I raise
An anthem of harmonious praise:
My heart thy wonders shall proclaim,
And spread its banners in thy name.

2 In Christ I view a store divine:
My Father, all that store is thine;
By thee prepared, by thee bestowed:
Hail to the Saviour, and the God!

3 When gloomy shades my soul o'erspread,
"Let there be light," the Almighty said:
And Christ, my Sun, his beams displays,
And scatters round celestial rays.

4 Condemned, thy criminal I stood,
And awful justice asked my blood:
That welcome Saviour from thy throne
Brought righteousness and pardon down.

5 My soul was all o'erspread with sin,
And lo, his grace hath made me clean:
He rescues from the infernal foe,
And full redemption will bestow.

6 Ye saints, assist my grateful tongue:
Ye angels, warble back my song:
For love like this demands the praise
Of heavenly harps, and endless days.

HYMN CCLXVII.

Being joined to Christ, and one spirit with him. 1 Cor. vi. 17.

1 My Saviour, I am thine
By everlasting bands;
My name, my heart, I would resign,
My soul is in thy hands.

2 To thee I still would cleave
With ever growing zeal

* Joshua x. 24.

Let millions tempt me Christ to leave,
They never shall prevail.

3 His Spirit shall unite
My soul to him, my head;
Shall form me to his image bright,
And teach his path to tread.

4 Death may my soul divide
From this abode of clay;
But love shall keep me near his side
Through all the gloomy way.

5 Since Christ and we are one,
What should remain to fear?
If he in heaven hath fixed his throne,
He 'll fix his members there.

HYMN CCLXVIII

The transitory nature of the world, an argument for Christian moderation. 1 Cor. vii. 29—31

1 Spring up, my soul, with ardent flight,
Nor let this earth delude my sight
With glittering trifles gay and vain:
Wisdom divine directs thy view
To objects ever grand and new,
And faith displays the shining train.

2 Be dead, my hopes, to all below,
Nor let unbounded torrents flow,
When mourning o'er my withered joys:
So this deceitful world is known;
Possessed I call it not my own;
Nor glory in its painted toys.

3 The empty pageant rolls along,
The giddy unexperienced throng
Pursue it with enchanted eyes:
It passeth in swift march away,
Still more and more its charms decay,
Till the last gaudy colour dies.*

4 My God, to thee my soul shall turn,
For thee my noblest passions burn,
And drink in bliss from thee alone:
I fix on that unchanging home,
Where never-fading pleasures bloom,
Fresh springing round thy radiant throne.

HYMN CCLXIX

God's fidelity in moderating temptation.
1 Cor. x. 13.

1 Now let the feeble all be strong,
And make Jehovah's arm their song:
His shield is spread o'er every saint,
And thus supported, who shall faint?

2 What though the hosts of hell engage
With mingled cruelty and rage?
A faithful God restrains their hands,
And chains them down in iron bands.

3 Bound by his word he will display
A strength proportioned to our day;
And, when united trials meet,
Will show a path of safe retreat.

4 Thus far we prove that promise good,
Which Jesus ratified with blood:
Still is he gracious, wise, and just,
And still in him let Israel trust.

HYMN CCLXX

Bearing the image of the earthly and the [illegible]
Adam. 1 Cor. xv. 49.

1 With flowing eyes and bleeding hearts
A blasted world survey;
See the wide ruin sin hath wrought
In one unhappy day!

2 Adam, in God's own image formed,
From God and bliss estranged,
And all the joys of paradise
For guilt and horror changed!

3 Ages of labour and of grief
He mourned his glory lost;
At length the goodliest work of heaven
Sunk down to common dust.

4 O fatal heritage bequeathed
To all his helpless race!
Through the thick mazes of sin and woe
Thus to the grave we pass.

5 But, O my soul, with rapture hear
The second Adam's name,
And the celestial gifts he brings,
To all his seed, proclaim.

6 In holiness and joy complete
He reigns to endless years,
And each adopted chosen child
His splendid image wears.

7 What though in mortal life they fall?
What though by death they fall?
Jesus in one triumphant day
Transforms and crowns them all.

8 Praise to his rich mysterious grace!
Even by our fall we rise;
And gain, for earthly Eden lost,
A heavenly paradise.

HYMN CCLXXI

Ministers comforted, &c. [illegible]
2 Cor. i. 4.

1 Fountain of comfort and of love,
Thy streams, how free they flow!

* Pageants, images or emblematical figures in a procession or procession continually moving, and quickly gone out of sight. See Francis Expositor &c.

First water all the world above,
Then visit us below!

2 From Christ, the Head, what grace descends
To cherish every part!
He shares his joys with all his friends,
For all have shared his heart.

3 What though the sorrows here they feel
Are manifold and great!
He brings new consolations still,
As various and as sweet.

4 He shows our numerous sins forgiven,
And shows our covenant God;
He witnesseth our right to heaven,
The purchase of his blood.

5 Though earth and hell against us join,
In him we are secure;
Our diadems shall brighter shine
For all we now endure.

6 On every faithful shepherd's breast,
Lord, send these comforts down;
That they may lead their flock to rest,
Which their own souls have known.

HYMN CCLXXII.

God's delivering goodness acknowledged and trusted.
2 Cor. i. 10.

A Song for the Fifth of November.

1 Praise to the Lord, whose mighty hand
So oft revealed hath saved our land;
And, when united nations rose,
Hath shamed and scourged our haughtiest foes.

2 When mighty navies from afar
To Britain wafted floating war,
His breath dispersed them all with ease,
And sunk their terrors in the seas. *

3 While for our princes they prepare
In caverns deep a burning snare;
He shot from heaven a piercing ray,
And the dark treachery brought to day. †

4 Princes and priests again combine
New chains to forge, new snares to twine;
Again our gracious God appears,
And breaks their chains, and cuts their snares.

5 Obedient winds at his command
Convey his hero to our land;
The sons of Rome with terror view,
And speed their flight when none pursue. ‡

6 Such great deliverance God hath wrought,
And down to us salvation brought;
And still the care of guardian heaven
Secures the bliss itself hath given.

* [illegible]

† [illegible]

‡ [illegible]

7 In thee we trust, Almighty Lord,
Continued rescue to afford:
Still be thy powerful arm made bare,
For all thy servants' hopes are there.

HYMN CCLXXIII.

Ministers a sweet savour, whether of life or death.
2 Cor. ii. 15, 16.

1 Praise to the Lord on high,
Who spreads his triumph wide!
While Jesus' fragrant name
Is breathed on every side:
Balmy and rich
The odours rise,
And fill the earth
And reach the skies.

2 Ten thousand dying souls
Its influence feel and live;
Sweeter than vital air
The incense they receive:
They breathe anew,
And rise and sing
Jesus the Lord,
Their conquering King.

3 But sinners scorn the grace
That brings salvation nigh:
They turn their face away,
And faint, and fall, and die.
So sad a doom,
Ye saints, deplore,
For oh they fall
To rise no more.

4 Yet, wise and mighty God,
Shall all thy servants be,
In those who live or die,
A savour sweet to thee:
Supremely bright
Thy grace shall shine,
Guarded with flames
Of wrath divine.

HYMN CCLXXIV.

God shining into the heart. 2 Cor. iv. 6.

1 Praise to the Lord of boundless might!
With uncreated glories bright,
His presence gilds the worlds above,
The unchanging source of light and love.

2 Our rising earth his eye beheld,
When in substantial darkness veiled:
The shapeless chaos, nature's womb,
Lay buried in eternal gloom.§

3 Let there be light, Jehovah said,
And light o'er all its face was spread:

§ Genesis i. 2, 3

Nature, arrayed in charms unknown,
Gay with its new-born lustre shone.

4 He sees the mind, when lost it lies
In shades of ignorance and vice,
And darts from heaven a vivid * ray,
And changes midnight into day.

5 Shine, mighty God, with vigour shine
On this benighted heart of mine;
And let thy glories stand revealed,
As in the Saviour's face beheld.

6 My soul, revived by heaven-born day,
Thy radiant image shall display,
While all my faculties unite
To praise the Lord, who gives me light.

HYMN CCLXXV.

The gospel treasure in earthen vessels. 2 Cor. iv. 7.

1 How rich thy bounty, King of kings!
Thy favours how divine!
The blessings which thy gospel brings,
How splendidly they shine!

2 Gold is but dross, and gems but toys,
Should gold and gems compare;
How mean, when set against those joys
Thy poorest servants share!

3 Yet all these treasures of thy grace
Are lodged in urns † of clay;
And the weak sons of mortal race,
The immortal gifts convey.

4 Feebly they lisp thy glories forth;
Yet grace the victory gives:
Quickly they moulder back to earth;
Yet still thy gospel lives.

5 Such wonders power divine effects;
Such trophies ‡ God can raise;
His hand from crumbling dust erects
Long monuments of praise.

HYMN CCLXXVI.

Living to him who died for us. 2 Cor. v. 14, 15.

1 My Lord, didst thou endure such smart
My life, when forfeited, to save?
And didst thou bear upon thy heart
My name, when rising from the grave?

2 Am I in thy remembrance still,
Midst all the glories of thy throne?
To form thy servant to thy will,
And fix my dwelling near thy own?

3 What can a feeble worm repay
For love so infinite as thine?
The torrent bears my soul away,
The impetuous stream of grace divine.§

4 To thee, my Lord, it bears me on;
Self shall be deified || no more;
By self betrayed, by self undone,
I live by thy recovering power.

5 Accept a soul so dearly bought;
Bought by thy life upon the tree:
A soul which, by thy Spirit taught,
Knows no delight but serving thee.

HYMN CCLXXVII.

God the author of consolation. 2 Cor. vii. 6.

1 The Lord, how rich his comforts are!
How wide they spread! how high they rise!
He pours in balm to bleeding hearts,
And wipes the tears from flowing eyes.

2 I have no hope, my spirit cried,
Just trembling on the brink of hell;
I am thy hope, the Lord replied,
My love secures its favourites well.

3 My grateful soul shall speak his praise,
Who turns its tremblings into songs;
And those that mourn shall learn from me
Salvation to our God belongs.

HYMN CCLXXVIII.

Satan's strong holds cast down by the gospel.
2 Cor. x. 4, 5.

1 Shout, for the battlements are fall'n,
Which heaven itself defied!
The aspiring towers dismantled ¶ all,
Now spread their ruins wide!

2 Thy wondrous trumpets, Prince of peace,
Sent forth their mighty sound;
The strength of heathen was struck,
And tottered to the ground.

3 No more proud reasonings shall dispute
What truth divine declares;
No more self-righteousness to plead
Its own perfections dares.

4 No strength our ruined powers can boast
Thy precepts to fulfil:
No liberty we ask or wish
For our rebellious will.

5 The gates we open to admit
The Saviour's gentle sway:
Blest Jesus, 'tis thy right to reign,
Our pleasure to obey.

* Lively, sprightly. † Vessels.
‡ Monuments or tokens of victory.
§ Meaning the new energies of the Spirit of God, which he is pouring in upon my soul.
|| Made a god of.
¶ Demolished, levelled.
 Overthrown.

6 Each thought in sweet subjection held,
Thy sovereign power shall own;
And every traitor shall be slain,
That dares dispute the throne.

HYMN CCLXXIX.

The Christian farewell. 2 Cor. xiii. 11.

1 Thy presence, everlasting God,
Wide o'er all nature spreads abroad;
Thy watchful eyes, which cannot sleep,
In every place thy children keep.

2 While near each other we remain,
Thou dost our lives and souls sustain;
When absent, happy if we share
Thy smiles, thy counsels, and thy care.

3 To thee we all our ways commit,
And seek our comforts near thy feet;
Still on our souls vouchsafe to shine,
And guard and guide us still as thine.

4 Give us in thy beloved house
Again to pay our grateful vows;
Or, if that joy no more be known,
Give us to meet around thy throne.

HYMN CCLXXX.

Living while in the flesh by faith in Christ, who loved us, &c. Gal. ii. 20.

1 My Jesus, while in mortal flesh
I hold my frail abode,
Still would my spirit rest on thee,
Its Saviour, and its God.

2 By hourly faith in thee I live
'Midst all my griefs and snares;
And death, encountered in thy fight,
No form of horror wears.

3 Yes, thou hast loved this sinful worm,
Hast given thyself for me;
Hast brought me from eternal death,
Nailed to the bloody tree.

4 On thy dear cross I fix mine eyes,
Then raise them to thy seat:
Till love dissolves my inmost soul
At its Redeemer's feet.

5 Be dead, my heart, to worldly charms;
Be dead to every sin;
And tell the boldest foes without,
That Jesus reigns within.

6 My life with his connected stands,
Nor asks a surer ground;
He keeps me in his gracious arms
Where heaven itself is found.

HYMN CCLXXXI.

A filial temper, the work of the Spirit, and a proof of adoption. Gal. iv. 6.

1 Sovereign of all the worlds on high,
Allow my humble claim;
Nor, while a word would raise its head,
Disdain a father's name.

2 My Father God! how sweet the sound!
How tender and how dear!
Not all the melody of heaven
Could so delight the ear.

3 Come, sacred Spirit, seal the name
On mine expanding heart:
And show, that in Jehovah's grace
I share a filial part.

4 Cheered by a signal so divine,
Unwavering I believe;
Thou knowest I Abba, Father, cry,
Nor can the sign deceive.

5 On wings of everlasting love
The Comforter is come;
All terrors at his voice disperse,
And endless pleasures bloom.

HYMN CCLXXXII.

Christian sympathy. Gal. vi. 2.

1 Hail, everlasting Prince of peace!
Hail, Governor divine!
How gracious is thy sceptre's sway!
What gentle laws are thine!

2 His tender heart with love o'erflowed,
Love spoke in every breath;
Vigorous it reigned through all this life,
And triumphed in his death.

3 All these united charms he shows
Our frozen souls to move;
This proof of love to him demands
That we each other love.

4 O be the sacred law fulfilled
In every act and thought;
Each angry passion far removed,
Each selfish view forgot.

5 Be thou, my heart, dilated wide
By thy Redeemer's grace:
And, in one grasp of fervent love,
All earth and heaven embrace.

HYMN CCLXXXIII.

Blessing God for spiritual blessings in Christ. Ephes. i. 3.

1 Loud be thy name adored,
Thy titles spread abroad,
Of Christ, our glorious Lord,
The Father and the God!

Through such a Son,
Thy church's head,
Thine honours spread
O'er worlds unknown.

2 Ten thousand gifts of love
From thee through him descend,
And bear our souls above,
To joys that never end:
To heaven they soar,
Sustained by God,
And through the road
His arm adore.

3 Ten thousand songs of praise
Shall by the Saviour rise,
And through eternal days
Shall echo round the skies.
New shouts we 'll give,
And loud proclaim
The honoured name
By which we live.

HYMN CCLXXXIV.

The grand scheme of the gospel. Eph. i. 9—11.

1 We sing the deep mysterious plan,
Which God devised ere time began,
At length disclosed in all its light.
We bless the wondrous birth of love,
Which beams around us from above,
With grace so free, and hope so bright.

2 Here has the wise Eternal Mind
In Christ, their common head, conjoined
Gentiles and Jews, and earth and heaven:
Through him, from the great Father's throne,
Rivers of bliss come rolling down,
And endless peace and life are given.

3 No more the awful cherubs guard
The tree of life with flaming sword,
To drive afar man's trembling race;
At Salem's pearly gates they stand,
And smiling wait (a friendly band!)
To welcome strangers to the place.

4 While we expect that glorious sight,
Love shall our hearts with theirs unite,
And ardent hope our bosoms raise:
From earth's dark vale, and tongues of clay,
To these resplendent realms of day,
We 'll try to send the sounding praise.

HYMN CCLXXXV.

The heavenly inheritance made known by the Spirit. Eph. i. 18.

1 Come, thou celestial Spirit, come,
And call my roving passions home:
To mine enlightened eyes display
The heritage of heavenly day.

2 My God, that heritage is thine:
How rich, how glorious, how divine!
How far above all mortal things,
The little pride of courts and kings!

3 Of endless joy the unbounded store,
Why is its lustre known no more?
Away, ye mists of envious night,
That veil salvation from my sight!

4 Shine forth, Almighty Saviour, shine;
Show the bright world, and show it mine.
Then paradise on earth shall spring,
And mortal worms like angels sing.

HYMN CCLXXXVI.

Salvation by grace. Eph. ii.

1 Grace! 'tis a charming sound,
Harmonious to my ear;
Heaven with the echo shall resound,
And all the earth shall hear.

2 Grace first contrived a way
To save rebellious man,
And all the steps that grace display,
Which drew the wondrous plan.

3 Grace taught my wandering feet
To tread the heavenly road,
And new supplies each hour I meet,
While pressing on to God.

4 Grace all the work shall crown
Through everlasting days;
It lays in heaven the topmost stone,
And well deserves the praise.

HYMN CCLXXXVII.

Christians risen and united with Christ to heavenly places. Eph. ii. 5, 6.

1 Stupendous grace! and can it be Designed for rebels such as we?
O let our ardent praises rise,
High as our hopes beyond the skies!

2 This flesh, by righteous vengeance slain,
Might ever in the dust remain;
These guilty spirits sent to dwell
Midst all the flames and fiends* of hell.

3 But lo, incarnate love descends:
Down to the sepulchre it bends:
Rising, it tears the bars away,
And springs to its own native day.

4 Then was our sepulchre unclosed!
Then was our path to glory cleared:
Then, if that Saviour be our own,
Did we ascend a heavenly throne.

* Demons.

5 A moment shall our joy complete,
And fix us in that shining seat,
Bought by the pangs our Lord endured,
And by unchanging truth secured.

6 O may that love, in strains sublime,
Be sung to the last hour of time!
And let eternity confess,
Through all its rounds, the matchless grace.

HYMN CCLXXXVIII.

Nearness to God through Christ. Eph. ii. 13.

1 And are we now brought near to God,
Who once at distance stood?
And to effect this glorious change,
Did Jesus shed his blood?

2 O for a song of ardent praise
To bear our souls above!
What should allay our lively hope,
Or damp our flaming love?

3 Draw us, O Lord, with quickening grace,
And bring us yet more near;
Here may we see thy glories shine,
And taste thy mercies here.

4 O may that love, which spread thy board,
Dispose us for the feast;
May faith behold a smiling God
Through Jesus' bleeding breast.

5 Fired with the view, our souls shall rise
In such a scene as this,
And view the happy moment near,
That shall complete our bliss.

HYMN CCLXXXIX.

The institution of a gospel ministry from Christ. Eph. iv. 11, 12.

For the Ordination or Settlement of a Minister.

1 Father of mercies, in thy house
Smile on our homage and our vows;
While with a grateful heart we share
These pledges of our Saviour's care.

2 The Saviour, when to heaven he rose
In splendid triumph o'er his foes,
Scattered his gifts on men below,
And wide his royal bounties flow.

3 Hence sprung the apostles' honoured name,
Sacred beyond heroic fame;
Hence dictates the prophetic sage,
And hence the evangelic page.

4 In lowlier forms, to bless our eyes,
Pastors from hence, and teachers rise;
Who, though with feebler rays they shine,
Still add a long-extended line.

5 From Christ their varied gifts derive,
And fed by Christ their graces live:
While, guarded by his potent hand,
'Midst all the rage of hell they stand.

6 So shall the bright succession run
Through the last courses of the sun;
While unborn churches by their care
Shall rise and flourish, large and fair.

7 Jesus our Lord their hearts shall know,
The spring, whence all those blessings flow;
Pastors and people shout his praise
Through the long round of endless days.

HYMN CCXC.

Christ the head of the church. Eph. iv. 15, 16.

1 Jesus, I sing thy matchless grace,
That calls a worm thy own;
Gives me among thy saints a place
To make thy glories known.

2 Allied to thee our vital Head,
We act, and grow, and thrive:
From thee divided, each is dead,
When most he seems alive.

3 Thy saints on earth, and those above,
Here join in sweet accord;
One body all in mutual love,
And thou, our common Lord.

4 O may my faith each hour derive
Thy Spirit with delight;
While death and hell in vain shall strive
This bond to disunite.

5 Thou the whole body wilt present
Before thy Father's face;
Not shall a wrinkle or a spot
Its beauteous form disgrace.

HYMN CCXCI.

Love to others urged from Christ's love, in giving himself a sacrifice. Eph. v. 2.

1 Now be that sacrifice surveyed,
That ransom which the Saviour paid;
That sight familiar to my view,
Yet always wondrous, always new.

2 The Lamb of God, that groaned and bled
And gently bowed his dying head;
While love to sinners fired his heart,
And conquered all the killing smart.

3 Blest Jesus, while thy grace I sing,
What grateful tribute shall I bring,
That earth and heaven and thou mayst see
My love to him, who died for me?

4 That offering, Lord, thy word hath taught,
Nor be thy new command forgot,

That, if their Master's death can move
Thy servants should each other love.

5 When to thy sacred cross we fly,
There let each savage passion die:
While the warm streams of blood divine
Melt our cold hearts to love like thine.

HYMN CCXCII.

The wisdom of redeeming time. Eph. v. 15, 16.

1 God of eternity, from thee
Did infant Time his being draw;
Moments and days, and months and years,
Revolve by thine unvaried law.

2 Silent and slow they glide away,
Steady and strong the current flows,
Lost in eternity's wild sea,
The boundless gulf, from whence it rose.

3 With it the thoughtless sons of men
Before the rapid streams are borne
On to that everlasting home,
Where not one soul can e'er return.

4 Yet while the shore on either side
Presents a gaudy flattering show,
We gaze, in fond amusement lost,
Nor think to what a world we go.

5 Great source of wisdom, teach my heart
To know the price of every hour,
That time may bear me on to joys
Beyond its measure, and its power.

HYMN CCXCIII.

Christ's love to the church in giving himself for it, &c.
Eph. v. 25—27.

1 Bridegroom of souls, how rich thy love!
How generous, how divine!
Our inmost hearts it well may move,
While thus our voices join.

2 Deformed and wretched once we lay,
Worthy thy hate and scorn:
Yet love like thine could find a way
To rescue and adorn.

3 Thou art our ransom; from thy veins
A wondrous fountain flows,
To wash thy bride from all her stains,
And heal our deepest woes.

4 Transformed by thee, e'en here below
Thy church is bright and fair:
But O! how glorious shall she show,
When Jesus shall appear!

5 Thine eye shall all her form survey,
With infinite delight,
Confessed in that illustrious day,
Unblemished in thy sight.

HYMN CCXCIV.

Christ's service, the fruit of our labours on earth.
Phil. i. 22.

1 My gracious Lord, I own thy right
To every service I can pay:
And call it my supreme delight
To hear thy dictates and obey.

2 What is my being, but for thee,
Its sure support, its noblest end?
Thy ever-smiling face to see,
And serve the cause of such a friend.

3 I would not breathe for worldly joy,
Or to increase my worldly good;
Nor future days or powers employ
To spread a sounding name abroad.

4 'Tis to my Saviour I would live;
To him, who for my ransom died;
Nor could untainted Eden give
Such bliss as blossoms at his side.

5 His work my hoary age shall bless,
When youthful vigour is no more:
And my last hour of life confess
His love hath animating power.

HYMN CCXCV.

The happiness of departing, and being with Christ.
Phil. i. 23.

1 While on the verge of life I stand,
And view the scenes on either hand,
My spirit struggles with its clay,
And longs to wing its flight away.

2 Where Jesus dwells my soul would be,
It faints my much loved Lord to see.
Earth, twine no more about my heart,
For 'tis far better to depart.

3 Come, ye angelic convoys, come,
And bear the willing pilgrim home.
Ye know the way to Jesus' throne,
Source of my joys, and of your own.

4 That blessed interview, how sweet!
To fall transported at his feet!
Raised in his arms, to view his face
Through the full beamings of his grace.

5 To see heaven's shining courtiers round,
Each with immortal glories crowned,
And, while his name in concert [illegible]
Beloved, and loving all to embrace!

6 As with a seraph's voice to sing!
To fly as on a cherub's wing!
Performing, with unwearied [illegible]
A present Saviour's high [illegible]

* Mercy, [illegible]

7 Yet with these prospects full in sight
I 'll wait thy signal for my flight;
For, while thy service I pursue,
I find my heaven begun below.

HYMN CCXCVI.

Pressing on in the Christian race. Phil. iii. 12–14.

1 Awake, my soul, stretch every nerve,
And press with vigour on:
A heavenly race demands thy zeal,
And an immortal crown.

2 A cloud of witnesses around
Hold thee in full survey:
Forget the steps already trod,
And onward urge thy way.

3 'Tis God's all-animating voice,
That calls thee from on high;
'Tis his own hand presents the prize
To thine aspiring eye.

4 That prize with peerless glories bright,
Which shall new lustre boast,
When victors' wreaths and monarchs' gems
Shall blend in common dust.

5 Blest Saviour, introduced by thee,
Have I my race begun;
And crowned with victory, at thy feet
I 'll lay my honours down.

HYMN CCXCVII.

God supplying the necessities of his people.
Phil. iv. 19, 20.

1 My God, how cheerful is the sound!
How pleasant to repeat!
Well may that heart with pleasure bound,
Where God hath fixed his seat.

2 What want shall not our God supply
From his redundant stores?
What streams of mercy from on high
An arm almighty pours!

3 From Christ, the ever-living spring,
These ample blessings flow:
Prepare, my lips, his name to sing,
Whose heart hath loved us so.

4 Now to our Father and our God
Be endless glory given,
Through all the realms of man's abode,
And through the highest heaven.

HYMN CCXCVIII.

Thankfulness for being made meet for the heavenly inheritance. Coloss. i. 12.

1 All-glorious God, what hymns of praise
Shall our transported voices raise!
What flaming love and zeal is due,
While heaven stands open to our view!

2 Once we were fallen, and oh! how low!
Just on the brink of endless woe;
Doomed to a heritage in hell,
Where sinners all in darkness dwell.

3 But lo, a ray of cheerful light
Scatters the horrid shades of night!
Lo, what triumphant grace is shown
To souls impoverished and undone!

4 Far, far beyond these mortal shores
A bright inheritance is ours;
Where saints in light our coming wait,
To share their holy blissful state.

5 If ready drest for heaven we shine,
Thine are the robes, the crown is thine:
May endless years their course prolong,
While "Thine the praise," is all our song.

HYMN CCXCIX.

Angels and Christians united in Christ, as their common head. Coloss. ii. 10.

1 Hail to Emanuel's ever honoured name!
Spread it, ye angels, through heaven's sacred flame.
Ye sceptred cherubim, before his throne,
And flaming seraphim, bow humbly down.
He is your head; with prostrate awe adore him,
And lay with joy your radiant crowns before him.

2 Arrayed in his refulgent beams ye shine,
And draw existence † from his source divine:
Grateful ye wait the signal of his hand,
Honoured too highly by his least command:
In him the indwelling Deity admiring,
And to his brighter image still aspiring.

3 Mortals with you in cheerful homage join,
And bring their anthems to Emanuel's shrine:
Mean as we are, with sins and griefs beset,
We glory, that in him we are complete.
He is our head, and we with you adore him,
And pour our wants, our joys, our hearts before him.

4 We sing the blood that ransomed us from hell;
We sing the graces that in Jesus dwell;
Led by his Spirit, guarded by his hand,
Our hopes anticipate your goodly land
Still his incarnate Deity admiring,
And with heaven's hierarchy; in praise conspiring.

HYMN CCC.

Christians, as risen with Christ, exhorted to seek things above. Coloss. iii. 1.

1 Hearken, ye children of your God;
Ye heirs of glory, hear;

For accents so divine as these
Might charm the dullest ear.

2 Baptized into your Saviour's death,
Your souls to sin must die;
With Christ our Lord ye live anew,
With Christ ascend on high.

3 There at his Father's hand he sits
Enthroned divinely fair;
Yet owns himself your brother still,
And your forerunner there.

4 Rise from these earthly trifles, rise
On wings of faith and love;
Jesus your choicest treasure lies,
And be your hearts, above.

5 But earth and sin will drag us down,
When we attempt to fly;
Lord, send thy strong attractive force,
To raise and fix us high.

HYMN CCCI.

The prosperity of the church, the life of a faithful minister. 1 Thess. iii. 8.

1 Blest Jesus, bow thine ear,
While we entreat thy love:
O come, and all our hearts possess,
And our best passions move.

2 May we stand fast in thee,
Though storms and tempests beat;
And in thy guardian arms obtain
A calm and safe retreat.

3 Still be thy truth maintained,
And still thy word obeyed,
And to the merits of thy blood
A constant homage paid.

4 So shall thy shepherds live
And raise their cheerful head,
And, in such blessings on their flock,
Confess their toils repaid.

HYMN CCCII.

Comfort on the death of a pious friend. 1 Thess. iv. 17, 18.

1 Transporting tidings which we hear!
What music to the pious ear!
Christ loves each humble saint so well,
He with his Lord shall ever dwell.

2 Blest Jesus, source of every grace,
From far to view thy smiling face,
While absent thus by faith we live,
Exceeds all joys that earth can give.

3 But O! what ecstasy unknown
Fills the wide circle round thy throne,
Where every rapturous hour appears
Nobler than millions of our years!

4 Millions by millions multiplied
Shall ne'er thy saints from thee divide;
But the bright legions live and praise
Through all thy own immortal days.

5 O happy dead, in thee that sleep,
While o'er their mouldering dust we weep!
O faithful Saviour, who shall come
That dust to ransom from the tomb!

6 While thine unerring word imparts
So rich a cordial to our hearts,
Through tears our triumphs shall be shown,
Though round their graves, and near our own.

HYMN CCCIII.

Christ glorified and admired in his saints at the [illegible] day. 2 Thess. i. 10.

1 Ye heavens, with sounds of triumph ring;
Ye angels, burst into a song;
Jesus descends, victorious King,
And leads his shining train along.

2 Ye saints that sleep in dust, arise;
Let joy re-animate your clay;
Spring to your Saviour through the skies,
And round his throne your homage pay.

3 Then let the sons of heaven draw nigh,
While to the astonished hosts you tell,
How feeble mortals rose so high
From graves and worms, from sin and hell.

4 Tell them, in accents like their own,
What an incarnate God could do;
Then point to Jesus on the throne,
And boast, that Jesus died for you.

5 Transported, they the [illegible]
Their voices catch the sacred name;
Harmonious to his Father's ear,
Jesus the God, their harps proclaim.

6 Sin hath its [illegible]
That thou mightst prove thy power to save;
And death its ensigns wide displayed,
That thou mightst triumph o'er the grave.

HYMN CCCIV.

Christ seen of angels. 1 Tim. iii. 16.

1 O ye immortal throng
Of angels round the throne,
Join with our feeble song,
To make the Saviour known:
On earth ye knew
His wondrous grace,
His beauteous face
In heaven ye view.

* [illegible]

2 Ye saw the heaven-born child
In human flesh arrayed,
Benevolent and mild.
While in the manger laid.
And praise to God,
And peace on earth,
For such a birth,
Proclaimed aloud.

3 Ye in the wilderness
Beheld the tempter spoiled,
Well known in every dress,
In every combat foiled;
And joyed to crown
The Victor's head,
When Satan fled
Before his frown.

4 Around the bloody tree
Ye pressed with strong desire,
That wondrous sight to see,
The Lord of life expire;
And could your eyes
Have known a tear,
Had dropped it there
In sad surprise.

5 Around his sacred tomb
A willing watch ye keep;
Till the blest moment come
To rouse him from his sleep:
Then rolled the stone,
And all adored
Your rising Lord
With joy unknown.

6 When all arrayed in light
The shining conqueror rode,
Ye hailed his rapturous flight
Up to the throne of God;
And waved around
Your golden wings,
And struck your strings
Of sweetest sound.

7 The warbling notes pursue,
And louder anthems raise;
While mortals sing with you
Their own Redeemer's praise.
And thou my heart,
With equal flame,
And joy the same,
Perform thy part.

HYMN CCCV.

The stability of the divine foundation, and its double inscription. 2 Tim. ii. 19.

1 To thee, great Architect on high,
Immortal thanks be paid,
Who, to support thy sinking saints,
This firm foundation laid.

2 Fixed on a rock thy gospel stands,
And braves[a] the rage of hell;
And while the Saviour's hand protects,
His blood cements it well.

3 Here will I build my final hope:
Here rest my weary soul;
Majestic shall the fabric rise,
Till glory crown the whole.

4 Deep on my heart, all-gracious Lord,
Engrave its double seal;
Which, while it speaks thy honoured name,
Its sacred use may tell.

5 Dear by a thousand tender bonds,
Thy saints to thee are known;
And, conscious what a name they bear,
Iniquity they shun.

HYMN CCCVI.

Persecution to be expected by every true Christian.
2 Tim. iii. 12.

1 Great Leader of thine Israel's host,
We shout thy conquering name;
Legions of foes beset thee round,
And legions fled with shame.

2 A victory glorious and complete
Thou by thy death didst gain;
So in thy cause may we contend,
And death itself sustain.

3 By our illustrious General fired,
We no extremes would fear;
Prepared to struggle and to bleed,
If thou, our Lord, be near.

4 We'll trace the footsteps thou hast shown
To triumph and renown;
Nor shun thy combat and thy cross,
May we but share thy crown.

HYMN CCCVII.

The Christian scheme of salvation worthy of God.
Heb. ii. 10.

1 Immortal God, on thee we call,
The great original of all;
Through thee we are, to thee we tend,
Our sure support, our glorious end.

2 We praise that wise mysterious grace,
That pitied our revolted race,
And Jesus, our victorious head,
The Captain of salvation made.

3 He, thine eternal love decreed,
Should many sons to glory lead;
And sinful worms to him are given,
A colony to people heaven.

[a] Defies. [b] Rescue.

4 Jesus for us (O gracious name!)
Encounters agony and shame;
Jesus, the glorious and the great,
Was by dire suffering made complete.

5 A scene of wonders here we see,
Worthy thy Son, and worthy thee:
And while this theme employs our tongues,
All heaven unites its sweetest songs.

HYMN CCCVIII.

Satan and death conquered by the death of Christ.
Heb. ii. 14, 15.

1 Satan, the dire* invader came,
Our new-made world to annoy:
And death marched dreadful in his rear,
His captives to destroy.

2 Caught in his snares our father sunk;
With him his children fell;
And death his fatal shaft† prepared
To smite them down to hell.

3 Jesus with pitying eye beheld,
And left his starry crown,
Turned his own weapons on the foe,
And moved his legions down.

4 By death the Saviour death disarmed,
That we in light may shine;
And fixed this great mysterious law,
That dust should dust refine.

5 No more the pointed shaft we fear,
Nor dread the monster's boast;
No more the pious dead we mourn,
As friends for ever lost.

6 Their tongues, great Prince of life, shall join
With our recovered breath,
And all the immortal hosts, to ascribe
Our victory to thy death.

HYMN CCCIX.

An immediate attention to God's voice required.
Heb. iii. 15.

1 The Lord Jehovah calls,
Be every ear inclined;
May such a voice awake each heart,
And captivate the mind.

2 If he in thunder speaks,
Earth trembles at his nod;
But gentle accents here proclaim
The condescending God.

3 O harden not your hearts,
But hear his voice to-day
Lest, ere to-morrow's earliest dawn,
He call your souls away.

* Dreadful. † Dart.

3 Y

4 Almighty God, pronounce
The word of conquering grace,
So shall the flint dissolve to tears
And scorners seek thy face.

HYMN CCCX.

The eternal sabbath. Heb. iv. 9.

1 Lord of the sabbath, hear our vows,
On this thy day, in this thy house:
And own, as grateful sacrifice,
The songs, which from the desert rise.

2 Thine earthly sabbaths, Lord, we love
But there's a nobler rest above;
To that our labouring souls aspire
With ardent pangs of strong desire.

3 No more fatigue, no more distress;
Nor sin nor hell shall reach the place;
No groans to mingle with the songs
Which warble from immortal tongues.

4 No rude alarms of raging foes;
No cares to break the long repose;
No midnight shade, no clouded sun,
But sacred, high, eternal noon.

5 O long-expected day, begin;
Dawn on these realms of woe and sin
Fain would we leave this weary road,
And sleep in death to rest with God.

HYMN CCCXI.

Christ our forerunner, and the [illegible] of our hope. Heb. vi. 19, 20.

1 Jesus the Lord our souls adore,
A grateful offering now he meets
High on his Father's throne he reigns
O'er earth, and heaven's extensive plains.

2 His race for ever is complete;
For ever undisturbed his seat;
Myriads of angels round him fly,
And sing his well-gained victory.

3 Yet, midst the honours of his throne,
He joys not for himself alone,
His meanest servants share the gift
Share in that royal tender heart.

4 Rise, rise my soul, thy raptured sight,
With sacred wonder and delight;
Jesus thy own forerunner see
Entered beyond the veil for thee.

5 Loud let the howling tempest dwell,
And foaming waves to heaven's arch swell,
No shipwreck can my vessel fear
Since hope hath fixed its anchor [illegible]

HYMN CCCXII.

The evil conscience purified by the blood of Jesus. Heb. ix. 13, 14.

1 Blest be the Lamb, whose blood was spilt
To sprinkle conscience from its guilt;
To ease its pains, to calm its fears,
And purchase grace for future years.

2 Cleansed by this all atoning blood,
We joy in free access to God,
The living God, before whose face
Sinners in vain shall seek a place.

3 Rouse thee, my soul, to serve him still
With cordial love, with active zeal:
Serve him, like his own Son divine,
Who made his life the price of thine.

4 Blest Jesus, introduced by thee,
The Father's smiling face I see;
And strengthened by thy grace alone,
These grateful services are done.

5 Then must my debt from day to day
Grow with each service that I pay;
So grows my joy, dear Lord, to be
Thus more and more in debt to thee.

HYMN CCCXIII.

Death and judgment appointed to all. Heb. ix. 27.

1 Heaven has confirmed the great decree,
That Adam's race must die:
One general ruin sweeps them down,
And low in dust they lie.

2 Ye living men, the tomb survey,
Where you must quickly dwell;
Hark how the awful summons sounds
In every funeral knell!

3 Once you must die, and once for all;
The solemn purport weigh;
For know that heaven and hell are hung
On that important day.

4 Those eyes, so long in darkness veiled,
Must wake the Judge to see,
And every word, and every thought
Must pass his scrutiny.

5 O may I in the Judge behold
My Saviour and my friend,
And far beyond the reach of death
With all his saints ascend.

HYMN CCCXIV.

Christ's second appearance, &c. Heb. ix. 28.

1 Behold, the Son of God appears,
And in his flesh our sins he bears;
The victim at God's altar stood
To expiate guilt by groans and blood.

2 But lo, a second time he comes
To shake the earth and rend the tombs;
These heavens before him melt away,
And sun and stars in smoke decay.

3 Yet 'midst this general wreck and dread,
Ye saints, with triumph lift the head:
With glad surprise your Saviour meet,
Who comes to make your bliss complete.

4 My soul, a happiness so great
With pleasing expectation wait;
And, while I dwell upon the thought,
Be earth and all its toys forgot.

5 My Saviour God, what grace is thine!
Which gives a prospect so divine!
Come blessed day, and teach our tongues
How angels warble out their songs.

HYMN CCCXV.

Liberty to enter through the veil by the blood of Christ. Heb. x. 19—22.

1 Approach, ye children of your God;
Favourites of heaven, draw near;
Enter the holiest with delight,
Though his own ark be there.

2 Pass through the veil, the Saviour's flesh,
That new and living way:
And majesty enshrined * in love
Shall gentle beams display.

3 Jesus with sin-atoning blood
The throne hath sprinkled o'er;
His fragrant incense spreads its cloud,
And justice flames no more.

4 Approach with boldness and with joy,
But spotless all draw near;
Pure be your lives from every stain,
And every conscience clear.

5 So shall the blessings of his grace
On all your souls distil,
Till each a royal priest appears
On his celestial hill.

HYMN CCCXVI.

God's fidelity to his promises. Heb. x. 23.

1 The promises I sing,
Which sovereign love hath spoke;
Nor will the eternal King
His words of grace revoke.
They stand secure,
And steadfast still
Not Zion's hill
Abides so sure.

* Shekinah.

2 The mountains melt away
When once the Judge appears,
And sun and moon decay,
That measure mortals' years;
But still the same,
In radiant lines,
The promise shines
Through all the flame.

3 Their harmony shall sound
Through mine attentive ears,
When thunders cleave the ground,
And dissipate the spheres:
'Midst all the shock
Of that dread scene,
I stand serene,
Thy word my rock.

HYMN CCCXVII.

The day approaching, a motive to love and worship.
Heb. x. 24, 25.

1 The day approacheth, O my soul,
The great decisive day,
Which from the verge of mortal life
Shall bear thee far away.

2 Another day more awful dawns;
And lo, the Judge appears:
Ye heavens, retire before his face,
And sink, ye darkened stars.

3 Yet does one short preparing hour,
One precious hour, remain;
Rouse thee, my soul, with all thy power,
Nor let it pass in vain.

4 With me my brethren soon must die,
And at that bar appear;
Now be our intercourse improved
To mutual comfort here.

5 For this, thy temple, Lord, we throng;
For this, thy board surround;
Here may our service be approved,
And in thy presence crowned.

HYMN CCCXVIII.

Abraham's faith in leaving his country at the divine command. Heb. xi. 8.

1 Now let our songs proclaim abroad
The unchanging name of Abram's God,
In him let Abram's children boast,
Their Father's ever-living Lord,
His shield, his friend, his great reward,
Who never can deceive their trust.

2 Called by thy voice, with joyful speed
He went, where thou wast pleased to lead,
Unknowing in the path he trod;
His land, his kindred [illegible]
The pious pilgrim to detain,
Propt on the promise of his God.

3 So at thy word the saint foregoes
Each tender tie the nation knows,
And hears no other voice but thine;
Marches where thou shalt point the way,
Where thou shalt pitch his tent will stay,
And learns his Isaac to resign.

4 At length, still faithful to thy own,
Thou callest him to a world unknown,
Through paths untrod by mortal feet;
Smiling, he owns thy voice in death,
Gives to the air his fleeting breath,
And finds the road to Abram's seat.

HYMN CCCXIX.

The God of the patriarchs proposes, from a view of Heb. xi. 16.

1 I am thy God, Jehovah said,
To Abram, and his chosen seed;
And still the same relation owns
To each of Abram's faithful sons.

2 Sovereign of heaven, what words of love
So grand a gift shall approve?
What splendid gifts will God bestow
That all its high import may know?

3 Not the rich flocks and herds that feed
Round Abram's tents in Mamre's mead,
Not Joseph's chariot, nor the throne,
Ivory and gold, of Solomon.

4 Not Canaan's plains a lot can prove Proportioned to Jehovah's love;
Not Zion's sacred mountain, where
His temple glittered like a star.

5 O'er Zion's mount, o'er Canaan's plains,
Oppression now and horror reigns:
And where the throne of David stood
His tomb a [illegible]

6 'Tis in the heaven of heavens alone
Thou makest thy wondrous friendship known;
A city there thy hand prepares,
Fixed as thy own eternal years.

7 Long as thy reign [illegible]
The blissful nations shall confess,
Thy sovereign love has there bestowed
Salvation worthy of a God.

HYMN CCCXX.

Moses's great choice. Heb. xi. 25.

1 My soul, with all thy weaknesses [illegible]
Survey the heavenly prize:

Nor let these glittering toys of earth
Allure thy wandering eyes.

2 The splendid crown, which Moses sought,
Still beams around his brow;
Though soon great Pharaoh's sceptred pride
Was taught by death to bow.

3 The joys and treasures of a day
I cheerfully resign;
Rich in that large immortal store,
Secured by grace divine.

4 Let fools my wiser choice deride,
Angels and God approve;
Nor scorn of men, nor rage of hell,
My stedfast soul shall move.

5 With ardent eye that bright reward
I daily will survey;
And in the blooming prospect lose
The sorrows of the way.

HYMN CCCXXI.

Acting as seeing him who is invisible. Heb. xi. 27.

1 Eternal and immortal King,
Thy peerless[a] splendours none can bear,
But darkness veils seraphic eyes,
When God with all his lustre 's there.

2 Yet faith can pierce the awful gloom,
The great Invisible can see;
And with its tremblings mingle joy
In fixed regards, great God, to thee.

3 Then every tempting form of sin,
Shamed in thy presence, disappears!
And all the glowing raptured soul
The likeness it contemplates wears.

4 O ever-conscious to my heart,
Witness to its supreme desire,
Behold, it presseth on to thee,
For it hath caught the heavenly fire.

5 This one petition would it urge,
To bear thee ever in its sight;
In life, in death, in worlds unknown,
Its only portion and delight.

HYMN CCCXXII.

Subjection to God the Father of our spirits.
Heb. xii. 9.

1 Eternal source of life and thought,
Be all beneath thyself forgot;
Whilst thee, great parent-mind, we own
In prostrate homage round thy throne.

2 Whilst in themselves our souls survey
Of thee some faint reflected ray,
They wondering to their Father rise,
His power how vast! his thoughts how wise!

3 Behold us as thine offspring, Lord,
And do not cast us off abhorred;
Nor let thy hand, so long our joy,
Be raised in vengeance to destroy.

4 O may we live before thy face,
The willing subjects of thy grace;
And through each path of duty move
With filial awe, and filial love.

HYMN CCCXXIII.

The immutability of Christ. Heb. xiii. 8

1 With transport, Lord, our souls proclaim
The immortal honours of thy name:
Assembled round our Saviour's throne,
We make his ceaseless glories known.

2 High on his Father's royal seat
Our Jesus shone divinely great,
Ere Adam's clay with life was warmed,
Or Gabriel's nobler spirit formed.

3 Through all succeeding ages he
The same hath been, the same shall be;
Immortal radiance gilds his head,
While stars and suns wax old and fade.

4 The same his power his flock to guard;
The same his bounty to reward;
The same his faithfulness and love
To saints on earth, and saints above.

5 Let nature change, and sink, and die;
Jesus shall raise his chosen high,
And fix them near his stable throne,
In glory changeless as his own.

HYMN CCCXXIV.

Watching for souls in the view of the great account.
Heb. xiii. 17.

For the Ordination of a Minister.

1 Let Zion's watchmen all awake,
And take the alarm they give;
Now let them from the mouth of God
Their solemn charge receive.

2 'Tis not a cause of small import
The pastor's care demands;
But what might fill an angel's heart,
And filled a Saviour's hands.

3 They watch for souls, for which the Lord
Did heavenly bliss forego;[b]
For souls which must for ever live
In raptures, or in woe.

4 All to the great tribunal haste,
The account to render there

[a] Unequalled.

[b] Forsook.

And shouldst thou strictly mark our faults,
Lord, how shall we appear?

5 May they that Jesus, whom they preach,
Their own Redeemer see;
And watch thou daily o'er their souls,
That they may watch for thee.

HYMN CCCXXV

The Christian perfected by divine grace through Christ. Heb. xiii. 20, 21.

1 Father of peace, and God of love,
We own thy power to save!
That power, by which our Shepherd rose
Victorious o'er the grave.

2 We triumph in that Shepherd's name,
Still watchful for our good;
Who brought the eternal covenant down,
And sealed it with his blood.

3 So may thy Spirit seal my soul,
And mould it to thy will;
That my fond heart no more may stray,
But keep thy covenant still.

4 Still may we gain superior strength,
And press with vigour on,
Till full perfection crown our hopes,
And fix us near thy throne.

HYMN CCCXXVI

Christians begotten to God as the first-fruits of his creatures. James i. 18.

1 Now to that sovereign grace,
Whence all our comforts spring,
Let the whole new-begotten race
Their cheerful praises bring.

2 His will first made the choice;
His word the change hath wrought;
In him, our Father, we rejoice,
Nor be the name forgot.

3 Lord, may this matchless love,
Which thy own children see,
Make us from all thy creatures prove
As the first fruits to thee.

4 Sacred to thee alone
Be all these powers of mine;
Then in the noblest sense my own,
When most entirely thine.

HYMN CCCXXVII

Looking into the perfect law of liberty, and continuing in it. James i. 25.

1 Behold the glass the gospel lends,
That men themselves may view:
How free from stain its surface is!
How polished, and how true!

2 Behold that wise, that perfect law,
Which noblest freedom gives;
O may it all our souls refine,
And sanctify our lives!

3 Not with a transient glance surveyed,
And in an hour forgot,
But deep inscribed on every heart,
To reign o'er every thought.

4 Great Author of each perfect gift,
Thy sovereign grace display,
That these rebellious roving powers
May hearken and obey.

5 Inspired by thee, our feeble souls
Shall pass victorious on;
As the faint dawning light improves
To all the blaze of noon.

HYMN CCCXXVIII

James's advice to sinners. James iv. 7, 8.

1 Ye sinners, bend your stubborn necks
Beneath the yoke divine;
In low submission bow ye down
Before his sacred shrine.

2 In penitential streams your tedious mourn
And seek his injured grace;
And wait with broken bleeding hearts
The openings of his face.

3 Resist the tempter's fierce attacks,
And he shall speed his flight;
Draw near to God, and his embrace
Shall fold you with delight.

4 Ye sinners, cleanse your spotted hands,
And purge your hearts from sin;
Here fix your long-divided views,
And peace shall reign within.

5 Blest Saviour, draw us by thy love,
And fix us by thy power
When we have felt these sweet constraints,
Our souls shall rove no more.

HYMN CCCXXIX

The vanity of worldly schemes entirely from the uncertainty of life. James iv. 13–15.

1 To-morrow I and to-day
Lodged in thy sovereign hand
And if its sun arise and shine,
It shines by thy command.

2 The present moment flies,
And bears our life away;
O make thy servants truly wise,
That they may live to-day.

3 Since on this winged hour
Eternity is hung,

Waken by thine almighty power
The aged and the young.

4 One thing demands our care:
O be it still pursued!
Lest, slighted once, the season fair
Should never be renewed.

5 To Jesus may we fly
Swift as the morning light,
Lest life's young golden beams should die
In sudden endless night.

HYMN CCCXXX.

Rejoicing in an unseen Saviour. 1 Peter i. 8.

1 Meet inward joys, suppressed too long,
Ecstatic burst into a song;
From Christ, though now unseen, they rise,
And reach his throne beyond the skies.

2 His glories strike the wondering sight
Of all the first-born sons of light,
Beyond the seraphim they shine,
Unrivalled all, and all divine.

3 Yet mortal worms his friendship boast,
And make his saving name their trust:
Jesus, my Lord, I know him well:
He rescued me from death and hell.

4 This sinful heart from God estranged,
His new-creating power hath changed,
And, mingling with each secret thought,
Maintains the work, which first it wrought.

5 He gives to see his Father's face:
He gives my soul to thrive in grace;
And brings the views of glory down,
The beamings of my heavenly crown.

6 Thus entertained while here below
Unspeakable my transports grow;
New joys in swift succession roll,
And glory fills my silent soul.

HYMN CCCXXXI.

The heart purified to love unfeigned by the Spirit. 1 Peter i. 22.

1 Great Spirit of immortal love,
Vouchsafe our frozen hearts to move:
With ardour strong these breasts inflame
To all that own a Saviour's name.

2 Still let the heavenly fire endure
Fervent and vigorous, true and pure;
Let every heart and every hand
Join in the dear fraternal band.*

3 Celestial Dove, descend, and bring
The smiling blessings on thy wing;
And make us taste those sweets below
Which in the blissful mansions grow

* Heart is one.

HYMN CCCXXXII.

Tasting that the Lord is gracious. 1 Peter ii. 3.

1 Yes, it is sweet to taste his grace,
Who bought us with his blood;
My soul prefers the relish still,
To all created good.

2 O how I love that vital word
Which taught me first to live!
Thirst for that uncorrupted milk,
That I may grow and thrive!

3 All-gracious Lord, instruct us more
Thy saving gifts to know:
And let our inmost hearts rejoice,
That thou hast loved us so.

4 Open thy stores with liberal hand,
That we may daily feast;
And let each dying soul around,
The sweet salvation taste.

HYMN CCCXXXIII.

Coming to Christ as a living stone. 1 Peter ii. 4, 5

1 With ecstasy of joy
Extol his glorious name,
Who raised the spacious earth,
And raised our ruined frame;
He built the church
Who built the sky,
Shout and exalt
His honours high.

2 See the foundation laid
By power and love divine;
Jesus, his first-born Son,
How bright his glories shine!
How he descends!
In dust he lies,
That from his tomb
A church might rise.

3 But he for ever lives,
Nor for himself alone;
Each saint new light derives
From this mysterious stone;
His influence darts
Through every soul,
And in one house
Unites the whole.

4 To him with joy we move;
In him cemented stand;
The living temple grows,
And owns the Founder's hand;
That structure, Lord,
Still higher raise,
Louder to sound
Its Builder's praise

5 Descend and shed abroad
The tokens of thy grace,
And with more radiant beams
Let glory fill the place;
Our joyful souls
Shall prostrate fall,
And own, our God
Is all in all.

HYMN CCCXXXIV.

Christ the corner stone. 1 Peter ii. 6. compared with Isaiah xxviii. 16, 17.

1 Lord, dost thou show a corner stone
For us to build our hopes upon,
That the fair edifice may rise
Sublime in light beyond the skies?

2 We own the work of sovereign love
Nor death nor hell those hopes shall move,
Which fixed on this foundation stand,
Laid by thy own almighty hand.

3 Thy people long this stone have tried,
And all the powers of hell defied;
Floods of temptation beat in vain,
Well doth this rock the house sustain.

4 When storms of wrath around prevail,
Whirlwind and thunder, fire and hail,
'Tis here our trembling souls shall hide,
And here securely they abide.

5 While they that scorn this precious stone,
Fond of some quicksand of their own,
Borne down by weighty vengeance die,
And buried deep in ruin lie.

HYMN CCCXXXV.

Christ precious to the believer. 1 Peter ii. 7.

1 Jesus, I love thy charming name,
'Tis music to mine ear;
Fain would I sound it out so loud,
That earth and heaven should hear.

2 Yes, thou art precious to my soul,
My transport, and my trust;
Jewels to thee are gaudy toys,
And gold is sordid dust.

3 All my capacious powers can wish
In thee doth richly meet:
Nor to mine eyes is light so dear,
Nor friendship half so sweet.

4 Thy grace still dwells upon my heart,
And sheds its fragrance there;
The noblest balm of all its wounds,
The cordial of its care.

5 I'll speak the honours of thy name
With my last labouring breath;
Then speechless clasp thee in mine arms,
The antidote of death.

HYMN CCCXXXVI.

Noah preserved in the ark, and the [illegible]
1 Pet. iii. 20, 21

1 The deluge, at the Almighty's call,
In what impetuous streams it fell!
Swallowed the mountains in its rage,
And swept a guilty world to hell.

2 In vain the tallest sons of pride
Fled from the close-pursuing wave;
Nor could their mightiest towers defend,
Nor swiftness 'scape, nor courage save.

3 How dire the wreck! how loud the roar!
How shrill the universal cry
Of millions in the last despair,
Re-echoed from the lowering sky!

4 Yet Noah, humble happy saint,
Surrounded with the chosen few,
Sat in his ark, secure from fear,
And sang the grace that steered [illegible]

5 So I may sing, in Jesus safe,
While storms of vengeance round me fall,
Conscious how high my hopes are fixed
Beyond what shakes this earthly ball.

6 Enter thine ark, while patience waits,
Nor ever quit that sure retreat;
Then the wide flood, which buries earth,
Shall waft thee to a fairer seat.

7 Nor wreck nor ruin there is seen;
There not a wave of trouble rolls;
But the bright rainbow round the throne*
Seals endless life to all their souls.

HYMN CCCXXXVII.

The [illegible]
1 Pet. iv. 18

1 Behold God's great incarnate Son
In majesty comes flying down.
Hark! for his trumpet's awful sound
Awakes the dead, and cleaves the ground.

2 So solemn shall the judgment be,
And so severe the scrutiny,†
That, by his heart-[illegible]
The saint himself would be undone.

3 Where then, ye sons of Belial,‡ where
Will your astonished souls appear?
How will ye shun his piercing sight?
Or how resist his [illegible]

4 Up to the pointed mountains fly,
And gain the confines of the sky;
There shall ye meet celestial [illegible]
While mountains melt before his ire.§

* Rev. [illegible]
† [illegible]
‡ Rom. [illegible]
§ [illegible]

5 Call on the rending earth to save,
And in its centre search a grave;
The Judge shall well discern thee then
And drag thee trembling to his bar.

6 Deck thee around with fraud and lies,
And put on every fair disguise;
Soon shall thy painted form be known
Amidst ten thousand of his own.

7 Gird thee in arms his wrath to oppose,
And league with millions of his foes;
Soon would the rebel band expire
Like crackling thorns amidst the fire.

8 One only way may yet be found:
Submissive bow ye to the ground:
His cross a refuge will afford
From all the terrors of his sword.

HYMN CCCXXXVIII.

Humbling ourselves under God's mighty hand.
1 Peter v. 6.

1 Beneath thy mighty hand, O God,
Our souls we prostrate low;
Shine forth with gentle radiant beams,
That we thy name may know.

2 Thy hand this various frame produced,
And still supports it well;
That hand with justice and with ease
Might smite our souls to hell.

3 Conscious of meanness and of guilt,
We in the dust would lie;
Stretch forth thy condescending arm,
And lift the humble high.

4 So in the temples of thy grace
We 'll sovereign mercy own,
And, when we shine above the stars,
Extol thy grace alone.

5 The more thou raise such sinful dust,
The lower would it fall;
For less than nothing, Lord, are we,
And thou art all in all.

HYMN CCCXXXIX.

The same.

Psa. Eisteddfa.

1 Our souls with reverence, Lord, bow down,
Struck by the splendours of thy throne;
Humbled, while in thy house we stand,
Beneath thy great tremendous hand.

2 That hand, which bears the steady pole,
While nature's wheels unwearied roll;
That hand, which gives each creature food,
And fills the world with various good.

3 That hand which pierced thy darling Son
To expiate crimes that we had done
That hand, which scatters grace abroad
To turn thy foes to sons of God.

4 But oh! with what distracted rage
Have we presumed that hand to engage!
And, while long patience hath been shown,
Struggled to force thy vengeance down.

5 Here might thy wrath begin to flame,
And vindicate thine injured name:
Till the red thunders of thy hand
Had dealt destruction round our land.

6 With humble hearts our God we meet:
O raise the suppliants at thy feet!
And let that glorious arm this day
Embrace the rebels it might slay.

HYMN CCCXL.

God's care a remedy for ours. 1 Peter v. 7.

1 How gentle God's commands!
How kind his precepts are!
"Come, cast your burthens on the Lord,
And trust his constant care."

2 While Providence supports,
Let saints securely dwell;
That hand, which bears all nature up,
Shall guide his children well.

3 Why should this anxious load
Press down your weary mind?
Haste to your heavenly Father's throne,
And sweet refreshment find.

4 His goodness stands approved
Down to the present day;
I 'll drop my burthen at his feet,
And bear a song away.

HYMN CCCXLI.

Establishment in religion from the God of all grace.
1 Peter v. 10, 11.

1 How rich thy favours, God of grace!
How various and divine!
Full as the ocean they are poured,
And bright as heaven they shine.

2 He to eternal glory calls,
And leads the wondrous way,
To his own palace, where he reigns
In uncreated day.

3 Jesus, the herald of his love,
Displays the radiant prize,
And shows the purchase of his blood
To our admiring eyes.

4 He perfects what his hand begins,
And stone on stone he lays:
Till firm and fair the building rise,
A temple to his praise.

5 The songs of everlasting years
That mercy shall attend,
Which leads, through sufferings of an hour,
To joys that never end.

HYMN CCCXLII.

The circumstances of Christ's second appearing.
2 Peter iii. 11, 12.

1 My wakened soul, extend thy wings
Beyond the verge of mortal things;
See this vain world in smoke decay,
And rocks and mountains melt away.

2 Behold the fiery deluge roll
Through heaven's wide arch from pole to pole:
Pale sun, no more thy lustre boast;
Tremble and fall, ye starry host.

3 This wreck of nature all around,
The angel's shout, the trumpet's sound,
Loud the descending Judge proclaim,
And echo his tremendous name.

4 Children of Adam, all appear
With reverence round his awful bar;
For, as his lips pronounce, ye go
To endless bliss, or endless woe.

5 Lord, to mine eyes this scene display
Frequent through each revolving day,
And let thy grace my soul prepare
To meet its full redemption there.

HYMN CCCXLIII.

The importance of being prepared for Christ's second appearance. 2 Peter iii. 14.

1 "Behold, I come, (the Saviour cries,)
With winged speed I come;
My voice shall call your souls away
To their eternal home.

2 "Awake, ye sons of sloth, awake;
Your vain amusements cease,
And strive with your united powers,
That ye be found in peace.

3 "Seize the blest hour with ardent haste,
Nor slight this peaceful word,
Lest your affrighted souls in vain
Fly from my flaming sword.

4 "Happy the man, whose ready heart
Obeys the sacred call;
And shelters in my covenant grace
His everlasting all."

5 Blest Jesus, whose all-searching eye
My inmost powers can see,
Dost thou not know my willing soul
Hath lodged that all with thee?

6 Those eager eyes thy signal wait,
My dear Redeemer, come
I rove a weary pilgrim here,
And long to be at home.

HYMN CCCXLIV.

Growing in grace, &c. 2 Peter iii. 18.

1 Praise to thy name, eternal God,
For all the grace thou shed'st abroad;
For all thine influence from above
To warm our souls with sacred love.

2 Blest be thy hand, which from the skies
Brought down this plant of Paradise,
And gave its heavenly glories birth,
To deck this wilderness of earth.

3 But why does that celestial flower
Open, and thrive, and shine no more?
Where are its balmy odours fled;
And why reclines its beauteous head?

4 Too plain, alas! the languor shows
The unkindly soil in which it grows;
Where the black frosts and beating storm
Wither and rend its tender form.

5 Unchanging sun, thy beams display
To drive the frosts and storms away;
Make all thy potent virtues known
To cheer a plant so much thy own.

6 And thou, blest Spirit, deign to blow
Fresh gales of heaven on shrubs below;
So shall they grow and breathe abroad
A fragrance grateful to our God.

HYMN CCCXLV.

Experimental knowledge communicated.
1 John i. 1—3.

1 Jesus, mine advocate above,
Let me not hear of thee alone,
But make the wonders of thy love
By deep experience sweetly known.

2 On thee my soul would fix its eye;
My lips would taste thy heavenly grace;
Then would I raise thine honours high,
And teach a thousand tongues thy praise.

3 The sacred flame from heart to heart
Should with a rapid progress run;
Till each in God could boast his part,
Through sweet communion with his Son.

4 Thus may the servants of the Lord
Feel the salvation they proclaim;
And thus may crowds receive the word,
And echo back the Saviour's name.

HYMN CCCXLVI.

Communion with God and Christ. 1 John i. 3

1 Our heavenly Father calls,
And Christ invites us near;

With both our friendship shall be sweet,
And our communion dear.

2 God pities all my griefs;
He pardons every day;
Almighty to protect my soul,
And wise to guide my way.

3 How large his bounties are!
What various stores of good,
Diffused from my Redeemer's hand,
And purchased with his blood!

4 Jesus, my living head,
I bless thy faithful care;
Mine advocate before the throne,
And my forerunner there.

5 Here fix, my roving heart;
Here wait, my warmest love;
Till the communion be complete
In nobler scenes above.

HYMN CCCXLVII.

The privileges of saints by the blood of Jesus.
1 John i. 7.

1 My various powers, awake
To sound redeeming grace;
To him that washed us in his blood,
Ascribe eternal praise.

2 What though our guilt appears
Dyed in a crimson grain?
The stream, that flows from Jesus' side,
Shall purge away the stain.

3 'Midst all our various forms
We in this centre meet;
Our hearts cemented by his blood,
Shall taste communion sweet.

4 Then let us walk in light,
Like Christ, whose name we wear;
And, as the pledge of endless bliss,
Our Father's image bear.

HYMN CCCXLVIII.

The blood of Christ cleansing from all sin.
1 John i. 7.

1 My sins, alas! how foul the stains!
How deep, and oh! how wide!
O'er my polluted soul they spread,
In double crimson dyed.

2 How shall I stand before that God,
In whose all piercing sight
Some shades of darkness seem to veil
The purest sons of light?

3 Where shall I wash these spots away,
And make my nature clean,
Since drops of penitential grief
Are tinctured still with sin?

4 Behold a torrent all divine
Flows from the Saviour's side,
And strangely bears a crystal stream
Amidst the purple tide. *

5 Here will I bathe my spotted soul,
And make it pure and fair;
Till not the eye of God discern
One foul pollution there

6 Then, drest in robes of snowy white,
I'll join the shining band,
And learn new anthems to the Lamb,
While round his throne we stand.

HYMN CCCXLIX.

Having the Son, and having life in him. 1 John v. 2.

1 O happy Christian, who can boast,
"The Son of God is mine!"
Happy, though humbled in the dust;
Rich in this gift divine.

2 He lives the life of heaven below,
And shall for ever live;
Eternal streams from Christ shall flow,
And endless vigour give.

3 That life we ask with bended knee,
Nor will the Lord deny;
Nor will celestial mercy see
Its humble suppliants die.

4 That life obtained, for praise alone
We wish continued breath;
And taught by blest experience, own
That praise can live in death.

HYMN CCCL.

Christ the first and the last, humbled to death, and exalted to an eternal triumph over it. Rev. i. 17, 18.

1 What mysteries, Lord, in thee combine!
Jesus, once mortal, yet divine:
The first, the last; the end, the head;
The source of life among the dead.

2 O love, beyond the stretch of thought!
What matchless wonders hath it wrought!
My faith, while she the grace declares,
Trembles beneath the load she bears.

3 Hail, royal Conqueror o'er the grave,
Tender to pity, strong to save!
For ever live, for ever reign,
And prosperous may thy throne remain!

4 Thy saints, obedient to thy word,
With humble joy surround thy board;

* Refer to the blood and water that came out of Christ's wounded side. John xix. 34.

And, long as time pursues its race,
Proclaim thy death, and shout thy grace.

5 In the full choir, where angels join
Their harps of melody divine,
Thy death inspires a song of praise,
New through thy life's eternal days.

HYMN CCCLI.

The keys of death and the unseen world in Christ's hand. Rev. i. 18.

1 Hail to the Prince of life and peace,
Who holds the keys of death and hell!
The spacious world unseen is his,
And sovereign power becomes him well.

2 In shame and torment once he died;
But now he lives for evermore:
Bow down, ye saints, around his seat,
And, all ye angel bands, adore.

3 So live for ever, glorious Lord,
To crush thy foes, and guard thy friends;
While all thy chosen tribes rejoice
That thy dominion never ends.

4 Worthy thy hand to hold the keys,
Guided by wisdom, and by love;
Worthy to rule o'er mortal life,
O'er worlds below, and worlds above.

5 When death thy servants shall invade,
When powers of hell thy church annoy,
Controlled by thee, their rage shall help
The cause they laboured to destroy.

6 For ever reign, victorious King:
Wide through the earth thy name be known;
And call my longing soul to sing
Sublimer anthems near thy throne.

HYMN CCCLII.

Christ's care of ministers and churches. Rev. ii. 1.

1 We bless the eternal source of light,
Who makes the stars to shine;
And, through this dark beclouded world,
Diffuseth rays divine.

2 We bless the churches' sovereign King,
Whose golden lamps we are;
Fixed in the temples of his love
To shine with radiance fair.

3 Still be our purity preserved
Still fed with oil the flame:
And in deep characters inscribed
Our heavenly Master's name.

4 Then, while between our ranks he walks,
And all our state surveys,
His smiles shall with new lustre deck
The people of his praise.

HYMN CCCLIII.

The Christian warrior animated and crowned. Rev. ii. 10.

1 Hark! 'tis our heavenly Leader's voice
From his triumphant seat:
'Midst all the war's tumultuous noise,
How powerful and how sweet!

2 "Fight on, my faithful band, (he cries,)
Nor fear the mortal blow:
Who first in such a warfare dies
Shall speediest victory know.

3 "I have my days of combat known,
And in the dust was laid;
But thence I mounted to my throne,
And glory crowns my head.

4 "That throne, that glory you shall share;
My hands the crown shall give;
And you the sparkling honours wear,
While God himself shall live."

5 Lord, 'tis enough; our bosoms glow
With courage, and with love:
Thy hand shall bear thy soldiers through,
And raise their heads above.

6 My soul, while death beset me round,
Erects her ardent eyes,
And longs, through some illustrious wound,
To rush and seize the prize.

HYMN CCCLIV.

The pillar in God's heavenly temple, with a new inscription. Rev. iii. 12.

1 All-hail, victorious Saviour, hail!
I bow to thy command;
And own, that David's royal key
Well fits thy sovereign hand!

2 Open the treasures of thy love,
And shed thy gifts abroad
Unveil to my prevailing eyes
The temple of my God.

3 There as a pillar let me stand
On an eternal base
Prepared by thine almighty hand,
And polished by thy grace.

4 There deep engraven let me bear
The title of my God;
And mark the New Jerusalem,
As my secure abode.

5 In lasting characters inscribe
Thy own beloved name,
That endless ages there may read
The great Emanuel's claim.

6 Lead on, my General; I defy
What earth or hell can do;
Thy conduct, and this glorious hope
Shall bear thy soldier through.

HYMN CCCLV.

God's covenant unchangeable; or, The rainbow round about the throne. Rev. iv. 3. compared with Gen. ix. 13—17.

1 Supreme of beings, with delight
Our eyes survey this heavenly sight;
And trace with admiration sweet
The beaming splendours of thy feet.

2 Jasper and sapphire strive in vain
To paint the glories of thy train;
Thy robes all stream eternal light,
Too powerful for a cherub's sight.

3 Yet round thy throne the rainbow shines,
Fair emblem of thy kind designs;
Bright pledge, that speaks thy covenant sure
Long as thy kingdom shall endure.

4 No more shall deluges of woe
Thy new-created world o'erflow;
Jesus, our sun, his beams displays,
And gilds the clouds with beauteous rays.

5 No gems so bright, no forms so fair;
Mercy and truth shall triumph there:
Thy saints shall bless the peaceful sign,
When stars and suns forget to shine.

6 E'en here, while storms, and gloomy shade,
And horrors, all the scene o'erspread,
Faith views the throne with piercing eye,
And boasts the rainbow still is high.

HYMN CCCLVI.

Victory over Satan by the blood of the Lamb, and the word of the testimony of his servants. Rev. xii. 11.

1 See the old dragon from his throne
Sink with enormous ruin down!
Banished from heaven, and doomed to dwell
Deep in the fiery gloom of hell!

2 Ye heavens, with all your hosts, rejoice:
Ye saints, in concert lend your voice:
Approach your Lord's victorious seat,
And tread the foe beneath your feet.

3 But whence a conquest so divine
Gained by such feeble hands as mine?
Or whence can sinful mortals boast
O'er Satan and his rebel-host?

4 'Twas from thy blood, thou slaughtered Lamb,
That all our palms and triumphs came;
Thy cross, thy spear, inflicts the stroke,
By which the monster's head is broke.

5 Thy faithful word our hope maintains
Through all our combat and our pains;
The accents of thy heavenly breath
Thy soldiers bear through wounds and death.

6 Triumphant Lamb, in worlds unknown,
With transport round thy radiant throne,
Thy happy legions, all complete,
Shall lay their laurels at thy feet.

HYMN CCCLVII.

The song of Moses and the Lamb. Rev. xv. 3.

1 Israel, the tribute bring
To God's victorious name;
The song of Moses sing,
Of Moses and the Lamb:
Improve his lays; *
The theme exceeds,
And nobler deeds
Demand our praise.

2 The prince of hell arose
With impious rage and pride,
And 'midst our numerous foes
Our feeble power defied;
"I will o'ertake,
And I destroy,
My hand with joy
Shall force thee back."

3 Thy hand, Almighty Lord,
Thy trembling Israel saves;
Thine unresisted word
Divides the threatening waves:
Thy hosts pass o'er;
The foe o'erthrown
Sinks like a stone,
To rise no more.

4 Our triumphs we prepare,
And cheerful anthems raise;
Jehovah's arm made bare
Demands immortal praise;
And while we sing,
Ye shores, proclaim
His wondrous name,
Ye deserts, ring.

5 Through all the wilderness
Thy presence, Lord, shall lead;
And bring us to the place,
Thy sovereign love decreed;
Those blissful plains,
Where all around
Hosannas sound,
And transport reigns.

* Sung-ed pass.

HYMN CCCLVIII.

The conquest of death and grief by saints of the heavenly state. Rev. xxi. 4.

1 Lift up, ye saints, your weeping eyes,
Suspend your sorrows and your sighs;
Turn all your groans to joyful songs,
Which Jesus dictates to your tongues.

2 Thus saith the Saviour from his throne,
"Behold all former things are gone,
Past like an anxious dream away,
Chased by the golden beams of day.

3 "See in celestial pomp arrayed
A new-created world displayed;
Mark with what light its prospects shine!
How grand, how various, how divine!

4 "There my own gentle hand shall dry
Each tear from each o'erflowing eye,
And open wide my friendly breast
To lull the weary soul to rest.

5 "No more shall grief assail your heart,
No boding fear, no piercing smart;
For ever there my people dwell
Beyond the range of death and hell."

6 Vain king of terrors, boast no more
Thine ancient wide-extended power;
Each saint in life with Christ his head
Shall reign, when thou thyself art dead.

HYMN CCCLIX.

Christ, the root and offspring of David, and the morning star. Rev. xxii. 16.

1 All-hail, mysterious King!
Hail, David's ancient root!
Thou righteous branch, which thence didst spring
To give the nations fruit.

2 Our weary souls shall rest
Beneath thy grateful shade:
Our thirsting lips salvation taste;
Our fainting hearts are glad.

3 Fair morning star arise,
With living glories bright,
And pour on these awakening eyes
A flood of sacred light.

4 The horrid gloom is fled,
Pierced by thy beauteous ray:
Shine, and our wandering footsteps lead
To everlasting day.

HYMN CCCLX.

Christ's invitation echoed back, &c. Rev. xxii. 17.

1 How free the fountain flows
Of endless life and joy!
That spring, which no confinement knows,
Whose waters never cloy!

2 How sweet the accents sound
From the Redeemer's tongue!
"Assemble all ye nations round,
In one obedient throng.

3 "The Spirit bears the call
To all the distant lands:
The church, the bride, reflects it back,
While Jesus waiting stands.

4 "Ho, every thirsty soul,
Approach the sacred spring;
Drink, and your fainting spirits cheer;
Renew the draught, and sing.

5 "Let all that will approach;
The water freely take;
Free from my opening heart it flows
Your raging thirst to slake."

6 With thankful hearts we come
To taste the offered grace;
And call on all that hear to join
The triad and the praise.

HYMN CCCLXI.

The Christian rejoicing in the views of death and judgment. Rev. xxii. 20.

1 "Behold I come, (the Saviour cries,)
On wings of love I fly:"
So come, dear Lord, (my soul replies,)
And bring salvation nigh.

2 Come, loose these bonds of flesh and sin;
Come, end my pains and cares;
Bear me to thy serene abode
Beyond the clouds and stars.

3 I greet the messengers of death,
By which thou callest me home:
But doubly greet that joyful hour,
When thou thyself shalt come.

4 Come, plead thy Father's injured cause,
And make thy glory shine;
Come, rouse thy servants' mouldering dust,
And their whole frame refine.

5 O come amidst the angelic hosts,
Their humble name to own,
And bear the full assembly back
To dwell around thy throne.

6 With winged speed, Redeemer dear,
Bring on the illustrious day:
Come, lest our spirits droop and faint
Beneath thy long delay.

HYMNS

PARTICULAR OCCASIONS, AND IN UNCOMMON MEASURES

HYMN CCCLXII.

A Morning Hymn, to be used at awaking and rising.

1 Awake, my soul, to meet the day:
Unfold thy drowsy eyes,
And burst the ponderous chain that loads
Thine active faculties.

2 God's guardian shield was round me spread
In my defenceless sleep:
Let him have all my waking hours,
Who doth my slumbers keep.

3 [The work of each immortal soul
Attentive care demands;
Think then what painful labours wait
The faithful pastor's hands.]

4 My moments fly with winged pace,
And swift my hours are hurled;
And death with rapid march comes on
To unveil the eternal world.

5 I for this hour must give account
Before God's awful throne:
Let not this hour neglected pass,
As thousands more have done.

6 Pardon, O God, my former sloth,
And arm my soul with grace,
As, rising now, I seal my vows
To prosecute thy ways.

7 Bright sun of righteousness, arise;
Thy radiant beams display,
And guide my dark bewildered soul
To everlasting day.

HYMN CCCLXIII

An Evening Hymn, to be used when composing one's self to sleep.

I.

Interval of grateful shade
Welcome to my weary head!
Welcome slumbers to mine eyes
Tired with glaring vanities!
My great Master still allows
Needful periods of repose:
By my heavenly Father blest,
Thus I give my powers to rest.
Heavenly Father! gracious name!
Night and day his love the same;
Far be each suspicious thought,
Every anxious care forgot:
Thou, my ever-bounteous God,
Crownest my days with various good
Thy kind eye, that cannot sleep,
These defenceless hours shall keep
Blest vicissitude to me!
Day and night I'm still with thee.

II.

What though downy slumbers flee,
Strangers to my couch and me!
Sleepless, well I know to rest,
Lodged within my Father's breast.
While the empress of the night
Scatters mild her silver light:
While the vivid planets stray
Various through their mystic way;
While the stars unnumbered roll
Round the ever-constant pole;
Far above these spangled skies
All my soul to God shall rise:
'Midst the silence of the night
Mingling with those angels bright,
Whose harmonious voices raise
Ceaseless love and ceaseless praise
Through the throng his gentle ear
Shall my tuneless accents hear
From on high doth he impart
Secret comfort to my heart
He in those serenest hours
Guides my intellectual powers.

And his Spirit doth diffuse,
Sweeter far than midnight dews,
Lifting all my thoughts above,
On the wings of faith and love
Blest alternative to me,
Thus to sleep, or wake, with thee!

III.

What if death my sleep invade?
Should I be of death afraid?
Whilst encircled by thine arm,
Death may strike, but cannot harm.
What if beams of opening day
Shine around my breathless clay?
Brighter visions from on high
Shall regale my mental eye.
Tender friends awhile may mourn
Me from their embraces torn:
Dearer, better friends I have
In the realms beyond the grave.
See the guardian angels nigh
Wait to waft my soul on high!
See the golden gates displayed!
See the crown to grace my head!
See a flood of sacred light,
Which no more shall yield to night!
Transitory world, farewell!
Jesus calls, with him to dwell.
With thy heavenly presence blest,
Death is life, and labour rest.
Welcome sleep or death to me,
Still secure, for still with thee.

HYMN CCCLXIV.

On recovery from sickness, during which much of the divine favour had been experienced.

1 My God, thy service well demands
The remnant of my days;
Why was this fleeting breath renewed,
But to renew thy praise?

2 Thine arms of everlasting love
Did this weak frame sustain,
When life was hovering o'er the grave,
And nature sunk with pain.

3 Thou, when the pains of death were felt,
Didst chase the fears of hell;
And teach my pale and quivering lips
Thy matchless grace to tell.

4 Calmly I bowed my trembling head
On thy dear faithful breast;
Pleased to obey my Father's call
To his eternal rest.

5 Into thy hands, my Saviour God,
Did I my soul resign,
In firm dependence on that truth,
Which needs salvation gives.

6 Back from the borders of the grave
At thy command I come:
Nor would I urge a speedier flight
To my celestial home.

7 Where thou determin'st mine abode,
There would I choose to be;
For in thy presence death is life,
And earth is heaven with thee.

HYMN CCCLXV.

The last words of David. 2 Sam. xxiii. 1–5.

1 Thus hath the son of Jesse said,
When Israel's God had raised his head
To high imperial sway:
Stored with his last poetic fire,
Zion's sweet psalmist tuned his lyre
To this harmonious lay.

2 Thus dictates Israel's sacred Rock:
Thus hath the God of Jacob spoke
By my responsive tongue:
Behold the Just One over men
Commencing his religious reign,
Great subject of my song!

3 So gently shines, with genial ray
The unclouded lamp of rising day,
And cheers the tender flowers,
When midnight's soft diffusive rain
Hath blessed the gardens and the plain
With kind refreshing showers.

4 Shall not my house this honour boast?
My soul the eternal covenant trust,
Well ordered still and sure?
There all my hopes and wishes meet
In death I call its blessings sweet,
And feel its bond secure.

5 The sons of Belial shall not spring,
Who spurn at heaven's appointed King,
And scorn his high command:
Though wide the briers infest the ground,
And the sharp pointed thorns around
Defy a tender hand.

6 A dreadful Warrior shall appear
With iron arms, and massy spear,
And [illegible]
Touched with the lightning of his eye,
At once they kindle into fire,
And vanish in the blaze.

HYMN CCCLXVI.

A Morning One. Psalm cxliv.

Probably composed by David in his young days [illegible]

most of the devoted nations of Canaan, and first went up in solemn procession to the house of God at Jerusalem, there, as it were, to consecrate the arms which he put into their hands. The last referred to, verse 5, were probably the couches, on which they lay at the banquet attending their sacrifices; which gives a noble sense to a passage, on any other interpretation hardly intelligible.

1 O praise ye the Lord, prepare a new song,
And let all his saints in full concert join
Ye tribes all assemble the feast to prolong,
In solemn procession with music divine.

2 O Israel, in him that made thee rejoice,
Let all Zion's sons exult in their King;
While to martial dances you join a glad voice,
Your lutes, harps, and timbrels in harmony bring.

3 The Lord in his saints still finds his delight,
Salvation from him the meek shall adorn:
They well may be joyful, sustained by his might,
And crowned by his favour may lift up their horn.

4 Let carpets be spread, and banquets prepared
Those altars around, whence incense ascends;
Whilst anthems of glory thro' Salem are heard,
And God, whom we worship, indulgent attends.

5 Then as your hearts bound with music and wine,
Inspired by the God, who reigns in the place;
Unsheath all your weapons, and bright let them shine,
And brandish your faulchions, while chaunting his praise.

6 Then march to the field; the heathen defy,
And scatter his wrath on nations around:
Like angels of vengeance your sword lift on high,
And boast that Jehovah commissions the wound.

7 Their generals subdued your triumphs shall grace,
And headed with chains their kings shall be brought;
On the necks shall ye trample of Canaan's proud race,
And all their last remnant for slaughter be sought.

8 No rage of your own such rigour demands,
A sentence divine your arms must enfold:
Of old he this vengeance consigned to your hands,
And in sacred volumes recorded his will.

9 This honour, ye saints, appointed for you,
All-grateful receive, and faithful obey;
And, while this direful pleasure resistless ye do,
Still make his high praises the song of the day.

HYMN CCCLXVII

For the Thanksgiving day for the Peace. April 23, 1749.

1 Now let our songs address the God of peace,
Who bids the tumult of the battle cease:
The greatest spears to pruning-hooks he bends,
And the broad faulchion in the plough-share ends.
His powerful world unites contending nations
In kind embrace, and friendly salutations.

2 Britain, adore the Guardian of thy state,
Who, high on his celestial throne elate,
Still watchful o'er thy safety and repose,
Frowned on the counsels of thy haughtiest foes;
Thy coast secured from every dire invasion
Of fire and sword, and spreading desolation.

3 When rebel-hands with desperate madness armed
He wafted o'er deliverance with his wind;
Drove back the tide that deluged half our land,
And curbed their fury with his mightier hand:
Till dreadful slaughter, and the last confusion,
Taught those audacious sinners their delusion.

4 He gave our fleets to triumph o'er the main,
And scatter terrors 'cross wide ocean's plain:
Opposing leaders trembled at the sight,
Nor found their safety in the attempted flight;
Taught by their bonds how vainly they pretended
Those to distress, whom Israel's God defended.

5 Fierce storms were summoned up in Britain's aid,
And meagre famine hostile lands o'erspread;
By sufferings bowed their conquests they release,
Nor scorn the overtures of equal peace:
Contending powers congratulate the blessing,
Joint hymns of gratitude to heaven addressing.

6 While we beneath our vines and fig-trees sit,
Or thus within thy sacred temple meet,
Accept, great God, the tribute of our song,
And all the mercies of this day prolong.
Then spread thy peaceful word through every nation,
That all the earth may hail thy great salvation.

HYMN CCCLXVIII

The blessing pronounced upon Israel by the priests. Numb. vi. 24—27.

Tune New 113th Psalm.

1 Guardian of Israel, source of peace,
Who hast ordained thy priests to bless,
Shine forth as our propitious Lord,
And verify thy servants' word.

2 Let thy own power defend us still
Through all the year from every ill;
And let the splendour of thy face
Cheer all its bright or gloomy days.

3 Thy countenance our souls would see,
For all our joys unite in thee;
And peace still waits at thy command
To calm our hearts, and bless our land.

4 Hear, while thy priests address their vows,
And scatter blessings through thy house,

And, while they fall, may Israel raise
Its pious songs of ardent praise

HYMN CCCLXIX

A hymn for a Fast-day in time of war. Deut. xxiii. 9

1 Great God of heaven and nature, rise,
And hear our loud united cries:
See Britain bow before thy face
Through all her coasts, and seek thy grace

2 No arm of flesh we make our trust;
Nor sword, nor horse, nor ships we boast
Thine is the land, and thine the main,
And human force and skill is vain.

3 Our guilt might draw thy vengeance down
On every shore, on every town;
But view us, Lord, with pitying eye,
And lay thy lifted thunder by.

4 Forgive the follies of our times,
And purge our land from all its crimes;
Reformed and decked with grace divine
Let princes, priests, and people shine.

5 O may no God-provoking sin
Through all our camps and navies reign;
No foul reproach, to drive from thence
Our surest glory and defence.

6 So shall our God delight to bless,
And crown our arms with wide success:
Our foes shall dread Jehovah's sword;
And conquering Britain shout the Lord.

HYMN CCCLXX.

Jabez's prayer recommended to youth. 1 Chron iv. 9, 10.

1 Thou God of Jabez, hear,
While we entreat thy grace,
And borrow that expressive prayer,
With which he sought thy face

2 "O that the Lord indeed
Would me his servant bless,
From every evil shield my head,
And crown my path with peace!

3 "Be his Almighty hand
My helper and my guide,
Till, with his saints in Canaan's land,
My portion he divide."

4 Thus pious Jabez prayed,
While God inclined his ear
And all, by whom his suit is made
Shall find the blessing near.

5 Ye youths, your vows combine,
With loud united voice;
So shall your heads with honour shine,
And all your hearts rejoice.

HYMN CCCLXXI

Manasseh's affliction, penitence, and restoration. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 10–12

1 God of Manasseh, wilt thou scorn
To own that humble name,
While sinners, so remote as we,
Thy grace to him proclaim?

2 High raised on Judah's throne he seemed,
That hell in him might reign;
And taught thy sacred name to know
Its honours to profane.

3 Yet thou the royal wretch didst view
With pity in thine eyes:
How strange a cure thy mercy wrought!
How wondrous, yet how wise!

4 Caught in the thorns by hostile hands,
The captive learned to reign;
And Babel's fetters set him free
From Satan's heavier chain.

5 From the deep dungeon where he lay,
Thou heard'st his doleful cry;
Didst raise the suppliant from the dust,
And bring salvation nigh.

6 Our souls, depraved and hard like his,
May grace exert its power;
And they shall bless the wholesome smart,
That works the sovereign cure.

HYMN CCCLXXII

A church seeking direction from God in the choice of a pastor. Ezra viii. 21

1 Shepherd of Israel, bend thine ear,
Thy servant's groans indulgent hear;
Perplexed, distressed, to thee we cry
And seek the guidance of thine eye.

2 Thy comprehensive view surveys
Our wandering paths, our reckless ways:
Send forth, O Lord, thy truth and light,
To guide our doubtful footsteps right.

3 With longing eyes, behold, we wait
In supplicant crowds at mercy's gate:
Our drooping hearts, O God, sustain:
Shall Israel seek thy face in vain?

4 O Lord, in ways of peace return
Nor let thy flock neglected mourn:
May our blest eyes a shepherd see,
Dear to our souls, and dear to thee

3 Fed by his care, our tongues shall raise
A cheerful tribute to thy praise;
Our children learn the grateful song,
And theirs the cheerful notes prolong.

HYMN CCCLXXIII.

Divine condemnation deprecated, and instruction desired, by the afflicted. Job x. 2

1 Thy righteous Judge, before thy bar,
What human creature can be clear?
An arm so strong, an eye so pure
Who can escape, or who endure.

2 "Do not condemn us, Lord," we cry
As trembling in the dust we lie;
But, while with grief our guilt we own,
Let smiling mercy take the throne.

3 If thou wilt smite, offended God,
Sheathe up thy sword, and take thy rod.
And, 'midst the anguish and the smart,
Open to discipline our heart.

4 By chastening if our souls be taught,
And cleansed from every secret fault,
The wise severity we'll bless,
And mix our groans with songs of praise.

HYMN CCCLXXIV.

Thanksgiving for national deliverance, and improvement of it. Luke i. 74, 75

1 Salvation doth to God belong
His power and grace shall be our song
His hand hath dealt a secret blow,
And terror strikes the haughty foe.

2 Praise to the Lord, who bows his ear
Propitious to his people's prayer;
And, though deliverance long delay,
Answers in his well-chosen day.

3 O may thy grace our land engage
(Rescued from fierce tyrannic rage,)
This tribute of his love to bring
To thee, our Saviour and our King!

4 Our temples, guarded from the flame,
Shall echo thy triumphant name;
And every peaceful private home,
To thee a temple shall become.

5 Still be it our supreme delight
To walk as in thy honoured sight;
Still in thy precepts and thy fear
To life's last hour to persevere.

INDEX OR TABLE,

TO

A HYMN BY THE TITLE OR CONTENTS OF IT

OR

A HYMN SUITABLE TO PARTICULAR SUBJECTS AND OCCASIONS

N. B. THE FIGURES REFER TO THE PAGES.

A

AARON's breastplate, 3
Abiding in Christ, 237, 238
Abraham's care of his family, 2. His faith in leaving his country, 318. God, his God, 319. His intercession for Sodom, 3
Absence of God dreadful, 18, 157
Activity in religion, 199, 240. rewarded, 172
Adam the first and second, 270
Adopting love, 124, 281
Afflictions improved, 159. Instruction under them desired, 373. moderated, 92. salutary, 143. submitted to, 42. succeeded by joy, 66. by rest and happiness in heaven, 242, 310, 358
Angels, Christ seen of them, 304. their head, 269. their reply to those who sought Christ, 294. their song at Christ's birth, 200, 201
Appeal to Christ for the security of love to him, 246
Ark, the godly man's, 90. Noah saved in, an emblem of the believer's safety in Christ, 336

B

Backsliders, their ingratitude, 191. invited to return, 122. God's pity for them, 153. recollecting themselves, 149
Blessing of God necessary and desired, 55, 368
Blessings spiritual acknowledged, 248. temporal, God's readiness to give them implied, 261
Blood of Christ, admitting to the holiest, 315. cleansing from sin, 348. conquering Satan, 356. conveying blessings, 347. purifying, 342
Britain, God entreated for it, 120. his controversy with it 158. unreformed by deliverances, 140, 155

C

Captives of sin lamented, 129
Care, anxious, reproved, 20, 47, 340. of the soul most needful, 206, 207
Cattle, the hand of God upon them, 5
Charity to the poor, 188, 261. rewarded, 261
Childless Christians comforted, 117
Children, Christ's regard to them, 138. commended to God, 51. destroyed, 141. instructed, 2. of God, 281, 356
Christ, his appearance after his resurrection, 245. his second appearance, 314, 342. his ascension, 244. his Blood, (see Blood.) his compassion, 185, 205, 214, 245. his complaint on the cross, 192, 193. Christians complete in him, 269. his conquests, 11, 306, 307. the chief, 288. our forerunner, 311. forsaken by his disciples, 191. by his Father, 192, 193. has the key committed to him, 308. humbled and exalted, 149, 150. his intercession, 8. his invitations, 74, 224, 225, 300. our Leader, 307, 308. living to him, 276. the Lord our Righteousness, 152. Loving him, 239, 243. his mission, 301. his nativity, 199, 201. his prayer for his enemies, 217. precious to believers, 315. his presence with his churches, 189, 302. a Priest and a Saviour, 248. rejected by, though unseen, 240. his resurrection, 194, 218. Christians risen and exalted with him, 287. the rest of David, 329. sanctification by him, 242, 295. security in him, 326. his sheep, 240, 241, 242. the saving star, 249. the steward of God's family, 87. the living and corner-stone, 333, 334. his submission, 190. his sufferings, (see Suffering.) the Sun of Righteousness, 173. his transfiguration, 183. his triumph, 41. unchangeable, 325. united with him, 267. (see Wisdom, Righteousness, &c. 266.
Christians, (see Saints)
Church, the birth place of the saints, 29. its glory in the latter day, 118. Christ's presence with it, 125. care of it, 302. its prosperity a principal happiness, 301. purified and guarded, 147. its security, 182. praying for a pastor, 16, 327.
Comfort, in God, 91. to the childless, 117. under death of friends, 240, 249, 362. (see Support.)
Communion with God through Christ, 236, 237.

Compassion, of God, 45, 109 of Christ, 180, 204, 214, 219, 235, Christian, 205, 282
Conduct of Christ, mysterious, 244
Consolation, from God, 277, from Christ, 235
Covenant, the blood of it delivering prisoners, 169, the engagements of it desired, 137, rejoiced in, 23, supporting under troubles, 21 in death, 22, unchangeable, 353
Courage, in religion, 9, in the cause of Christ, 247
Course, the Christian's, finished with joy, 249
Creatures, insufficient, 125, mean, 97 vain, 208
Cross of Christ, its influence, 233 276, 280
Cup of blessings, 106
Cyrus's spirit stirred up, 24

D

Demoniac, recovered, 204, relapsing, 180
David, encouraging himself in God, 20, his vain pursuit of perfection on earth, 63, his last words, 365
Day, of small things not despised, 168 of grace, 127, 286, of judgment, (see Judgment)
Dead, quickened, 89, the pious, living to God, 215
Death, appointed to all, 313, conquered by Christ, 308, under his control, 351, of friends improved, 164, happiness beyond it, 295, a great journey, 27, none in heaven, 358, prepared for, 130, 313, 317, rejoiced in, 361, a sleep, 196, support in it, 22, 32, 45, uncertain time of it, 130, 134, 329
Delaying sinners admonished, 127, 130, 256, 292, 309, 329
Deliverance, celebrated, 58, 59, 60, 361, public, 272, 371, spiritual, 105, 204
Desires known to God, 39, (see Prayer)
Devil, (see Satan)
Devotion, daily, 79, secret, 177, an evidence of adoption, 281, (see Prayer)
Diligence, Christian, 199, 210, 296

E

Education, good, 2, bad, 241
Enemies, of God, destroyed, 44, of Christ, destroyed, 213, his prayer for them, 217, of the church restrained, 46, defence against them, 95, love to them, 247, spiritual, (see Satan)
Enoch's piety and translation, 1
Establishment in religion, 341
Eternity, of God, 54, of Christ, 323, of heavenly happiness, 187, 302, employed in God's praise, 71
Evening hymn, 303
Examples, good, their usefulness, 175

F

Faith, and confession, 202, Jonah's recommended, 157, living by it, 280, in God's name, 30, in his promises, 316, struggling with unbelief, 197, the Syrophoenician woman's, 181
Faithfulness of God, 269, 316, 355
Fall of Adam, effects of it, 270
Family, religion, 2 God's, under Christ's care, 85
Farewell, the Christian, 279
Fast days, hymns for, 3, 6, 83, 84, 116, 120, 140, 155, 158, 186, 339, 369
Fasts, unsuccessful, accounted for, 116
Fathers, state of them reflected on, 105
Fear, unreasonable, restrained, 15, 30, 47, 98
Feast, of wisdom, 76, of the gospel, 211, the Christian's secret feast, 222
Fire, God's controversy by it, 151, his word compared to it, 133 everlasting, the portion of the wicked, 189
Forgiveness, of enemies, 217, divine, (see Pardon)
Forsaking God, its evil, 131, the misery of being forsaken by him, 18
Foundation, the divine, firm, 305, of the church is Christ, 333, 334,
Frailty of man, and God's pity, 55
Fruitfulness of Christians, 247, 240
Funeral hymns, 17, 25, 27, 32, 42, 196, 208, 215, 260, 295, 302, (see Death, Grave, Resurrection)

G

Generations, passing away, 164, succeeding, supported by God, 51
Gentiles, Christ the light of them, 202, united to the church, 113, 284
Glory, divine, Moses's view of it, 11, future, (see Heaven)
Glorying in God alone, 128
God, his blessing desirable, 53, 368, his compassion, 55, 109, 153, his complacency in his people, 38, in their prosperity, 37, in his thoughts of peace, 135, in the salvation of his church, 163, the dwelling-place of his people, 51, his eternity, 54, his faithfulness, 269, 316, 355, the God of the patriarchs, 319, his goodness to saints, 34, to all creatures, 56, crowning the year, 43, ever-enduring, 67, relished, 35, his greatness, 97, the happiness of his people, 45, his justice and mercy, 12, his knowledge of our days, 38, of our distress, 39, of our frame, 55, his love in Christ, 220, his pardoning mercy, 28, 50, 103, 160, his name proclaimed, 12, trust in it, 30, his people his portion, 14, our portion here and hereafter, 45, his presence desirable, 10, with his saints, 38, our Preserver, 102, our Protector, 31, 340, his providence, 47, its bounties, 176, 297, the salvation of his people, 36, 125, our Shepherd, 144, shining into the heart, 274, speaking peace, 48, 109, 114, support in him, 15, 45, unchangeable, 54, unknown, 253, waiting to be gracious, 93
Goodness of God for time and eternity, 34, crowning the year, 43, everlasting, 67, tasted, 35, universal, 56
Gospel, its happy effects, 86, 109, 111, its feast, 211, a law of liberty, 327 its progress desired, 120, 121, its grand scheme, 284, its joyful sound, 50, its treasure in earthen vessels, 275,
Government, of God, Zion's joy, 108, of Christ, 85, 351, over death and the unseen world, 351,
Grace, growing in it, 344, pardoning, 130, 160 perfecting, 325, quickening, 62, saved by it, 386,
Gratitude, the spring of religion, 152, (see Praise)
Grave, its solitude, 25, 27, Christ's triumph over it 194, 330, 351 (see Resurrection)
Grief, at beholding transgressors, 61 moderated, 196, 268, 302,

H

Happiness of God's Israel, 16, his complacency in it, 37, 38, 163, only in God, 45,
Hardening ourselves against God fatal, 26, 256, 309,
Head of the church, Christ, 290, of angels and men, 288,
Health restored, 58, 59, 60, spiritual, 204, 223
Heaven, its happiness, 295, an inheritance, 285, everlasting light there, 149, made meet for it, 258, its rest, 310 seeing Christ there 296, to be sought first, 178. view of it, overcoming grief and death, 358.

Heavenly-mindedness, 300.
Help from God, 19, 98, 257. sought and obtained, 68.
House, of God above, 33, 354. of prayer, 113. of wisdom, 76.
Humiliation and exaltation, of Israel, 99. of Christ, 139, 351. day of. (see Fast)
Humility of a penitent, 142, 371. under God's hand, 338, 339.
Hymn, for morning, 362. for evening, 363. for a day of prayer, 120. (see Praise)
Hypocrisy dreaded, 250.

I

Jabez's prayer, 370.
Jacob's vow, 4.
Jerusalem, Christ's tears over it, 214. his gospel first preached there, 219. the New, 354.
Incarnation of Christ, 200, 220.
Inconstancy in religion, 151.
Inheritance, of the upright, 38. of heaven, 285.
Iniquity abounding, 186. to be avoided, 7.
Intercession of Christ, 8.
Invisible God regarded, 321.
Joy, religious, 69. in God, 161. in Christ, 330, 335. in the covenant, 22, 24.
Israel and Amalek, 6. backsliding invited to return, 122. blessed by the priests, 368. its happiness, 16. humbled and exalted, 99. its obstinacy, 88. its stupidity, 83.
Jubilee, the gospel, 50.
Judgment, appointed to all, 313. approaching, 317. the circumstances of it, 342. no escaping it, 337. prepared for, 343. desired and rejoiced in, 314, 361. happy for the saints, 303.
Judgments of God, deprecated, 373. compared with his mercies, 109.
Justice and mercy of God, 12.

K

Key of David in Christ's hand, 85, 350, 351
Kingdom, of God, 108. to be first sought, 178. of Christ, 41, 351. of heaven, 187, 208.
Knowledge, of God sought, 150. experimental, 345.

L

Law, of liberty, 327. of love, 205, 282.
Liberality, (see Charity)
Liberty given by Christ, 226, 227. the law of, 327. to enter the holiest, 315.
Life, abundant by Christ, 220, 340. the Christian's connected with Christ's, 236. the fountain of it, 170. vain, 52. uncertain, 130, 134, 329.
Light, shining into the heart, 274. of the Gentiles, Christ, 202. everlasting from God, 119. of good examples, 175.
Living, to Christ, 276, 294. by faith in him, 280. to God hereafter, 215.
Love of God, in sending his Son, 220. in giving all things with him, 261. shed abroad, 249. of Christ in ministering to men, 184. in giving himself for them, 184, 291, 293. to Christ expressed, 345. continued in, 239. appeal to him for its sincerity, 246. to men, 291. unfeigned, 331. to enemies, 217

M

Majesty of God, 97.
Man, frail, and mortal, 270. frail, but God eternal, 54
Manasseh's repentance, 371
Marriage, spiritual, 293.
Meditation and retirement, 29
Meek, their happiness, 72
Mercy, pardoning, 103, 160, 371. despised, 258. public improved, 374. (see Compassion)
Military ode, 366.
Ministers under Christ's care, 352. Christ ever with them, 195. comforted, that they may comfort others, 271. comfort on their death, 17, 182, 195, 275. faithful, promoted to join the angels, 166. frail and weak, 275. given by God, 125. the church's prosperity their happiness, 301. a sweet savour to God, 273. sought from God, 13, 372. watching for souls, 324. willing to be employed, 82. die, but the gospel lives, 275
Ministry, instituted, 289. Christ's, unsuccessful, 104
Miracles for Israel in the wilderness, 17
Moderation, Christian, 208
Morning hymn, 362
Mortality (see Man, Death)
Moses, his wise choice, 320. his regard to the invisible God, 321. his song, 347. his view of the divine glory, 11
Mourners comforted, 66, 196, 302. (see Comfort, Support)
Multitude not to be followed to evil, 7

N

National sins lamented, 140. deliverances celebrated, 272, 374
Nature, frail, but God compassionate, 54. and Scripture, 68
Nearness to God through Christ, 114, 288
New year's day, hymns for, 13, 14, 92, 97, 234, 257, 368
Noah preserved in the ark, 336
November the 5th, hymns for, 108, 272, 374

O

Obedience, to the heavenly vision, 82. to God's word, 136. the design of national deliverances, 374
Ordination, hymns for, 82, 123, 196, 276, 280, 324

P

Pardon of sin celebrated, 103, 142, 160. for the chief of sinners, 219. and strength, 160
Part, the better, chosen, 306, 320
Patience, under afflictions, 52. under mysterious providences, 212. in waiting, 93, 205
Patriarchs, a city prepared for them, 319
Peace, with God, sought, 91. obtained, 87, 114. rejoiced in, 155. improved, 48. in Christ amidst tribulations, 241. publicly celebrated, 367
Perfection, not to be found in nature, 68. in religion, 341
Persecution to be expected by Christians, 286
Perseverance of the saints, 242, 344
Pity, (see Compassion)
Poor, trusting in God, 162. charity to them, 188, 265, 329
Portion of God, his people, 14. God, ours, 4
Power of God, 26, 120. the security of the saints, 31, 216, 232
Praise to God, everlasting, 71. for Christ, 201, 220. for his goodness, 34, 35, 43, 56. for his everlasting goodness, 67, 70. for the hope of glory, 295. for liberty of worship, 49. for mercies, 135, 282. for pardon, 160. for public peace, 367, 374. for preservation, 257. for protection, 31. for recovery from sickness, 58, 59, 60, 364. as our Shepherd, 144. for spiritual blessings, 283. for temporal blessings given with Christ, 261

Prayer, heard, 68, 370, 371. secret, 177. family, 2. for the Spirit, 251. for ministers, 43, 372. for the revival of religion, 120, 121. house of prayer, 113
Preparation to meet God, 156. for Christ's second coming, 317, 343
Presence, of God desirable, 10, 368. of Christ with his churches, 17, 195
Preservation, from God, 31, 95, 102, 257
Pride punished, 26
Prisoners, spiritual, delivered, 105, 169, 203
Privileges, misimproved, 127. of Christians by the blood of Christ, 287, 288, 347, 348, 356
Promises, God's fidelity to them, 316, 355
Prosperity, from God, 53. not to be expected by rebels against him, 26. dreadful, if abused, 212
Providence, 108, followed, 318, its bounties, 175, 297, its mysteries to be cleared up hereafter, 212, 234

Q

Quickening grace desired, 62
Quietness under trouble, 42

R

Race, the Christian, 296. Christ our forerunner in it, 311
Raiment, spiritual, 132, 165
Rainbow round the throne, 355
Rebels, against God, warned, 14. punished, 26, 156. against Christ executed, 213
Rebellion, impudent, 136. hymn for deliverance from it, 46
Recovery from sickness, 58, 59, 60, 364
Redemption by Christ, 170, 226, 227, 266
Rejoicing in God amidst poverty, 161. in Christ though unseen, 330. in our covenant engagements, 23. in the views of death and judgment, 314, 361. (see Joy)
Religion, revived, 146. activity in it, 172. inconstancy in it, 151. gratitude the spring of it, 152
Repentance, commanded to all, 254. the means of pardon, 28, 371. producing humility and submission, 142
Resignation (see Patience, Submission)
Rest, the holy soul's in God, 57. remaining for God's people, 310
Resurrection, of Christ, 191, 218. of Christians, 89, 260, 270, 287. by the Spirit, 260
Retirement and self-examination, 29
Returning to God, 122, 126, 149
Revival of religion, attempted, 172. prayed for, 120, 121
Riches, their vanity, 63, 212. desire of them moderated, 268. everlasting, obtained by charity, 269
Righteous men, (see Saints)
Righteousness from Christ, 132, 165, 266, 274
Rod of God heard, 150. its good effects, 143, 373

S

Sabbath, the eternal, 310
Sacrifice, of Christ, 220, 291. (see Blood,) the living, 263
Safety, in God, 31, 90, 95, 98, 102. in the ways of religion, 96
Saints, their excellency, 77, 78. their happiness, 16, 55. God's portion, 14. their prospects for time and eternity, 33, 45. their sentence and final happiness, 187. Christ glorified in them, 302. and sinners, different views in time of danger, 94. their different end, 212
Salvation, approaching, 264. beautifying the meek, 72. everlasting, 310, 314. (see Heaven,) from God, 39. God magnified for it, 40. speaking it to his people, 36. by grace, 286. the scheme of it worthy of God, 307. the word of it sent to us, 252
Samaritan, the good, 205
Sanctification, of Christ and his church, 242. by Christ, 266, 293
Satan, his captives lamented, 129. conquered by Christ, 308. by Christians, 265, 356. his power restrained, 216. his strong holds cast down, 278
Scripture, its excellency, 63. (see Word)
Seasons of the year, 43
Secret prayer, 177
Seeking, Christ, 75. the knowledge of God, 150. the kingdom of God first, 178. things above, 300
Self-dedication, 23, 263
Self-examination, 29, 138
Sepulchre in the garden, 243, (see Grave)
Serving Christ, 276, 294, with zeal, 240, 247
Settlement of a minister, a hymn for, 123. (see Ordination, Minister)
Sheep, Christ's, their character, 230. happiness, 231. security, 232. comforted, 208. God's care of them, 144. recovered from wandering, 65
Shepherd of saints is God, 144
Sickness, healed, 58, 59, 60, 361. spiritual, healed, 204, 223
Silence under affliction, 42. (see Submission)
Simeon's song and prophecy, 202
Sin, its captives lamented, 129. causing grief to good men, 64. cleansed by Christ's blood, 312, 348. pardoned, 169, 170. remonstrated against, 115. none in heaven, 310
Singing in God's way, 69. (see Joy, Rejoicing)
Sinners, alarmed, 80. destroyed, 26. their doom, 148. exhorted, 328. recovered, 204. relapsing, 100. their final sentence and misery, 189. warned of their appearance at judgment, 337. their vain refuge, 337
Soldier, the Christian, animated and crowned, 353, 354
Song of Moses and the Lamb, 357. (see Hymn, Praise)
Sorrow, (see Affliction, Grief)
Soul, God, its Saviour, 36. its strength, 68. the care of it needful, 206, 207
Spirit of God, compared to water, 221, 225, 360. his influences desired, 145, 251, 360. lifting up his standard, 117. the proof of our adoption, 281. quickening dead saints, 260. revealing heaven, 285
Spirits of men, under God's influence, 24. departing, committed to Christ, 249
Spiritual enemies, (see Satan)
State of the dead reflected on, 164
Stone, the living, 333. the corner, 334
Strength from heaven, 15, 68, 98, 269
Subjection to God, 322
Submission to God, 42, 190. (see Patience)
Success of the gospel, 100, 111, 147, 173. sought, 120, 121
Sufferings, of Christ, 191, 307. and his success, 41 139. of Christians, 306. (see Grief, Comfort, Support)

Sun of righteousness, 173
Supper, Lord's, hymns for it, 171, 288, 350
Support, from God, 15. in death, 32, 45. in the covenant, under troubles, 20, 21. in death, 22. on the death of faithful ministers, 17, 182, 195. pious friends, 17, 196, 208, 215, 260, 302. young Christians, 234
Sympathy, Christian, 205, 282

T

Table of the Lord, polluted, 171. spread, and invitation sent, 211. attended, 350
Tasting divine goodness, 35. that the Lord is gracious, 332
Teachings, divine, 210. Christ's, excellent, 175
Temple, the spiritual, 167, 333. the heavenly, and Christians pillars in it, 33, 354
Temptations moderated, 246. overcome, 356. strength proportioned to them, 269
Thankfulness, (see Praise)
Thanksgiving, hymns of, 67, 70, 71. for public mercies, 49, 95, 272, 374
Things, small, the day of, not despised, 168
Time, redeemed, 130, 292, 317, 329. wasted, 52, 127
Triumph in God's protection, 31. of Christ, 41. of the gospel, (see Success)
Trouble, patience under it, 42. consolation in it, 235. in domestic troubles, 21. (see Support)
Trust in God, 30, 87, 162

V

Vacant congregations seeking God, 13, 372
Vanity, of creatures, and God's sufficiency, 125. of earthly things, 168. of man, 63. of man, and majesty of God, 97. of riches, 212. of worldly schemes, 329. of our years, 52
Victory, celebrated, 46, 272, 374. spiritual, (see Satan)
Vine, Christ the true, 337. abiding in him, 237, 238
Vineyard of God, 81. its unfruitfulness punished, 174
Unbelief and faith struggling, 197
Unchangeableness of God, 54, 316. of Christ, 324. of the covenant, 355
Unknown God, 143
Voice of Christ calling men, 74. of God to be immediately heard, 402. of the rod heard, 149, 374
Vows, religious, encouraged, 137. rejoiced in, 23

W

Waiting for God, 93
Walking with God, 1, 79
Warfare, spiritual, 192, 309, 343, 354. (see Satan)
Watchfulness, Christian, 129, 210
Waters, living, an emblem of the Spirit, 221, 224, 360. of the sanctuary, 147
Ways of God, singing in them, 69. safety in them, 96. the blind and weak led in them, 101. of the upright known to God, 38. searching and trying our ways, 138
Wicked, (see Sinner)
Wilderness, transformed, 100. miracles in it, 47
Wisdom, her house and feast, 76. her invitations, 76. her reproofs and encouragements, 73. true, 150. Christ our wisdom, 266
Word of God, its benefit to youth, 61. its efficacy, 133, 356. its excellency, 65
World, transitory, 268. vain, 329. destroyed, 342
Worship, daily, 79. family, 2. secret, 177. opening a new place of worship, 49
Wrath, future, 189. treasured up, 258. of enemies restrained, 95. and overruled, 46

Y

Year, crowned with divine goodness, 13. wasted, 52. (see New-year's day)
Youth, pressed to pray, 370. regard to Scripture, 61. to seek Christ, 75. to seek heaven first, 178. comfort on their death, 234

Z

Zeal, for God, 9. for Christ's cause, 246, 247. approved and rewarded, 172
Zion, God comforting it, 163. entreated for it, 220. its joy in God's government, 108. purified and guarded, 197. the highway to it, 98. ways to it sought, 137. (see Church)

THE

PRINCIPLES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION,

EXPRESSED

IN PLAIN AND EASY VERSE,

AND

DIVIDED INTO SHORT LESSONS, FOR THE USE OF CHILDREN AND YOUTH

[illegible]-saith unto Peter,—Lovest thou me?—Feed my lambs.—JOHN xxi. 15.

PREFACE.

THE little verses now before the reader were written at the desire of my most worthy and honoured friend, the Reverend Mr. Clark of St. Albans, and are published at his request, as what he hopes may, by the divine blessing, do some good in the rising generation. I was the more willing to undertake the task, because I had often observed with how much ease and pleasure children learn verses by heart, how fond they are of repeating them, and, by consequence, how much longer they retain them than they do what they learn in prose.

In this view Dr. Watts's Songs for Children have been a singular blessing to our land; and it is but justice to that great, yet condescending, writer, to own, that if this light essay be of any service in it, a great part of the thanks will be due to him, who had digested the chief heads of Christianity in so natural a method, and expressed them in such easy yet comprehensive language, in the first part of his Second Set of Catechisms, that he had left me very little more to do under many of the articles than to translate them into rhyme; for I can hardly presume to call it poetry.

That simplicity and ease, which may suit children, I have been always careful to maintain, and have endeavoured, here and there, where I conveniently could, to strike the fancy with a little imagery, and especially to affect the hearts of my dear little scholars, by giving a serious and practical turn to the several truths which are delivered. It has also been my great care to insert nothing into these verses but what I apprehend the generality of serious Christians believe, so that I hope they will suit different denominations, as indeed I could wish the rising age might be instructed in what is like to unite, rather than divide, us. Their own comfort, as well as the credit of our common Christianity, is much concerned in it.

Some will, no doubt, think this a trifling performance: but I have been told, that the familiar system of religion which Grotius drew up, in easy verse, for the use of the Dutch sailors, was esteemed by him and others one of his most useful works: and if I had not the patronage of such illustrious names as have gone before me in such humble labours, I should think myself unworthy the honour of calling Jesus my Master, if I thought it beneath me to be desirous of doing good to the least child of the poorest of the people.

No nation under heaven appears to me so well furnished with helps for the Christian education of children as our own. I heartily pray that parents may be diligent in using them, and that they may enforce their good instructions with a suitable example: and then I doubt not, but, through the divine blessing, the happy fruits will be visible: nor will a gracious God, who taketh pleasure in the prosperity of his people, forget the least pious and benevolent attempt for promoting so good a work.

Northampton, October 31, 1745. P. DODDRIDGE

LESSON I.

Of our own nature, and its chief glory and happiness.

Now for a while aside I 'll lay
My childless trifles, and my play,
And call my thoughts which rove abroad,
To view myself and view my God.
I 'll look within, that I may see
What I now am, what I must be.

I am the creature of the Lord:
He made me by his powerful word.
This body, in each curious part,
Was wrought by his unfailing art.
From him my nobler spirit came,
My soul, a spark of heavenly flame:
That soul, by which my body lives,
Which thinks, and hopes, and joys, and grieves,
And must in heaven or hell remain,
When flesh is turned to dust again.

What business then should I attend,
Or what esteem my noblest end!
Sure it consists in this alone,
That God my Maker may be known.
So known, that I may love him still,
And form my actions by his will:
That he may bless me whilst I live,
And when I die my soul receive,
To dwell for ever in his sight
In perfect knowledge and delight.

LESSON II.

The knowledge of God and our duty to be learnt from the Bible.

How shall a young immortal learn
This great, this infinite concern,
What my Almighty Maker is,
And what the way this God to please?

Shall some bright angel spread his wing,
The welcome message down to bring?
Or must we dig beneath the ground,
Deep as where silver mines are found?

I bless his name for what I hear;
The word of life and truth is near;
His gospel sounds through all our land;
Bibles are lodged in every hand.
That sacred book inspired by God
In our own tongue is spread abroad:
That book may little children read,
And learn the knowledge which they need.
I 'll place it still before my eyes,
For there my hope and treasure lies.

LESSON III.

Of the nature and attributes of the Blessed God.

God is a Spirit none can see,
He ever was, is, and shall be:
Present where'er his creatures dwell
Through earth and sea, through heaven and hell.

His eye with infinite survey
Views all their realms in full display:
What has been, is, or shall be done,
Or here, or there, to him is known;
Nor can one thought arise unseen,
In mind of angels, or of men.
Yet far above all anxious cares
Serene He rules his grand affairs;
While wisdom infinite attends
By surest means the noblest ends.

Majestic from his lofty throne
He speaks, and all his will is done.
Nor can united worlds withstand
The force of his Almighty hand.
Yet ever righteous are his ways:
Faithful and true whate'er he says:
The Holy, holy, holy Lord,
By all the angelic host adored.

The bounty of his gracious hands,
Wide as the world he made, extends!
And though himself completely blessed,
With pity looks on the distressed;
And by his Son, our Saviour dear,
To sinners brings salvation near.

All that is glorious, good, and great,
Does in the Lord Jehovah meet.
Then to his name be glory given
By all on earth, and all in heaven.

LESSON IV.

Of God's relation to us.

The Lord my Maker I adore,
Created by his love and power.
He fashioned in their various forms
Angels, and men, and beasts, and worms;
And all their well-ranged orders stand
Supported by his powerful hand.

Father of light! amidst the skies
He bids the golden sun arise:
He scatters the refreshing rain,
To cheer the grass, and swell the grain;
And every day presents the food,
That satisfies my mouth with good.

At home, abroad, by night, by day
He is my guardian, and my stay.
And sure 'tis fit my soul should know
He is my Lord and Sovereign too.

O may that voice, that speaks his love,
My heart to sweet obedience move;
That when I see the Judge enthroned,
I in that Judge may see my friend!

LESSON V.

The sum of our duty to God and man.

THE knowledge which my heart desires,
Is but to learn what God requires.
Speak then the word, my Father dear,
For all my soul's awake to hear:
And O, what joy my breast must move,
To hear, that all thy law is love!

This is the sum of every part;
To love the Lord with all my heart,
With all my soul, with all my might,
And in his service to delight:
That I should love my neighbours too,
And what I wish from them should do.

How short and sweet, how good and plain,
Easy to learn, and to retain!
O may thy grace my soul renew!
And 'twill be sweet to practise too.

LESSON VI.

How our love to God is to be expressed.

SINCE love is as my duty known,
How must this love to God be shown?
Sure I the highest thoughts should raise
Of him, who is above all praise:
His favour most of all desire,
And still to please him should aspire:
To him be constant worship paid,
And all his sacred laws obeyed.

If to afflict me be his will,
I 'll bear it with submission still:
A tender Father sure he proves,
And but corrects because he loves.

His word with diligence I 'll hear:
To him present my daily prayer:
And while new mercies I implore,
For blessings past I will adore;
And every action shall express
A heart full-charged with thankfulness.

LESSON VII.

How love to our neighbour should be expressed.

I BY my love to men must prove
How cordially my God I love.
To those whom he hath clothed with power,
I would be subject every hour:
To parents, and to rulers too,
Pay honour and obedience due:
In every word I 'll truth maintain,
In every act shall justice reign.

In all my feeble hands can do
The good of all I would pursue:
And where my powers of action fail
Kind wishes in my heart prevail
For every man, whoe'er he be,
Stranger, or friend, or enemy

Since by God's pardoning grace I live,
Well may I all my foes forgive;
And, as Christ's word and pattern showed,
Conquer their evil by my good.

LESSON VIII.

Sins to be avoided, in thought, word, and action.

GUARD me, O God, from every sin;
Let heart, and tongue, and life be clean!
Though with ten thousand snares beset,
I never would my Lord forget.

Fain would I learn to lay aside
Malice, and stubbornness, and pride,
Envy, and every evil thought;
Nor be my breast with anger hot.
Each other passion wild and rude
I long to feel by grace subdued.

When thus my heart is well prepared,
My tongue I easily shall guard
From every oath, and curse profane,
Nor take God's reverend name in vain:
No sacred thing shall I deride,
Nor scoff, nor rail, nor brawl, nor chide:
My soul will every lie detest,
And every base indecent jest.

This humble watchful soul of mine
Shall with abhorrence then decline
The drunkard's cup, the glutton's feast,
That sink the man down to the beast;
The injurious blow, the wanton eye,
The loss of hours that quickly fly;
And that which leads to every crime,
The vain mispence of sacred time;
What brings dishonour on God's law,
Or what on man would mischief draw.

LESSON IX.

The corruption of nature, and sins of life acknowledged.

LORD, when my wretched soul surveys
The various follies of my ways,
The guilt of every word and thought,
Every neglect, and every fault,
Well may I tremble to appear,
Laden with horror, shame, and fear.

Adam, our common head, alas,
Brought sin and death on all his race.
From him my ruined nature came,
Heir to his sorrow, and his shame:
My body weak, and dark my mind,
To good averse, to sin inclined:
And oh, too soon the deadly fruit
Ripened from that unhappy root.

Duty required my early care
Each fond indulgence to forbear;

Required me, all the good I knew
With constant vigour to pursue.
But my vain heart, and stubborn will,
In its own ways would wander still:
Like a wild ass's colt would go
On to this wilderness of woe.
Vainly I seek to plead a word,
Silent in guilt before the Lord.

LESSON X.

Of the misery which sin hath brought upon us.

Who can abide God's wrath, or stand
Before the terrors of his hand?
Jehovah's curse what heart shall dare
To meet? or what be strong to bear?

He every good can take away,
And every evil on us lay:
Can by one single word bring down
The tallest head that wears a crown,
The statesman wise, the warrior brave,
To moulder in the silent grave;
And send the wretched soul to hell,
To the fierce flames where devils dwell,
For endless years to languish there
In pangs of infinite despair.

I then, poor feeble child, how soon
Must I dissolve before his frown?
And yet his frowns, and vengeance too,
I by my sins have made my due.

Is there no hope? and must I die?
Is there no friend, no helper nigh?
Is it beyond repeal decreed,
That every soul that sins must bleed?
Oh let my longing, trembling ear
Some sound of grace and pardon hear?
My soul would the first news embrace,
And turn its tremblings into praise.

LESSON XI.

Of the Gospel, or the good news of salvation by Christ.

What joyful tidings do I hear?
'Tis gospel grace salutes my ear:
And by thy gentle sound I find,
This righteous God is mild and kind.

Jesus, his only Son, displays
The wonders of his Father's grace,
The great salvation long foretold
By prophets to the Jews of old,
Is now in plainer words made known,
As to the apostles clearly shown.
By this blest message brought from heaven,
Pardon, and peace, and grace is given.

O may I know that Saviour dear,
Whom God has represented there!
And that eternal life receive,
Which he was sent by God to give!

LESSON XII.

Who Christ is, and how he lived on earth.

Jesus! how bright his glories shine!
The great Emanuel is divine.
One with the Father he appears,
And all his Father's honours shares:
Yet he to bring salvation down
Has put our mortal nature on.

He in an humble virgin's womb
A feeble infant did become:
A stable was his lodging made,
And the rude manger was his bed.

Growing in life he still was seen
Humble, laborious, poor, and mean.
The Son of God from year to year
Did as a carpenter appear.

At length, when he to preach was sent,
Through towns and villages he went,
And travelled with unwearied zeal
God's will and nature to reveal.

To prove the heavenly truths he taught,
Unnumbered miracles were wrought.
The blind beheld him; and the ear,
Which had been deaf, his voice could hear;
Sickness obeyed his healing hand;
And devils fled at his command;
The lame for joy around him leap;
The dead he wakens from their sleep.

Through all his life his doctrine shines,
Drawn in the plainest, fairest lines.
And death at length did he sustain,
Our pardon and our peace to gain.
That sinners who condemned stood,
Might gain salvation by his blood.
All honour then ascribed be
To him who lived and died for me!

LESSON XIII.

Of Christ's death, resurrection, and ascension.

Jesus the righteous! he, he dies,
For sin a spotless sacrifice!
Justice has on his sacred head
The weight of our transgressions laid.
If God's own Son would sinners save,
He must be humbled to the grave.
That so a pardoning God might shew
What vengeance to our crimes was due.

Nailed to the cross with torturing smart
What anguish racked his tender heart!
Alas! how bitterly he cried,
Tasted the vinegar, and died!
Cold in the tomb that mournful day
My Saviour's mangled body lay.
Will may I bless, and weep, to see
What Jesus bore for love of me.

But, O my soul, thy grief refrain,
Jesus the Saviour lives again.
On the third day the Conqueror rose,
And greatly triumphed o'er his foes;
Proved his recovered life, and then
Ascended to his heaven again.

Exalted on a shining throne
At God's right hand he sets him down,
To plead the merits of his blood,
And rule for all his people's good:
Wide o'er all worlds his power extends,
And well can he protect his friends.
May I in that blest band appear,
Secure from danger and from fear!

LESSON XIV.

Of the nature of faith and repentance.

Thou must repent, and must believe,
Who Christ's salvation would receive.
O may thy Spirit faith impart,
And work repentance in my heart!

Blessed Jesus, who can be so base,
As to suspect thy power or grace?
Or who can e'er so stupid be
To slight thy blessings, Lord, and thee?
With humble reverent hope and love
I to thy gracious feet would move,
And to thy care my all resign,
Resolved to be for ever thine;
Secure, if thou vouchsafe to keep
My feeble soul among thy sheep.

The sins and follies I have done
Humbled in dust I would bemoan;
And while past guilt I thus deplore,
I would repeat that guilt no more:
But by a life of zeal and love
True faith and penitence approve:
So shall thy grace my sins forgive,
Jesus shall smile, and I shall live.

LESSON XV.

Of the assistances and influences of the blessed Spirit

'Tis not in my weak power alone
To melt this stubborn heart of stone,
My soul to change, my life to mend,
Or seek to Christ that generous Friend.

'Tis God's own Spirit from above
Fixes our faith, inflames our love,
And makes a life divine begin
In wretched souls, long dead in sin.

That most important gift of heaven
To those that ask and seek is given:
Then be it my immediate care,
With importunity of prayer,
To seek it in a Saviour's name,
Who will not turn my hopes to shame.

God from on high his grace shall pour,
My soul shall flourish more and more,
Press on with speed from grace to grace,
Till glory end and crown the race.

Since then the Father, and the Son,
And Holy Spirit, three in one,
Glorious beyond all speech and thought,
Have jointly my salvation wrought;
I 'll join them in my songs of praise,
Now, and through heaven's eternal days.

LESSON XVI.

Of the means of grace which God has appointed

What kind provision God has made,
That we may safe to heaven be led!
For this the prophets preached and wrote,
For this the blessed apostles taught;
Taught, as that Spirit did inspire,
Who fell from heaven in tongues of fire,
And gave them languages unknown,
That distant lands his grace might own.
His hand has kept the sacred page
Secure from men's and devils' rage.

For this he churches did ordain,
His truths and worship to maintain:
For this he pastors did provide,
In those assemblies to preside:
And from the round of common days
Marked out our sabbaths to his praise.
Delightful day, when Christians meet!
To hear, and pray, and sing, how sweet!

For this he gives, in solemn ways,
Appointed tokens of his grace:
In sacramental pledges there,
His soldiers to their General swear.
Baptized into one common Lord,
They joyful meet around his board;
Honour the orders of his house,
And speak their love, and seal their vows.

LESSON XVII.

Of the design and obligation of baptism.

In baptism washed we all must be,
In honour of the sacred Three,
To show how we are washed from sin
In Jesus' blood, and born again
By grace divine; and thus are made
Members of Christ our common head.

The Father formed the glorious scheme,
And we adopted are by him.

The Son, great prophet, priest, and king,
Did news of this redemption bring:
He by his death our life procured,
And now bestows it as our Lord.

The Holy Spirit witness bore
To this blest gospel heretofore.

And teaches those he 's purified
Faithful and patient to abide.

Into these names was I baptized,
And be the honour justly prized:
Nor let the sacred bond be broke,
Nor be my covenant God forsook.
Thus washed I 'd keep my garments clean,
And never more return to sin.
One body now all Christians are:
O may they in one Spirit share!
And cherish that endearing love,
In which the saints are blessed above!

LESSON XVIII.

On the nature and design of the Lord's supper.

The memory of Christ's death is sweet,
When saints around his table meet,
And break the bread, and pour the wine,
Obedient to his word divine.

While they the bread and cup receive,
If on their Saviour they believe,
They feast, as on his flesh and blood:
Cordial divine, and heavenly food!
Thus their baptismal bond renew,
And love to every Christian show.

Well may their souls rejoice, and thrive
Oh may the blessed hour arrive,
When ripe in knowledge, and in grace,
I at that board shall find a place!
And now, what there his people do
I would at humble distance view;
Would look to Christ with grateful heart,
And in their pleasures take my part,
Resolved, while such a sight I see,
To live to him who died for me.

LESSON XIX.

Of the nature and office of angels.

My soul the heavenly world survey,
The regions of eternal day.
There Jesus reigns, and round his seat
Millions of glorious angels meet.

Those morning stars, how bright they shine!
How sweetly all their voices join
To praise their Maker! watchful still
To mark the signals of his will;
While with their out-stretched wings they stand,
To fly at his divine command.

All happy as they are, and great,
Yet scorn they not on men to wait
And little children in their arms
They gently bear, secure from harms.

O may I, with such humble zeal
My heavenly Father's word fulfil!
That I, when time has run its race,
May with blessed angels find a place,
Borne on their friendly wings on high
To joys like theirs, which never die.

LESSON XX.

Of the fall and state of the devils.

Well may I tremble, when I read
That sin did heaven itself invade:
Cursed pride, with subtilty unknown,
Perverted angels near God's throne:
They sinned against his holy name,
And hateful devils they became.
But wrath divine pursued them soon,
And flaming vengeance hurled them down.

Now in the pangs of fierce despair,
Prisoners at large they range in air.
Walk through the earth, unheard, unseen,
And lay their snares for thoughtless men;
Tempt us to sin against our God,
And draw us to hell's downward road.

But God can all their power restrain:
My Saviour holds them in his chain,
Till at his bar they all appear,
And meet their final sentence there.

LESSON XXI.

On death.

Lord, I confess thy sentence just,
That sinful man should turn to dust;
That I ere long should yield my breath,
The captive of all-conquering death.

Soon will the awful hour appear,
When I must quit my dwelling here:
These active limbs, to worms a prey,
In the cold grave must waste away;
Nor shall I share in all that 's done,
In this wide world, beneath the sun.

To distant climes, and seats unknown,
My naked spirit must be gone,
To God its Maker must return,
And ever joy, or ever mourn.

No room for penitence and prayer
No further preparation there
Can e'er be made; the thought is vain:
My state unaltered must remain.

Awake, my soul, without delay;
That if God summons thee this day,
Thou cheerful at his call mayst rise,
And spring to life beyond the skies.

LESSON XXII.

On the resurrection of the dead.

What awful ruins death hath made!
How low the wise and great are laid!
Alike the saints, and sinners, die;
Mouldering alike in dust they lie.
But there's a day shall change the scene,
How awful to the sons of men!

When the archangel's trump shall sound,
And shake the air, and cleave the ground,
Jesus enthroned in light appears,
Circled with angels, bright as stars.
"Rise, ye that sleep," the Lord shall say:
And all the earth, and all the sea,
Yield up the nations of the dead,
For ages in their bowels hid.
Bone knows its kindred bone again,
All clothed anew with flesh and skin:
Each spirit knows its proper mate;
They rise an army vast and great.

But oh what different marks they bear,
Of transport some, and some of fear;
When marshalled in the Judge's sight,
These to the left, those to the right,
That they may that last sentence hear,
Which shall their endless state declare!
My soul, in deep attention stay,
And learn the event of such a day.

LESSON XXIII.

Of judgment and eternity, heaven and hell.

When Christ to judge the world descends,
Thus shall he say to all his friends:
"Come blessed souls, that kingdom share,
My Father did for you prepare
Ere earth was founded: come, and reign
Where endless life and joy remain."

Then to the wicked,—"Cursed crew,
Depart, heaven is no place for you:
To those eternal burnings go,
Whose pangs the rebel angels know.

He speaks, and straight his shining hands,
With fiery thunders in their hands,
Drive them away; hell's lake receives
The wretches on its flaming waves:
Justice divine the gates shall bar,
And for a seal affix despair.

While Jesus, rising from his throne,
Leads his triumphant army on,
To enter their divine abode,
In the fair city of their God.
There everlasting pleasures grow;
Full rivers of salvation flow;
And all their happiness appears
Increasing with eternal years.

LESSON XXIV.

The conclusion, in a practical reflection on the whole.

And now, my heart, with reverent awe
From hence thine own instruction draw.
I at this judgment must appear;
I must this solemn sentence hear,
(As I'm with saints or sinners placed,)
"Depart, accursed," or "Come, ye blest
For me the fruits of glory grow;
Or hell awaits my fall below.

Eternal God! what shall I do?
My nature trembles at the view:
My deathless soul herself surveys,
With joy, and terror, and amaze.
Oh be thy shield around me spread,
To guard the spirit thou hast made!
Save me from snares of earth and hell,
And from my self preserve me well:
Lest all the heavenly truths I know
Should aggravate my guilt and woe!

Thy power in weakness is displayed,
If babes by thee be conquerors made;
It Satan's malice shall confound,
And heaven with praises shall resound.

TRACTS, &c.

No. I.

A DISSERTATION

ON

SIR ISAAC NEWTON'S SCHEME,

REDUCING THE SEVERAL HISTORIES CONTAINED IN THE EVANGELISTS TO THEIR PROPER ORDER

THE name of Sir Isaac Newton is so justly celebrated through the learned world, that they who know he has endeavoured to establish a method of settling a chronology of our Lord's life, (for I think one can hardly call it a harmony of the Evangelists,) quite different from what has hitherto been advanced, may be curious to know what it is, and why we presume to depart from it; since it is so natural to imagine, that such a genius must demonstrate whatever it attempts to prove. I therefore think it incumbent upon me to lay the scheme before my reader, as I promised long since to do. (Note (m) on Matt. iv. 25.) After which I shall briefly present, in one view, those reasons (many of which have been already hinted) which compelled me to tread a different road, after having most attentively considered all that this illustrious writer has urged for the support of his plan.

I cannot set myself to this task, without feeling the fatigue of it sensibly allayed, by the pleasure with which I reflect on the firm persuasion which a person of his unequalled sagacity must have entertained of the truth of Christianity, in order to his being engaged to take such pains in illustrating the sacred oracles. A pleasure, which I doubt not every good reader will share with me; especially as (according to the best information, whether public or private, I could ever get) his firm faith in the divine revelation, discovered itself in the most genuine fruits of substantial virtue and piety; and consequently gives us the justest reason to conclude, that he is now rejoicing in the happy effects of it, infinitely more than in all the applause which his philosophical works have procured him; though they have commanded a fame lasting as the world, the true theory of which he had discovered, and (in spite of all the vain efforts of ignorance, pride, and their offspring bigotry) have arrayed him, as it were, in the beams of the sun, and inscribed his name among the constellations of heaven.

Sir Isaac Newton has given us his sentiments on the chronology of our Lord's history, in his Observations on Prophecy, book I. chap. XI. page 144—168. and, according to his usual method, he has done it concisely, only marking out some of the outlines; and after having endeavoured to establish some of the chief principles, by arguments which he judged to be conclusive, he leaves it to his readers to apply those principles to the several particulars; which being deducible from them, he did not think it necessary to enter into. Such is the method he has also taken in his [illegible] great genius, which bore him with such amazing velocity through so vast a circle of various literature. Yet it must render him less sensible of the difficulty attending some of his schemes, than he would otherwise have been, and may [illegible] to those, who are justly sensible how much they are [illegible] how possible it is for the greatest of mankind to be misled by some plausible appearances of things in a general view of them, against which invincible objections may arise, when they come to be applied to unthought-of particulars.

There are many facts recorded in the Evangelists

the order of which is so plain, that all harmonies agree in them: and such especially are most of those with which the history begins, and most of those with which it ends, though there be some disputes about a few circumstances relating to the resurrection. But Sir Isaac enters not at all into that part of the history, nor into any thing that precedes the appearance of John the Baptist.

He lays it down as the foundation of all his other reasonings and calculations here, (on the authority of Luke iii. 1.) that John began to baptize in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, reckoning his reign to have commenced from the death of Augustus, which happened, he says, Aug. 28.* in the year of our Lord (according to the common reckoning) 29. This is said (Newt. page 147.) to have been in the year of the Julian period 4727, which must surely be an error of the press for 4742, the year of that period which is universally known to have answered to the 29th of the received Christian era. He supposes, the Baptist's ministry opened in the spring, when the weather was warm; and allowing the remainder of the year to the spreading of his reputation, he concludes, that our Lord was baptized before the end of it, when Tiberius's 16th year was begun. (Matt. iii. 1—17. Mark i. 1—11. Luke iii. 1—18, 21—23. John i. 6—18. sect. 15—18.) After this the temptation ensued, (Matt. iv. 1—11. Mark i. 12, 13. Luke iv. 1—13. sect. 19.) and all those testimonies of John to Jesus, and the interviews between Jesus and his first disciples, (which are mentioned John i. 19, to the end, sect 20—22.) as likewise our Lord's journey to Galilee, and his first miracle there. (John ii. 1—11. sect. 23.) Then followed our Lord's FIRST PASSOVER, which, according to Sir Isaac, (and I would be understood through all this part of the dissertation to be only reporting his opinion,) happened A. D. 30. at which he drove the traders out of the temple, (John ii. 12, to the end, sect. 24.) had that celebrated conference with Nicodemus, (John iii. 1—21. sect. 25, 26.) and continued for some time to abide in Judea, baptizing by his disciples, while John baptized in Enon, and bore his last recorded testimony to him. (John iii. 22, to the end, sect. 27.)

Thus the summer was spent, till John was thrown into prison about November; (Matt. xiv. 3—5. Luke iii. 19, 20. Mark vi. 17—20. sect. 28.) and our Lord passed through Samaria, in his way to Galilee, about the winter solstice, that is, four months before harvest: (John iv. 1—42. sect. 29, 30.) See note (e) on John iv. 35. After which he went, first to Cana in Galilee, (John iv. 43—54. sect. 31.—) and then, after a circuit, or rather journey, in Galilee, (Matt. iv. 12. Mark i. 14, 15. Luke iv. 14, 15. sect. 31, 32.—) he came and preached at Nazareth, Luke iv. 16—30. sect. 32.) and being rejected there, went and settled for a while at Capernaum, where he called Peter, Andrew, James, and John. (Matt. iv. 13—22. Mark i. 16—20. Luke iv. 31, 32, v. 1—11. sect. 33, 34.) This our author thinks must have taken up all the spring, and must bring us to our Lord's SECOND PASSOVER, A. D. 31.

It is after this passover that Sir Isaac places another circuit through Galilee: which also carried his fame throughout all Syria, and added multitudes from thence, and from Decapolis, to those that followed him from Judea and Jerusalem. (Matt. iv. 23, to the end. Mark i. 28. Luke iv. 44. sect.—36.) To these he preached the celebrated sermon on the mount: (Matt. v. vi. vii. sect. 37—43.) Immediately after which, he cured the leper, (Matt. viii. 1—4. Mark i. 40, to the end. Luke v. 12—16. sect. 44.) the centurion's servant, (Matt. viii. 5—13. Luke vii. 1—10. sect. 55.) and Peter's mother-in-law, with many others. (Matt. viii. 14—17. Mark i. 29—38. Luke iv. 38—44. sect. 35, 36.—)

By this time Sir Isaac supposes the feast of tabernacles approached, when our Lord passing through Samaria was refused a lodging; (Luke ix. 51—56. sect. 127.—) to which he strangely supposes a reference, Matt. viii. 19, 20. (Sect. 69.—) After which, when the feast was over, and Christ returned from Jerusalem toward winter, he stilled a tempest as he crossed the sea, (Matt. viii. 23—27. Mark iv. 35, to the end. Luke viii. 22—25. sect. 69.) and when he had landed, dispossessed the legion: (Matt. viii. 28, to the end. Mark v. 1—21. Luke viii. 26—40. sect. 70.) and then returning again to the western side of the sea, cured the paralytic, (Matt. ix. 1—8. Mark ii. 1—12. Luke v. 18—26. sect. 45.—) called Matthew, (Matt. ix. 9. Mark ii. 14. Luke v. 27, 28. sect.—45.) and having been entertained at his house, (Matt. ix. 10—17. Mark ii. 15—22. Luke v. 29, to the end. sect. 71.) went out to raise Jairus's daughter, curing the woman who had a bloody flux by the way. (Matt. ix. 18—26. Mark v. 22, to the end. Luke viii. 41, to the end. sect. 72.—) And after performing other cures, (Matt. ix. 27—34. sect.—72.) he took another circuit in Galilee, (Matt. ix. 35, to the end. sect.—73.) gave a charge to his apostles, and sent them out: (Matt. x. 1, to the end; xi. 1. Mark vi. 7—13. Luke ix. 1—6. sect. 74—76.) after which, having answered the messengers which John had sent, he discourses with the people concerning him, (Matt. xi. 2—19. Luke vii. 18—35. sect. 57, 58.) and upbraids the impenitent cities of Galilee. (Matt. xi. 20, to the end. sect. 59.) And as these events would employ the winter and the spring, our author places the THIRD PASSOVER here, A. D. 32.

He does not indeed expressly assert, that this was the feast at which our Lord cured the lame man at the pool of Bethesda in Jerusalem, and made that defence before the Sanhedrim, related in the 5th chapter of John: (sect. 46—48.) but according to this general plan, this must be its proper place. And that there was a passover about this time, he argues from the story of the disciples rubbing out the ears of corn, which is related as in this place. (Matt. xii. 1—8. Mark ii. 23, to the end. Luke vi. 1—5. sect. 49.) Soon after which happened the cure of the withered hand, (Matt. xii. 9—15. Mark iii. 1—7. Luke vi. 6—11. sect. 50.) and a variety of other miracles, (Matt. xii. 15—21. Mark iii. 7—12. sect. 51.) with that of the dispossession imputed to a confederacy with Beelzebub. (Matt. xii. 22, to the end. Mark iii. 22, to the end. Luke xi. 14—36. sect. 61—64.) Here Sir Isaac places the parables delivered at the sea-side, as he supposes about seed-time, or the feast of tabernacles, (Matt. xiii. 1—52. Mark iv. 1—34. Luke viii. 4—18. sect. 65—68.) his renewed visit to Nazareth, (Matt. xiii. 53, to the end. Mark vi. 1—6 sect. 73.—) and the return of the twelve, after having spent, as he supposes, a year in their embassy. (Mark vi. 30, 31. Luke ix. 10. sect. 78.—)

* [illegible] Aug. 19th [illegible] Sept. 5th [illegible] Sept. 12.

About this time our author places the beheading of John the Baptist, after he had been in prison two years and a quarter. (Matt. xiv. 1—12. Mark vi. 14—29. Luke ix. 7—9. sect. 77.) After which those multitudes resorted to Christ, whom he fed with the five loaves, (Matt. xiv. 13—23. Mark vi. 30—46. Luke ix. 10—17. John vi. 1—15. sect. 78.) and to whom, after having crossed the lake, (Matt. xiv. 24, to the end. Mark vi. 47, to the end. John vi. 16—21. sect. 79.) he discourses concerning the bread of life. (John vi. 21, to the end. sect. 80—82.) As we are expressly told, John vi. 4. that when this miracle was wrought the passover was near, Sir Isaac concludes this to be the FOURTH PASSOVER after our Lord's baptism, A. D. 33 and argues from John vii. 1. that Christ did not celebrate it at Jerusalem.

Quickly after this, followed the dispute with the Scribes who came from Jerusalem, (Matt. xv. 1—20. Mark vii. 1—23. sect. 83, 84.) After which our Lord departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, and after having dispossessed the daughter of a Syrophœnician woman, (Matt. xv. 21—28. Mark vii. 24, to the end. sect. 85.) he returned to the sea of Galilee, where he fed the four thousand. (Matt. xv. 29, to the end. Mark viii. 1—10. sect. 86.) and after having replied to the unreasonable demand the Pharisees made of a sign from heaven, and cautioned his disciples against the leaven of their false doctrine, (Matt. xvi. 1—12. Mark viii. 11—26. sect. 87.) he came to Cæsarea Philippi, and having, by the way acknowledged himself to be the Messiah, he was afterwards transfigured, and ejected an obstinate dæmon. (Matt. xvi. 13, to the end; xvii. 1—21. Mark viii. 27, to the end; ix. 1—29. Luke ix. 18—43. sect. 88—91.) He then came to Capernaum, and made provision by a miracle to pay the tribute; (Matt. xvii. 24, to the end. sect. 92.) and there, or in the neighbourhood of it, discoursed of humility, forgiveness, &c. (Matt. xviii. 1, to the end. Mark ix. 33, to the end. Luke ix. 46—48. sect. 93—95.)

Our author takes no notice of the mission of the seventy, and their return; (Luke x. 1—24. sect. 97—100.) but he would probably have placed it here, previous to that which he supposes to be Christ's last departure from Galilee, (Matt. xix. 1, 2. Mark x. 1. sect. 135.—) when he went up to the feast of tabernacles. (John vii. viii. sect. 98—105.) Neither does he take notice of the visit to Bethany; (Luke x. 38, to the end, sect. 108.) nor of the date of any of those discourses which are recorded by Luke, (from chap. xi. 1. to chap. xviii. 14. sect. 109—129.) except where any passages happen to be parallel to those in Matthew, to which he hints they are to be reduced.

He then introduces our Lord's visit to Jerusalem, and the cure of the blind man at the feast of dedication; (John ix. x. sect. 130—134.) after which Christ retired beyond Jordan, (John x. 40.) where he treats of divorce, (Matt. xix. 3—12. Mark x. 2—12. sect.—135.) blesses the little children, (Matt. xix. 13—15. Mark x. 13—16. Luke xviii. 15—17. sect. 136.) answers, and remarks upon, the young ruler. (Matt. xix. 16, to the end. xx. 1—16. Mark x. 17—31. Luke xviii. 18—30. sect. 137, 138.) After which, on the death of Lazarus, he returns to Bethany, and raises him from the dead; (John xi. 1—46. sect. 139, 140.) and then withdraws to Ephraim, till the approach of the FIFTH PASSOVER after his baptism, which was the last of his life: the particulars of which are related at large by the evangelists, and with the subsequent circumstances of his death, resurrection, appearances, and ascension, make up the rest of this important history: but the contents need not be inserted here, as, for any thing that appears, there is no material difference between a harmony formed on Sir Isaac's principles, or on ours.

I have taken the trouble of quoting the particular passages in each evangelist, as well as of every correspondent section in the Family Expositor, that it may be easy for any who desires it, to read over the whole Paraphrase according to this new scheme, and also to see how it transposes the passages in question, and how it differs from what I judge to be the most exact method of disposition. And the attentive reader will easily see, that there is a coincidence in the order of several of the stories, and a much greater in the dates we have respectively assigned to several which are placed in the same order by both.

A repetition of all the particulars would perhaps be disagreeable. I shall therefore content myself here with observing in general, that Sir Isaac constantly follows the order of Matthew, whatever transpositions of Mark and Luke it may require; which we do not: and he also concludes, there were FIVE PASSOVERS from the baptism to the death of Christ, whereas we, with the generality of harmonizers, suppose there were but FOUR. I have in my notes hinted at some considerations which determined me to the method I have taken: but it will be expected I should here at least touch upon them again, and give a view of them together, which I the rather do, as they strongly illustrate each other.

The grand reason why I do not every where follow the order of Matthew, is in one word this: That both Mark and Luke do not only in several instances agree to place the stories otherwise, though we have not the least reason to think, that one wrote from the other; but also, that they do, one or another of them, expressly assert, "that the events in question actually happened in a different order from that in which Matthew relates them:" whereas it is observable, that in all such cases Matthew does not so expressly assert his order, as to contradict theirs. A few instances of this may be expedient; and a few shall suffice.

Thus, though Matthew relates the cure of Peter's mother in Law, (sect. 35.) in his eighth chap. ver. 14, 15. after the sermon on the mount, and according to Sir Isaac some months after the call of Peter, Andrew, James, and John, which he had related, chap. iv. 18—22. Mark says, this cure was immediately after they came out of the synagogue, into which they entered straightway after the call of those disciples. Mark i. 20, 21, 29.

Again, though Matthew gives us the story of Christ's calming the sea, dispossessing Legion, and curing the paralytic, in the latter part of his eighth and beginning of his ninth chapters, and does not relate the parables of the sower &c. delivered from the ship, till the thirteenth; and places so many facts between, that Sir Isaac concludes the miracles to have been wrought in winter, some time before the passover A. D. 32. and the parables not to have been delivered till about the feast of tabernacles, almost a year after. Mark is very punctual in assuring us, (chap. iv. 35. et seq.) that, in the evening of the same day in which the parables were delivered from the ship, Jesus calmed the sea, and dispossessed Legion: for which reason I have followed him, and placed those miracles immediately after the parables (sect. 69. 70.) but have set that of the paralytic much higher, (sect. 45.) as both Luke and Mark connect it strongly with the cure of the leper, which Sir Isaac allows to have happened immediately after the sermon on the mount.

Matthew relates the message of John, and those subsequent [illegible] our Lord, which are contained in his eleventh chapter, after having given us an account of the mission of the apostles in his tenth. But Luke (who more accurately distinguishes between their call, Luke vi. 13—16. and mission, Luke ix. 2—6. as Mark also does, Mark iii. 13—19. and vi. 7—13.) places this message together with the account of several things on which it is founded, as well as the retreat which our Lord made with the twelve before he sent them out, and the fore-mentioned miracles of calming the sea, dispossessing Legion, &c. between those two events, that is, the call, and actual mission, of the twelve, the one of which must in all reason be supposed considerably to precede the other: to which he also agrees with Mark, as was observed above.

Matthew also relates the story of the disciples rubbing out the ears of corn, and the cure of the withered hand, (chap. xii. 1—13.) after the mission of the twelve: whereas both Luke and Mark place whichever of those events they mention before the choice of them (see Mark iii. 1—6. Luke vi. 1—11.) and Luke expressly says, that choice was in those days. (Luke vi. 12, 13.) that is, at the time which followed the fore-mentioned events.

These, and the discourse on the unpardonable sin, (sect. 61.) which we readily allow might have happened twice, are all the most material transpositions we have made: and I must submit it to the judgment of the reader, whether it be not more for the honour of the New Testament in general, to suppose that Matthew might not intend exactly to preserve the order of the history, where he asserts nothing directly concerning it, than to suppose both Mark and Luke to have mistaken it, when they so expressly declare their regard to it: as in some of these instances they do.

Sir Isaac indeed urges, that Matthew (as well as John, in whom I have made some transposition) was an eye witness: but this can have no weight; unless it be certain, that he every where intended to observe an exact order which he knew to be of reasons or causes, many of which may be to us unknown, he might not be scrupulous about.*

And I cannot forbear observing, that on this great man's own principles there cannot be a great deal in the argument for as Matthew was not called till chap. ix. 9. he could not, according to his hypothesis, have been an eye and ear-witness to all the events from chap. iv. to that place; and if, as Sir Isaac also urges, he was sent out as one of the twelve, chap. x. init. and continued a year on his embassy, he could not be such a witness to what passed from the beginning of chap. xi. to the end of chap. xiii. where he places them return after a year's absence. And these are the chapters where we have made the greatest and most material transpositions, the others hardly deserving a censure.

* Mr. Le Clerc has made a very [illegible]

If this branch of Sir Isaac's argument falls to the ground, and it be not allowed that Matthew observed a strict chronological order; that part of his reasoning, by which he would fix the date of each event, must fall with it. For if it were to be granted, that Matthew hinted at the different seasons of the year when they passed, we could not fix the chronology by that, unless we were sure that each was such a season of a different year, and not of the same; which on this supposition we cannot assert. But I think it very easy (see above) to show, that passages which Sir Isaac produces as indications of the seasons, are not so; or at least do not point them out so perceptibly as they ought to do in order to justify the uses he would make of them.

One cannot but wonder, that some of the arguments which I have now in my eye, should ever have been urged by a writer of such extraordinary discernment. As, for instance, that he should conclude the sermon on the mount must be preached later than the passover, because multitudes followed Christ in the open fields, which he says, (page 151.) was an argument of the summer season; though it is so apparent, that when there were those five thousand men, besides women and children, assembled around him, whom he fed with the five loaves, the passover was only at hand. (John vi. 4.) —Or that he should say, (page 142.) the second mentioned Matt. viii. 23. shows the winter was "now come on," as if there were not storms in the summer. —Or, once more, that it must be said time when the parables in Matt. xiii were delivered, "because sowing seed is mentioned in them;" (page 154.) when it is so evident, (as I have observed elsewhere, note (d) on Mark iv. 3.) the very same principle would prove it to be harvest, as another parable delivered the same day refers to that season.

I am not willing to swell this Dissertation, and therefore omitting many remarks which might easily be made on other passages, I will conclude with the mention of two or three particulars which might contribute to lead this illustrious writer into some error.

One thing that has occasioned this, was his taking it for granted, as I observed before, that the fifteenth year of Tiberius, in which Luke (iii. 1.) says, opened his ministry, must needs be reckoned from the death of Augustus; whereas it ought to be computed from the time when Augustus made him his colleague in the empire. (See note (b) on Luke iii. 1.)

Another is, his admitting the rabbinical rules for the translation of the Jewish feasts, of which we have not one word either in the Scriptures, or in Josephus, or Philo. Yet it is on this principle that reader to judge, whether, if such a variety of journeys and events must be allowed to have happened in these nine months, or, according to him, in six, we may not, by a parity of reason, or rather with greater, comprehend all the preceding within the compass of about sixteen; especially when it is considered that, according to Sir Isaac, that progress of our Lord, for which the apostles were intended to make way, and that after the embassy of the seventy, must be thrown into the first six months of this year, and is an extreme, and, I think, insurmountable difficulty, into which we shall not be driven.*

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

I shall conclude this Dissertation with one reflection, which may perhaps be of some use to those who have but little relish for the niceties of this inquiry. I mean, that when we find this great master, and, I had almost said, so far as the title can be applied to a mortal man, this great father of reason, falling into such obvious mistakes, as I have been obliged here to point out, it tends to give us an humbling idea of the imperfections of the human mind in its present state. And, consequently, we may learn from it two of the most important lessons that can be imagined in social life:—A caution, lest we assert our own opinions with too dogmatical an air;—and a care to avoid such petulancy in censuring the mistakes of others, as if we thought none but the weakest and most contemptible of mankind were capable of being misled by the specious appearances of some inconclusive arguments. And I will venture to say, that if Sir Isaac Newton's error in the order of the harmony teach us this candour, it will be a much greater benefit to us, than if he had placed every circumstance relating to it beyond all possibility of further dispute.

* To make the reader more sensible of this, I shall add a brief survey of the compassed time, within which I suppose the principal events between the several passovers of our Lord's ministry to have happened, referring him to the following chronological table for a more exact view of them.

Events which we suppose between the first and second of our Lord's passovers.

Our Lord spends the summer, and beginning of the winter, in Judea, about the wilderness, passes through Samaria into Galilee, (sect. 25—30.) spends the remainder of the winter and spring in a circuit through Galilee, in which are included his visit to Nazareth, and short stay at Capernaum, and towards the close of the circuit, having preached his celebrated sermon on the mount, returns to Capernaum. (Sect. 31—45.)

Events between the second and third passover.

After vindicating what passed upon rubbing out the ears of corn, and curing the withered hand, he travels to the sea of Galilee, chooses his apostles, and makes another abode at Capernaum; visits Nain, and dismisses John's messengers, all which pass before the end of May. (sect. 46—60.) Then travels, with the twelve in his train, (Luke viii. 1. Matt. xi. 1.) through the places near the sea of Tiberias, perhaps, during the months of June, July, and August: (sect. 61—74.) and attending a much more extensive circuit, dispatches the twelve to make way for him, and probably setting out quickly after them, might employ six months in this part of it, sect. 74—77: and leave sufficient time for his interview with the five thousand whom he miraculously fed, and his conference with the scribes and pharisees from Jerusalem, before the next passover. (Sect. 78—84.)

Events between Christ's third passover and the feast of dedication, which preceded his fourth.

Allowing the time between the passover and the end of May for his journey to the coasted Tyre and Sidon, and other places in Galilee, he might return to Dalmanutha, and feed the four thousand by that time, sect. 85, 86. and the subsequent events and discourses recorded sect. 87—96. employed him till the end of June, he might then send out the seventy, and they might easily meet him at Jerusalem at the feast of tabernacles in September: between which, and the feast of dedication (that the end of December, we must place his last circuit in Galilee, sect. 97—127. unless which is possible, we suppose it to have been begun quickly after the mission of the seventy, and so some part of July and September to have been employed in it. And indeed one cannot imagine any necessity, that all the seventy, or all the apostles, should have finished their journeys, before our Lord began to follow those who were sent to his nearest places. Or, if we should suppose it, and follow Sir Isaac's reckoning, we must, of necessity, place the two journeys, which followed these two embassies, within this space of time, as was before shewn: whereas if we consider the journey to the coast of Tyre and Sidon as an opposite to the former, we may according to our reckoning have eight months to that grand tour of our Lord, in which he followed the twelve, which might make a convenient proportion to despatch that, in which he followed the seventy, in proportion to their number. And however, that if we consider Galilee not to have been larger than three or four of our western counties, we shall more easily acquiesce in the competency of the time assigned to these circuits.

POSTSCRIPT.

I never had, nor never took, an opportunity of looking into Dupin's Life of Christ, till about a year ago, long after the publication of the second edition of my Paraphrase on the Evangelists: but then I found, to my agreeable surprise, a more perfect agreement between his scheme of the harmony and mine, than I expected any where to have met with; and particularly in the story of the resurrection.

Of the 203 sections, into which I have divided the evangelists, we differ only in the order of 29: and as several of these are inseparably connected, there are only, on the whole, nine stories or discourses, in which there is a variety in our order.

The first, sect. 12. The wise men's visit to Christ; which he places before the presentation, sect. 11.

The second, sect. 37—43. Matthew's account of the sermon on the mount; which he supposes to have been coincident with that in Luke, sect. 53, 54. which I consider as a repetition of it.

The third, sect. 69, 70. The stilling the tempest, and dispossessing Legion, which he places before the calling of Matthew, and immediately after sect. 36.

The fourth, sect. 96. Christ's reproving John for an instance of the narrowness of his spirit; which, as a similar and undetermined fact, he subjoins to sect. 93. Christ's checking the ambition of his disciples.

The fifth, sect. 106. The return of the seventy: which he connects with the story of their mission, sect. 97.

The sixth, sect. 118. Christ's urging the necessity of striving for heaven, &c. which he strangely introduces between sect. 151 and 158.

The seventh, the discourses and facts, sect. 126—135. which he scatters promiscuously, after sect. 105. and elsewhere.

The eighth, sect. 170. The intimation of Judas's treachery; which he introduces after the eucharist, sect. 172.

And the last, sect. 181. The warning Christ gave of Peter's denying him; which he joins with sect. 171. though I take them to be two different predictions of the same event.

The reader may see my reasons for the order in which I have placed most of these sections, in the notes upon them: but I cannot forbear thinking, that such a coincidence in all the rest, where the one could not write from the other, is a strong presumption in favour of both.

No. II.

A DISSERTATION

ON

THE INSPIRATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT,

AS

PROVED FROM THE FACTS RECORDED IN THE HISTORICAL BOOKS OF IT.

NOTHING can be more evident, than that a firm and cordial belief of the inspiration of the sacred Scripture is of the highest moment; not only to the edification and peace of the church, but in a great measure to its very existence. For if this be given up, the authority of the revelation is enervated, and its use destroyed: the star which is to direct our course, is clouded; our compass is broke to pieces; and we are left to make the voyage of life in sad uncertainty, amidst a thousand rocks, and shelves, and quicksands. I hope, therefore, I may perform a service acceptable to God and my Christian brethren, while I endeavour, as plainly and as briefly as I can, to place some leading proofs of it in a convincing view. And I undertake the task the more willingly, as in the preface to the first volume of my Family Expositor I laid myself under an obligation, several years ago, to attempt something of this kind, and have often been reminded of it by persons for whom I have the highest regard.

I then proposed to handle the subject in a few sermons, to be added to those, long since published, on the evidences of the gospel. But on a review of that particular connexion, which the argument I am here to pursue has with the history of the New Testament, I apprehend it could no where appear better, than at the end of my exposition on the books which contain it. The reader will, I hope, recollect, that in the sermons just now mentioned, I have endeavoured to demonstrate the truth of that history; and every year convinces me more and more, of the unanswerable force of the evidence there displayed. It is with great pleasure that I reflect on the divine blessing, which hath seemed to attend those discourses; and it is a great encouragement to me to hope, that what I am now to offer may be a means of establishing some of my readers in that regard to the sacred oracles, which will be their best preservative against the errors and the vices of that licentious age in which Providence hath cast our lot; whereby our fidelity and our zeal are brought to a trial, which few ages but those of martyrdom could have afforded.

It will be my business,—First, to state the nature of inspiration in general, and of that kind of it which, as I apprehend, we are to ascribe to the New Testament:—I shall then prove, that it was undoubtedly written by such inspiration:—And after this, I shall briefly hint at the influence, which this important truth ought always to have upon our temper and conduct; by enforcing which, I apprehend I shall take the best method to promote a growing persuasion of the truth I am labouring to establish.

I will only premise, that I do not intend this, as a full discussion of the subject; but only, as such a compendious view of the chief proofs, as may suit the place in which it stands, and as may, from the easiest and plainest principles, give rational satisfaction to the minds of common Christians.

who have not leisure, nor perhaps ability, to enter into all the niceties of theological and scholastical controversy.

I. I shall state the nature of inspiration, and of that kind of it, which we are to ascribe to the New Testament.

In this I shall be more particular, as I apprehend, the want of a sufficient accuracy here has occasioned some confusion in the reasoning of several worthy persons, who have treated this important subject more largely than I must here allow myself to do. I shall not, however, criticise on their account of the matter, but plainly lay down what seems to me intelligible, right, and safe.

By inspiration in general, I would be understood to mean, "Any supernatural influence of God upon the mind of a rational creature, where it is formed to any degree of intellectual improvement, beyond what it would, at that time, and in those circumstances, have attained in a natural way, that is, by the usual exercise of its faculties, unassisted by any special divine interposition." Thus, if a man were instantaneously enabled to speak a language which he had never learned, how possible soever it might have been for him to have obtained an equal readiness in it by degrees, I believe few would scruple to say, that he owed his acquaintance with it to a divine inspiration. Or if he gave a true and exact account of what was doing at a distance, and published a particular relation of what he neither saw nor heard, as some of the prophets did; all the world would own, if the affair were too complex, and the account too circumstantial, to be the result of a lucky guess, that he must be inspired with the knowledge of it; though another account equally exact, given by a person on the spot, would be ascribed to no inspiration at all.

But of this supernatural influence on the minds of men, forming them to such extraordinary intellectual improvements and abilities, there are various sorts and degrees, which it will be of importance for us accurately to distinguish from each other.

If a person be discoursing either in word or writing, and God do miraculously watch over his mind, and, however secretly, direct it in such a manner, as to keep him more secure from error in what he speaks or writes, than he could have been merely by the natural exercise of his faculties, I should say he was inspired; even though there should be no extraordinary marks of high genius in the work; or even though another person, with a stronger memory, or relating a fact more immediately after it happened, might naturally have recounted it with equal exactness. Yet still, if there was in this case any thing miraculous, we must, on the principles above, allow an inspiration; and I would call this, to distinguish it from other and higher degrees, an inspiration of superintendency.

If this influence should act in such a degree, as absolutely to exclude all mixture of error in a declaration of doctrines or facts so superintended, we might then call it a plenary superintending inspiration; or, as I would choose for popular use to express myself in this discourse, a full inspiration.

Now it will from hence follow, and I desire that it may be seriously attended to, that a book, the contents of which are entirely true, may be said to be written by a full inspiration, even though it contain many things which the author might have known and recorded merely by the use of his natural faculties, if there be others which he did not so well know, or could not without miraculous assistance have so exactly recollected; or if, on the whole, a freedom from all error would not, in fact, have been found, unless God had thus superintended or watched over his mind and pen. And in regard to such a production, it would be altogether impertinent and insignificant to inquire, how far did natural memory or natural reason operate, and in what particular facts or doctrines did supernatural agency prevail. It is enough, if I know, that what the author says or writes is true, though I know not particularly how he came by this or that truth: for my obligation to receive it arises from its being known truth, and not merely from its being made known this or that way. And should God miraculously assure me that any particular writing contained nothing but the truth; and should he at the same time tell me, it had been drawn up without any miraculous assistance at all, though I could not then call it inspired, I should be as much obliged to receive and submit to it on its being thus attested by God, as if every single word had been immediately dictated by him.

It will further follow from what is said above, that a book may be written by such full inspiration as I have described, though the author being left to the choice of his own words, phrases, and manner,* there may be some imperfection in the style and method, provided the whole contents of it are true; if the subject be so important, as to make it consistent with the divine wisdom miraculously to interpose, to preserve an entire credibility as to the exact truth of facts recorded, and doctrines delivered as divine. If, indeed, God were represented as declaring such a book to be intended by him as an exact standard for logic, oratory, or poetry, every apparent defect in either would be an internal objection against it. But if it be represented only as intended to teach us truth, in order to its having a proper influence on our temper and actions, such defects would no more warrant or excuse our rejecting its authority, than the want of a ready utterance or a musical voice would excuse our disregard to a person, who should bring us competent evidence of his being a messenger from God to us.

* It is very evident that the learned Maimonides thought that it [illegible] to the prophets, though I think it [illegible] See Maimon. More Nev. lib. [illegible]

I have been more particular in stating this kind of inspiration, because it is that which I shall endeavour to assert to the sacred books of the New Testament, and this, without any exception or limitation, as they came out of the hands of the apostles, though I allow it is possible they may, in this or that particular copy, and in some minuter instances which now perhaps affect all our remaining copies, have suffered something by the injuries of time, or the negligence of transcribers, as well as printers; which, that they have in some particulars suffered, is as notorious a fact, as that there is a written or a printed copy of them in the world; yet is at the same time a fact, which no man of common sense or honesty can seriously urge against their authority.

Though it be the main point in my view, to prove that the New Testament is written under that kind of inspiration which I have been explaining, I must nevertheless beg leave to mention two other kinds, of which divines often speak, and which do also, in a considerable degree, belong to many parts of Scripture, though I think it neither expedient, material, nor safe, to assert that they run through the whole of it: I mean, an inspiration of elevation and of suggestion.

The former, as its name plainly intimates, prevails where the faculties, though they act in a regular, and, as it seems, a common, manner, are nevertheless elevated, or raised to some extraordinary degree, so that the performance is more truly sublime, noble, and pathetic, than what would have been produced merely by the force of a man's natural genius. As for the particular degree of the divine agency, where there is indeed something of this inspiration, perhaps neither the person that is under it, nor any other creature, may be able confidently to pronounce concerning it. Perhaps nothing less penetrating than the eye of God himself may be able universally to distinguish that narrow line, which divides what is natural from what is supernatural, in all the productions and powers of imagination, reasoning, and language, or in the effects and powers of memory under the former head. It is a curiosity, in the minute particulars of which we are not at all concerned; as it is the same God which, whether naturally or miraculously, worketh all and in all, 1Cor. xii. 9. But if any excellency in the performance itself can speak it to be more than human, productions of this sort are to be found in Scripture; and the rank and education of some of the sacred penmen, render the hand of God peculiarly conspicuous in the sublimity and lustre of their writings. What the gifts of the Spirit may in every age of the church have done, by operations of this kind, we know not. And I think it would be presumptuous absolutely to deny, that God might act in some extraordinary degree on some of the heathen writers, to produce those glorious works of antiquity, which have been, under the direction of his providence, so efficacious, on the one hand, to transmit the evidences of divine revelation, and, on the other, to illustrate the necessity of it: in consequence of which, I cannot forbear saying, by the way, that I think they who are intimately acquainted with them are, of all men upon earth, the most inexcusable in rejecting Christianity. But our inability to mark out the exact boundaries between nature and an extraordinary divine agency, is not much to be regretted; since it does not appear to be the design of Providence, by such elevations of sentiment, style, and manner, by any means to bear testimony to the person adorned with them, as a messenger sent to speak in his name, which may as effectually be done in the plainest and simplest forms of expression, without any thing which looks like the heightenings of art, or the sparklings of an extraordinary genius.

The other, which divines have called immediate suggestion, is the highest and most extraordinary kind of inspiration; and takes place, when the use of our faculties is superseded, and God does, as it were, speak directly to the mind; making such discoveries to it as it could not otherwise have obtained, and dictating the very words in which these discoveries are to be communicated to others: so that a person, in what he writes from hence, is no other than first the auditor, and then, if I may be allowed the expression, the secretary, of God; as John was of our Lord Jesus Christ, when he wrote from his sacred lips the seven epistles to the Asiatic churches. And it is, no doubt, to an inspiration of this kind, that the book of the Revelation owes its original.

It is evident from the definitions above, that there may be a full superintendency, where neither of the latter kinds of inspiration, of elevation or suggestion, take place: but I think we must necessarily allow, that an inspiration of suggestion, so far as it goes, must also imply a full superintendency in recovering the history of what has been seen or heard, or any prophetic vision, when it is necessary to make a report of it. For as it would, on the one hand, be impious to imagine that the blessed God would dictate a falsehood to any of his creatures; so neither can we suppose it consistent with the divine wisdom, to suffer the prophet, through infirmity, to err in delivering a message, with which he had expressly charged him, lest what he would be given in vain, so far as there was a failure in the exact delivery of it.

Besides the last book of the New Testament, I mean, the Revelation, which I have already mentioned in this view, it seems evident to me, that some other parts of it were given by such a suggestion; seeing there are so many predictions interspersed, and so many mysteries revealed, which lay entirely beyond the ken of any human, or perhaps angelic, mind. But that this is applicable to all the history of it, or to all things contained in its epistolary parts, I choose not to assert. For as it cannot be necessary to its entire credibility, which nothing can more effectually secure than a full superintendency, it would subject us to many difficulties, which have been so forcibly urged by others, that it is not necessary for me here to repeat them. But I am well assured, that the apparent insufficiency of the answers, which have been returned to these objections by some very sincere, but I think in this instance less judicious, defenders of Scripture, has led some people to conclude, that the Scripture was not inspired at all; as if it had been on both sides agreed, that a universal suggestion was the only kind of inspiration worth contending about. The consequence of this hath been, that such as are dissatisfied with the arguments, which these defenders of the divine authority of the Scripture insist upon, read the Scriptures, if they read them at all, not to learn their authentic dictates, but to try the sentiments contained in them by the touch-stone of their own reason, and to separate what that shall allow to be right, from what it presumptuously concludes to be wrong. And this boasted standard has been so very defective, that on this mistaken notion they have not only rejected many of the most vital truths of Christianity, but even some essential principles of natural religion. And thus they have in effect annihilated the Christian revelation, at the very same time that they have acknowledged the historical truth of the facts on which it is built. This is the body of men that have affected to call themselves cautious believers: but their character is so admirably well described under that of Agrippa, by my honoured friend Dr. Watts, in his little treatise called the Redeemer and Sanctifier, that it may be sufficient here to have hinted it thus briefly, as the reason why, out of regard to them as well as others, I have resumed the subject of inspiration, and endeavoured to place it in, what I do in my conscience apprehend to be, both a safe and rational light.

That I may remedy, so far as God shall enable me to do it, the great and destructive evil I have just been mentioning, and may establish in the minds of Christians a due regard to the sacred oracles of eternal truth, I shall now proceed to the second part of this discourse: in which,

II. I am to show, how evidently the full inspiration of the New Testament, in the sense stated above, follows from the acknowledged truth of the history which it contains, in all its leading and most important facts.

But before I proceed to the discussion of the matter, I must beg leave to observe, that, though this is what I apprehend to be the grand argument, and that which may most properly be connected with an exposition of the historical books, I am very far from slighting those other arguments which fall not so directly in my way here.

I greatly revere the testimony of the primitive Christian writers, not only to the real existence of the sacred books in those early ages, but also to their divine original: their persuasion of which most evidently appears from the veneration with which they speak of them, even while miraculous gifts remained in the church; and consequently, an exact attendance to a written rule might seem less absolutely necessary, and the authority of inferior teachers might approach nearer to that of the apostles. I believe every candid reader will acknowledge, that nothing can be objected to many strong passages in Clemens Romanus, Polycarp, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, and some other ancient writers he has mentioned, that are now lost. It is needless to produce them here, after those valuable specimens of them, which Dr. Whitby and Mons. Du Pin have given; and especially, considering what my learned friend Dr. Lardner has with so much industry and accuracy of judgment collected on this head, in the second part of his Credibility of the Gospel History. I shall therefore content myself with observing here, that several of the most learned and considerable of these ancients speak of this veneration for the sacred writings of the New Testament, not as the result of their own private judgment, but as that in which all the churches were unanimously agreed.*

The internal characters of divine inspiration, with which every page of the New Testament abounds, do also deserve our attentive notice; and render the book itself, if considered as detached from all external evidence whatsoever, a compendious demonstration of its own sacred original, and consequently of the certainty of that religion which it teaches. The excellency of its doctrines, the spirituality and elevation of its design, the majesty

* Thus Origen says, Philocal. cap. xii. page 41. [illegible] "That of a man would not readily be allowed to be an infidel, he must admit the inspiration of the Scriptures." And he elsewhere places the gospels in the number of writings, "which were received as divine by all the churches of God, and were the elements, or first principles, of the church's faith." [illegible] Tertullian also lays it down as a fundamental principle in disputing with heretics, "That the books of doctrine are to be determined by Scripture;" for the question has evidently the form of a strong suggestion. Athanasius would have passed for no Reformer, even ex Ecclesiæ Fidei. De Principiis Homil. cap. xv. And Eusebius quotes a much more ancient writer than himself, Ecclesiast. Hist. lib. v. cap. 28. who calls the Scriptures "the rule of ancient faith;" and who, after words speaking of heretics, declares, "that if they denied the Scriptures to be divinely inspired, they were infidels."

and simplicity of its style, the agreement of its parts in the most unsuspicious manner, with its more than human efficacy on the hearts and consciences of men, do all concur to give us a very high idea of the New Testament: and I am persuaded, that the wiser and better any man is, and the more familiarly he converses with these unequalled books, the more will he be struck with this evidence. But these things, in the general, are better felt than expressed; and several of the arguments arise, not from particular passages, but from the general tenor of the books: and consequently, they cannot be judged of, but by a serious and attentive perusal.

Dismissing, therefore, these topics, not with neglect, but with the sincerest expressions of just and high veneration, I now proceed to that grand proof of the inspiration of the New Testament, which is derived from the credibility of its leading facts, which having so fully illustrated in the sermons referred to above, I think I have a just title to assume as the foundation of what further reasonings may occur.

Admitting this great principle, it is undeniably certain,—That Jesus of Nazareth was a most extraordinary person:—That after having been foretold by many prophets, in distant periods of time, he was at length, agreeably to the repeated declaration of an angel, first to a priest ministering at the golden altar in the temple, and then to his mother, conceived by a virgin of David's family:—That his birth was proclaimed by a choir of angels, who celebrated it in celestial anthems, as the foundation of peace on earth, and the most glorious display of divine benevolence to men:—That before his public appearance, a person greater than any of the prophets, and whose birth had also been foretold by an angel, was sent to prepare his way:—That on his being baptized, he was anointed with a wonderful effusion of the Spirit, poured down upon him by a visible symbol: and that the efficacy of this sacred agent, continually residing in him, was apparent throughout the whole course of his ministry; not only in the unspotted sanctity of his life, amidst a thousand most violent temptations, and in the bright assemblage of virtues and graces, which shone in it with a lustre before unknown, and since absolutely unparalleled; but also in a multitude of various works of wonder and mercy, which he miraculously wrought on those, whose diseases were of the most desperate and incurable nature, and even on the dead, whom that almighty voice of his, which had driven out the fiercest infernal spirits, and calmed the rage of tempests, did, with serene majesty, awaken into life, as from a slumber. It is also on the same foundation certain, That this illustrious person having, by the malice of his enemies, been most unjustly and cruelly put to death, did, on the third day, arise from the dead. And that, after having given to his disciples the most abundant proofs of that important fact, he at length ascended to heaven gradually in their sight; angels appearing, to assure them he should as visibly descend from thence to the universal judgment, the administration of which he had declared to be committed to him.

I must freely declare, that had I been an entire stranger to the sacred story, and proceeded no further in it than this, supposing me firmly to have believed all these wonderful things, though delivered in the shortest abstract that could have been made of them, I should readily have concluded, that this extraordinary person, being sent, as it plainly appears from the history that he was, with a divine revelation for the benefit of all nations and of all ages, had taken care to leave some authentic records of the doctrine which he taught. And if I had further found, that he had left no such records written by himself, I should naturally have concluded, that he took effectual care that some of his followers should be enabled to deliver down to posterity the system of religion which he taught, in the most accurate manner; with all such extraordinary assistance from God as the nature of the subject required, in order to rendering their accounts exact. And I believe every reasonable man would draw this inference; because it is very apparent, that the great end of this vast and astonishing apparatus (for vast and astonishing it would appear, if what relates to Jesus alone were taken into the survey) must, in the nature of things, be frustrated, if no such records were provided; it being morally impossible that unwritten tradition should convey a system of religion pure and uncorrupted, even to the next generation; and much more, that it should so convey it to the end of time. And it would seem, so far as we can judge, by no means worthy the divine wisdom, to suffer the good effects of such a great and noble plan to be lost, for want of so easy an expedient; especially, since men of the age and country in which these things happened, were not only blessed with the use of letters, but were remarkable for their application to them, and for great proficiency in various branches of learning. And if I should not only have an abstract of the history of Jesus which I judged credible, but should also be so happy as to have the four gospels in my hand, with convincing evidences of their being genuine, which we here suppose; I should, on these principles, accordingly argue, that not only the leading facts, but likewise the system of doctrines and discourses delivered in them, might entirely be depended upon: nor could I conceive the truth of such doctrines and discourses to be seperable from the general truth of the leading facts referred to above: having as I here suppose, proper evidences to convince me, that the penmen of these books were the persons by whom the memory of these events was to be delivered down to posterity: which is a further principle, that none of common sense and modesty can pretend to contest; none appearing as their competitors, whose pretensions are worthy to be named.

But my apprehension of the full authenticness and credibility of these writers would, on the supposition I am here making, greatly increase, as I proceeded to that excellent and useful book, which the good providence of God has now given me an opportunity of illustrating; the Acts of the holy Apostles: since I learn from thence, that in a very few days after the ascension of Jesus into heaven, the Spirit of God was, according to his promise, poured out upon his apostles in an abundant manner, attended with the visible appearance of a lambent celestial flame; and that, in consequence of this amazing unction, the poor fishermen of Galilee, and their companions, were in a moment enabled to speak, with the greatest readiness and propriety, Latin, Greek, Arabic, Coptic, Persic, and a variety of other languages, the first rudiments of which they had never learnt; and also to perform all kinds of miracles, equal to those of their Master, and in some circumstances, superior to them. My veneration for the writings of these men, and I here suppose, I know those of the New Testament to be so, must be unparalleled, when I think who and what they were: and I am so struck with this plain, but divinely powerful, argument, that I must entreat my reader to review with me, a little more particularly, some of the actions and circumstances of these holy men, to whose writings I am labouring to conciliate his unreserved regard.

Let them all be considered, as preaching the gospel in that extraordinary manner, on the day of Pentecost; and a few days after, when some of their companions had been seized and threatened by the Sanhedrim, as anointed again with such an effusion of the Spirit, as shook the very house in which they were, and inspired them all at once with the same sublime hymn of praise. Let them be considered, as afterwards led out of prison by an angel, and commanded by him to go and preach the gospel in the temple, under the remarkable phraseology of "the words of this life;" as if the whole life and happiness of the human race depended on their knowing and receiving it. Nor let us here forget that extraordinary power, common to all the apostles, of communicating the miraculous gifts of the Spirit by the imposition of their hands. Had we nothing particularly to say of any one, more than these grand things which we hear of them all, it must surely command our reverence to their writings, and set them at a vast distance from any of merely human original.

But through the singular providence of God it hath so happened, that we have the most particular history of the lives of those apostles, to whose writings we are generally most indebted, I mean, John, Peter, and Paul.

With respect to John we know, that besides the concern he had in the cure of the lame man, he was favoured with the visions of God in the Isle of Patmos; where our Lord, after an abode of more than half a century on the throne of his glory at his Father's right hand, did him the unequalled honour to use him as his amanuensis, or secretary; expressly dictating to him the letters he was pleased to send to the seven churches in Asia. How easily then may we suppose him so to have presided over his other writings, as to have secured him from mistakes in them!

Consider Peter, as striking Ananias and Sapphira dead with a word; as curing, by the like powerful word, one cripple at Jerusalem, and another at Lydda; and calling back Dorcas, even from the dead. Let us view him in that grand circumstance, of being marked out so particularly by an angel to Cornelius, and sent to him as the oracle of God himself, from whom that worthy and honourable person was to hear words, by which he and all his house should be saved: and after this, let us view him, as once more delivered out of the hand of Herod, and from all the expectation of the people of the Jews, by an angel, who struck off his chains, and opened the doors of his prison, the very night before he was to have been executed. And let any one, with these particulars in his eye, added to the foregoing, in which he shared with all his brethren, say, what more could be necessary, to prove the divine inspiration of what he taught; so far as inspiration was requisite, to render it entirely authentic: or let any one further say, upon what imaginable pretence the authority of his writings can be denied, if that of his preaching be granted.

And to mention no more, let Paul, that great scribe, instructed in the kingdom of heaven, to whose pen we owe so many invaluable epistles, be considered in the same view: and let us endeavour to impress our minds with the various scenes through which we know he passed, and the distinguished favours, with which his Master honoured him, that we may judge, how we are to receive the instruction of his pen. Let us therefore think of him, as so miraculously called by the voice of Christ to the profession of his gospel, when he was persecuting it even to the death, as receiving a full and distinct revelation of that glorious, but to him quite unknown, gospel, by the immediate inspiration of its divine Author; which is a fact he expressly witnesses, and in which he could not possibly be mistaken. Think of the lustre of those astonishing works, which shone round him wherever he went, and of those wrought in his favour, which showed him so eminently the care of heaven; Demons ejected; distempers cured sometimes with a touch, and sometimes without it, by a garment sent from him to the patient; his motions guided from place to place by a divine oracle; Elymas struck blind for opposing him; his bands loosed by an earthquake; his strength and vigour instantaneously restored, when the rage of the mutable and barbarous populace at Lystra had stoned him and left him for dead; and to add no more, his safety in a shipwreck, with that of near three hundred more in the same vessel for his sake, promised by an angel, and accomplished without the loss of a single person, when they had expected nothing but a universal ruin. Let us, I say, think of Paul in these circumstances; and with these facts full in our view, let us judge, whether it is at all probable, yea, whether it be morally possible, that a man, sent out and attended with such credentials as these, should be so left of God, amidst all these tokens of his constant care, as to mingle error with sound doctrine, and his own fancies with the divine revelations, which we are sure he received; or whether, if he were not left to such effects of human frailty in his preaching, but might have been regarded by his hearers with entire credit, he would be left to them in those writings, by which he was, as it were, to preach to all future generations of men, from one end of the world to the other; and by which, being dead, he yet speaketh, in all languages, and to all Christian assemblies.

I cannot forbear thinking this plain argument, so well adapted to popular use, abundantly sufficient to carry conviction to every candid mind, in proportion to the degree of its attention and penetration. And I am almost afraid, that some should think I have bestowed an unnecessary labour, thus particularly to state a matter, which hath such a flood of light poured in upon it from almost every page of the sacred story. But I have been obliged, in the course of this exposition, to meditate much on these facts; and under the deep impression I could not but speak as out of the fulness of my heart.

Yet after all I have already said, I should be very unjust to this argument, if I did not endeavour to represent to my reader, how much it is strengthened, on the one hand, by the express and comprehensive promises which our Redeemer made to his apostles; and on the other, by the peculiar language in which the apostles themselves speak of their preaching and writings, and the high regard they challenge to each; a regard, which nothing could justify them in demanding, but a consciousness that they were indeed under a full inspiration.

The promises of our Lord Jesus Christ must undoubtedly have a very great weight with all, that have reflected on that indisputable testimony, which God himself bore to him in raising [illegible]. And therefore, though they are so very well known, I must beg leave, not only to refer to them, but to recite the chief of them at large: and I entreat the reader to consider, how he can reconcile them with an apprehension, that our Lord Jesus Christ did at the same time intend to leave the persons to whom he made such promises liable to mistake both in facts and doctrines, and to [illegible] to mislead such as should depend upon their testimony, where they professed themselves to be thoroughly informed.

In that copious and excellent discourse, which our Lord addressed to the apostles, just before he quitted the guest-chamber to go to the garden of Gethsemane, that is, but a few hours before his death, the grand consolation he urges to his sorrowful disciples, is this; that he would send his Spirit upon them. The donation of which Spirit is represented as the first-fruits of Christ's intercession; when after so long an absence, and such terrible sufferings, he should be restored to his Father's embraces. This is spoken of as the first petition preferred by him, and the first favour granted to his church for his sake: John xiv. 16. I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever. Yea, Christ declares, and he could not be mistaken in it, that the agency of this Spirit should so abundantly counterbalance all the advantages they received from his bodily presence, that strong as their affection to him was, they would in that view have reason to rejoice in his leaving them: (John xvi. 7.) I tell you the truth, that is, I say what may be depended upon as a most important certainty, and very important indeed such a representation was; it is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you. Now from these expressions, were they alone, I think we might probably infer, that the apostles, after having received the Spirit, would be in no more danger of erring in their writings, than they would have been, if Jesus himself had been always near them, to inform them concerning any fact or doctrine, of which they ought [illegible] to speak.

This is further confirmed by the title which is given him no less than thrice in this discourse, the Spirit of truth; almost in a breath with these great and weighty circumstances, that he should abide with them for ever: (ver. 16.) that he should guide them into all truth; that he should teach them all things, yea, and show them things to come. John xvi. 13. which must surely secure them from any danger of erring in relating things that were past. But lest any should be perverse enough to dispute the consequence, our Lord particularly mentions this effect of the Spirit's operation, that they should thereby be fitted to bear a testimony to him, as those who had long been conversant with him, and whose memories were miraculously assisted in recollecting those discourses which they had heard from him: John xv. 26. 27. "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me; and ye also, being so assisted, shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning." And again, John xiv. 26. "The Holy Ghost shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."

Soon after this, our Lord, on the very day in which he rose from the dead, in a dependence on the aids of this promised Spirit, gives them a commission, which nothing but its plenary inspiration could have answered, or have qualified them to fulfil: for coming to them, he declares, John xx. 21. "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you: and upon this he breathed upon them, and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted; and whose soever ye retain, they are retained." Which, whether it signifies a power of inflicting and removing miraculous punishments, or of authoritatively declaring that sins were in particular instances forgiven or retained, must, either way, suppose such a constant presence of Christ with them, as it is hard, or rather impossible, to reconcile with supposing them to err in what they wrote for the instruction of the church in succeeding ages.

These are the grand passages, on which I rest this part of the argument: yet I think, I ought not to omit those, in which Christ promises them such extraordinary assistance of the Spirit, while defending his cause in the presence of magistrates; and it is the more proper to mention them, as the language in which they are made is so remarkable. On this occasion then he tells them, Matt. x. 19, 20. "When they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak, for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak, for it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you." May we not therefore on the same principles conclude, that when they were to write for the use of all future generations of Christians, it was not so much they who wrote, as the Spirit of the Father, who in effect wrote by them, and, as it were, dictated to them? For the occasion will surely appear as important, in one instance, as in the other, or rather much more important in the latter, than in the former, as an error in their writings would have a much more extensive and lasting influence, than a slip of their tongues in a transient pleading before a magistrate. Nay, to give this argument the greatest possible weight, we find that the same promise was made, almost in the very same words, Luke xii. 11, 12. to persons in the dignity of their office inferior to the apostles; I mean, to the seventy: which might have entitled their writings to such a regard, as I am now labouring to engage to those of their superiors.

I shall only further remind the reader, that our Lord, when just ascending to heaven, refers to that effusion of the Spirit, which was quickly after to happen, even before they departed from Jerusalem, as the era from whence the grand accomplishment of the promises relating to the aids of the Spirit was to be dated. See Luke xxiv. 49. Acts i. 4, 5. And as all the apostolical writings which now remain, were written several years after that event, it plainly proves, they lie within the period in which they were to expect all the assistance which these promises import.

The most plausible objection which can be urged against the application of these promises to the matter now before us, is this: "That these promises only refer to the supernatural assistance, granted to the apostles on great and pressing occasions; but that they might easily, without such assistance, have written a true account of the life and preaching of Christ, and of such other facts as they record; and consequently, that their historical writings at least, how credible soever we suppose them, might be drawn up without any inspiration at all."

To this I might reply, That if it be allowed, that the apostles, in the books which we have been endeavouring to explain, wrote the exact truth, and that in their epistles they have made a right and unerring representation of the revelation with which they were charged, so that we may safely make their writings a rule both of faith and practice, the remaining question would only be about the propriety of using the word inspiration, when speaking of them; and therefore would, on the principles I have laid down above, be comparatively of small importance. Yet I think it easy, in that view of the question, to prove that these writings could not have been thus entirely credible, if they had not been written under such a full inspiration of superintendency, as is stated in the first part of this discourse.

I do indeed allow, and no candid man can dispute it, that the penmen of the New Testament, supposing them able to write at all, might merely by the natural exercise of their memory, under the direction of the common sense and reason of men, have given us a plain, faithful, and very useful account of many extraordinary scenes, to which they had been witnesses during the time they conversed with Jesus on earth, and in which they were active after his ascension. And I cannot forbear saying, that supposing the truth of the grand leading facts, as, that Jesus of Nazareth taught a doctrine confirmed by miracles, and was himself raised from the dead, I should have esteemed such writings, supposing them merely an honest account of what such men must have known, to be beyond all comparison the most valuable records of antiquity. But when these writings came to be perused, it is evident to me, from the particular contents of them, that honest and worthy men would never have pretended to have written in such a manner, if they had not been conscious of superior direction, and extraordinary divine influence.

For the historians of whom we speak, do not merely give us a very circumstantial account of actions; as what journeys Christ made, what miracles he performed, in what manner he was received, where and how he died, and rose again, and ascended into heaven; but they do also, as we may reasonably expect they should, give us an account of the doctrine he taught: and indeed, if they had not done this, the knowledge of his story, amazing as it is, would have been but an unprofitable amusement to us. Nor do they content themselves with giving us a short summary of his doctrine, or a view of the religion he intended to introduce, as the general result of their having attended so long on his instructions; but they presume to tell us his very words. And here they do not merely relate some short sayings, the remarkable poignancy of which, or their propriety to the circumstances in which they were spoken, might have struck the memory with a peculiar force; but they insert long discourses which he made on public occasions; though they do not pretend that he left any copies of them, or that they themselves took them from any written memoirs whatsoever: and it is worth our notice, that, besides the many shorter sayings and replies, with which the history is interspersed, near one half of the four gospels is taken up with the insertion of these discourses.*

Now it was highly necessary, that if these speeches of our Lord were recorded at all, they should be recorded with great exactness, for many of them relate to the system of doctrines which he came to teach; and others of them are predictions of future events, referring to a great variety of curious circumstances, where a small mistake might greatly have affected the credit of the prediction, and with it the cause of Christianity in general: so that common prudence would have taught the apostles to wave them, rather than pretend to deliver them to posterity, if they had not been sure they could have done it exactly.

But how could they have expected to have done this, merely by the natural strength of their own memories, unless we imagine each of them to be a prodigy in that respect, to which no one of them makes the least shadow of a pretence! It is well known, that several of those speeches of Christ which Matthew and John give us, not now to mention the other evangelists, contain several pages; and some of them cannot be deliberately and decently read over in less than a quarter of an hour. Now I believe, if my reader would make the experiment on any thing of that length which he read or heard yesterday, or even on one of those discourses of Christ, though perhaps he has read or heard it a hundred times; he would find, on a careful examination, many things would probably be omitted, many transposed; many expressed in a different manner: and were he to write a copy of such a discourse from his memory, and then critically to compare it with the original, he would find the sense, in many particulars, where there was some general resemblance, more different than he could perhaps have imagined, and variations, which at first seemed but inconsiderable, would appear greatly to affect the sense, when they came to be more nicely reviewed. If this would so probably be the case with ninety-nine out of a hundred of mankind, and I certainly speak within compass, when a discourse to be repeated had been delivered but a day or an hour before, what could be expected from the apostles, with an interval of so many years? And especially from John, who has, in proportion to the length of his gospel, recorded more speeches than any of the rest, and wrote them, if we may credit the most authentic tradition, more than half a century after our Lord's ascension?

This argument would have great weight, with relation to a man, whose life was ever so powerful, and his affairs contracted in the narrowest sphere: but it will be greatly strengthened, when we come to consider the multitude and variety of scenes, and those too the most interesting that can be imagined, through which the apostles passed. When we consider all their labours and their cares; the journeys they were continually taking; the novelty of objects perpetually surrounding them; and, above all, the persecutions and dangers to which they were daily exposed; and the strong manner in which the mind is struck, and the memory of past circumstances erased, by such occurrences; I cannot conceive, that any reader will be so unreasonable, as to imagine these things could have been written with any exactness by the apostles, if they had not been miraculously assisted in recording them. And what is particularly mentioned by the two of those writers, of the promised agency of the Spirit to bring to their remembrance all things they had heard from Christ himself; John xiv. 26. must I think incontestably prove, that this was the purpose

* If my computation does not deceive me, there are 203 sections or verses taken up thus, and some of them are long sections too: and the number of verses contained in these speeches, is found by the same way to be about 1700 to 3570, which is the number of verses in the four gospels.

for which the Spirit was given; and therefore, we may be sure, that it was a purpose for which it was needed.

I hope I have by this time convinced my reader, that it is agreeable to the other circumstances of the apostles' story, and to the promises which our Lord so largely and so frequently made to them, and the frequent repetition of the promise strongly intimates the importance of it, to suppose, that they were indeed favoured with a full inspiration in their writings.

But to complete the argument, it must be observed, that these holy men, for such the history plainly shows them to have been, assume to themselves such an authority, and speak of their own discourses and writings in such peculiar language, as nothing but a consciousness of such inspiration could warrant, or even excuse.

To make us duly sensible of the force of this argument, let us hear Paul, Peter, and John, and we shall find the remark applicable to them all; though as St. Paul wrote much more than either of the latter, we may naturally expect to find the most frequent instances of it in his writings.

When the apostle Paul had taken notice to the Corinthians, that the subject of his preaching was the wisdom of God in a mystery, and related to things which transcended the sense and imagination of men, he adds, 1 Cor. ii. 10. "But God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, even the deep things of God:" and again, ver. 12. "We have received, not the spirit of the world, so as to act in that artful way, which a regard to secular advantages dictates; but the Spirit which is of God, that we may know the things that are freely given us of God." Now it is natural to conclude from hence, that this knowledge being given them, not merely or chiefly for themselves, but for the church, in which view they speak of themselves and their office, as the gift of God to the church; compare Eph. iv. 11, 12. and 1 Cor. iii. 21—23. they should be assisted to communicate it in a proper manner; since otherwise, the end of God in giving it to them would be frustrated. But the apostle does not content himself with barely suggesting this; but he asserts it in the most express terms: 1 Cor. ii. 13. Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, that is, not with a vain ostentation of human eloquence; but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual, or, as some would render and paraphrase it, adapting spiritual expressions to spiritual things.* And in the close of the chapter, when with a noble freedom, in a consciousness of the distinguished character he bore, he puts the question to the whole world besides, Who hath known the mind of the Lord? he adds, But we have the mind of Christ. Which last clause plainly determines the sense, in which we are to take those words at the close of chap. vii. And I think also, that I have the Spirit of God; that is, "I certainly appear to have it;" or, "it is evident and apparent, that my pretences to it are not a vain boast." For, after having so expressly asserted it just above, none can imagine he meant here to insinuate, that he was uncertain whether he had it or not. He appeals therefore to those whose gifts were most eminent, to dispute it, if they could: 1 Cor. xiv. 37. If any man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, that is, if he have ever so good evidence that he really is so, for it cannot be thought he meant to appeal only to those who falsely pretended to these endowments, let him acknowledge, that the things which I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord.—In his second epistle to the Corinthians, chap. ii. 10. he speaks of forgiving offenders in the person of Christ; and amidst the humblest acknowledgments of his own insufficiency, boasts a sufficiency of God, who had made him an able minister of the New Testament. 2 Cor. iii. 5, 6. Of which he was so thoroughly sensible, that in the first epistle which he ever wrote, so far as Scripture informs us, to any of the churches, I mean, his first epistle to the Thessalonians, he ventures to say, chap. iv. 8. He that despiseth, that is, as the context plainly implies, he that despiseth or rejecteth, what I now write, despiseth not man, only or chiefly, but God, who hath given us his Holy Spirit: which manifestly intimates, that what he wrote was under supernatural divine guidance and influence, as in the second verse of that chapter he had spoken of commandments which he had given them by the Lord Jesus Christ; just as he afterwards declared to the Corinthians, 2 Cor. xiii. 3. how well he was able to give proofs of Christ speaking in him.—In his epistle to the Galatians, the apostle solemnly assures them, Gal. i. 11, 12. that the gospel which he had preached among them, was not after man, that is, not of any human original: and he gives this substantial proof of it, that he was himself taught it, no otherwise than by the immediate revelation of Jesus Christ. Agreeable to which assertion, when he gives the Corinthians an account of the institution and design of the Lord's supper, he says in so many words, 1 Cor. xi. 23. That he had received of the Lord, what he delivered unto them: that is, that he had his notion of that sacrament, and of the actions and words of Christ on which it was founded, by an immediate inspiration from him, or, in the language we have used above, by suggestion. And he speaks of his brethren, as well as of himself, in these terms, Eph. iii. 3, 5. That the mystery of Christ which was before unknown, that is, the right of the Gentiles on believing the gospel to full communion with the Christian church, was made known to the holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit, and not merely by the natural recollection of what they had heard Christ say, or by their own reasonings upon it.

* [illegible]

Most agreeable to this is the strain of Peter, who in one epistle, joins the commandment of the apostles with the words of the holy prophets; 2 Pet. iii. 2. and mentions the epistles of Paul with other scriptures, ver. 15, 16. no doubt, in allusion to the sacred oracles of the Old Testament, which so generally went by that name. And in his other epistle, he insists strenuously upon it, that the gospel was preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, in exact conformity to the prophetic oracles of former ages, not understood by those who uttered them, a circumstance, in this connexion, highly worthy of our remark: and he seems strongly to intimate, that the angels themselves did by these apostolical preachings learn some things, which, with all their superior faculties, they did not before so fully know. Which things, says he, the angels desire to look into, 1 Pet. i. 12. As Paul had also said, that, to the principalities and powers in heavenly places, was made known by the church the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10.

To conclude this argument, St. John, remarkable as he was for his singular modesty and ingenuity of temper, does not only tell us, that Jesus Christ showed him the revelation; Rev. i. 1. but speaks in his epistle, of an unction poured out from the Holy One, by which they knew all things, 1 John ii. 20. And in another passage he in effect asserts, that he had, in concurrence with his brethren, given such abundant proof of his being under the divine influence and direction in his teaching, whether by word or letter, that an agreement or disagreement with his doctrine was to be made the standard by which they might judge of truth or error, and obedience or disobedience to his injunctions the test of a good or a bad man; which is considerably more than merely asserting the fullest inspiration. 1 John iv. 6. We are of God: he that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God, heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.

I might here add, if it were necessary, the several passages of the New Testament, in which the gospel preached by the apostles, is called the gospel of God, such as 2 Cor. xi. 7. 1 Thes. ii. 11. and the like: but I omit them, as the stress of the controversy does undoubtedly rest on those I have mentioned, and the importance of the question must be my defence for so large an enumeration of texts, which are so well known.

I shall only remind my reader, in a few words, of minister now on earth, and you must necessarily suppose his character from that very hour overthrown. The whole world would immediately run to loudly demanding miraculous proofs to verify such assertions; or in condemning, with just indignation, such a claim unsupported by them, as an unpardonable loading it over men's faith and conscience, and thrusting themselves into their Master's throne. Let us not then charge the holy apostles with a conduct, of which we should not suspect any wise and good man now upon the face of the earth; and which if we saw in any of our friends, our charity and respect for them would incline us to inquire after some marks of lunacy in them, as its best excuse.

I have now given an easy and popular view of the principal arguments for the inspiration of the New Testament,* on which my own faith in that important doctrine rests, and such a one, as I hope by the divine blessing may be useful to others. I shall not enter into a particular consideration of the several objections against it, which chiefly arise from texts of Scripture, in which some pretend to find, that the apostles were actually mistaken. I have considered most of these objections already, in my notes on the texts from whence they are taken: for almost all of them relate to passages in the historical books, and I do not know that I have omitted any of them; but have every where given, though as briefly as I could, such solutions as appeared to me in conscience satisfactory, though I have not stood formally to discuss them as objections against the inspiration of those books.

The reader will observe, that very few instances have occurred, in which I have judged it necessary to allow an error in our present copies: but as in those few instances the supposed change of a word or two makes the matter perfectly easy, I think it most respectful to the sacred writings, to account for the seeming difficulty thus, and to impute it to the transcribers, though it is certain, some of these mistakes, supposing them such, did happen very early; because, as Mr. Seed very properly expresses it in his excellent sermon on this subject,† which, since I wrote the former part of this Dissertation, fell into my hands, a partial inspiration is, to all intents and purposes, no inspiration at all: for as he justly argues against the supposition of any mixture of error in these sacred writings, "Mankind would be as much embarrassed, to know what was inspired, and what was not, as they could be to collect a religion for themselves, the consequence of which would be, that we are left just where we were, and that God put himself to a great expense of miracles to effect nothing at all; a consequence highly derogatory and injurious to his honour."

The arguments brought from a few passages in the epistles, to prove that the apostles did not think themselves inspired, weak as they are, will be considered, if God permit, in their proper places. At present I shall content myself with referring the reader to Dr. Whitby, who I think has given a satisfactory solution to them all.

There are other objections of a quite different class, with which I have no concern, because they affect only such a degree of inspiration, as I think it not prudent, and am sure it is not necessary, to assert. I leave them therefore to be answered by those, if any such there be, who imagine that Paul would need an immediate revelation from heaven, and a miraculous dictate of the Holy Ghost, to remind Timothy of the cloak and writings which he left at Troas, or to advise him to mingle a little wine with his water.

Waving therefore the further discussion of these topics, on which it would be more easy than profitable to enlarge, I shall conclude this Dissertation with a reflection or two of a practical nature, into which I earnestly entreat the reader to enter with a becoming attention.

Let me engage him seriously to pause, and consider, what sort of an impression it ought to make upon us, to think, that we have such a book; a book, written by a full divine inspiration: that amidst all the uncertain variety of human reasonings and conjectures, we have a celestial guide through the labyrinth: that God hath condescended to take care, that we should have a most authentic and unerring account of certain important, though very distant, facts, many of which were wrought with his own hand; and with these facts, should have a system of most weighty and interesting doctrines, to the truth of which he makes himself a witness. Such a book must to every considerate person appear an inestimable treasure; and it certainly calls for our most affectionate acknowledgment, that God should confer such a favour on any of his creatures, and much more on those, who by abusing in too many instances their natural light, had made themselves so utterly unworthy of supernatural.

From this view of the inspiration of Scripture we may also infer our obligation to study it with the greatest attention and care, to read it in our closets and our families; and to search in the most diligent and impartial manner into its genuine sense, design, and tendency: which is, in the main, so evident, that no upright heart can fail of understanding it, and every truly good heart must delight to comply with it. This is indeed a most important [illegible] and that without which, all our [illegible] of its divine authority will only condemn us before God and our own consciences. Let us therefore always remember, that in consequence of all these important premises, we are indispensably obliged to receive with calm and reverent submission all the dictates of Scripture, to make it our oracle; and, in this respect, to set it at a due distance from all other writings whatsoever; as it is certain, there is no other book in the world that can pretend to equal authority, and produce equal or comparable proofs to support such a pretension. Let us measure the truth of our own sentiments, or those of others, in the great things which Scripture teaches, by their conformity to it. And O that the powerful charm of this blessed book might prevail to draw all that do sincerely regard it into this centre of unity! That, dropping those unscriptural forms, which have so lamentably divided the church, we might more generally content ourselves with the simplicity of divine truths as they are here taught, and agree to put the mildest and kindest interpretation we can, upon the language and sentiments of each other. This is what I cannot forbear inculcating again and again, from a firm persuasion, that it is agreeable to the spirit of the gospel and pleasing to its great Author: and I inculcate it in this place, and at this time, with peculiar affection, as the providence of God around us calls us loudly to do all we can with a safe conscience, to promote a union among protestants. And I heartily pray, that our mutual jealousies and prejudices, which some are so unseasonably labouring to exasperate, may not provoke God to drive us together by a storm of persecution, if peradventure the bond of suffering together may be strong enough to bind those, whom the endearments of the same Christian profession, the same rule of faith, of manners, and of hope, have not yet been able to unite.

* I am aware that a learned and pious friend [illegible] very great regard to some [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

On the whole, let me most affectionately invite and entreat every reader, whatsoever his rank in life, or his proficiency in learning, may be, seriously to consider the practical design of these sacred oracles, the sense and authority of which I have been endeavouring to explain and assert. It is indeed a mystery in Divine Providence that there should still remain so much difficulty in them, as that in many points of doctrine, thoughtful, serious, and I trust upright, men should form such different opinions concerning the interpretation of so many passages, and the justice of consequences drawn from them, on the one side, and on the other. But of this there can be no controversy, "That the great design of the New Testament, in delightful harmony with the Old, is to call off our minds from the present world, to establish us in the belief of a future state, and to form us to a serious preparation for it, by bringing us to a lively faith in Christ, and as the genuine effect of that to a tidal loss to God and a fraternal affection for each other;" or, in one word, and a more short and more comprehensive sentence was never written, "to lead us (by denying ungodliness and worldly lusts) to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, even the glorious appearance of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ," Tit. ii. 12, 13. To his almighty hand may our souls be committed, by a faith productive of these glorious fruits; and, under the sanctifying quickening and supporting influences of his Spirit, may we wait for his mercy unto eternal life! Then shall no terror of suffering, no allurement of pleasure, no sophistry of error, be able to seduce us; but guided by that light and truth, which shines forth in the sacred pages, we shall march on to that holy hill; where, having happily escaped all the dangers of that dark path which we now tread, we shall greet the dawning of an everlasting day, the morning of a day that SHALL shall go down no more. Amen!

POSTSCRIPT

A Sketch of the Argument by which the Inspiration of the Old Testament may be proved to the utmost satisfaction of the most sober and unbiassed judgment.

If the proof of the inspiration of the Old Testament be deduced in its full compass from its first principles, we must have recourse to a method very nearly resembling that which is taken in the three sermons referred to above, for proving the authority of the New: that is, we must first prove, that the books are genuine; and then, that the history which they contain is credible; from which premises the inspiration of the Old Testament may easily be inferred by a train of arguments similar to that which we have pursued in the Dissertation above.

For proving the genuineness of the books I should think it proper briefly to show, (what I think hardly any will be so ignorant and confident as to deny) that the Jewish affairs in all reasonable probability, and way founded by Moses about fifteen hundred years before Christ's time; and further,—That the Jews, before and at the time of Christ, had books among them bearing the titles of those, which make up and are commonly call the canonical books of the Old Testament.—And that these books then received as the Jewish canon, were the genuine works of the persons to whom they were respectively ascribed.—From hence it is easy further to show, that they have not suffered, and reasoning what a guard the Jews put Christians were upon each other, could not suffer any material alteration since, and more easily, that the Old Testament, as now extant in the Hebrew and

Chaldee languages, is genuine, and in the main such as it originally was.

In order to prove its credibility from this established medium, we may prepare the way, by showing, That many material facts which are there recorded, are also mentioned by very ancient heathen writers.—And it is yet more important to show, as we very easily may, that there is room to go over the same leading thoughts, with those insisted upon in the second of the three sermons mentioned above, and to argue the credibility of the story, from the certain opportunities which the writers had of informing themselves as to the certain truth of the grand facts which they assert, as having themselves been personally concerned in them; and from those many marks of integrity and piety to be found in their writings, which may do as much as any thing of that kind can do, to obviate any suspicion of an intention to deceive.—We may here also advance further, and demonstrate beyond all contradiction, that the facts asserted were of such a nature, as could not possibly have gained credit, had they been false; yet that they did gain most assured credit, of which the persons receiving these books gave the most substantial evidence that can be imagined, by receiving, on the authority of these facts, a system of laws, which though considered as to be divinely supported they were admirably wise, yet were of such a nature, that without such an extraordinary providence as nothing but an assurance of such an original could have warranted them to expect, they must necessarily have proved ruinous to the state they were intended to regulate and establish.*

A further and very noble evidence of the truth of the grand facts attested in the Old Testament, and of the inspiration of a considerable part of it, may be drawn from the consideration of those numerous and various predictions to be found in it; which refer to a multitude of events, several of them before utterly unexampled, which no human sagacity could possibly have foreseen, and which nevertheless happened exactly according to those predictions.†

Having advanced thus far, we may take up a set of arguments correspondent to those insisted on above, to prove from its genuineness and credibility, now supposed to be evinced, that the Old Testament was written by a superintendent inspiration: and this we may argue, not merely, or chiefly, from the tradition to this purpose, so generally and so early prevailing in the Jewish church, though that is considerable, not even from those very special and glorious internal evidences of various kinds, which every competent judge may easily see and feel, but from surveying the characters and circumstances of the persons by whom the several books were written, in comparison with the genius of that dispensation under which they lived and wrote. This may, in all the branches of the argument, be proved in this way, with the greatest ease and strength, concerning Moses, and his writings: and when the authority of the Pentateuch is established, that of most material succeeding books stands in so easy and natural a connexion with it, that I think few have been found, at least since the controversy between the Jews and the Samaritans, who have in good earnest allowed Moses to have been a messenger from heaven, and denied the inspiration of the prophets, and of the books which we receive as written by them.

But it is obvious, that the illustration of all these propositions would be the work of a large volume, rather than of such a Postscript to a Dissertation, itself of so moderate a length. I have discussed them all, with the most material objections which have been advanced against them, in that course of theological lectures, which I mentioned in the preface to the first volume; and which it is my continual care to render worthy the acceptance of the public in due time, by such alterations and additions as frequent reviews, in conjunction with what occurs to me in reading, conversation, or meditation, may suggest.

I shall conclude these hints, with the mention of one argument for the Inspiration of the Old Testament, entirely independent of all the former; which a few words may set in a convincing light, and which must be satisfactory to all who see the reasonableness of acquiescing in what I have urged above. I mean,—That the inspiration, and consequently the genuineness and credibility, of the Old Testament, may be certainly inferred from that of the New;‡ because our Lord and his apostles were so far from charging the scribes and pharisees, (who on all proper occasions are censured so freely,) with having introduced into the sacred volume any merely human compositions; that, on the contrary,

* The reader will easily imagine I have here supposed, in the way of reasoning, [illegible] Old Testament [illegible] and that [illegible] and [illegible] of the Jewish [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] of they not only recommend a diligent and constant perusal of these Scriptures, as of the greatest importance to men's eternal happiness: but speak of them as divine oracles, and as written by the extraordinary influence of the Holy Spirit upon the minds of the authors.

I desire that the following list of scriptures may be attentively consulted, and reflected on, in this view. I might have added a great many more, indeed several hundreds, in which the sacred writers of the New Testament argue from those of the Old in such a manner, as nothing could have justified but a firm persuasion that they were divinely inspired. Now as the Jews always allowed, "that the testimony of an approved prophet was sufficient to confirm the mission of one who was supported by it," so I think every reasonable man will readily conclude, that no inspired [illegible] can reasonably object another to be inspired: and indeed the very definition of plenary inspiration as stated above absolutely excludes any room for cavilling on so plain a head. I throw the particular passages which I choose to mention, into the margin below;* and he must be a very indolent inquirer into a question of so much importance, who does not think it worth his while to turn carefully to them, unless he has already such a conviction of the argument that it should need no further to be illustrated or confirmed.

[illegible]

FREE THOUGHTS

ON THE MOST PROBABLE MEANS

OF REVIVING THE DISSENTING INTEREST.

OCCASIONED BY THE LATE

INQUIRY INTO THE CAUSES OF ITS DECAY.

To the Author of the Inquiry into the Causes of the Decay of the Dissenting Interest.

SIR,

You will probably be surprised at this address on occasion of your Inquiry, so many months after the publication of it. But my distance from the town, and engagement in business, hindered me from an early sight of it; and many accidents, which it is of no importance to mention, obliged me to delay finishing these papers, so soon as I intended when I began to write them. On the whole, as I am not attempting to criticise on your performance, but only to offer some remarks, which I hope may be of common use, if what I say be just and important, it cannot be quite too late; and if it be either false or trifling, it appears after all too soon.

As I am persuaded that the dissenting cause is founded on reason and truth, and that the honour of God and the public good is nearly concerned in its support, you have my hearty thanks for that generous zeal with which you have appeared for the defence of it. On this account, I should think myself highly obliged to treat you with decency and respect, how much soever my sentiments might differ from yours, as to the particular causes of its decay. And indeed, Sir, you have taken the most effectual method in the world to prevent any thing of a rude attack, by treating all whom you mention, even the meanest and the weakest, with remarkable candour and humanity.

But I have the happiness of agreeing with you in far the greater part of what you advance. I will not now debate, whether the principles of our dissent are less known than they formerly were; and consequently whether that be, properly speaking, a cause of the late decay of our interest: but I will readily grant, Sir, that it is highly necessary they should be known; and I think you have done us a great deal of service by setting them in so easy, and yet in so strong, a light. I hope it may be a means of informing and establishing some, who are too busy or too indolent to give themselves the trouble of perusing what Dr. Calamy, Mr. Peirce, and some others, have written so copiously and so judiciously upon the subject.

I further apprehend, Sir, that nothing can be said upon the case before us of more certain truth or more solid importance, than what you have frequently observed: viz. that our interest has received great damage from our acting in a manner directly opposite to our principles, by unscriptural impositions, and uncharitable contentions with each other. I hope many of us have seen our mistakes here, and shall be careful, for the future, to avoid what has been attended with so many unhappy consequences.

After having thus declared my agreement with you, in the greater part of your discourse, I hope, Sir, you will pardon me, if I add, that I cannot think that you have exhausted your subject. To speak freely, I think you have omitted some causes of the decay of our interest, which are at least as important as those you have handled. It is the design of my present undertaking, to point out some of the most considerable of them, which have occurred to my thoughts: and I persuade myself, Sir, you will be no more offended with me, for offering this supplement to your Inquiry, than I imagine I should myself be with any third person, who should fix upon others which may have escaped us both.

You will the more readily excuse the freedom which I take, as I imagine that the scenes of our lives have been widely different,* and consequently I may have had an opportunity of making some useful observations which have not fallen in your way: though I question not but if you, Sir, had been in my circumstances, you would soon have remarked them; and perhaps have communicated them to the public with much greater advantage.

I shall add nothing more by way of introduction, but that I choose the title I have prefixed to these papers, rather than that of a Further Inquiry into the Causes of the Decay of the Dissenting Interest; partly, Sir, as it seemed most respectful to you, but principally that I may not appear to advance any direct charge against any of my brethren in the process of this discourse. I am sensible that would be highly indecent on many accounts, and particularly as it is from the example of several amongst them whom I have most intimately known, that I have learnt many of those particulars of conduct, which I am now going to offer to your consideration, as the happiest expedients for the revival of our common cause.

But before I proceed to particulars, I would observe (what we immediately allow, but too quickly forget) that we are to be concerned for this interest, not merely as the cause of a distinct party, but of truth, honour, and liberty; and I will add, in a great measure, the cause of serious piety too. I would be far from confining all true religion to the members of our own congregations. I am very well aware that there are a multitude of excellent persons in the establishment, both amongst the clergy and the laity, who are (in their different stations) burning and shining lights; such as reflect a glory on the human nature, and the Christian profession. Yet I apprehend some of these are the persons who will most readily allow, that, in proportion to the numbers, there is generally more practical religion to be found in our assemblies, than in theirs. This was surely the original, and this, if I mistake not, must be the support, of our cause. It was not merely a generous sense of liberty, (which may warm the breast of a deist or an atheist,) but a religious reverence for the divine authority, which animated our pious forefathers to so resolute and so expensive an opposition to the attempts which were made in their day, to invade the rights of conscience, and the throne of God, its only sovereign. And if the cause be not still maintained on the same principles, I think it will hardly be worth our while to be much concerned about maintaining it at all. It must argue a great defect, or partiality of thought for any, with the Jesuits of old to boast of their being free from human impositions, when they are the servants of sin. And all the world will evidently perceive, that it is the temper of a pharisee, rather than of a Christian, to contend about mint, anise and cummin, (on one side of the question or the other,) while there is an apparent indifference about the weightier matters of the law. We that are ministers may entertain ourselves and our hearers with fine harangues in defence of liberty; but I apprehend, that in the near views of death and eternity, we shall have little satisfaction in reflecting on the converts we have made to that, unless at the same time we have some reason to hope that they are persons of true substantial piety; such as will be our crown in the day of the Lord, and our companions in the glories of the heavenly world. I cannot say how trifling and contemptible our labours appear to me, when considered in any other view. And therefore, Sir, it will be my concern throughout this whole discourse, to point out those methods for the support of the dissenting interest, which I imagine will be most subservient to the cause of practical religion, and vital holiness in all its branches.

It was the observation of Dr. Burnet, almost forty years ago, in his incomparable discourse on the pastoral care,† "That the dissenters had then in a great measure lost that good character for strictness in religion, which had gained them their credit, and made such numbers fall off to them." Whether that good character has since been recovered, or has not been more and more declining, some others are more capable of judging; but I think it calls for our serious reflection. And if we find upon inquiry, that this our glory is departing, it surely deserves to be mentioned, as one cause, at least, of the decay of our interest: and that all who sincerely wish well to it, should express their affection, by exerting themselves with the utmost zeal for the revival of practical religion amongst us.

This must be our common care, according to the various stations in which Providence has placed us: and as for ministers, nothing can be more evident, than that they, by virtue of their office, are under peculiar obligations to it. And in order to pursue it with the greatest advantage, I cannot but think that it should be their constant study to [illegible] and temper of their people. That so far as they can do it with conscience and honour, they may render themselves agreeable to them both in their public ministrations, and their private converse.

This, Sir, is so obvious a thought, that one would imagine it could not be overlooked: and yet it is certain our interest has received considerable damage for want of a becoming regard to it. [illegible]

* As the author to whom I write is not certainly known, I trust it for granted he is what he seems by [illegible] a gentleman of the laity, and though I have [illegible] I [illegible] my character better, he is supposed by many to be a [illegible] minister at once. I have no evidence of it which is [illegible] to me: and as I [illegible] it would be of [illegible] to appear to know either more or less. I thought it not proper to alter what I had written with regard to the late report.

† Ch. [illegible] p. 87.

cially in those who have been setting out in the ministry amongst us. It was therefore, Sir, with great surprise, that I found you had entirely omitted it in your late Inquiry, and had dropt some hints, which (though to be sure you did not intend it) may very probably lead young preachers into a different and contrary way of thinking, than which hardly any thing can be more prejudicial, either to them, or to the cause in which they are embarked.

The passage of yours, to which I principally refer, is in the 33d and 34th pages of your Inquiry: where, amongst other things, you observe, that "a great many of those things that please the people, have often a very bad tendency in general." And you add, "the being pleased, which they so much insist upon, seldom arises from any thing but some oddness that hits their peculiar humour, and is not from any view to edification at all, and therefore too mean to be worthy any one's study. The people do not usually know wherein oratory, strength of speech, the art of persuasion, &c. consist; and therefore it is vanity in such to pretend to be judges of them. I wish I could deny, that amongst us, they generally fall into the falsest and lowest taste imaginable."

There is, no doubt, Sir, a mixture of truth and good sense in some of these remarks; but for want of being sufficiently guarded, they seem liable to the most fatal abuse. I frankly confess, that when I began to preach, I should have read such a passage with transport, and should very briskly have concluded from it (as many of us are ready enough to conclude without it) that, with regard to our public discourses, we had nothing to do but to take care that our reasoning were conclusive, our method natural, our language elegant, and our delivery decent; and after all this, if the people did not give us a favourable reception, the fault was to be charged on a perverseness of humour, which they should learn to sacrifice to good sense, and the taste of those who were more judicious than themselves; and in the mean time, were the proper objects of contempt rather than regard.

I say not, Sir, that what I have now been quoting from your letter, would lay a just foundation for such a wild conclusion; but I apprehend that a rash young man, ignorant of the world, and full of himself, might probably draw such a conclusion from it. And if such a conclusion were to be universally received and acted upon, by the rising generation of ministers, it must in a few years be the destruction of our interest, unless the taste of our people should be miraculously changed.

I am not so absurd and perverse as to assert,* that learning and politeness will be the ruin of our cause, nor have I ever met with any that maintained so extravagant an opinion. But surely, Sir, a cause may be ruined by learned and polite men, if, with their other furniture, they have not religion and prudence too: and I hardly conceive how a minister, who is possessed of both these, can be unconcerned about the acceptance he meets with from the populace, or can ever imagine that the dissenting interest is generally to be supported in the contempt or neglect of them.

I cannot believe, Sir, that a gentleman of your good sense intended to teach us such a contempt. Had religion, and the souls of men, been entirely out of the question, and had you considered us only as persons whose business it is to speak in public, you well know that such a thought had been directly contrary to the plainest principles of reason, and the rules of those amongst the ancients, as well as the moderns, who were the greatest masters in that profession. You will readily allow, (what no thinking man can dispute,) that a true, skilful, unpopular orator, is a direct contradiction in terms. And I question not, Sir, but that you could in a few hours throw together whole pages of quotations, from Aristotle, Quintilian, Longinus, and especially from Tully, (not to mention Rapin, Gisbert, Fenelon, and Bishop Burnet,) which all speak the same language. You know that Tully in particular declares, not only "That † he desired his own eloquence might be approved by the people," but that his friends might accommodate their discourse to them; and therefore says to Brutus,‡ "Speak to me and to the people." And this he carries so far as to say,§ "That whatever the people approve, must also be approved by the learned and judicious; and ‖ that men of sense never differed from the populace in their judgment of oratory." And that to speak in a manner not adapted to their capacity, and the common sense of mankind, is the greatest fault an orator can commit.¶ These were the sentiments of Tully on a subject peculiarly his own. And few that have ever heard of Longinus, are strangers to that celebrated passage, in which he makes it the test of the true sublime, that strikes periods of all tastes and educations, the meanest as well as the greatest.

But indeed, (as I hinted above,) the necessity of an orator's accommodating himself to the taste of the people, depends not on the authority of the greatest writers, but on the apparent principles of reason, obvious to common sense; since without it the ends of his undertaking cannot possibly be an-

* Inq. p. 36.

† Unumquemque autem meam POPULO probari velim, &c. Orat. nec. Quis enim multitudinem probare prudens velit? POPULARIS omnino dicendum et electus eloquentia est auditorum adpetitor. Brut. Dicy. 185 II. [illegible]

‡ Ad eum qui populo [illegible] Brut. Accersus. Brut.

§ [illegible] Brut. [illegible]

‖ Nunquam [illegible] Brut. [illegible]

¶ [illegible] [illegible]

 [illegible]

swered, as the people will neither be instructed nor persuaded by what he says.

Again, if the matter were to be considered merely in a political view, and with regard to the support of our interest, as a separate body of men, I can imagine nothing more imprudent, in present circumstances at least, than a neglect of the populace: (by which I mean all plain people of low education and vulgar taste, who are strangers to the refinements of learning and politeness:) it is certain they constitute at least nine parts in ten of most of our congregations, and are generally the supports of the meetings they belong to, by their subscriptions, as well as their attendance. In boroughs (especially) several of them have a vote for members of parliament, and are so numerous, as to have it in their power frequently to turn the balance, by throwing themselves into one scale or the other. Now to speak plainly, Sir, I apprehend it is chiefly this that makes us considerable to many, who have no regard at all to our religious principles. And to the bulk of mankind there is something in the very idea of a large place, and a crowded auditory, which strikes the thought, and secures a society from that contempt, which might perhaps fall upon persons of the most valuable characters amongst them, if they stood alone as the support of the interest, and appeared in their assemblies but as a handful of men.

Now, Sir, as this is the case, as numbers make our interest considerable, and those numbers are principally to be found amongst the common people, would you advise us ministers to neglect the people; or could you wish that any thing you have written, should be interpreted as an encouragement of such a neglect? When we have lost our interest in them, (as we must necessarily do, if we take no care to preserve it,) I would fain know what must become either of us or them. As for them, I imagine, that many of them would grow indifferent to all religion, and seldom appear amongst us, or in any other places of divine worship; and others of a warmer and more resolute temper, would find out ways of making us uneasy; and if they could not get rid of us any other way, would draw off to neighbouring congregations, or form new societies, and choose ministers agreeable to their own taste, who might perhaps think it their prudence to maintain and inflame their resentments against those they had left. Thus our common interest as dissenters would moulder and crumble away, by our frequent divisions and animosities. And we, who by our contempt of the people, had been the occasion of them, shall have the great pleasure of being entertained with the echo of our own voices, and the delicacy of our discourses, in empty places, or amidst a little circle of friends, till perhaps (like some of our brethren) we are starved into a good opinion of conformity: and in the mean time, shall have the public honour of ruining the cause we undertook to support. For the generality of people, who never reason accurately, will readily conclude it was ruined by us, if it sink under our care: though you, Sir, will be so complaisant as to own, it fell by the obstinacy and perverseness of a people, "whose humour was too mean to be worthy any one's study."*

But perhaps, Sir, you will tell me, that we need not be apprehensive of being driven to such extremities; for though some of the lowest of our auditors are lost, we shall gain over others to fill up their places, in a manner much more agreeable to ourselves, and more honourable to our cause in the eyes of the world. "Many gentlemen have left us because they were ashamed of our interest, and nothing can recover them but the study of learning and politeness."† I assure you, Sir, I am an enemy to neither; but heartily wish they may both be cultivated, so far as is consistent with our being acceptable to the people (and I apprehend, as you will afterwards perceive, they are both in a very high degree consistent with it). But I imagine it will never be worth our while, to neglect and displease the people, in order to bring over these gentlemen; or to make other proselytes of their rank, character, and taste.

I shall, perhaps, surprise you when I say, that I am not much charmed with your proposal, allowing it ever so practicable, and the prospect of success ever so fair. You suppose the gentlemen whom you describe, have not left us upon principles of conscience, on apprehension of our being schismatics, &c. (for then no alteration in the manner of our preaching could bring them back) but merely from a delicacy of taste, and because they were ashamed to continue amongst so unpolished a people. You must then suppose, either that they acted in direct opposition to the dictates of conscience, or else, that they did not consult them at all in the affair, nor regarded any thing more than fashion or amusement in the choice of the religious assemblies with which they have joined. The former supposition charges them with an outrageous contempt both of truth and of honour; and the latter, with a shameful mixture of pride and weakness, which has little of the gentleman, and less of the Christian. And I freely declare, that I think an honest mechanic, or day-labourer, who attends the meeting from a religious principle, though perhaps it may expose him to some ridicule amongst his neighbours, and be in some measure detrimental to his temporal affairs, (which is often the case,) is a much more honourable and generous creature, and deserves much greater respect from a Christian minister, than such a gentleman, with all his taste, learning, and politeness.

* [illegible]

In the sight of God, you will readily allow, that it is so; but perhaps, Sir, you will tell me, that I am now considering the matter in a political view. It is time to recollect it, and I ask your pardon for this digression.

I shall therefore speak more directly to the point when I answer, with all due submission, that I apprehend this scheme of bringing back these gentlemen to our assemblies, is but wild and chimerical.

If their conformity entirely depended on the delicacy of their taste, we could never expect to recover them, till we could entertain them with more polite and elegant discourses, than those which they hear in the churches they now frequent. Now, Sir, whatever your complaisance may suggest in our favour, I have not the vanity to believe, that if we and the established clergy were to try our skill in the contest, we should generally exceed them. At least, I see no such certain evidence of our being superior to them here, as should encourage us to risk the whole of our cause upon this attempt; as I imagine we should do, if we were to neglect the people.

And further, I think there is the less reason for making so dangerous an experiment, as it is very apparent to me, that those who have left us, have not been influenced merely by such a critical exactness as you suppose. I know not any among them of a more judicious and refined taste, than some who still continue the ornaments and supports of our assemblies: and it is undeniably evident, that many who have quitted us, have acted on very different principles. Some have been influenced by secular views, (in which they have not always been disappointed,) and some by complaisance to their friends, and particularly those who have married into families of a different persuasion (which has been a very fatal blow to our interest). Many more, I fear, have forsaken us from a secret dislike to strict piety, and with us have abandoned all appearances of religion, and perhaps of common decency and morality. And I question not, Sir, but you very well know, that many others who have broken off from us, and perhaps make the greatest pretences to strength of thought, and politeness of taste, are sunk as low as deism itself, (if not yet lower,) and may probably enough reckon it matter of boasting, that having thrown off one fetter, they have had greater advantage for throwing off the other; i. e. the faith of the Christian, after the strictness of the dissenter.

And are these, Sir, the persons who are to be brought back by our learning and address? Some of them may, perhaps, now and then make an occasional visit to our assemblies for their own amusement, as they frequent the theatre, but surely they can never be depended upon as the support of an interest: nor could you on the whole think it prudent for us to hazard the approbation and affection of our people, in a view of making ourselves agreeable to them.

But religion furnishes us with many considerations to the present purpose, of much greater importance than any which could arise merely from prudential views. Surely there is a dignity and a glory in every rational and immortal soul, which must recommend it to the regard of the wise and the good, though it may be destitute of the ornaments of education, or splendid circumstances in life. Let us think of it in its lowest ebb of fortune, or even of character, as still the offspring and image of the great Father of spirits, and as the purchase of redeeming blood: let us consider what an influence its temper and conduct may have at least on the happiness of some little circle of human creatures, with whom Providence has linked it in kindred, in friendship, or in interest; and especially, let us consider what it may become in the gradual brightenings and improvements of the eternal state: let us but seriously dwell on such reflections as these, (too obvious to be missed, yet too important to be forgot,) and we shall find a thousand arguments concurring to inspire us with a sort of paternal tenderness for the souls of the meanest of our people. This will teach us to bear with their prejudices, to accommodate ourselves to their weakness; and to consider it as a mixture of impiety and cruelty, to neglect numbers of them, out of complaisance to the taste of a few, who are perhaps some of them but occasional visitants, and whom we judge by their habits, rather than by any personal acquaintance, to be a part of the polite world.

Did I affect to throw together all that might be said on this subject, I might both illustrate and confirm what I have already written, by showing at large that Christianity is a religion originally calculated for the plainer part of mankind, by that God who has chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and, consequently, that a neglect and contempt of the common people is far from being the spirit of the gospel. I might add many remarks to this purpose on the preaching and conduct of St. Paul, and fill whole pages with quotations from him and the rest of the apostles, and many more from some of the most ancient and celebrated fathers of the church. But I do not think it necessary for the support of my argument, and I am persuaded that you, Sir, in particular, have no need of being taught these things from me.

Permit me only to add, (what you must frequently have observed,) that our Lord Jesus Christ is a most amiable and wonderful example of a plain, familiar, and popular preacher. When we come to peruse those divine discourses, which extorted a confession from his very enemies that he spake as never man spake; we find neither a long train of abstract reasonings, nor a succession of laboured periods, adorned with an artificial exactness; but the most solid and important sense, delivered in an easy and natural way, illustrated by similes taken from the most common objects in life, and enforced with lively figures, and the strongest energy of expression, which is well consistent with all the former. So that, upon the whole, it was most happily calculated, at once to instruct the most ignorant, and to awaken the most negligent, hearer. I cannot but wish that some judicious writer would attempt to set this part of our Lord's character in a clearer and a more particular light; and would show us how the whole of his conduct, as well as the manner of his address, was calculated to promote his usefulness under the character of a preacher of righteousness. I hope such an essay might be very serviceable to those of us who have the honour to succeed him in that part of his work; and I persuade myself that it would furnish us with a variety of beautiful remarks on many passages in the evangelical historians, which are not to be found in the most celebrated commentators.

You will excuse me, Sir, for having insisted so largely on the necessity of endeavouring to render ourselves agreeable to our people; because I am fully persuaded that it is of great importance to the support and revival of the dissenting interest. I hope you already apprehend, that I intend nothing in this advice which is below the pursuit of the most elevated genius, or the most generous temper, nothing inconsistent with the politeness of the gentleman and the scholar, or the dignity of the Christian and the minister. You cannot imagine that I would recommend a popularity raised by quirks and jingles, or founded on affected tones, or ridiculous grimaces; and much less on an attempt to inflame the passions of mankind about trifling controversies, and the peculiar unscriptural paraphrases of a party. Such a popularity as this is almost the only thing that is more despicable, than the insolent pride of despising the people.

If any of my younger brethren were to inquire how another popularity, of a far more honourable kind, is to be pursued and secured, I answer, that their own converse and observation on the world, must furnish them with the most valuable instructions on this head. And though some of their particular remarks may differ, according to the various places and circumstances in which they are made; yet I apprehend there are many things of considerable importance, in which they will all agree. As for instance:

They will quickly see that the generality of the dissenters, who appear to be persons of serious piety, have been deeply impressed with the peculiarities of the gospel scheme. They have felt the divine energy of those important doctrines, to awaken, and revive, and enlarge the soul; and, therefore, they will have a peculiar relish for discourses upon them. So that, if a man should generally confine himself to subjects of natural religion, and moral virtue, and seldom fly on the doctrines of Christ, and the Spirit, and then perhaps treat them with such caution, that he might seem rather to be making concessions to an adversary, than giving vent to the fulness of his heart on its darling subject, he would soon find, that all the penetration and eloquence of an angel, could not make him universally agreeable to our assemblies.

Many of our people have passed through a variety of exercises in their minds, relating to the great concern of eternal salvation. And they apprehend that the Scripture teaches us to ascribe this combat to the agency of Satan, and the corruptions of our own heart, on the one hand, and the operations of the Holy Spirit of God on the other. It is therefore very agreeable to them, to hear these experimental subjects handled with seriousness and tenderness. It raises their veneration for such a minister, as for one who has himself tasted of the grace of God, and encourages their confidence in him, and their expectations of improving by his labours. On the other hand, it grieves them when these subjects are much neglected, and gives them the most formidable suspicions if one word be dropt which seems to pour contempt upon them, as if they were all fancy and enthusiasm; (with which, it must be granted, they are sometimes mixed).

The greater part of most dissenting congregations consisting, as we before observed, of plain people, who have not enjoyed the advantages of a learned education, nor had leisure for improvements by after-study, it is apparently necessary that a man should speak plainly to them, if he desire they should understand and approve what he says. And as for those that are truly religious, they attend on public worship, not that they may be entertained with a form of sound, nor entertained with some new and curious speculation; but that their hearts may be enlarged as in the presence of God, that they may be powerfully affected with those great things of religion, which they already know and believe, that so their conduct may be suitably influenced by them. And to this purpose they desire that their ministers may speak as if they were in earnest, in a lively and pathetic, as well as a clear and intelligible, manner.

Such is the taste of the generality of the dissenters; a taste which I apprehend they will still retain, whatever attempts may be made to alter it. And I must take the liberty to say, that I conceive this turn of thought in the people to be the great support of our interest, and not the little scruples which you hint at in the 34th page of your letter, nor even those rational and generous principles of liberty, which you so clearly propose, and so strenuously assert. And I cannot but believe, that if the established clergy, and the dissenting ministers in general, were mutually to exchange their strain of preaching and their manner of living but for one year, it would be the ruin of our cause, even though there should be no alteration in the constitution and discipline of the church of England. However you might fare at London, or in some very singular cases elsewhere, I can hardly imagine that there would be dissenters enough left in some considerable counties, to fill one of our largest meeting-places.

We have then advanced thus far: that he who would be generally agreeable to dissenters, must be an evangelical, an experimental, a plain, and an affectionate preacher. Now I must do our common people the justice to own, that when these points are secured, they are not very delicate in their demands, with regard to the forms of a discourse. They will not in such a case be very much disgusted, though there be no regular chain of reasoning, no remarkable propriety of thought or of expression, no elegance of language, and but little decency of address. The want of all these is forgiven, to what they apprehend of much greater importance. Yet, Sir, I would not from hence infer, that these things are to be neglected; on the contrary, I apprehend it is absolutely necessary, that they should be diligently attended to, in order to obtain that universal popularity, which I think so desirable for the sake of more extensive usefulness. A man of a good taste will certainly take some care about them. It is what he owes to himself, and to the politer part of his audience, whom he will never be willing to lose in the crowd: and he need not fear that a prudent regard to them will spoil his acceptance with the people. Few of them like a discourse the worse for being thoroughly good; and the accomplished orator will find, perhaps to his surprise, that they will not only know and feel the important truths of religion, in the most agreeable dress he can give them; but that they will even applaud the order and regularity of his composures, the beauty of his language, and the gracefulness of his delivery, at the same time that they have the candour not to complain of the indigested rovings, the unnatural transports, and the awkward distortions of the pious, well-meaning, but injudicious preacher. For human nature is so formed, that some manners of thinking and speaking are universally agreeable and delightful. It is the perfection of eloquence to be master of these, and should, I think, be the care of every one that speaks in public, to pursue them as far as genius and opportunity will allow.*

The man who forms himself upon such views as these, if he be not remarkably deficient in natural capacities, will probably be popular amongst the dissenters as a preacher; but a thinking man will easily perceive, this is not the only character under which a minister is considered. His people will naturally and reasonably expect a conduct answerable to his public discourses; and without it, he cannot be thoroughly agreeable to them. They will take it for granted, that a man so well acquainted with divine truths, and one that seems to be so deeply affected with them, should be regular and exemplary in the whole of his behavjour, and free from the taint of vice, or of folly, in any remarkable degree. They will expect that he should be far from being a slave to secular interest, or to the little trifles of food, dress, or domestic accommodation; and that he should avoid every thing haughty and overbearing, or peevish and fretful, in his daily converse. They will conclude, that a desire of doing good to souls, will make him easy of access to those who apply to him for advice, with regard to their spiritual concernments; and that it will likewise dispose him at proper times to visit all the people of his charge, the poor as well as the rich; and that not only under the character of a friend, but of a minister, in a direct view to their spiritual edification. And if a man desire the affections of his people, he must not disappoint such expectations as these.

The tenderness with which parents interest themselves in the concerns of their children, and the earnest desire that all religious parents must necessarily have, that theirs may be a seed to serve the Lord, will engage them very kindly to accept our care, in attempting to bring them under early impressions of serious piety. Catechising has therefore been generally found a very popular, as well as a very useful, practice. And here I think it is much to be wished that our labour may extend to the youth, as well as to little children; that in a familiar way they may be methodically acquainted with the principles of natural religion, and then with the evidences of the truth of Christianity, and with the nature of it, as it is exhibited in the New Testament; both with regard to the privileges and the duties of Christians. As this might be a means of filling our churches with a considerable number of rational, catholic, and pious communicants, from whom considerable usefulness might in time be expected, so it would greatly oblige their religious parents, and lay a foundation for a growing friendship between us, and our catechumens, in the advance of life.

* [illegible] to the SENSES COMMUNIS, which I only thinks [illegible]

I once thought to have insisted more largely on these hints, but am happily prevented by the publication of Mr. Some's sermon, on the methods to be taken by ministers for the revival of religion. He has fully spoken my sentiments, with regard to many of those articles on which I have only glanced. I persuade myself, Sir, you will read it with a great deal of pleasure; for (so far as I can judge) this sermon is almost as agreeable an example of that preaching, as his life is of that conduct, which he recommends. I am confident that a man of your good sense must necessarily approve the scheme which I have briefly laid down, and which is there largely considered and recommended. Were you to choose a pastor for yourself, I doubt not but you would rejoice in such a one; and you would probably have the hearty concurrence of the weakest and most illiterate of your pious neighbours. My younger brethren (for whom alone I am now presuming to write) can have no reason to complain, that I have assigned them either a mean or a severe task. I heartily desire to be their companion in all the most laborious and self-denying parts of it; and I persuade myself, that we shall find it, on the whole, as delightful as honourable, and as advantageous to ourselves as it will be serviceable to the public interest.

There seems to be but one material objection against all this; and it is an objection, in which I doubt not but your own thoughts have all prevented me. It may perhaps be pleaded, that we have a sort of people amongst us, whose approbation and esteem cannot be obtained by such honourable methods as I proposed. For they, whom we call the rigidly orthodox, are so devoted to a peculiar set of human phrases, which have been introduced into the explication of some important doctrines, that they will hardly entertain a favourable thought of any who scruple the use of them, or who do not seem to value them as highly as they, though they may, on all other accounts, be ever so considerable.

You, Sir, hint at* a very expeditious remedy for uneasiness arising from this quarter; that persons of generous and bigoted sentiments should meet in different places. In London it is certainly practicable, and may perhaps be most expedient; but to attempt any such separation in the country, would be the utter ruin of many of our societies, which now make some considerable appearance. But besides my regard to the ministers and societies to which they are related, I must confess, I have too much tenderness for the persons themselves, to be willing entirely to give them up. I have been intimately acquainted with those who have been accused, and perhaps not unjustly, of this unhappy attachment to human phrases, and nicety in controversial points; and I must do many of them the justice to own, that I have found very excellent qualities mingled with this excess of zeal, (which must methinks appear pardonable in them when we consider how artificially it has been infused; and how innocently they have received and retained it, from a real principle of conscience to God). But, indulging them in this one article, several of them will appear to be persons of so much humility and piety, of so much integrity and generosity, of so much activity and zeal for the common interest, that separate from all views to private advantage or reputation, one would heartily wish to do all he honestly can, to remove those prejudices, which give them so much uneasiness, and impair the lustre of so many virtues and graces. And if at the same time we can secure their esteem and friendship, it may have such an influence, both on our own comfort and usefulness in life, that it must be great ignorance or pride to despise it.

You will readily grant, Sir, that the thing is in itself desirable: the great question is, how it may be effected? And here I will venture to say freely, that I apprehend bigotry of all kinds to be a fortress, which may be attacked by sap more successfully than by storm. It is evident that we have most of us something of the humour of children, that grasp a thing so much the more eagerly, when an attempt is made to wrest it out of their hands by violence; and yet perhaps will drop it themselves in a few minutes, if you can but divert their attention to something else.

From such a view of things, I apprehend, we are to judge of the most proper methods of dealing with those, whose case is now under consideration. You, Sir, may tell them again and again, with your natural coolness and moderation,† That it would be an instance of their modesty to resign their pleasures to the general notions and judgment—that instead of assuming the characters of judges and censors, they should put on the humble temper of learners—and receive the truth without being jealous of heresy in our youngest proselytes.—And at the same time that you are thus giving your advice, you may give your reasons, as clearly and handsomely as you have given them for nonconformity in this inquiry: yet, after all, you will probably find, that the [illegible] will out-noise the voice of the charmer, charming ever so wisely. And should I exert myself with greater warmth and eagerness, should I grow a bigot in the defence of catholicism, and load those of different sentiments with reproaches, because they have profited no better by so many solid arguments. I should indeed pay a very great compliment to them, in supposing them [illegible] knowing and admitting truth, under so disagreeable a disguise: but it would be [illegible] my own character and ease, and I should run the risk of being severely scorched by that flame, which I pretended to extinguish, by pouring on oil.

* Page 44.

† [illegible]

I cannot but think it much more advisable, according to the apostle's maxim of becoming all things to all men, to study to accommodate ourselves in this respect, as well as in others, to the infirmities of our hearers, as far as with a safe conscience we may. If we can put a tolerably good sense on any of their favourite phrases, it would surely be a most unreasonable stiffness and perverseness of temper, to avoid it merely because they admire it. Or if we cannot go so far, we may at least lay aside any darling phrases of our own, which we know will be offensive to them. (For if the Bible be a complete rule, our human forms are no more necessary than theirs.) Christians as such profess a reverence for the Scripture, and many of these Christians have a distinguishing regard to it, as they have felt its divine energy on their souls. Now, Sir, with submission to the better judgment of my brethren, I think we, who are ministers, should take them by the hand, and should labour to discover to them, more and more, the beauty and fulness of the word of God, not only with regard to this or that particular doctrine, but to the whole system of truth and duty contained in it. It is a subject on which we might speak and they would hear with pleasure; and it would not only divert their attention and their zeal from other things, which might give uneasiness, but would have a direct tendency to enlarge their views, and sweeten their tempers, beyond all our encomiums on liberty and catholicism, or our satires on bigotry and imposition.

I likewise apprehend, that a regard to what was said under the former heads, will further conduce to this happy end. When these exact people hear us preaching in a truly spiritual and experimental strain, and at the same time in such a rational and graceful manner, as may set our discourses above contempt, and make them agreeable to the younger and politer part of our auditory, as well as to others; they will quickly see that it is not for their own interest, or that of their children, to drive us away with a rigorous severity. And therefore, instead of studying to find us heretics, they will rather put the most favourable sense on ambiguous expressions, and labour to believe us as orthodox as they can: or, if they suspect us to be in the dark as to some particulars, yet they will charitably hope, that age and experience will perfect what is wanting, and that God will reveal it to us in his own time. With these views they will cheerfully commit themselves to our ministerial care, if Providence seems to open a way for our settlement amongst them. And when they find that they are handsomely treated by us, that no direct attack is made upon their darling notions; but that the great concerns of practical religion (as dear to them as to any people upon earth) are plainly and faithfully pursued by us, both in public and private, (to the refreshment of their own souls, and to the evident advantage of many others,) they will contract a tender, growing affection for us: and thus their bigotry will gradually wear away, till perhaps they come at last joyfully to embrace those more generous notions, from which they would at first have started back with horror.

Thus we may, after the example of our great Master, teach our followers, as they are able to bear it: and by this moderation, may be instrumental in healing the breaches which we profess to lament, in rescuing many an excellent soul from a painful and dishonourable bondage; and in spreading a generous, candid, Christian spirit, which will be the glory and happiness of our interest in general, as well as of the particular societies under our care. And in the mean time another generation will be rising, whom we may hope to form, in a manner agreeable to our own sentiments, who may transmit to remote ages those united principles of piety and catholicism which they have happily learnt from us.

I cannot but think, that such rational and noble prospects may encourage us to submit to some restraints, which we should not otherwise have chose. But if, after all, we inflexibly insist on "as unbounded a liberty of speaking our sentiments in public, as of forming them in private," or, in the language of Solomon, of uttering all our mind, I think we shall dearly purchase the pleasure of hearing ourselves talk, on a subject on which we can do little more, than echo back a part of what has been so copiously and judiciously written, and so frequently repeated by others. The wiser part of mankind will look upon us as forward heirs, who spend our estate of reputation and importance in life, before we come to it, and upon the whole, we shall not only exceedingly injure ourselves in private life, which is comparatively but a trifle, but shall impair our future usefulness, and even wound the darling cause of liberty, to which we are so ready to sacrifice all. For I seriously declare, that if I could be so wicked as to form a design against it, and so base as to prosecute it by clandestine and hypocritical methods, I would only set myself to declaim in its favour, with imprudent zeal, and unbounded fury.

You have now, Sir, all that I think proper to say, at present, concerning the methods by which I apprehend those of us, who are employed in the ministry, may most effectually contribute to the revival of the dissenting interest. I can assure you, they are not the reveries of my own closet, but observations which I have drawn from life, as occasions have occurred in conversing with a variety of persons of different stations, relishes, and characters. I have the better opinion of many of them, as I know that they are thoroughly agreeable to the sentiments and conduct of some of the most considerable persons of all denominations amongst us, both in town and country; whose friendship is the honour and pleasure of my life. I am particularly confirmed in this way of thinking, by observing the success which such measures have had in the congregations of my fathers and brethren in these parts. For I know, that in many of them, the number of dissenters is greatly increased within these twenty years, and the interest continues so to flourish, that I am confident some of our honest people, who converse only in their own neighbourhood, will be surprised to hear of an inquiry into the causes of its decay.

If what I have written appear reasonable to you, Sir, I cannot but wish that you, and other gentlemen of the laity, who are heartily concerned for our interest, would endeavour to cultivate such sentiments as these in the minds of young ministers of your acquaintance. We are naturally very desirous of being known to you, and singled out as the object of your regard. Whereas we early begin to look with a comparative contempt upon the meaner sort of people, as an ignoble herd—Vulgus concamerati. Whilst engaged in our preparatory studies, we are indeed so generous, as to give up one another to the vulgar; but we have each of us the penetration to discover, that there is something uncommon in our dear selves, by which nature seems to have intended us to be (as we absurdly enough express it) orators for the polite. These arrogant and pernicious sentiments we sometimes carry along with us, from the academy to the pulpit; where, perhaps, we make our first appearance infinitely solicitous about every trifling circumstance of a discourse, yet negligent of that which should be the soul of it. And if the people are not as much charmed with it as ourselves, we have then an evident demonstration of their incorrigible stupidity; and so resentment concurs with pride and ambition, to set us at the remotest distance from those, who ought to be the objects of our tenderest regards.

If an elder minister have so much compassion and generosity, as to deal freely with us upon these heads, and give such advice as circumstances require, it is great odds but we find some excuse for neglecting what he says. "He is ignorant and unpolite; or perhaps intoxicated with his own popularity, and means his counsels to us as encomiums upon himself."—Or if neither of these will do, some other artifice must be found out, to fix the blame any where rather than at home. And if in the midst of a thousand mortifications we can but find out one gentleman of fortune, sense, and learning, that admires us, we are happy. A single diamond is worth more than a whole load of pebbles; and we perhaps adapt, with vast satisfaction, the celebrated words of Arbuscula in Horace, * without considering that what was highly proper in the mouth of a player, and a poet, would be extremely absurd in a heathen, and much more in a Christian, orator.

Me[n]' movent cimex Pantolabus, &c.

Now, Sir, what I intend by all this, is to shew that you gentlemen may have it in your power to do a great deal to correct these mistaken notions. If we plainly see that you regard us, not merely according to the manner in which our performances are accommodated to your own private taste, but according to our desire and capacity of being useful to the public interest, we shall perhaps be taught to place our point of honour right; and when that is once done, a moderate degree of genius, application, and prudence, may be sufficient, by the blessing of God, to secure the rest.

I would here, Sir, have ended my letter, but the hints you give in the conclusion of yours concerning Academical Education, lead me to add a few words on that head. I would be far from the insolence of pretending to teach tutors; but I apprehend that if my former principles be allowed, it will follow, by the easiest consequence in the world, that it is a very important part of their business, to form their pupils to a regard for the people, and to a manner of preaching, and of converse, which may be agreeable to them.

There is hardly any thing which should be more discouraged in a young student than such a mistaken haughty way of thinking, as I so freely described a little above, especially when it discovers itself in a petulant inclination to employ their talent at satire, in ridiculing the infirmities of plain serious Christians, or the labours of those ministers, who are willing to condescend to the meanest capacities that they may be wise to win souls.

A young man of sense will easily enter into such plain reasonings as I have offered in the beginning of this letter, and be convinced by them, that if he ever appear under the character of a dissenting minister, he must not neglect the people. But it is greatly to be desired, that our students may be engaged to regard them, not merely from political, but religious, views.

It is therefore, no doubt, the care of every pious tutor amongst us, [and may God make it a more constant and successful care,] to possess his pupils, who are designed for the ministry, with a deep and early sense of the importance of the gospel of Christ for the recovery of man from the ruins of the apos-

* Hor. Sat. I. x. 78.

tasy, and his restoration to God and happiness by a mediator.—To show (as it may easily be shown) that this has been the great end of the divine counsels, with regard to which, the harmony of nature in the lower world has been supported, and the various economies of Providence disposed:—To point out the Son of God descending from heaven in favour of this design, pursuing it by humble condescensions to the lowest of the people, and unwearied labours amongst them; and at last, establishing it by agonies and death:—To show them the apostles taking up their Master's cause, prosecuting it with unwearied vigour and resolution, and sacrificing to it their ease, their reputation, their liberty, and their lives:—To trace out those generous emotions of soul, which still live and breathe in their immortal writings:—And then (when their minds are warmed with such a survey) to apply to the students themselves, as persons designed by Providence to engage in the same work, to support and carry on the same interests, who therefore must be acted by the same views, and imbibe the same spirit.

Something of this kind is, I doubt not, attended to; and I must take the liberty to say, that I think these the most important lectures a tutor can read. You cannot but see, Sir, that by the blessing of God, such addresses must have an apparent tendency to fill the mind with sublime and elevated views, and to make a man feel and own too, (though it may appear something unpolite,) that the salvation of one soul is of infinitely greater importance, than charming a thousand splendid assemblies with the most elegant discourses that were ever delivered. A young minister under these impressions, will come out to his public work naturally disposed to care for the state of his people; and such sincere zeal and tenderness will form him to a popular address, abundantly sooner, and more happily, than the most judicious rules which it is possible to dictate.

As examples are the best illustration of precepts, it must certainly be a great advantage to pupils to hear such preaching, and see such pastoral care, as is recommended to them in the lecture-room. A prudent man, who is concerned in the education of young ministers, will be particularly careful to avoid those faults in preaching, which they are in the greatest danger of falling into; and particularly too abstracted a train of reasoning, and too great a care about the little ornaments of speech, when addressing to a common auditory. And if (where other circumstances may allow it) he sometimes engage the attendance of senior pupils in his pastoral visits, and introduce them to the acquaintance and freedom of some serious Christians in the society, it may be much for their improvement. A more intimate knowledge of their hidden worth, and perhaps of those noble traces of natural genius, which they might discover amongst some of a very low education, would something increase their esteem for the populace in general. And from their observations on books and sermons, and their accounts of the various exercises of their minds, (where our politer hearers are generally more reserved,) a man may best learn how they are to be addressed, and form himself to that experimental strain, on which so much of his acceptance and usefulness amongst us will depend.

If you apprehend, Sir, that such a course will make them preachers for the vulgar, and for them only; I think it sufficient to answer, that I entirely agree with you in what you say of the great advantages of an intimate acquaintance with the learned languages, and the classical writers both of the Romans and Greeks. I heartily wish our students may always be well furnished with it before they leave the schools, and think it highly proper it should be carried on through the whole of their academical course. And I cannot imagine, that a man of tolerable sense, who is every day conversing with some of the finest writers of antiquity, and who is (as most of our students are) a little exercised in the mathematical sciences, (to teach him attention of thought, and strength, and perspicuity of reasoning,) will be in great danger of saying any thing remarkably impertinent, or contemptibly low.

As for being masters of our own language, it is a point which I think should be thoroughly laboured from the very beginning of their education. They should to be sure make themselves familiarly acquainted with those writers, who are allowed to be the standards of it, and should frequently be translating and composing. And if this be not only practised at school, but continued through four or five years of academical education, they will have formed a habit of expressing themselves gracefully, or at least tolerably well: so that in their ordinary composures, when they have digested their materials, and ranged their thoughts, they will often find proper, expressive, and elegant words, flowing in faster than they can write them.

And as composition is far from being the only business of an orator; so I heartily wish, that not only tutors, but schoolmasters, (whose character and conduct, by the way, is of vast importance to our interest,) would make a very serious business of teaching lads, who are designed for the ministry, to read well, and to pronounce properly and handsomely. Thus an early remedy would be provided on the one hand, against those unnatural tones and gestures, which (as you well observe*) are a grand cause of our reproach and contempt; and on the other, against that cold insensible air, which sometimes, amongst strangers at least, affects even the moral character of the preacher.

* Inquiry, page 43.

I think some care should be taken, both at the school and the academy, to engage students to a genteel and complaisant behaviour; not only as what is apparently conducive to their mutual ease and pleasure, and the convenience of the family where they are; but as what may render them more agreeable and useful in life, to persons of superior rank, and even to the populace themselves. For a well-bred man knows how to condescend in the most obliging way; and the common people (such is either their good sense or their humour) are peculiarly pleased with the visits and converse of those who they know may be welcome to greater company.

And now, Sir, I have done with my subject, and must conclude, with assuring you, that it is not the design of one line which I have written, merely to prove that you are mistaken in any thing that you have asserted; and therefore I have purposely avoided many citations from your letter, which might easily have been connected with what I have said. You will infer from what you have read, that I differ from you in some other particulars, which are not mentioned, but they apparently depend on what I have debated at large; and I chose to omit them, not only because my letter is already longer than I intended, but from a general observation which I have had frequent occasion to make; that if a man desires to do good by what he says, he must oppose and contradict as little as possible. If I am mistaken in what I have advanced, I shall be heartily thankful for better information; and, if it come from you, it will be peculiarly agreeable, as I shall have nothing to fear from your reproaches, and much to hope from your arguments.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

P. DODDRIDGE.

☞ This was printed in the year 1749, being the first piece the Doctor published.

THREE LETTERS

TO

THE AUTHOR OF A LATE PAMPHLET,

ENTITLED

CHRISTIANITY NOT FOUNDED ON ARGUMENT, &c.

LETTER I.

SIR,

WHEN I consider the strain and purport of your late discourse, I am heartily sorry that I was so long a stranger to it. A month has hardly passed, since it first fell into my hands. They who know my circumstances in life, and the variety of business in which I am continually engaged, will not wonder that I missed it so long. Nor should I have read it now, had it not been mentioned to me by some friends, for whose judgment I have a very high regard, as a performance which had a very ill aspect on Christianity, and which was executed with much more spirit and address, than is to be found in most of the attacks which have been lately made upon it.

I have now, Sir, perused it with attention; and various as my cares and labours are, I think it of such importance, that I ought to lay before you, and the world, the result of my reflections upon it.

The character you have assumed of a most zealous Advocate for Christianity, seems so ill to agree with the purport of your reasonings, that I apprehend most of our readers will esteem it a bad compliment paid to your understanding, if I were to think of that character otherwise than as a mask worn for pleasantry, rather than the design of your pamphlet, with which I am concerned. Were you indeed the warm Christian you personate, I could not behold the wounds of religion with indifference, merely because they were received in the house of a friend: nor would I consent to demolish the walls of a fortress, on the strength of which my life, and even the safety of my country, depended, though the worthiest man upon earth should, in a fit of lunacy, undertake to persuade me, that it was the most effectual method to engage the miraculous protection of an Almighty arm. That those efforts which, in the name of the Lord, you have thought fit to make, with such solemn preparation, and such glowing ardour of spirit, do indeed tend to subvert the faith of Christians, and to expose the gospel to the last degree of contempt, is so exceeding plain, that I verily believe, it would appear to every intelligent reader a solemn kind of trifling, to labour the truth of it: and the passages, which I am to take under examination, may be more than sufficient to demonstrate it to a stranger.

You have evidently represented Christianity, if not religion in general, as an unreasonable thing; for you expressly tell us, not only "that it is not founded on argument," and that it is incapable of being generally proved by it, but go so far as roundly to say, (p. 86.) "that there is an irreconcilable repugnance between reason and faith." You speak of Scripture, as if all your eloquence was at a loss for words strong enough to express your contempt for it. "Manuscript authorities, and paper-revelations," as they are insultingly called, are, it seems, "an empty notion:" (p. 60.)—"The suspicious repositories of human testimony, in which nothing remains that can deserve our least notice, or be thought of consequence enough to engage a moment's attention." (P. 50.) It was not, it seems, enough to represent them as superfluous, "We have no longer need of distant records:" (ibid.) But you briskly maintain, that Omnipotence itself is not able to supply their defects and insufficiency; "though a constant miracle were to interpose on the occasion, and the same Almighty Power that first indited it," whatever you mean by that singular expression, "were to continue hovering perpetually with a guardian hand over the sacred depositum." (P. 61.)

As for all the Scripture-miracles, on which we have laid so great a stress, you declare without reserve, "that they are to us no more than an uncertain hearsay," and "that the voice of God, bearing witness to his beloved Son, has long since dwindled to human tradition." (P. 52, 53.) Nay, you strongly insinuate, that these miracles were never meant as arguments of the divine authority of the gospel; (p. 46.) and, with very little complaisance to St. Paul, are pleased to tell us, by a burlesque on his words, when speaking of the resurrection of Christ, (pag. 68.) "that the thing was done in a corner," without taking the least notice of the public proofs which were given of it, in the very place where it had happened but a few days before.

It is obvious, Sir, that I might transcribe many pages of your work in illustration of these hints; and I must needs say, that the language appears so unnatural, and so monstrous, in a professed disciple of Christ, that I am sometimes ready to wonder you were not a little more careful to save appearances. But then I recollect, that the character you assume is such, as leaves little room to expect consistency, and seems best supported by such kind of paradoxes and self-contradictions. By this means also you have artfully enough disarmed your adversary of the weapon called argumentum ad hominem, a whole magazine of which might otherwise have been presented. Were you to be attacked that way, you would no doubt laugh very heartily, to see an adversary so fairly hit, in a grave expectation that you should be solicitous cum ratione insanire, to appear a cool-headed, consistent enthusiast.

You have chosen, Sir, in these transports, whether real or fictitious, to fight with a two-edged weapon; and the blow which you give by a kind of back stroke, while avowedly defending Christianity, seems to me as threatening as any of the rest. I mean, those passages of your book in which you so grossly misrepresent that glorious and important doctrine of the New Testament, concerning the agency of the divine Spirit, in promoting the reception and efficacy of the gospel. This, according to you, is nothing less than such an immediate and instantaneous communication of the whole sum and system of the gospel, as renders every particular believer more infallible, than the church of Rome has generally asserted the pope to be, and secures the most illiterate person, even from a possibility of error. (P. 89, 90.) This plenary inspiration communicated to every private Christian, you represent as the main and only support of religion, though I think, Sir, you must needs know, that every difference of opinion in the Christian church is a demonstration that no such universal influences do, in fact, take place. So that upon the whole, you have left Christianity no evidence but what every one sees it has not, that is, indeed, you have left it no evidence at all. In one word, if your readers were to suppose you serious in what you write, and to fall in with your reasoning, I think the plain consequence must be, that all men of sober sense would immediately reject the gospel, while among the remainder, every one that was mad would make himself a prophet, and vent every wild chimera of his distempered brain as an immediate dictate of God himself; in the plenitude of inspiration and distraction, equally scorning to condescend to assign any reasons for his doctrines, or to hear any arguments against them.

That your late performance, sprightly and ingenious as it is, has a tendency to produce these terrible effects, (for to me they appear terrible beyond expression,) is too evident; and I may afterwards give you a more particular account of the reasons, on which I apprehend that it must in its consequences affect the foundations of natural religion, as well as of revealed. How far any of these consequences might be intended by you, it is not my business to determine. You, Sir, are ere long to answer that to the great Judge of hearts, whose tribunal I should dread to usurp. Yet I cannot forbear observing, that the ludicrous turn you so often give to Scripture, and the air of burlesque and irony which runs through your whole piece, neither suits the character of a rapturous devotee so often affected, nor discovers a becoming sense of the infinite moment of the question in debate. Pardon me, Sir, the plainness with which I speak my real apprehensions on this head, and believe me when I seriously declare, it is with no design to libel and expose you, but with a sincere desire to serve you and others, into whose hand this letter may come, that I now set myself to examine what you have advanced, and, if possible, to lead you into juster and safer sentiments.

Agreeably to these views, and that regard to the general good which has engaged me to enter on this controversy, I shall decline the invidious and unnecessary task of pursuing you with severe criticism through every paragraph. I am not solicitous to expose every ungraceful expression, to enhance every minute mistake, nor even to censure every clause of the sacred writings which I apprehend you have misrepresented or misapplied. I have not leisure for such a task as this, and there is hardly any thing against which my temper more strongly recoils. I shall examine what I apprehend most material and most dangerous in your work, with calmness and seriousness, representing it as fairly in words as I can, what I take to be the strength of your cause, and telling you with the simplicity and moderation that becomes a Christian, how I answer it to my own conscience. This I shall do with all possible plainness, not affecting to be witty in a case in which eternity is concerned; nor so consulting in your taste and character, as to forget that I am addressing the public, and aiming not to divert, but, if possible, to edify. And if any cannot relish such a design, and such a manner, I give them fair warning to throw this letter aside, and to waste (or shall I rather say, to kill) no more of their precious moments about it.

It sufficiently appears, Sir, from your manner of writing, that you are well aware, the main strength of your cause lies in the first head of your discourse, to which therefore, after some gay flourishes on the two last, you return again towards the conclusion of your pamphlet. It is this, therefore, which I shall here examine at large; and the rather, because I think what you urge on this topic, though it be far from any new discovery, may admit some further illustration than I have commonly met with; and is the point which, in proportion to its difficulty and importance, has been least discussed by the worthy apologists for Christianity, in which our country is so happy. The foundations of the solution have indeed often been laid down; but I have long wished to see the matter placed in that particular point of view, in which the difficulties you propose, and which naturally arise, may be most happily obviated.

It is your professed design under your first general to show, "That reason, or the intellectual faculty, could not possibly, both from its own nature, and that of religion, be the principle intended by God to lead us into a true faith." (P. 7.) An ambiguous proposition, the sense of which must be ascertained in a few words, before its pretended demonstration can be discussed.

You well know, Sir, that the whole body of Christians, as such, are, and must ever be, agreed, that reason is not our only guide, but that Divine Revelation is most wisely and graciously intended to supply its many deficiencies; and you know, too, that they generally acknowledge the reality and importance of divine influences on the mind, to confirm our faith, and to quicken our obedience. So that if you would not encounter a puppet of your own forming, with whom we have no manner of concern, you must mean by this grand proposition, "That reason is not to be consulted, in judging either of the evidences or the sense of any supposed revelation, nor in forming any of our religious sentiments." An assertion so apparently extravagant, that one would imagine, that merely to propound it were a sufficient confutation.

Can any one indeed seriously think, that the noblest of our powers was intended only to the lowest and meanest purposes, to serve the little offices of mortal life, and not to be consulted in the greatest of concerns, those of immortality? Strange! that the only power which renders us capable of saying, Where is God my Maker? and of forming any sentiments of religion at all, should be discharged from that province, for which it seems chiefly to have been given! But it will at least have strength and spirit enough to say, Why must I be thus discharged? And you condescend to answer at large, without seeming to be aware, that your first step towards demonstrating your point supposes it to be false; appealing to reason itself to judge, that it is not capable of judging at all. Nor is this position only inconsistent with the pertinency of any reasoning whatsoever, but particularly inconsistent with that footing on which you profess to place Christianity, when its rational proofs are given up. Since, if God were, according to your strange hypothesis, to reveal to me in a moment the whole system of Christianity, and were I assured, by some inward inexplicable sensation, that it was indeed a revelation from him, I could not receive it without some reasoning. I must at least have this one short syllogism in my mind, "What comes from God is to be admitted as true; but this comes from God, therefore it is to be so admitted." And the foundation of this supposes some previous reasoning, concerning the existence and veracity of that Being, whose testimony is so readily to be admitted.

A very small part of your sagacity, Sir, might serve to discover this, which, obvious as it is, supersedes all you have written. I will therefore take it for granted, that what you really intend by this general, and very unguarded, proposition, is chiefly this; "That Christianity is not capable of such a rational proof, as can be made intelligible to the generality of mankind, so as to oblige them to receive and obey it." This is what you seem to have at heart throughout your whole book, and I shall not further press the advantage you have given an opponent, by asserting so much more than was necessary to your main design.

You do indeed sometimes acknowledge, I think in direct opposition to your main argument, that Christianity is capable of being rationally proved to the conviction of a studious person; (however unnecessary, and however hazardous it may be, even for such a one to meddle with that kind of proof:) but you always contend, that the generality of mankind cannot enter into any rational proofs of it; (though it is well known that it was intended for them;) and that they who can will not find them sufficient, to bear the stress which must in fact be laid upon them, if we desire to be Christians to any valuable purpose. I shall therefore set myself on the contrary to prove, "That the rational evidence of Christianity is so adjusted, that the generality of its professors may, if they be not wanting to themselves, attain to some competent satisfaction with regard to it." And when I have offered that proof, I shall consider your objections.

I am far from asserting, that every one in common life can have a full view of all the controversies which relate to Christianity; a curiosity of literature, which to multitudes would be of very small importance: nor do I maintain, that every sincere believer is capable of rendering a sufficient reason for his faith; an ability on many accounts highly desirable, yet not, so far as I can find, at all essential to salvation. A man may have reason in his own mind, which he cannot readily put into words. Nay, I apprehend it possible, that a man may feel and comply with the practical tendency of Christianity, who does not himself rightly apprehend the force of its rational proofs, and perhaps lays a very great stress on arguments which are far from being conclusive. And I hope, Sir, you will allow, that when a man's temper and character is such as the gospel requires, such a speculative mistake as to the strength of an argument does not affect his salvation. Else, I fear, we must condemn all those excellent persons, who have believed the great fundamental of all religion, the existence of a God, chiefly on the force of those Cartesian arguments, now generally, and I think rationally, exploded.

The question is not, What knowledge is universally necessary, nor what is in fact attained; but what satisfaction might generally be had, if there be a competent care, on the one hand, to teach, and on the other, to learn. This is all which is absolutely essential to my argument. Nevertheless, for the further illustration of the subject, I shall freely tell you, how I apprehend the case to stand, with regard to the generality of the common people, who are in good earnest in the profession of religion; readily acknowledging, though with great grief, that there are thousands, and ten thousands, who wear the name of Christians as by mere accident, without at all considering its meaning, reason, or obligation; a case very consistent with the possibility of their being better informed, and rationally convinced.

Now here, Sir, the leading thought will be, that God has so adjusted the nature and circumstances of Christianity, as represented and exhibited in the New Testament, that it is attended with a strong degree of internal evidence, of which, by an unaccountable omission, you take not the least notice; and that what is most essential to the external proof, lies within much less compass than you seem to imagine, and is capable, if previous precautions be taken in a proper manner, of being opened to persons of an ordinary capacity, and understood by them, though they have neither ability nor leisure for the curiosities of learned disquisition.

For the illustration of this, you must give me leave to remind you, that both the Mosaic and Christian dispensation have been much misrepresented, in consequence of men's taking their notions of them, rather from the conduct of their professors, than from the institutes of their respective founders. To apply this to the present occasion, let us consider what the case of Christians would be, with regard to the rational evidence of their religion, if things were to flow on in the channel, into which it was the apparent design of our divine Master to direct them.

You will no doubt, Sir, readily allow, that a pious education, and a standing ministry, are appointments of our blessed Redeemer, and will spare me the trouble of proving either of them in form. And as you take it for granted in the whole of your Letter, that infant baptism is a Christian ordinance, you will also allow me to mention it as a common principle, though little of my argument will depend on its being so.

A parent therefore acting upon the laws of Christianity, (which is what I here all along suppose in stating the case,) having in a solemn manner devoted his child to God in its early infancy, and having ever since been earnestly recommending it to the divine blessing, watches the first dawning of reason, to instil into its tender mind, sentiments of piety to God, gratitude to the Redeemer, benevolence to men, and every other grace and virtue which the gospel recommends, and which the life of its great Founder exemplified. Quickened by the obligation, which the birth and baptism of every younger child in the family renews, the father and mother concur in a wise and conscientious care, to keep their dear charge, as far as possible, out of the sight and hearing of every thing profane, cruel, and indecent; and to accustom it to love whatsoever things are venerable, whatsoever things are righteous, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, the child will be taught, by the force of precept and daily example, to seek after these things, and to pursue them. The consequence of this, under those influences of divine grace which may be cheerfully expected in the way of duty, will probably be an early sense of decency, virtue, and piety. The growth of those seeds of corrupt nature, which will in some instances discover themselves in the most amiable children, will in a great measure be suppressed; religion will grow familiar and pleasant, under the smiling aspect it will appear to wear, and the Bible, which our little disciple will early have been taught to read, will soon become a most delightful book. The entertaining stories, the fine examples, the beautiful poems, the wise precepts, so gravely and yet so kindly given, which it will every where meet with, must give it abundance of pleasure; and it will be eager to read those things, the general contents of which it has learnt, long before it could read, from the daily discourse of its parents, who, while they are recounting these glorious things, will be teaching themselves as well as their children, and by more familiar and attentive views of them, confirming their own faith, and animating their own piety. And as for the leading facts which the child meets with in Scripture, strange as some of them may appear, it will readily believe them on this general foundation; that its good parents, who know much better than himself, and never deceive him, assure him that every thing which this excellent book contains is true. And this, Sir, is all the satisfaction which a child of the most extraordinary genius can have in the first stages of life; and if it die before it arrive to greater maturity, it will be happy in the practical influence, which the gospel, thus implicitly believed, had upon its temper and conduct; as it could be under no necessity of entering into its rational evidence, before those faculties opened by which that evidence was to be received, any more than a blind man can be obliged to read, or the dumb to sing God's praises.

At length, as the minds of children open, they will gradually be led into some further reflections on the certainty of these things in which they have been instructed. And here they will soon perceive some degree of difference in the evidence of them, immediately appearing. As for the existence of the Supreme Being, I really think that the noblest and most satisfactory arguments, of which the mind of man is capable, are those which are obvious even to the understanding of a child: I mean those taken from the works of creation and providence. Common sense will surely tell these little creatures, as soon as they can understand the words, that if every house, even the poorest cottage, must have some builder, there must be one who built all things, who made heaven and earth, with all their bright, noble furniture. And as they see, clearly as they see the sun, that he who made and upholds all these things, is powerful and wise; which every flower, and every fly, when considered as his work, may show them: so they may naturally conclude, such a great and wise Being is good; and it will be easy to show them, that every agreeable object about them is a sensible proof of his goodness; every pleasant fruit, for instance, a gift of God, which all the men in the world could not have made, or provided for them, without him.

By such familiar views of things they may be brought, not only to believe, but to know, that there is a great, powerful, wise, and kind Father of the world always near them. Nor will it be difficult to give them some rational view and conviction of his moral attributes, as inferred from his natural. I suppose they have in those early lessons of sacred history, which have been their entertainment from their infancy, been led to reflect on the characters of persons mentioned; to see the amiableness of some affections and actions, and the deformity of others, which in many instances are as obvious, as that one face, or dress, makes a pleasanter appearance to the eye than another. Discerning this visible difference in moral characters, long before they knew what the words morality or character signify, they will naturally, and I think very reasonably, conclude, that it is just to ascribe every excellence and glory to him, in whom they see so many: and by consequence, that he must be pleased with what is good, and displeased with what is evil. They see it in their wise and pious parents, (for wise and pious we here suppose them to be,) and they will much more conclude, it must be in him, whom they have learnt to address as "our Father who art in heaven." I take the liberty, Sir, to tell you, that I have examined many scores of children on these heads, not as to what they have learnt, but as to what they themselves think of the matter; and have put the questions in various forms, to suggest an affirmative or negative answer; and I always find, if they understand the terms of it, they answer right upon a very short pause.

Agreeably to those obvious principles, they naturally apprehend, that the regard of God to his creatures follow them beyond death; and that he rewards or punishes them, suitably to their temper and behaviour. They cannot think, that God would have suffered such persons as Abel, or the seven sons of that good woman in the Maccabees, to have been slain in that cruel manner, if he had not intended to take them to himself, and make them happier than they were: that, Sir, is a learned prejudice, the laboured error of a man, of a minute philosopher: the simplicity of a virtuous child is not able to attain it.

A prudent parent will easily foresee, that the child will find greater difficulties in coming at the evidence of the truth of those things, which depend merely upon the authority of Scripture: he will early be laying in materials for its seeing the force of that noble part of it, which you so strangely leave untouched; I mean, that which is internal, and arises from the contents and design of the book itself. A child trained up as we here suppose, will, probably, of itself, make a great many reflections, what an excellent book it is; especially as to some parts of it, with which I have known little children so struck, that they have, of their own accord, read the same passage, though neither history nor parable, over and over, till they have almost learned it by heart. the religious parent or friend will watch, encourage, and illustrate these remarks; and at length, when he finds the young mind strong enough to receive it, he will lead it to reflect, what excellent men they must be who wrote such things: and when that reflection is familiar, and has been daily renewed, perhaps for weeks and months, another easily follows, that the Bible is undoubtedly true and divine; for good men would never have invented lies, and have presumed to teach them in the name of God himself; and wicked men would not, and could not, have written what is so excellently good, and tends to make others so. This, Sir, my pious friends taught me when I was a child, and I think it, to this very day, an argument of unanswerable weight: and I cannot but apprehend, that the more a man advances in real goodness, and the more intimately he converses with Scripture, the more he will be impressed with it. Here is an argument depending on no other fact than this, that there is such a book as the Bible in the world, of which our children are as sure, as that there is a sun: and Providence has wisely ordered it so, that they may understand the force of it, before they can enter into objections against it; and so far as I can judge, those objections must be stronger than any I have ever met with, which can be sufficient to balance the force of it. Yet this is far from being the only foundation of our faith, or the only argument in its favour, which a young Christian may be able, with proper assistance, to understand.

The external evidence does not indeed lie within so little room, nor can it perhaps be made equally obvious by every pious parent; yet with the assistance which able ministers, and proper books, may give, I apprehend, a child of fourteen or fifteen years old may have some competent view of it. It will be a most easy thing to show him, by uncontroverted testimonies, collected by a variety of writers,—that Christianity was an ancient religion,—for the sake of which its professors, in its earliest ages, endured great extremities;—that there was, about 1700 years ago, such a person as Jesus Christ, the great founder of it;—that the first preachers of his religion wrote books, which were called by the name of those that make up the most important part of the New Testament;—that these books are, in the main, transmitted to us uncorrupted;—and that our translation of them may, in the general, be depended upon as right. These are the grand preliminaries; and as the foundation may be laid without much difficulty, so the superstructure may be raised upon it, with yet much more ease. From the New Testament, thus proved to be genuine, a person of very moderate capacity and learning will presently be able to show, that the writers of it certainly knew, whether the facts they recorded were true or false;—that their character, so far as we can judge by their manner of writing, was so excellently good, that there is no reason to suspect them of falsehood;—nay, that the probability of their fidelity is so great, that it would be astonishing, if the strongest temptation could prevail upon them to violate it;—at least in so criminal a manner, as they must have done, if they were impostors—the temptations must have been exceeding strong, to justify the least degree of suspicion:—but they had no temptation at all to forge such a story, and to attempt to impose upon the world by it:—however, that if they had made the attempt, they could not have succeeded in gaining credit;—nevertheless, it is plain, they did gain credit among vast multitudes, who were strongly prejudiced against the religion they taught;—from all which things compared, it appears that their story, and the religion founded upon it, i. e. Christianity, is true: a conclusion which may be greatly illustrated by showing them further,—what wonderful things have since happened for the confirmation of it; considering, on the one hand, what God has done to establish it; and on the other, what methods its enemies have taken to destroy it.

It is not my business, Sir, to state and vindicate these arguments at large; I have done it already in my Three Sermons on the Evidences of Christianity, which were published several years ago; and I shall be very ready to canvass the strength of them, as there represented, with any who shall think fit to bring them into dispute. I the rather mention those Sermons here, because they are calculated for popular use, and may assist those who are not so well versed in the arguments, to propose them to their children or catechumens, in what I apprehend the easiest and plainest light. By talking over these heads in a free and familiar manner, and then giving them the book to read two or three times alone, till he has fixed the leading thoughts in his understanding and memory, I doubt not but such a foundation might be laid in a few days, as all the succeeding years of life would not be able to shake. Nor must it ever be forgotten, how much it would be cemented and established by that true taste of moral beauty and excellence, which we suppose already formed in the mind of our young student. He would find so much to charm him in the sentiments, character, and conduct of the apostles, as would engage him to lay a very great stress on that important branch of the argument which turns on that point. It would appear to him, in theory, utterly improbable, that men of their heroic goodness should engage in so impious and detestable a fraud, as they must have engaged in, if their testimony was false; as,* on the other hand, the good sense which may easily be discovered in their writings and behaviour, will make it appear equally absurd to imagine, they should so madly run on sufferings and ruin, as they must have done, if they had not been conscious of a divine support, or miraculous powers, and of immense future rewards.

* [illegible]

A religious youth, grown up to years of maturity, with a mind thus furnished, and thus disposed, will not easily be perverted to infidelity: so precious a freight would be too weighty, to be overset by every wind of doctrine, and every breath of ridicule. Yet it might conduce to his security, if a prudent parent or minister should give him, before the scene of temptation opens, some short hints of the chief topics from whence objections against Christianity are drawn, and of the plainest and most obvious answers to them, which, so far as I can judge, are generally the most solid. If a person be not intended for some learned profession, or distinguished circumstance in life, it is by no means necessary to be large in this part of the scheme; but something of this kind may easily and profitably be done, and there will be no reason to be in any panic, lest every hint of an objection should overturn his faith. Answers will be suggested, with those objections; and he will soon be weary of hearing such poor unsatisfactory things as most of the cavils of infidelity are. And here, again, the good habits and dispositions formed in his mind, will be of great service. He will perceive, that Christianity wears so favourable an aspect, and opens upon him so fine a prospect, that he will not hunt after objections against it; as a man is not studious to find a flaw in writings, by which he stands entitled to the reversion of some noble estate: and when they accidentally start up in this way, he will soon see, that many of them are grounded on notorious falsehood, and are in themselves despicably mean; especially when set against the great arguments for it, of which he is already possessed: and with regard to others, the assistance of ministers and other religious friends, which when pressed with real difficulties he will honestly seek, will, no doubt, furnish him with proper answers; and, indeed, his converse with the Scriptures will enable him, without foreign assistance, to obviate most of them, and they will vanish like birds of night before the sun: not now to mention those auxiliaries, which his faith will often call in, from observing and comparing the different characters of those, who are most solicitous, on the one hand to destroy it, and on the other to support it, of which I may hereafter speak.

If this, Sir, were merely an imaginary scheme, on which no parent acted, and no children were educated, yet if it were (as, I think, every one must own it is) agreeable to the original Christian plan, it would not be foreign to our purpose; as it will prove, that if proper precautions were taken, and men were to act in character, competent rational evidence might be attained as young people grew up to a capacity of exercising reason, which is all that could be supposed requisite. But bad as the work is, I bless God, I can confidently say, I have in the main traces copied from the life. This, to my certain knowledge, is the care of many parents and ministers, and this the felicity of many children. The success is generally answerable; and I hope, the instances in which it is so in the protestant world, are not to be numbered by scores, but by hundreds and thousands, who are to be regarded as the precious seed of the church in the next age, and who, I doubt not, will, in spite of all the efforts of infidelity, exert themselves so effectually in its service, that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

Nevertheless, while I bless God that this is the case of so many, I readily acknowledge, that, through a negligence, for which I fear a multitude of parents and ministers have a terrible account to render before God, it is generally much otherwise. By far the greater part of professing Christians have probably no better reason to give for their religion, than that they were early baptised into it, and have been trained up in some of its external forms. Far from being instructed in its evidences, they are hardly taught its doctrines, or its precepts; or superficially learn them from those, who do not themselves seem to be in good earnest concerned about the one or the other. The fatal consequence is too plain. The corruptions of nature, abetted by the force of evil examples, prevail against them; and they are early plunged into such licentious practices, that if they ever reflect on the most evident and express declarations of the word of God, they must immediately see, that they are condemned by it.

Now, there is no reason to wonder, if many of this sort of Christians are easy proselytes to infidelity. It is no surprising thing, if a bold jest thrown upon Scripture, or a confident senseless assertion of its falsehood, (perhaps from a person on whose word hardly any thing else would be believed,) have with them all the weight of a demonstration. They will be little concerned to ask information, or consider how objections may be answered. Those magical words, priestcraft, and the prejudice of education, stun and terrify them: they submit, as you gravely express it, (p. 75.) "in the impotence and impuberty of a dutiful understanding, in the tractable simplicity of unpractised reason: with the obsequious and humble acquiescence of a babe, they sit down to learn their lesson" too; and their unbelief, after they have attained the stature of men, is just as blind and implicit as the faith of their childhood was.

This, Sir, is undoubtedly the case with many: and you cannot but have observed what large companies in the freethinking army are raised and enlisted from among these vagabonds. But the generality of men among us, as in every nation, go on thoughtlessly in the religion in which they were educated: hearing the truth of it often asserted, and perhaps never hearing it contradicted, they entertain no doubts on the subject, but grow old in a mere speculative and ineffectual assent to Christianity. And if their heart at any time smite them, with the contrariety of their temper and conduct to the rules which they acknowledge to be divine, they seek their shelter in the hope of making their peace with God, (as they commonly express it,) before they go out of the world; and perhaps abuse some of the noblest discoveries which the gospel makes, as an encouragement to continue in those sins and follies, from which it was expressly designed to reclaim them.

Nevertheless, it frequently happens among such as these, that some are awakened to think deeply and seriously of religion: the plain lively preaching of the gospel, or perhaps some afflictive providence, rouses them from their lethargy. And I must reckon it among the chief felicities of my life, that I have had many opportunities of observing, what are in fact the workings of men's spirits in such a circumstance.

And here I have always found, that the moral perfections of the great Governor of the world appear to them in a very lively view: the records of their own conscience are thrown open before their eyes, and they feel a load of guilt pressing on their minds, of which they were before utterly insensible. Under this anxiety they hear of the remedy which the gospel has provided; and they hear of it with another kind of regard than formerly. It is what they now perceive that they want; (strange, that they should have perceived it no sooner!) and it appears far more important to them than animal life and all its enjoyments. Hearing of the love and grace of a Redeemer, concerning the reality of whose undertaking they never had any considerable doubt, their hearts are transported with a flow of most ardent and various affections; they find another kind of energy in these things, than they were ever aware, or could have imagined to be possible. He has saved their lives at the expense of his own, and under the constraints of his love, they consecrate themselves to a forgiving God, with an ardour of soul which nothing but gratitude can inspire. They do now, as it were, receive the gospel anew from his hand, not as a revelation new made, but now first endeared to them, by a sense of their own concern in it; they exemplify the beauty of its precepts, and they feel the force of its consolations. A blessed effect, in which I humbly acknowledge the finger of God and the agency of his Spirit; though I see no reason to pretend to an immediate inspiration, in the sense which you maintain.

When the first tumult of affections, raised by so interesting and important a scene, subsides, and the happy converts come more coolly to reflect on what has passed, they draw a new argument of the truth of this glorious gospel from its experienced efficacy; and, though they cannot make a stranger sensible of the force of it, will say, like the blind man, as yet little instructed in many other proofs of our Lord's divine mission, If he were not of God, he could not have opened my eyes; and under the lively impression of it, the sophistry of modern infidels is as little to them as that of the Sanhedrim was to him. At length, growing in wisdom and piety by their acquaintance with the gospel, and in proportion to their regard for it, they likewise, who had formerly no taste and sensibility for such things, become qualified to take a more extensive survey of its internal evidence, and to judge of it; and, accordingly, they see it much in the same light with those who had been formed to an earlier subjection to it, and had grown up with it in their hands and their hearts.

Of these recovered votaries to it, some who have a head turned for reasoning, perhaps from a desire to serve others, and honour God, by defending Christianity, rather than from any doubt which they themselves have of its truth, set themselves to study the evidences of the gospel, as stated in some judicious treatise on the subject; which they carefully examine, and often ground so thoroughly in their understandings and memories, as to be able to silence, if not to convince, gainsayers. And others, who have not leisure or inclination to search so particularly into the whole compass of the argument, are perhaps greatly confirmed in their faith, by some circumstances which powerfully impress them, though they may not be able to communicate the force of the argument to others; or though, where it is communicated, it cannot publicly be stated, without inconveniences which might overbalance the advantages arising from the discovery of such occurrences.

I am sensible, Sir, I am touching on a subject, which it is difficult to handle, without the imputation of enthusiasm, and perhaps without the danger of it: and therefore I shall dismiss it in few words. I take upon me now to assert no facts, either as my own experience, or as on the testimony of others, whom I may have reason to credit; but I would suggest the thought in hypothesis. Is it in the nature of things impossible, or is it utterly incredible, that the great Author and Governor of all should, in some rare instances, even in these later ages, deviate from the laws by which he stately rules the natural world, for the deliverance and support of some of his faithful servants in circumstances of great extremity; especially, when thereby the interest of the moral world may remarkably be promoted? Or supposing this to be ever so rare, I would further ask, Is it impossible that he may, on a perfect view of every minutest circumstance, have constituted the course of things in such a manner, that there shall be a remarkable correspondence between a train of thoughts in a Christian's mind, and an event arising from other natural, but perhaps unobserved, causes, on which that train of thoughts could have no influence? Do you, Sir, thoroughly understand the law, by which thoughts arise in our mind? or can you say, by what connexion one springs up, rather than another? Can you account for it, why the mind is sometimes so much more forcibly struck than at other times, with the same object; or why it sometimes feels itself directed strongly into a certain channel, and track of thinking, in which it is not conscious to itself of a self-determining agency? Or are you sure that there may not be a special gracious appointment (whether natural or miraculous I do not now contend) in certain events, the causes of which are so unobserved, that we commonly, but perhaps rashly, say, they happen by chance? That the minds of many eminently wise and good men have been greatly comforted and established by such events, I am well assured; and it seems probable to me, that to well-disposed persons, of weaker abilities, they may more frequently happen: nevertheless, as I know they are liable to a great deal of cavil, and that it is the fashion of the age to deride every thing of this nature, I will not urge this argument in the present debate, but content myself with having insinuated it. I think I ought not entirely to have omitted it; and this seems its most proper place.

It is, I hope, at least possible, that the faith of an illiterate Christian may be not only really, but rationally, confirmed by such events; or, if you will admit the commonly received phrase, by such special providences as these. However, I am sure, there is another topic of argument, which is frequently of great and important service in this view, and which falls under the daily observation of the common people as well as others, and of which they are as competent judges as the most polite and learned of mankind. I mean, that which arises from comparing the temper and conduct of those who profess to reject the gospel, with that of those who seem most cordially to esteem and embrace it.

If it were evident and notorious, that infidelity did generally in fact make men better; if it increased their reverence for the Divine Being, and made them more diligent, constant, and devout in paying their daily homage before him; if it rendered them more sober and temperate, more mild and gentle, more upright and benevolent, in their behaviour; though this would be a most unaccountable phenomenon to any one who examines the constitution of the gospel, (since that diminishes no natural motive to virtue, and adds many peculiar to itself,) I do not say, that this remark ought to balance all the evidence on the other side; yet I will venture, Sir, to say, that I think it would shock an honest and candid mind, more than all the objections I have ever seen or heard of, as advanced by our modern freethinkers. But I firmly believe, that what weight this thought has, will be found in favour of Christianity, and not in opposition to it.

You well know, Sir, one can judge of these things only by one's own observation, and the report of others. I will not now insist on the latter; and that what I have to say as to the former may not be imputed to the eagerness of disputation, I think it not unbecoming my character to use the solemnity of saying, in the words of St. Paul, I protest to you by our rejoicing which I have in Christ Jesus, (and a stronger asseveration I cannot use,) that I write on this topic, as I would do if my life were to conclude with this letter, and I were directly to pass to account before the Judge of hearts for the truth of what I say.

I condescend not to speak of a mere freedom from gross and infamous vices; but sure I am, that if ever I have seen amiable and sublime virtue in the world, I have seen it among the humble disciples of Jesus. Where education and circumstances in life have been low, Christian principles have, to my certain knowledge, so far as principles could be known from behaviour, raised, animated, and ennobled the mind. I have beheld, even in cottages, that filial devotion toward the blessed God, that cordial submission to his will under the most painful dispensations, that calm steady fortitude in the midst of evils, which might have made a philosopher tremble; that cheerfulness in the immediate views of death; and, in the tenor of lives which I have intimately known, that strict integrity, that diligence, that contentment, that readiness to do good, in full proportion to their small abilities; that generous self-denial to avoid what might grieve and offend others; and, to crown all, that tender solicitude for the eternal happiness of friends, of strangers, and sometimes even of enemies; which has often filled me with wonder as well as delight. I speak freely, as conscious both of the truth and importance of what I say; nor am I at all ashamed thus openly to acknowledge, that my faith in Christianity has been not a little established by such observations as these; which, I bless God, have not been made in a few instances: and I esteem the evidence not the less, but the more, because day-labourers might enter into it, as well as myself.

I doubt not, Sir, but thousands more have also made observations of this kind, and that it will generally be found, that when the principles of Christianity enter a mind before unaffected with them, they produce this effect, which indeed it is most natural they should. On the other hand, as to professed infidels, and it is on them only that the observation can pertinently be made, I appeal to the world in general, whether they do not commonly make shipwreck of a good conscience, as well as of faith, and plainly show, that the precepts of the gospel are as disagreeable to them as its doctrines. It would be strange, indeed, if good nature, a sense of honour, and, especially in advanced life, a caution not to disgrace distinguishing principles, did not restrain some from scandalous enormities, and produce something agreeable in their behaviour; but I believe, most who know the world will allow, that it is a peculiar glory for any of this sect to maintain so much as an uniform external appearance of what the best heathen moralists have esteemed virtue.

People of attention and reflection in the lower ranks of life, are not so stupid, as not to observe those things, or to neglect drawing the obvious inference from them: an inference, in which they will be both directed, and supported, by that maxim of our divine Master, By their fruits ye shall know them. What the morals of infidel writers in private life have been, it may seem difficult certainl to judge, because their pieces have been mostly anonymous. Yet I cannot forbear observing, that some of those ingenious authors have found out a way of letting the world into their characters, without publishing their names; and that in some such palpable instances, as one would almost ascribe to a judicial infatuation, or think they had been hired to expose their own cause to contempt.

And this leads me further to touch upon that confirmation, which the faith of plain Christians sometimes receives, from observing, not only the character of those who would subvert Christianity, but also the manner in which they often manage their opposition to it.

Every one who can read his Bible may observe, (and it may be profitable for young persons, especially, to be shown it,) how unjustly the enemies of revelation often represent the doctrines and facts delivered in Scripture. He may see the calumnies, which these men often throw upon the inspired writers, or those whom they celebrate, rolling off, like foul water from the down of a swan, without leaving any trace or soil behind it. It is obvious also to remark, that instead of examining, or so much as attempting to confute, the arguments for Christianity, which these gentlemen cannot but know; they only advance their surmises, and their possibilities, or make vain efforts to prove, that those things cannot in reason be, which in fact appear.

It is not to be wondered, if honest persons of plain sense have soon enough of such teachers, and do not often come to seek for grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles; or that if the boisterous attacks, which are made on their faith by such methods, seem at first a little to loosen the roots of it, the storm afterwards serves only to fix it the faster, and to make way for its further spread. Especially when they see, that arguments produced in opposition to Christianity, often have as malignant an aspect on natural religion too, and apparently tend to destroy all mutual commerce among mankind, which can never be carried on without some confidence in the testimony of each other. It is thus that meat often comes out of the eater, and sweetness out of the fierce; and the subtle are taken in their own craftiness. The grossness of such visible and palpable snares engages prudent people to avoid the path in which they lie, and so secures them from others of a finer contexture and more dangerous form.

And thus, Sir, I have fulfilled my promise, and given you a more distinct account, than I remember to have met with elsewhere, of the rational satisfaction which many Christians in common life have, and others, under due cultivation, might without any accuracy of learning obtain, with regard to the truth of the religion they profess. And I do sincerely apprehend, that this representation of the matter, far different from that which you have given, if it appear just, will contain a compendious answer to what you have suggested on the contrary side of the question, and be such a reply to your treatise, as nothing is to the celebrated arguments which have been brought to demonstrate the impossibility of motion.

But here, Sir, as you tell my friend, "I am very sensible, I have been holding you for some time past in the highest impatience of zeal, to interpose and remind me," that even this evidence cannot be obtained by all;—that while it is pursued, it keeps the mind in a state of dangerous hesitation;—and where it is had, it is founded in the prepossessions of education, on partial and imperfect views of the question;—that much of it depends upon precarious human testimony;—and consequently, that it cannot have efficacy enough to satisfy the mind, to control irregular affections, or to incourage against those extremities, which the gospel may sometimes require us to endure in its defence. Each of these particulars you object in your pamphlet: and I do not remember any thing material suggested in it, and proper to be considered in this place, which does not fall under one or other of these heads.

Now as to the first of these, it is indeed true, that all the evidence which I have here described, cannot probably be attained by all; though I am confident a great deal more might be done for this purpose, in an enlightened and protestant country like ours, than we generally see. Care might be taken, especially if the richer kind of people had a becoming compassion on their poor neighbours, to teach all children to read, and to furnish all families with Bibles; as also to put such catechisms into their hands, as contain some hints of the reasons of Christianity. And if that which Dr. Thomas Burnet has drawn up in so plain and concise a manner, were to be used, I will venture to say, that children will be furnished with reasons for being Christians, which, so far as I can learn, the most sagacious Deists have been too wise to attempt directly to answer; and till they both attempt, and effect it, the understanding of a child may see, that whatever else they do is of very little importance. There are also several other plain and popular pieces,* which may, with a very small expense of money and time, be purchased and perused by young people: and if they were to be read two or three times over in families on the evening of the Lord's day, children and servants might, by an attentive hearing, be enabled to give some reason of the hope that is in them. And till they come to be capable of understanding such plain things as these, if they have no reason to believe their Bible to be true, but that they find it excellently good, and see it believed and reverenced by the wisest and best of those around them, it is, I suppose, at least as good a ground for their faith, as such infant understandings can have for infidelity. Nor will it be easy to invent any scheme, by which a child shall attain any knowledge at all, without some confidence in the veracity and skill of its parents, or other teachers.

Indeed, Sir, according to the injurious representation you have made of human nature, this is the case, not of little children alone, but of most who are grown up to years of maturity. "The generality of apprehensions," say you, (p. 17.) "extend not beyond a simple proposition, and are thrown out at once at the very mention of introducing a medium;" that is, in plain terms, they are not rational creatures. I shall not now urge, how inconsistent this is with the arguments, by which those that call themselves (by a strong catachresis) freethinkers, attempt to reason people out of a regard to revelation; and that, even by maintaining the natural abilities of the human mind to discover, without any supernatural assistance, every thing in religion which we are concerned to know. You, Sir, are too zealous a Christian to be pressed with such a consequence; or to be told, that if your subsequent discourse (p. 18, 19.) be right, when taken in connexion with this principle, it will lead to a conclusion, that men may live at random, not having sense enough to be capable of rendering an account to God for their actions. It would, I doubt not, be well for some, if this were indeed the case; but I hope none that pretend to reason against religion, will imagine they have any pretence to take shelter in such a thought. If this admonition be a digression, you will, I hope, pardon it, in favour of those who, I dare say, are the greatest admirers of your performance; and I will now return to remind you, in direct answer to what you advance, that daily experience shows the capacities of mankind in general not to be so weak as (just to serve a present purpose) you are pleased to suppose them. Do not people in low life reason on the common occurrences of it? Do they not learn the art of numbers, and often know how to apply it in cases where the reason of that application requires more than one medium to find it out? I suppose the natural understanding of men, in different stations of life, is, on an average, pretty equal, and that education generally makes the chief difference; and I have had an opportunity of observing, that among those who enter on academical studies, (and reasoning is not much cultivated in grammar-schools,) there is not one in some scores who, with proper instructions, does not, in a few days, grow capable of entering into the force of Euclid's demonstrations. And I hope none will have so little modesty as not readily to acknowledge, that the reasonings by which Christianity is proved in the plain pieces I referred to above, are much easier, and less abstruse, than those relating to the properties of mathematical figures to persons to whom they are entirely new. Objections, therefore, taken from the supposed impossibility of entering into the proofs offered, can only take place with regard to persons who, when grown up, are so unhappy as to want common sense; of whom it cannot be supposed that either of us intend to speak, in what we have said on either side of the question in debate between us.

But you will not fail to remonstrate, as you have already done at large, (p. 13, 14.) that supposing the rational evidence of Christianity ever so intelligible, it will at least require time for the most candid inquirer to make himself master of it; and while he is pursuing it, he continues in a state of extreme danger; because he is hesitating about that, on an immediate compliance with which his salvation depends. But to this, which really appears to me the most considerable difficulty you have suggested, I beg leave to answer, that the examination requires not so much time as you would represent, and that while the mind is pursuing it, there is no need at all that it should be in a state of infidelity, and consequently, of dangerous to its final happiness, if life should end before the examination be finished.

* Either the Three Sermons mentioned before, or the Bishop of London's Pastoral Letters, or a pamphlet entitled Plain Reasons for being a Christian, or the first part of The Gentleman's Religion.

You, Sir, I think, by one of the most palpable sophisms that I have any where met with, every where affect to represent the case in question, as if a man could have no rational evidence of Christianity, till he had inquired, on the one hand, into every thing that could be said either to confirm, or even to illustrate it; and, on the other hand, into every objection that has been brought against it. And if this be not granted, all your flourishes (p. 61—63.) will be mere ornaments of wit and eloquence, entirely wide of the matter in debate. On the contrary, it seems self-evident, that this is so far from being necessary to make a rational and intelligent Christian, that it is not necessary to constitute an able and an accomplished divine. View it in any other instance, and you cannot but allow what I say. Would you maintain that a man cannot be fit to practise as a lawyer, or a physician, till he has read every thing that has been written in any controversy relating to those professions? It would be much more apparently absurd, to insist on this polemical omniscience, (if I may be allowed the expression,) in the case before us: since, at that rate, a competent number of infidels might, without urging one material argument, overthrow Christianity, supposing it in itself ever so rational, merely by writing a greater number of books about it than any one man could be able to read.

On the whole, controversies relating to Christianity are endless; but what is essential to the proof of it lies within a very little room, and may be set in so plain and easy a light, that a man may in a few hours, with attentive thought, be competently master of the argument. If indeed he desires copiously and curiously to examine the particular branches of it, he must allow proportionable time and labour: but it is by no means necessary, though you, Sir, seem constantly to take it for granted, that he should be all this while in suspense as to the truth of the gospel in general. Every topic of argument is not so fundamental, as that the whole evidence of Christianity should depend on that topic; much less is every particular proof belonging to each topic so: and least of all, the circumstance of every particular proof. I might, for instance, see great reason to believe Christianity to be true, even though I knew nothing of its extraordinary success and speedy propagation in the first ages of the church, or I might be sure, that it was early propagated through vast tracts of land, with circumstances which afford a strong conviction of its truth, though I were yet to learn, whether it reached India or Britain during those early days, and if it did, whether the Christians of St. Thomas received it from the apostle of that name, or our happy island from St. Paul. I may be sure, that Jesus was prophesied of in the Old Testament, while I am entirely dubious how Daniel's weeks are to be calculated; nay, I may be uncertain as to some niceties in the calculation, and yet be in general sure, that the period they mark out is elapsed, and that it ended much about the time of Christ.

And as a consequence of all this it is evident, that books on various topics relating to Christianity may be highly valuable, and yet by no means necessary to lay a rational foundation for our faith. They may suggest new thoughts; they may place arguments urged many ages ago, in a clearer and more beautiful light; they may obviate difficulties, which ingenious men have started, and artfully aggravated; and thus they may demand the esteem and gratitude of the Christian world, to which the learned and worthy authors of the Analogy between Reason and Revelation, and of the Trial of the Witnesses, are undoubtedly entitled; and yet "the evidence of the gospel, like its great Author, might be the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever," notwithstanding all you are pleased so shrewdly to insinuate on this head. (P. 20—22.)

But waving this, which, though I thought it necessary to touch upon it here, relates not immediately to the case of common Christians, you will, I doubt not, be ready to remind me, that let the evidence to be offered to their consideration be ever so short and ever so plain, yet some time must be taken up in examining it, even that part of it which is most essential; and while that examination continues, they must be in a state of dangerous hesitation; since to doubt the truth of Christianity is (according to your representation of the matter) a damnable apostasy from it.

In answer to this part of the objection, I am compelled to say, that I apprehend there is in it a complication of errors. I cannot, in the first place, see how the faith of a Christian is utterly cancelled by every doubt and suspicion which arises in his mind. Our thoughts are not entirely at our command, and natural temper may sometimes suggest fears, which reason can neither authorize nor exclude. The humble Christian, conscious, on the one hand, of the imperfection of his character, and on the other, of the greatness of his hopes, may be ready sometimes to suspect, that the gospel is too good news to be true. Now where will you find your proofs, either from Scripture or from reason, that every such suspicion is an apostasy from the faith, and that it is damnable thus to be tempted?

But to cut the grand sinew of your objection, I will presume to say, how widely soever it may differ from the schemes you have formed on this subject, that I apprehend a man may be rationally established in the faith of the gospel, and may have candiddly examined the evidences of it, without ceasing to believe it while he pursues that examination; which I think may easily appear from what I have represented above, and I the rather repeat it, as you, Sir, seem so studious to keep your reader from one thought of it.

Having once learnt what the gospel scheme is, I can never doubt of its being admirably calculated to elevate, to purify, and to strengthen the soul, to fix it on God, and to open in it sentiments of the most sincere and generous benevolence towards men. Of this I am as sure, as that there is a gospel scheme at all, or such a book as the New Testament existing in the world. Nor can I ever question for a moment, after having read that admirable book with attention, that there seem to be in it all imaginable signs of integrity, piety, and goodness in the heart of its writers. Both these will appear strong presumptions of its truth and authority, and such as would require cogent arguments on the other side to balance them: arguments which, till I hear, I see no reason to set myself to surmise. And it is likely in theory, that a religion attended with strong internal evidence, will not be left destitute of external, I shall set myself to examine into that, under the apprehension of a strong probability that it will turn out in favour of the gospel.

I remember indeed, that you somewhere speak with sovereign contempt of "that inquiry, which is intended with a shrewd foreboding how the matter will end." But I must entreat you to ask yourself again, whether it is not possible for the most impartial mind, in such cases, to have such forebodings; nay, whether it be always possible to avoid them, even when entering on the most resolutely impartial examination? Consider the matter in subjects where the severest reasoning takes place, and where there can be no interest to bribe the assent, I mean, where mathematical theorems are concerned.

I question not, Sir, but you have observed, if you ever turn your thoughts this way at all, that there is often an observable proportion in the figure of a diagram, which leads a man to think the proposition true, as soon as he reads it. Besides, that having found demonstration attending all the former propositions, suppose of Euclid, he naturally concludes, he shall find it in the proposition in question. He would not perhaps accept a bet of a thousand guineas to one, against the force of a demonstration, which he has not yet studied; and which, notwithstanding this grand foreboding, he shall be able as freely and fairly to canvass, as he ever did any of the former. So little does there seem in this part of the argument, which you have pushed with so much eagerness and triumph.

But to return to the case of young persons, to be instructed in the evidences of Christianity, the matter we were considering, and from whence my regard to this favourite topic of yours led me to digress a little too far:—I freely own, and leave you, Sir, to make the best of the concession, I would not have youth led into any doubts about these matters, till their understandings arrive at a strength and solidity capable of encountering with them. I would not represent Christianity to my catechumens, or my children, nor indeed to the most intelligent and judicious of my hearers, as a dubious, uncertain thing, where the probabilities were so equal, that it was quite precarious which way an honest inquirer would see reason to determine. It appears to my reason, and conscience, quite in another point of light, as an evident and certain truth, which I assuredly know; in which I rejoice as the anchor of my soul, and which I verily believe must be the salvation of theirs, if they are saved at all. With these views it would be a horrible iniquity in me, to speak slightly and dubiously about it: yet I may, in a perfect consistence with this persuasion, and with the declaration of it, recommend it to others, not as on my own authority, but on the force of reasons, concerning the strength of which they are to judge for themselves; though I am ever so earnestly solicitous that they may judge aright, as knowing how strictly they are to answer for the integrity of their conduct in this affair.

But here, I am well aware, you will glory over me as convicted by my own confession. You will tell me, that all this scheme of educating children in Christian principles, and recommending them with so much confidence and delight, is an avowed method of prejudicing their minds strongly on one side of the question, and utterly inconsistent with any pretence of bringing them to a fair and honest inquiry; in order to which it is absolutely necessary, that a man come to search after truth without any preconceived opinion at all, and perfectly indifferent on which side he may happen to find it.

This I confess, Sir, has a plausible sound, and is a charming subject for a young academic, or a very young preacher, if he has a mind to display his talent at declamation: but after all, it is perfect knight-errantry, and lays down a law to mankind, which it is in many instances impossible they should follow, and which of consequence can be neither necessary nor reasonable. The affections of the human mind may indeed be controlled, but they cannot be extirpated; nor is it needful men should be insensible, in order to their being impartial. Had Junius Brutus, when he saw his sons arraigned before him for treason against their country, been thus philosophically indifferent whether they were innocent or guilty, he had been the idiot he formerly counterfeited, or something worse than that: and yet he did justice: and in other circumstances, with all the bowels of a father melting over them, he might have been equally just in acquitting them. A man may have strict reason for assenting to what he has been taught from his very infancy, and where the truth is greatly for his interest; or otherwise, who could have reason to believe himself heir to a kingdom, or an estate? A man may, I hope, have reason to believe the being of a God, yet who among us was not taught it from a child? or what virtuous mind does not see, that all its happiness is concerned in the question? Who would not esteem it far worse than death, to be brought to an apprehension that he lives in a fatherless world, and that all the resource which he thought he had found in the guardianship of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, was but the amusement of a pleasing dream?

And while I am on this topic, give me leave to touch on that notion, which some have entertained, of leaving children untaught in religion, that they may come unprejudiced to inquire into it: an absurdity, surely, to be numbered among the greatest which the adventurous infidelity of the present age has started, or its implicit disciples have imbibed, in open and perhaps boasted defiance of the common sense of mankind throughout all ages, nations, and religions. And yet I am told, some who have continued to call themselves Christians, have been wild enough to admit it. With them indeed I might justly cut short further debate, by urging, what on their professed principles must be unanswerable, the most express authority both of the Jewish and Christian revelations, strongly requiring that children should be brought up in an early and familiar acquaintance with them. But for the sake of others I would observe, and would entreat every professed disciple of reason to consider, that the notion of omitting an education in religion, to avoid prejudice, is utterly inconsistent with itself. For it is certain, as the world now goes, and every infidel must surely in his conscience know it, that if the children of Christians are not taught religion, and trained up in the exercises of it, they will soon learn vice and immorality, and then they will come to inquire into the evidences of Christianity in time, (if they ever made the inquiry at all,) with this terrible prejudice on the negative side of the question, "If Christianity be true, I am in a state of condemnation, and an heir of everlasting ruin: and I must relinquish all the dearest of my pleasures, in pursuit of a pretended felicity, which I had rather be annihilated than confined to."

And indeed, Sir, we would gladly know, if children are not to be taught religion, on what principles they are to be taught virtue. The philosophical questions relating to the first principles, and ultimate obligations, of morality, they can as little understand as those of religion: and if they are to be taught it, as in itself an amiable thing, and a thing which their parents know to be reasonable, and conducive to their happiness, they may on the like foundation be taught, to receive the gospel as the word of God, and, according to their little abilities, to worship, and live like Christians.

I think I may conclude this head with an appeal to every man's conscience, whether it would be best for society in general, that our children should be taught Christianity in their early years? Whether the history of a life and character like that of the blessed Jesus, be not one of the finest lessons they can learn? And whether an apprehension of our obligations to him as our great Redeemer, who, as the messenger and gift of his Father's love, taught such excellent truths, and did and suffered so much for our salvation, be not admirably calculated to touch their tender hearts, and form them to humility, gratitude, and love? I hope, men of such lordly and towering understandings, as our deists generally are, will at least condescend to own this of the gospel, which wise men will reckon no small circumstance in its favour: and these gentlemen must pardon me when I add, that had their own minds been more deeply touched with it, their understandings might have been more solid, in proportion to the degree in which their own opinion of them had been less exalted.

But should you allow this, you may still insist, that, according to the scheme I have proposed, our young Christian, in his most advanced stage, must have very partial and imperfect views of the question; since I have supposed him chiefly to have heard the advocates on one side, and have not made the perusal of infidel writers, or an attendance upon such catechists, if such there be, any part of our method.

It is here obvious to reply, that I have advised, as young persons grow up towards manhood, to give them some hints of the main objections which are generally made to Christianity, or at least some view of the chief topics, from whence these objections are taken. A Christian parent or minister will of course do this in such a manner, as to show that there seems to him to be very little weight in them, when compared with the evidence in favour of our religion; and this he may do in perfect consistence with giving a plain and honest view of the strength of the objections, which to be sure he ought to give, if he mentions it at all.

This may commonly suffice; yet I readily acknowledge, there are circumstances, in which it may be very expedient to enter into a more particular detail of objections and answers. This I take to be especially the case of those, who are educated for the ministry; and perhaps I might add, of gentlemen intended for the practice of the law, and indeed, of all whose incomes can afford what is commonly called a liberal education. The strong temptations, to which such persons are generally exposed, might, I think, require proportionable antidotes; at least I am persuaded, every considerate person will acknowledge, that it is incumbent on those who are to be the teachers and guardians of religion, to be well acquainted with its proofs; in order to which, let such, by all means, before they appear in a public character, examine the evidence on both sides. And whatever use they may make of a tutor on this occasion, as to the method and order of their studies, and whatever confidence they may place in his integrity and capacities, let them not acquiesce in whatever abstracts he may give them of the objections which our adversaries advance; but let them attentively peruse the most celebrated pieces, which have been written by them; and what they are, no man of tolerable acquaintance with the world can be long to seek. Thus let them hear infidels pleading their own cause; at the same time weighing, which justice and common sense will require, those answers which have been returned by the learned advocates for Christianity, in which our country, above all others, has been so eminently happy.

Sad, indeed, is the drudgery our younger brethren must go through, in reading such authors, as many of those who have attacked religion; as I well know by my own painful and laborious experience. But the confirmation which their faith may receive, by the very efforts made to overthrow it, will, I hope, in many instances, be a sufficient reward. And as these pieces, especially in the hand of second-rate writers, contain little more than a confident and unwearied repetition of the same objections, which have been answered perhaps many scores and hundreds of times, without taking any notice of those replies; (which, whether it be owing to the learning or the modesty of the authors, I will not undertake to say;) one who is acquainted with these controversies will be able to despatch large volumes in a little time, and will see that many of them need no new answers. All which will be a circumstance of some consolation under so tedious a task.

This, Sir, is a method in the education of young ministers, which is practised, even among the protestant dissenters, in the midst of those many disadvantages under which their tutors and students labour; in several of whose little seminaries, to my certain knowledge, the rational evidences of natural and revealed religion, with such a view of the objections against both, are as regularly and methodically taught as logic or geometry, or any of the other sciences: and with what superior advantage this important branch of learning is cultivated in our two celebrated universities, is not for me to say, or perhaps to imagine. But as for the common people, I hope none will be so unreasonable as to insist upon it, that they should spend their money for that which is not bread, or their labour for that which will yield them so little satisfaction, as a course of polemics would in their circumstances do. For them, the plain and practical method I have offered above, seems abundantly sufficient. And if objections come in their way, which in this free age may very probably happen, let them apply to those who may be most like to answer them, and weigh the answers seriously and impartially; at the same time humbly addressing the great Father of lights, to lead them into all necessary truth, and to preserve them from every dangerous mistake, in a matter of such apparent moment: and, with these precautions, reason and experience concur to teach me, that their Christian friends need be in no pain for the event. Their inquiries, as I before observed, may be impartial, and their determinations rational, without knowing every thing that has been said, on one side, and on the other. And for them to remain still undetermined, from any impertinent suspicion, that somebody might have something to say which they never heard, but which, if they knew it, might be an invincible objection to Christianity, is a conduct into which no one will be like to fall, who is not pretty heartily resolved to be an infidel at all adventures. For if there be any good sense in such a turn of mind, it must be a foundation of universal scepticism in all the affairs of life, as well as religion; and would be full as absurd, as if a jury should refuse to give a verdict upon the evidence they have already received, because it is possible there may be some absent persons in the world, who, if they were present, might give such information as would turn the scale the contrary way.

On the whole, it seems to me strictly reasonable, that as every man should seriously reflect on the nature, genius, tendency, and evidence, of those religious principles in which he has been brought up; so he should continue to adhere to them, till he sees an evidence against it, at least equal to that which he has for it. And I further apprehend, that there are certain degrees of evidence attending many truths, of one kind and another, moral and religious, as well as mathematical, in which a candid and upright man may see reason to acquiesce, without giving himself perpetual trouble in renewing his inquiries as long as he lives; and concerning which he may have a rational apprehension, that he shall never meet with any thing to be urged against them, which is worthy of his notice, unless it should be for the sake of others, rather than for his own. Whether this be not the case with regard to Christianity, every one must judge for himself, as in the sight of God, and on a review of the information he has gained with respect to it. Yet it is possible, that when his judgment is thus determined in its favour, objections against it may afterwards occur to him, which though he does not seek, he may not be able to avoid hearing. Of these, some may be such, as he has already weighed in the balance, and found wanting: others may immediately appear to affect only what is circumstantial, in the evidence on which he has already yielded his assent, and not what is essential to it; or at most, but a small part of the evidence, which, if it were to be given up, the main strength of the various and complex argument in which he before acquiesced, might remain secure; as for instance, the meaning of some particular prophecy which he thought to refer to Christ, or the like. Now I apprehend, that by far the greater part of what is commonly advanced against Christianity, perhaps nineteen objections in twenty, will, to one well instructed and experienced in religion, be reducible to one or other of these heads. As for those which fall under neither of them, I doubt not but they will soon appear to be built on some ignorance or misrepresentation of the plan of revelation, which will, I hope, never want pious and learned votaries, capable of defending it, and of turning the difficulties urged against it, or the manner in which they are treated, into occasions of adding increasing lustre to its proofs, and, perhaps, into arguments in its favour; as the world has already seen in frequent instances.

The chief remaining objection is, that, according to the plan laid down above, we shall have our faith built upon mere human testimony, which you, Sir, represent as a most fallacious and uncertain thing, utterly unfit to be the foundation of so important a superstructure. It is by no means necessary here to repeat all the diminutive things, which you are pleased to say of human testimony, without any distinction, and with as much severity, as if you judged of it in general, by what you may have found in some deistical writings. It all centres in depreciating its validity; and the reader will soon see, how far it is to be regarded, as just in itself, or as applicable to the present occasion.

And here I must, in the first place, remind you, that the article now in question does not at all concern, or affect, the internal evidence of Christianity, which of itself alone is a very considerable thing; especially when it is considered, how probable it is, that God might favour the world with a revelation, which in its present condition it so evidently needs. It is not on testimony that I believe there is such a book as the Bible in the world. I see it, and read it; and that it is in the main rightly translated, even an illiterate Christian among us may be sure; because if there had been any gross prevarication in this respect, considering the variety of sects among us, clamours must have arisen, which he sees in fact do not arise, between the contending parties, as I have elsewhere argued more at large.* And therefore all the proofs of the divine authority of this book, that arise from the contexture, design, harmony, and efficacy, which I mentioned above, are quite independent, even on that human testimony, on which its genuineness depends, and are built on sense, observation, and experience.

There are indeed other, and those I confess very material, proofs of Christianity, in which some considerable regard to human testimony is absolutely necessary: but before we further discuss these, give me leave to ask you, Sir, Will you, or any man of candour or common sense, venture to assert, that we are in no circumstances obliged to admit the truth of any fact on the testimony of other men? You cannot but know, how often the contrary has been demonstrated, by all our best writers on this subject: nay, I think you cannot but see, at the first glance, the glaring absurdity of such a principle. Does not the course of human life every day declare, what is, and must be, the sense of mankind with regard to this? Are not things of the utmost importance, in which not only the estates and lives of particular persons, but the interests of whole nations, are concerned, undertaken and determined on the credit of testimony? and is it not absolutely necessary, they should turn upon it? How dishonest then, and how shameful, would it be to assert, that it is to be regarded in other things of the greatest moment, but not in those which relate to the support of the gospel.

If there be any thing particular in that evidence to which we appeal on this occasion, which renders it unworthy of regard, let our adversaries show it plainly. You will not, Sir, I am persuaded, think fit to assert, that every fact must of course be given up, which is said to have happened almost two thousand years ago, or that we may never [illegible] that books are genuine which pretend to such antiquity as that. Are all the classics of Greece and Rome spurious? Or is it to be numbered among the uncertainties of antiquity, whether Cyrus conquered Babylon, and whether Julius Cæsar was assassinated in the senate? These facts are of more ancient date than any which are asserted in the New Testament; yet are you a sceptic with regard to them? Were you as sure that you should be possessed of all imaginable happiness for a million of years, as you are of the truth or falsehood of those things, would you entertain any afflictive doubt with regard to it? or would you not, what you would look on as such a tenure, for the certain enjoyment of any thing in mortal life? A man's own heart easily answers him such questions as these: and yet the testimony in support of Christianity is slighted, though it is most easy to show, that it is far superior to that by which we are informed of Cyrus's conquests, or of Cæsar's death.

* See Sermons on the Power [illegible] Vol. I. Serm.

The only remaining question, therefore, on this head, is not concerning the learned, but common, Christians, and the rational satisfaction which they are capable of receiving, with regard to these facts, on which the external evidences of Christianity depend. And here I doubt not but they may receive competent satisfaction; that is, they may see much greater reason to believe them than they can possibly have to reject them; which is all the matter requires.

To evince this, let us consider what those facts are on which their reasonings, with respect to the external evidence, depend; for that is properly the precise question. And they are chiefly these: that there was such a person as Jesus Christ,—who founded a religion,—which was received by multitudes of people quickly after his death; (i. e. about 1700 years ago;)—many of which converts testified their firm persuasion of its truth by enduring great extremities in its defence:—that among these ancient Christians there were such persons as the evangelists and apostles,—who wrote the chief books of the New Testament;—which books are, in the main, transmitted safely and faithfully down to us:—as also, that when Christ and his apostles lived, the Jews did subsist as a people,—and had in their hands books which they accounted sacred, —in the main the same with those which we now call the Old Testament.

These, Sir, are the grand facts, which we prove by testimony, and with which we connect our reasonings in favour of the gospel. What the testimony is by which we confirm these facts, and what the connexion by which we infer Christianity from them, I (among many others) have elsewhere shown at large; and I have too much other business, and too much with you in particular before me, to swell this letter by so unnecessary a repetition.

Now, with regard to common Christians, of whose attainable satisfaction we are treating, I readily own, they cannot be fully masters of that evidence which learned men may receive of these facts, by consulting the original writers: yet they are certainly capable of knowing something of considerable importance even on this head, where their disadvantages must be acknowledged the greatest of all. Every plain reader sees many ancient authors quoted, as testifying such and such things, and perhaps sees at the bottom of the page characters or words which he cannot understand: but he reads the supposed sense of them in English, and is told, if the book be properly written, about what time the author produced is said to have lived. Now, it can never enter into his heart to imagine, that, in an enlightened age, Christian divines, publishing their names with their works, or if they do not, seeming zealous for Christianity, would have so little regard to themselves, or their cause, as to pretend to quote such passages, unless the books from whence they were taken were certainly extant; and the passages to be found there, containing the sense which they give them. The matter does not by any means rest upon our personal integrity: (though, I hope, in reporting a fact, some regard might be paid to that:) were the defenders of Christianity ever so dishonest, it cannot be imagined they would obtrude such palpable falsehoods on the world, while so liable to be contradicted, and ashamed, by those who disbelieve the gospel, and make it the great, though wretched, business of their lives, to oppose it to the utmost of their power, and to revile its preachers and defenders. But are these assertions of ours, as to the passages in question, contradicted? Where is the deist who will dare to say, that Christianity is not an ancient religion; that it did not arise and spread about the time I have mentioned; or that its professors did not early suffer in its defence? Where is the man who will venture to assert, that the most material books of the New Testament were not early received by Christians: or that the authors in which we assert, that we find quotations from them, and references to them, did not really live in the ages and places we assert? Our books are open: and the facts and testimonies on which we build our reasonings, are liable to be examined with all possible freedom by our enemies as well as our friends. If we have recourse to any pious frauds, (as they are scandalously called,) let those frauds be detected; and, in the name of the God of truth, let them be hissed out of the world with a just abhorrence. But the contrary is so plain, that there is not an infidel in our land, that will presume to oppose the evidence of these things, and to set his name to such an attempt: nay, either some remains of modesty, or a consciousness of the hurt which their cause would receive from so shameless a defence, prevents even anonymous authors from attacking us here. The controversy is concerning the consequences drawn from these acknowledged facts; (that Christianity was an ancient religion, and the New Testament early received, &c.) Now, of these consequences the common people are themselves judges, on principles laid down above; and they do not admit them because we, or any others, assert them to follow.

And here, Sir, I cannot forbear admiring the wisdom of Divine Providence, in permitting such perverse opposition to the gospel to arise, and continue: since even its avowed enemies, by the nature and manner of their attack, serve but more effectually to confirm the faith of impartial and intelligent inquirers, and give an authority and evidence which the teachers of Christianity assert, in some measure beyond what it could otherwise have had. Just as another kind of infidels, I mean the Jews, are also vouchers for the antiquity and authority of the Old Testament, on which so many of our arguments depend; and those arguments of such validity, that, as Mr. Addison well concluded, many who now dispute against the application of its prophecies to Christ, would, no doubt, have concluded them a Christian forgery, and have argued that conclusion from the perspicuity of those prophecies, had not Providence laid in so incontestable a proof to the contrary. "The wrath of man, O Lord, shall praise thee; and the remainder of that wrath shalt thou restrain." I must on the same principle congratulate the happiness of our own country, in which such liberty is allowed, of proposing whatever can be said against Christianity; in consequence of which our modern infidels are deprived of that shrewd pretence, which perhaps might be more serviceable to them than all the rest of their weapons, that they could say something convincing against it, if penal laws did not deter them.

I hope, Sir, these things will evince, that the common people may have some considerable degrees of evidence for those facts, on which the external proofs of Christianity are built, though they are not capable of consulting the original records from whence they are taken. But I must not dismiss the subject, till I have considered an objection, which equally concerns the most learned Christian: I mean, that none of the most rational arguments, in their clearest and strongest view, can give the mind satisfaction; or at least can produce such a degree of persuasion, as should animate us to subdue our passions,—or to endure those extremities in defence of our religion, which we may possibly meet with, and which it indispensably requires us to bear.

You make these three distinct topics; but the former is so evidently included in the two latter, that all I shall say to it at present is, that every man who will reflect in his own mind, must find, that there are degrees of rational proof in which he acquiesces with entire satisfaction. Many Christians testify this to be the case, with regard to the arguments in favour of Christianity, of which great number I must declare myself one; and any one who finds himself dissatisfied, will do well to give his reasons for that dissatisfaction, without making his own case a standard, by which to pronounce on that of every one else. You argue, as if there were no medium between an implicit faith, and perpetual scepticism; but the conclusion is very hastily drawn. You, Sir, may perhaps have known some, who have gradually quitted all religious principles, when they had begun to examine any: I, on the contrary, have known many who have professed themselves to have been greatly confirmed in Christianity by such examination: they have found its evidences, like gold, approved by the severest trials: and it is to me utterly unimaginable how a rational believer should be incapable of finding complacency and satisfaction of mind, in having used his rational faculties on so important an occasion.

Waving therefore all further debate upon this, I shall proceed to what you add under the two remaining parts of this argument; (p. 30—35.) in which you undertake to show, that "no conviction drawn from reasoning can ever have force enough to command our passions, so as on common emergencies" (they are your own extraordinary words) "to make a good Christian,—much less will it serve to produce a faithful martyr, if ever so severe an exercise be demanded at our hands." You employ a great deal of rhetoric on this subject, in the pages referred to above: but I am sorry to say, that, so far as I can judge, it amounts only to this, "That you apprehend something so extremely desirable in the indulgences which Christianity prohibits, and something so terrible in death, in whatever view and cause it is to be encountered, that no rational argument imaginable can induce a man to give up the one, and expose himself to the other."

And is it possible, Sir, that sensual pleasure, and mortal life purchased at the expence of honour, gratitude, and conscience, can indeed appear so exceeding valuable? I would not wrong your moral character so much, as to suppose, that you seriously meant this, and will abide by it; and yet it is difficult to imagine, how it could be written otherwise than seriously, without bearing hard on another part of your moral character too. I will leave it among the other mysteries of your book, and content myself with hinting at those reasons, for which the matter appears to me in a quite contrary view; as I am persuaded, it would have done to Socrates, Seneca, or Epictetus, had they considered it only in theory.

No paradox in human nature appears to me so strange, as that a man, who in his conscience believes, that the arguments in favour of Christianity are unanswerably strong, should deliberately allow himself in the violation of its precepts; or should, by any temporal considerations whatsoever, be induced to renounce it. All the pleas of duty, gratitude, and interest, are so weighty in favour of a constant and resolute subjection to it, that one could hardly imagine, did not fact demonstrate the contrary, that any temptation of allurement, or of terror, should, with a rational creature, who believed the gospel, triumph over them.

Nor is a life of Christian obedience that violent and constrained thing, which you seem to suppose. Were I to judge by those pages [illegible] I should imagine you had never read the New Testament, and did not know how the views of a Christian are animated and raised. O, Sir, the rational believer is in his heart and conscience persuaded, that to all the bounties of his common providence, God has added the riches of redeeming love. He is fully persuaded that the Son of God descended from heaven, to deliver him from everlasting ruin; that he has generously purchased him with the price of his own blood; and that (if he be conscious of a true faith in him) Christ has taken him as his peculiar property under his guardian care, with a gracious purpose of conducting him safely through life and death, of receiving his nobler part in a very little time into the abode of holy and happy spirits, and at length of raising his body from the dust, and fixing his complete person in a state of immortal glory and felicity. Now when this is really believed, and the conviction is firm and lively, (which I hope a rational conviction may very possibly be,) what can be a more natural effect, than that an ardent love to God our Father, and to the Lord Jesus Christ, should be excited by it? And it is easy to imagine, that this love must make obedience easy: and when the mind is taken up with such sublime and delightful views, and those devotional exercises which is so natural to ingraft upon them, it will not be so hard a matter as many seem to imagine, to conquer the irregular propensities of animal nature, or the exorbitances of passion, where only the little enjoyments and interests of this transitory life are concerned. Or rather, many of those exorbitances will be superseded, or, as the apostle justly and finely expresses it, crucified by the cross of Christ; and the affections, without any painful struggle, will generally flow on in an orderly and pleasant channel.

And where this is the temper and character, martyrdom may not appear so dreadful a thing, as you, Sir, have taken pains to represent it. It may rather be the habitual judgment of such a Christian, that it is to be esteemed an honour and favour, which our great Lord bestows on some of his most beloved servants. To be excused from the melancholy circumstances attending death in its natural form; to have an opportunity of turning the common lot of mortality into an occasion of manifesting heroic gratitude and fidelity to the best of Masters and of Friends; to die with those warm sentiments and elevated views which such a condition so naturally tends to excite and suggest; would not surely be, as you seem to insinuate, the death of a fool: (which I cannot think even that of Socrates to have been:) surely, Sir, on second thoughts, you must rather judge it a consummation of labours, cares, and sorrows, inseparable from human life, to be devoutly wished for, rather than dreaded. I will on the other hand grant, that hellish acts of cruelty may be invented and practised, under which the resolution of an upright mind may faint, and even reason itself be overborne, unless God were pleased to interpose by extraordinary supports, which there is great encouragement to hope he would in such a case do: but while reason remains undisturbed, I should imagine, that death in its most horrible form, when met in the cause of such a Saviour, who had so graciously borne it for us, should appear more desirable than life in its most agreeable circumstances; and surely, then, infinitely more desirable than life purchased by base ingratitude to him, and worn out under the sense of his just displeasure, and the sad prospect of being finally disowned by him, as an apostate and a traitor.

This I think to be solid reason; and I bless God, there are numberless facts which confirm it, and show that persons not pretending to any such immediate revelation as you assert to be necessary, have conquered the greatest difficulties on these principles, and, after having adorned the gospel by a most exemplary and holy life, have steadily and cheerfully sealed it with their blood. And every fact of this kind is so unanswerable an argument against all that you allege here, that I do not judge it necessary to pursue this part of my plan any further.

With this therefore I conclude what I had to offer in vindication of the perspicuity and solidity of those arguments in proof of Christianity, to which the generality of its professors among us may attain: and I hope it will be allowed, that I have fairly and candidly, as well as seriously, considered what you object against it, and so have answered the first part of your pamphlet, which I take to be by far the most plausible and dangerous.

Your endeavour to prove, that Christianity itself avows, that it is not built upon argument, but on a revelation to be immediately made from the Spirit of God to every Christian, by which all argument is superseded, and all possibility of doubt and error excluded, is such a direct contradiction to the whole tenor of the New Testament, that I hardly think you would be understood seriously to mean it. It is sufficient that you have shown, you have wit enough to give a varnish to so wild a notion. Yet lest any should be so weak as to imagine there is any solidity in what you have so adventurously advanced on that head, I am willing plainly to discuss it with you; and at the same time to inquire into what you say, with regard to the awful sentence which the gospel passes on those who reject it: a circumstance which you every where represent as totally irreconcilable with a religion to be rationally proved and defended; but which, on the contrary, appears to me most wisely adapted to the rest of the scheme, and, when compared with it, an addition rather than abatement of its internal evidence. This, and several other particulars in yours, I should be glad to examine; but I wave it at present, because this letter is already swelled to a pretty large size. I therefore reserve what I have further to say to another opportunity, and I hope a few weeks more may afford it. But I choose to send you what I have already written, without any further delay; because I am conscious of the many hinderances, which, in a life like mine, oblige me often to postpone, much longer than I intended, the execution of attempts to do what little I can towards serving the world, by promoting the interest of Christianity in it; and because I really think your piece has been already too long unanswered. If you please to offer any thing in reply to what I have here proposed, I shall give it a serious consideration: and hope that I shall, in the whole course of this controversy, endeavour to write like a Christian, and then I shall not forget any other character which I could wish to maintain. At present, Sir, I conclude with assuring you, that it is with sensible regret I have found myself obliged, for the honour of the gospel, and the preservation of men's souls, to animadvert on what you have written, in the manner I have already done. Should you prove, which may possibly be the case, some old acquaintance and friend, I hope I have written nothing which should make me blush at any interview with you; and should you, as I rather apprehend, be an entire stranger, I am, on the common principles of that faith, which it is the great glory of my life to profess and defend, with sincere good wishes for your temporal and eternal happiness, in any thing which may conduce to either,

Sir,

Your obedient humble servant,

P. DODDRIDGE.

Northampton, Nov. 5, 1742.

LETTER II.

Sir,

Though my former Letter considered what I thought most essential in your late treatise, yet there are several other things in it, which, however designed, have so plain a tendency to expose Christianity to suspicion, and even to contempt, that on the principles which led me to animadvert upon it before, I find myself obliged to give you this second trouble.

I proceed therefore without any further ceremony, to consider the pains you have taken, under the second general head of your tract, to represent the gospel as pleading guilty to the charge of not being founded on argument; or in other words, not being generally capable of such rational proof, as its disciples may be able to receive.

You would seem indeed at one view to by your manner of introducing this topic, to think this is doing great kindness to the New Testament, as it delivers it from the absurdity of saying, "Judge whether you have time or not;—judge whether you are judges or not;—judge all for yourselves, and yet judge all alike." (P. 3.) But I hope, Sir, before I have finished my letter, to show, that all, whom we can suppose to be concerned in any demand of judging, i. e. all persons of common understanding, to whom the gospel is, or has been faithfully and intelligibly preached, can have no just plea from the want of time, or capacity, and must, on the supposition of an honest and diligent inquiry, all judge alike, i. e. all agree in receiving it as a divine revelation.

To illustrate and confirm the view you have given of the matter, you undertake to show,—that Christ did not propose his doctrines to examination (p. 36—38.)—that his apostles had neither leisure, nor qualifications, for such a method, i. e. for the use of reasoning and argument in the propagation of the gospel, (p. 38—40.)—and that the very supposition of such a proceeding is evidently preposterous from the nature of the thing. (P. 41—46.) In opposition to all which, it is one of the easiest tasks one can imagine, to show, that Christ did propose the great doctrines he taught to examination: that the apostles did the same, urging (as their blessed Master had done) most cogent arguments in the proof of them:—and that any other method of proceeding had been preposterous, and must necessarily have exposed the gospel to the contempt of all reasonable people. It seems hard, indeed, to be put upon proving things so conspicuous as these; and it cannot but be some trial of temper to one who honours and loves the gospel to see it and its glorious founders, placed in so ridiculous a view, as that in which your assertions and arguments represent them: that is, described as wild enthusiasts, running all over the world, at the expense of their own lives, to urge men, on pain of damnation, to receive a religion, for which they did not pretend to give them any reason. But out of respect both to you, and the cause in which I am engaged, I will keep myself as cool as I can. And in the following pages seem to my reader unnecessary, I must beg him to distinguish, how much was needful to convince you, and what was sufficient to confute you.

But before I proceed to hint at the evidential proof of the three propositions, which, in opposition to yours, I have laid down above, I beg leave to premise, that all you say on this subject seems to me founded on an artful and sophistical shifting the question. The grand matter in debate is whether Christianity is founded on rational argument, or whether the only reason which a person of the gospel can generally have to give for his belief of it, must be, that God has immediately revealed it to him by his Spirit, and testified the truth of it to him in a manner, which as, on the one hand, he cannot suspect, so, on the other hand, he cannot communicate or explain? Instead of discussing this question, you put off the reader with another very different, (p. 36.) Whether Christ and his apostles submitted their doctrine to examination? which is a very ambiguous manner of speaking; and when you assert that they did not, I must beg leave to ask, what you mean by their doctrine? Do you mean this general doctrine, that they were teachers sent from God? Or do you mean those particular doctrines, which in consequence of that general assertion they proceeded to teach? If you mean the former, it is indeed to your purpose; but, as I shall presently show, is a proposition entirely and notoriously false. But if you mean the latter, which the course of your arguments seems to imply, then it is foreign to your purpose: for Christianity may be founded on rational argument, though the first teachers of it, when they had proved their mission, should have put the credit of particular doctrines on their own authorized testimony alone, without discussing the several branches of their system, in such a manner as it would have been necessary they should have done, had they proposed it only as a theory, destitute of external proofs.

Now that our Lord Jesus Christ did not expect, that it should be believed merely on his own testimony, that he was a teacher sent from God, and one whose doctrine was consequently true and divine, but set himself to prove it, is so evident from the history of the evangelists, that I believe few readers need so much as to be reminded of particular passages on this head. No words can be more express than those, in which he has disclaimed this. If (says he) I bear testimony of myself alone, my testimony is not true or valid; but my Father who hath sent, he beareth testimony to me. And you well know, that he illustrated and argued this testimony of the Father, partly from the predictions of those sacred writings which they acknowledged to be the word of God, in which Jesus declared he was described and foretold; and partly from the attestation of John, whom they generally acknowledged to be a divinely inspired prophet; but principally, from a yet more sensible argument than either, the works which the Father had given him to perform, and which (said he) bear witness of me. And all these he represents as illustrated by the excellent design and tendency of his preaching, to which he plainly refers, when he says, the word which I have spoken, shall judge the unbeliever another day.

These were various and cogent arguments, some of them so very plain, that one single day, or hour, might make a man master of them: I mean, that arising from his miraculous powers, and the tendency of his doctrines to promote real goodness. The argument from John's testimony was, even by the confession of his enemies, known to all the nation; and as for that from prophecy, he submitted it to their candid and deliberate examination, urging them to search the Scriptures, and assuring them that if they did so, they would there find a convincing testimony concerning him, which was to shine with growing evidence. And on the whole, he expostulates with them, in language utterly irreconcilable with your scheme; And why, even of yourselves, from plain appearances, and without further explications and remonstrances from me, judge you not that which is right? pleading that the signs of the times, marking them out to be those of the Messiah, were as discernible as those of the prognostications of the weather, which all the world had observed, and formed into common proverbs. So that, in consequence of all, their continued unbelief, in the midst of so many united testimonies and palpable proofs, was not only an irrational and criminal, but a most inexcusable, thing. If I had not (says he) come and spoken unto them, and done among them the works which no other man did, though their disobedience to the law of God had been justly punishable, yet, in comparison of their present case, they had not had sin; but now, they have no cloak for their sin. Could they have pleaded, as you, Sir, it seems, would have taught them to do, "We never had any reason offered to bring us to believe;" I suppose, it would have been no despicable cloak for their infidelity. I cannot forbear saying, that it is a grievous outrage upon the character of our blessed Redeemer, to suppose him capable of talking in so wild, so false, and so inconsistent a manner, as this wretched hypothesis would imply. I should have too great a respect for the memory of Socrates, to advance, or admit, any thing so injurious to it.

That the apostles also reasoned in the defence of their mission, is as certain, as that they preached and wrote; and indeed the fifth book of the New Testament is almost as much the history of their reasonings, as of their acts. The second chapter contains an account of their reasoning at Jerusalem, from the fact of the miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost upon them, in comparison with the predictions of the Old Testament, both with respect to that, and to the resurrection of Jesus; from whence they strongly infer, that all the house of Israel might know assuredly, that God had made that same Jesus whom they had crucified both Lord and Christ. The third, fourth, and fifth chapters, relate their reasonings before the people and the Sanhedrim, from the cure of the lame man in the temple, as wrought in the name of Jesus of Nazareth, whom they had crucified. And it would be tedious, rather than necessary, to continue the enumeration of particular passages, in which we read of Paul's reasoning in confirmation of these great points: as we are told he did at Damascus, at Jerusalem, at Antioch in Pisidia, and particularly at Thessalonica, where when his reasoning with the Jews out of the Scriptures for three successive sabbaths is spoken of, it is said to have been as his manner was. You cannot but know, that as he continued this practice at Berœa, the inhabitants of that place are greatly commended, for examining the force of his arguments, and searching the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so. His reasoning with the philosophers at Athens, from natural principles, to demonstrate the absurdity of image worship, is so conclusive and so noble, that I cannot suppose it to have escaped your notice or memory. I am sorry to be under a necessity of reminding you, that at Corinth, where he continued for a year and a half, he reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath, at least for a considerable part of that time; that at Ephesus, he preached in the synagogue for the space of three months, disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God; and after this, having separated the disciples, he disputed daily in the school of one Tyrannus, continuing this practice for the space of two years; that he made his defence with great presence of mind, before the Jews at Jerusalem; that he reasoned with Felix of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, in such a manner that he made him tremble, and pleaded with such strength of argument before Agrippa, that he almost persuaded him to be a Christian. And the history closes with his appointing a day to the Jews at Rome, in which they attended him at his lodging, and he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law and out of the prophets, from morning till evening. What the force and validity of these reasonings were, is not at all the question between us: it is sufficient, that the passages referred to demonstrate, that reasonings were used, and objections heard, directly contrary to what you, Sir, have been pleased to assert, (p. 39.) with as much confidence, as if you had never read these passages, or never expected that what you have written should be compared with the records to which you appeal.

It is equally easy to show, that the apostles reason in their epistles; and with what force, many valuable commentators have shown at large. But as it would be out of my way to consider those reasonings now, I content myself with mentioning one passage, as a specimen of many more: "I speak as unto wise men, judge ye what I say." A text, in which there seems to be a spring, that will not easily bend to your interpretation. But the whole New Testament is so full of reasonings, that it is quite superfluous to enumerate particulars.

Now when these things are thus evident to fact, it signifies little to say, that the apostles had not time, or qualifications, to maintain an argument, and that in the nature of things it would have been preposterous for them to have attempted it. If what you say on these topics (p. 38—45.) were conclusive, when compared with what I have produced above, the conclusion would be something very different from what you professedly labour to establish:—it would show, that the apostles acted in an irrational and preposterous manner. But I am in no pain for their reputation on this head, in consequence of any thing which you have asserted; for all your reasonings are built on a forgetfulness, or misrepresentation, of those topics of argument, on which the apostles laid the great stress of their cause.

It is very true, that many curious and subtle questions in pneumatology, metaphysics, and ethics, might have been connected with some articles which the apostles taught, and a whole life might have been spent in canvassing all that a disputatious caviller might have objected. It was indeed beneath the dignity of an apostle's character, and inconsistent with his important work, to unravel all these cobwebs, thread by thread. Yet God was pleased to furnish them with the proper and rational means of sweeping them away, as it were, at once. Inspiration could, no doubt, have furnished them for a minute discussion of every artful sophism, and have taught them to range metaphysical arguments with an accuracy far exceeding that of Aristotle: but the generality of mankind was not capable of entering into such curiosities; and therefore it was an instance of great wisdom and goodness in the great Author of our religion, to furnish them with a much nobler kind of arguments, equally convincing to all candid and upright minds, which might soon be set in a very strong and easy light. And accordingly they insisted upon these.—They asserted, that God, having sent Christ into the world to be a divine teacher, raised him from the dead, after he had been cruelly slain by wicked and incorrigible men; that, quickly after this, he received him into heaven, from whence he had sent down upon them an extraordinary divine influence, to instruct them in the truth, and to enable them to preach it to the world in a very convincing manner: in consequence of which men were no longer under the necessity of investigating divine truths by the slow progress of philosophical argumentation; but were to come, with humble simplicity of soul, to hear and receive what God by them taught concerning himself, and his Son, and the way of obtaining final and eternal happiness

They never expected that so important and comprehensive an assertion should be taken on the credit of their own word; but to show, that God was indeed with them, and that he himself taught mankind by them, they wrought such miracles as sensibly demonstrated his extraordinary presence and agency. And that this might appear a scheme long since formed in the divine mind, and intimated to men long before it opened upon them, they produced passages in the ancient and sacred books of the Jews, in which their prophets had plainly described this Jesus as the Messiah, and marked out various particulars, which had an evident accomplishment in him; waving many other predictions, which could not so easily be ascertained and illustrated at that time, though future ages and occurrences have made them very considerable to us.—The apostles also urged, or frequently referred to, the excellent tendency of their doctrine to promote real virtue and goodness in the world, and the happy influence it had on those who sincerely entertained it, which made the acceptance or rejection of it a test of characters; as they often intimate, and sometimes expressly assert, that it was.* And from all these things, which were plain and evident, they most rationally inferred the obligation which their hearers were under, to submit themselves to those doctrines, laws, and institutions of Christ, which they, as his authorized messengers, brought them, and to adhere to his cause whatever it might cost them. And all this they confirmed by communicating to great numbers of their new converts different gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost, that produced sensible effects; which might also tend to convince others, that the doctrine they had received was supernatural and divine.

These particulars constituted what one may call the apostolic demonstration; and they allowed their hearers a competent time to examine it. It is true indeed, the time and labour of these holy men were of too great importance to permit them to make a long stay in places, where the inhabitants would not so much as receive them, nor give them a hearing, nor would the mild and peaceful genius of their religion allow them to endeavour, even by miracle, to force their continuance in any place, from which the magistrates and people joined to expel them. In cases of this nature alone, they were directed to quit them, with that striking circumstance, which you so much misrepresent, of shaking off the dust of their feet, in token of their looking on such despisers as devoted to certain destruction. But yet in other places, where any of their hearers desired their stay, and the rulers permitted it, they abode awhile with them; and if we may judge of the conduct of others by that of the apostle Paul, who seems one of the most active and itinerant of them all, that stay sometimes extended to months, and sometimes to years. During this time they were, so far as we can learn by the New Testament, willing to dispute publicly with all opposers, and to answer any objections which could be urged against the truth of their doctrine, and the authority of their mission, whether by Jews or Gentiles. And if, which we have no reason to imagine a common case, they sometimes cut short the debate, by inflicting on perverse opponents miraculous judgments, those punishments carried a rational conviction of the authority of the apostles: but I recollect no instance of a miracle of this kind on such an occasion, but that of Elymas the Jewish sorcerer, who probably opposed the gospel, either by lying wonders, or by misrepresentations of the Old Testament, of which a Roman governor could not easily judge: on either of which suppositions, there would be a remarkable propriety in this extraordinary step; in which instance, by the way, great gentleness was intermixed with the apparent severity, as it was only for a season he was deprived of his sight.

If in cases and with proofs like these, thousands were converted at a single lecture, as you express it, it is certainly to be ascribed to the validity of their arguments, in concurrence with the operation of God's Spirit, to subdue their prejudices, and make them willing, cordially to embrace, and courageously to confess, the truth; of which, many who did not profess it, were no doubt in their consciences inwardly convinced. Yet I cannot think after all, that its success on the day of Pentecost, where so many peculiar circumstances concurred, is to be looked upon as a specimen of the rapidity with which it commonly prevailed.

This, Sir, appears to me a just representation of the case: that which you have been pleased to make, in the pages last referred to, is very different; and I apprehend, it will be easy to show, there are two material errors which attend it. It supposes the case to be determined much more difficult than it really was, and the assent universally required much more immediate. And as these two palpable fallacies run through several other passages of your book, I must take the liberty to examine them a little more particularly.

You represent the question concerning the truth of Christianity, as taught by the apostles, to have been much more difficult than it really was. "Eternal relations, moral differences of things, and a precise delineation of the religion of nature and its obligations, were all" not only material, but (as you say in p. 42) "indispensable, articles to be treated of in the way, and inculcated as the foundation of such a superstructure." Now here I would first ob-

* Compare Rom. i. 16—18. v. 12—20. viii. 3. xi. 22. xv. 4. 1 Cor. x. 11. 2 Cor. iii. 12. iv. 2. Gal. iv. 19. 1 Pet. i. 10—12. v. 12. 2 Pet. i. 19—21. 1 John ii. 11. iii. 10. iv. 16. 1 Thess. i. 4—10. v. 5. 2 Thess. ii. 10. 1 Tim. i. 11. vi. 3—11. 1 Pet. i. 11. 2 Pet. i. 3—11. 1 John i. 1—3. ii. 7. iii. 2. 3. 14. 23. iv. 2. 20. 21. v. 1—5. 10. 13. 2 John 9. 3 John 4.

serve, that so far as the Jews were concerned in this matter, a great part of these preliminary controversies was quite superseded. They already believed, that there was one God, the supreme Lord of all, whose law required universal virtue, and had denounced an awful curse against every instance of wilful and presumptuous disobedience: they likewise believed, that in various preceding ages this God had raised up prophets, with miraculous powers, first to introduce, and afterwards to confirm, the religion which they professed: and they were also fully persuaded, that the Messiah was to appear about that time, to establish the cause of God and of righteousness in the world. To such the apostles presented themselves as messengers from the God of their fathers; turned them to passages of their own sacred books, in which the sufferings as well as the triumphs of the Messiah were evidently foretold; and showed them, by the account they gave of Christ, confirmed by the miracles which they wrought in his name, that they must submit to his authority, on the very same principles on which that of Moses was acknowledged by them; and that they must hearken to him, or, according to the testimony of Moses himself, must expect to be cut off from among the people.

Where idolatrous Gentiles were to be addressed to, there was indeed a great difficulty; yet it was by no means equal to what you, Sir, would represent. Bad as they were, they had not lost all distinction between virtue and vice, nor all notion of a supreme Governor of the world. The popular religion received among them was so flagrantly absurd, as to admit of being easily exposed. And when they heard that those vices, which, contrary to the light of their own consciences, they indulged themselves in, exposed them to the divine displeasure; and saw such sensible proofs of his presence and power, as the miracles of the apostles afforded, proofs so unparalleled and so striking; that principle of conscience which God had implanted in their natures, and to which their own writers bear an abundant testimony, would probably be alarmed: and there could be no need of a long deduction of philosophical arguments to convince those of them, who had not imbibed philosophical prejudices, or were not incorrigibly hardened in their immoralities, that such kind of teachers deserved to be attentively heard. They would evidently see, that God was with them, a God far superior to, and quite different from, those indolent inactive deities which they had been taught to adore. And it needs no great labour to convince a man's understanding, that when the Lord of nature speaks, he should hear and obey.* In consequence of this, as soon as the Gentiles heard one discourse of the apostles, and as soon as they saw a single miracle, or heard the probable report of it, they had reason to pause, and to set themselves seriously to inquire into this new doctrine: and if they did so, then supposing as we must here suppose, that facts were as the New Testament represents, it is impossible but they must have stronger reasons to receive the gospel, than they could have to reject it. Ignorant as they were of the true principles of natural religion, they could not be able at first to discern the force of that argument for the truth of Christianity, which arises from its agreement with those principles: but that it was proposed and attested by him, who evidently appeared to be the great Sovereign of the world, they might immediately see, by those instances, in which the stable laws of nature were controlled in subserviency to it. And they must also see, as soon as they heard the plan, that it was admirably calculated, by strong motives before entirely unknown, to make men honest, benevolent, and temperate: virtues, which have always been esteemed among heathens, how little soever they have been practised. And having embraced it, they would come to have juster and more extensive notions of the beauty and glory of its internal evidences, as their experimental acquaintance with it increased, and their understandings improved with their graces.

Thus, I hope, may make it evident, that it was not so difficult a thing, as you suppose, for those to whom the apostles addressed, to enter into some rational proofs of Christianity. I must now add, that the assent which these divine teachers demanded, was not so immediate as you represent it to have been. You say indeed, "There were no concessions of time for doubt or deliberation; one declaration of the terms of the covenant was often thought sufficient; the least standing-off gave up the unbeliever to reprobation;—they must comply without the least hesitation;" and the like. (P. 38, 39.) Now I own, that if frequent positive assertions could pass for proofs, the point would be clearly demonstrated on your side of the question. But I think, the whole history of the Acts, and many things in the Epistles, lead us to consider the matter in a very different light.

The man indeed, who, on viewing such credentials as I have mentioned, and hearing so much of the gospel as in one hour he might learn, should in the force of preconceived prejudices, whether speculative or practical, refuse to give it any further consideration, and, as some of the wits of Athens did, answer merely with scorn and ridicule, might justly be left to perish in his delusions. And if this were the case universally in any city or town into which the apostles came, (which one would hope it seldom was,) the apostles must of course leave them, and not force themselves on those who rejected their pretensions with disdain. But if others received them, they generally (as I observed before) made some stay at a place; and as they continued to teach and dispute publicly, those who at first derided, might if they pleased hear them again and again: and I can see no argument to prove, that any degree of contempt or opposition, with which any of them had at first rejected the gospel, would seal them up under reprobation, if they afterwards came to a better temper.

* Dr. Stebbing, in his late sermon before the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, has especially considered the miracles of the Apostles as an application before their hearers, to conduct the apprehend God and dislike [illegible] wisdom. And it is certain they did [illegible]

If these very men, as well as any others, expressed a desire of being further instructed; if they urged their remaining doubts, not as with a proud disposition to cavil and insult, but as persons that desired further rational satisfaction, that they might act as in the sight of God, and as answerable to him in a point of so great importance; and if they attended these inquiries with prayers for further divine illumination, which both the principles of the Jewish revelation, and of natural religion, might easily have taught them; light would gradually break in upon their minds, and they would know, if they followed on to know the Lord. I challenge you, Sir, to produce any one line in the New Testament, that intimates the apostles would discourage such persons as these; on the contrary, that humanity and gentleness, that meekness and humility, which every where appear in their conduct and writings, and for which they so justly celebrate their great Master, would no doubt teach them to treat such inquirers tenderly and kindly, and to cherish them as hopeful persons, who were not far from the kingdom of God. A little time would probably lead a candid upright mind through its difficulties, amidst so many shining evidences, which must impress and convince, in proportion to the attention with which they were viewed. And if the public concern of the churches did require the apostles, as they possibly might, to quit such modest and humble inquirers as these, before they arrived at full satisfaction; they would, in every place where they had planted a Christian church, leave persons behind them, furnished with miraculous gifts, who might build on the foundation they had laid, and complete the work which they had begun, in such honest and teachable souls.

There might indeed be a third sort of persons, whose state was a medium between that of these, and of the scorners we mentioned before: I mean, such as were indolent about the matter; neither positively persuaded that Christianity was false, nor quite convinced that it was true, nor solicitous to bring their doubts to an issue; but concluding, that whether it were true or false, they might find out a path to happiness without it. This was probably the case of many of them, as it undoubtedly is the case of many in our days. Now such as these were not to be looked upon as fair inquirers, but as triflers in the most serious of all affairs; and as acting the most absurd and inconsistent part: for as Christianity pretended to be a matter of the utmost importance, in neglecting it they acted as if it were assuredly false, while yet they confessed that they knew not but it might be true. A conduct, which was rendered especially inexcusable by that grand apparatus, with which Providence interposed to introduce it, which if it proved any thing at all concerning it, must prove it to be of infinite moment. Persons of the sceptical turn, which you know, Sir, to have been very common among the ancients, might perhaps sometimes amuse themselves with proposing their doubts to Christian teachers, as they came in their way; but it is not to be wondered, if they lived and died in this wavering state, which was indeed a state of folly and of vice, and no doubt ended accordingly. But I cannot find a line in the New Testament, which should lead one to suspect, that they would ever have it to plead before the tribunal of God, that they were condemned for rejecting the gospel, before they had time to look into its proofs, though honestly and seriously disposed to have done it.

I have in the whole course of this argument mentioned miracles, as awakening and convincing proofs of a divine mission, without any particular regard to what you have insinuated to the contrary. (P. 46—50.) But now, Sir, I shall give it such a notice as I think it requires; which will be the less, as you seem to lay but very little stress on it yourself, and write, so far as I can judge by what follows, in a consciousness of the weakness of your own objections. You say, "they were not meant as arguments, but were natural effects of gospel benevolence;—and plead their being used by impostors;—that care was often taken to keep them private;—and that the seeking them was discouraged." All which you would seem to think inconsistent with their being proofs, especially important proofs, of the truth of the revelation. The New Testament, that grand magazine of weapons for the defence of Christianity, furnishes me with such easy answers to all these suggestions, that my only fear is, lest the reader should be wearied with the illustration of things in themselves so plain, as what I have to advance in direct contradiction to all these insinuations of yours.

That the miracles which Christ and his apostles performed, were really intended by him and them, as proofs of a divine mission, is so plain from the appeals made to them, and the stress laid upon them, that it would be quite superfluous to dilate upon it here, especially after what Bishop Fleetwood, Dr. Chapman, and Mr. Chandler have so judiciously urged on this head. Nor need any reader who has not had the pleasure of an acquaintance with those learned and accurate writers, go any further than the texts I have thrown into the margin to prove it beyond debate.* So that the tendency of your remaining objection must be only to show the argument, which Christ and his apostles most largely insisted upon, to be inconclusive, and the stress laid on it unreasonable. How far the prosecution of this design is consistent with the warm zeal you profess for the gospel, it is not worth while particularly to urge. I cannot see what its greatest enemy could say, more directly tending to subvert it.

You assert, in a manner which I confess surprises me, "that miracles were but the natural effect of their doctrine, instead of any supernatural proof of its veracity." (P. 47.) I acknowledge myself quite at a loss to find out the sense of this extraordinary passage. By a miracle we generally mean a supernatural event: now I cannot conceive, how this should be in any case the natural effect of any doctrine, be it ever so divine, or ever so important. But if there were a doctrine, whose natural effect it was, to endow its professors or teachers with a power of performing such operations as Christ and his apostles did, it would surely be a proof of its veracity convincing beyond all dispute or comparison. However, we know not of any such doctrine; nor can we conceive of any necessary connexion between the knowledge of truth, and a power of such performances. I suppose therefore your meaning must be, that when a person was endowed with these miraculous powers, the exertion of them would be what so benevolent a religion as Christianity would naturally prompt him to, even though he should not intend by it to demonstrate the truth of that doctrine. But when the passage above is thus explained, which I can but guess to be your meaning in it, I would entreat you to show us what inconsistency there is between these two views, that you have so strangely opposed to each other. Would it not be a glorious proof of a divine mission, that God gave to Christ and his apostles a power of exercising their benevolence in so extraordinary a manner! Would not miracles of a benevolent kind appear the most congruous proofs of so benevolent a scheme? And would not miracles intended as proofs of a divine mission be equally an exercise of benevolence: may indeed, would they not be much more eminently so, than if no reference to that mission had been intended? Surely an unprejudiced mind must see the view you are guarding against, to be the crown and glory of the whole. By curing a painful and dangerous disease, by opening the eyes of the blind, and the like, to lead the afflicted creature into the way of truth and duty, and so into salvation; and by his means to instruct every spectator, every one who heard the credible attestation of the fact, must enhance the benefit beyond all expression; extending it to a far greater variety of subjects, and, if it were duly improved, producing in each a far superior degree of happiness, than the cure alone could afford to the person who was the subject of it.

That Christ took care to conceal some of his miracles, is indeed apparent; which, to be sure, was to avoid ostentation, and to prevent the people from rising tumultuously in his favour: and that he silenced the devils who bore witness to him, was an evident instance of his wisdom, to cut off every colour for the malicious and blasphemous charge advanced against him as a confederate with them. But you well know, that many of our Lord's miracles were wrought in a most public manner; some in the streets of Jerusalem, and many more before vast multitudes who were crowding around him, in the fields, and the mountains. This is notorious. And give me leave, Sir, seriously to express my astonishment, how you could venture to say, in the face of such obvious evidence to the contrary, "that our Lord was always remarkably on the reserve in this respect, whenever he happened to be among unbelieving company." (P. 48.) A known falsehood, liable to conviction in the eyes of the whole world, is what I am very unwilling to charge upon a gentleman and a scholar, though ever so unacquainted with his person and character. I will therefore impute this, and some other passages of this kind, to mere inattention and forgetfulness. But permit me, Sir, to say, that you ought to have read the New Testament with more accuracy, and to have fixed the contents of it more deeply in your mind, before you had thrown out so many public reflections upon it. How must it surprise and pain you, to be told from thence, and to see how plainly it is there asserted, that our Lord not only cast out devils before the Pharisees, who charged him as a confederate of Beelzebub with that very miracle before their eyes; but likewise, that the paralytic was healed in Capernaum, while there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, who were come out of every town of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem, when the power of the Lord was also present to heal several more, and the crowd was so great, that the friends of the paralytic were obliged to take a very peculiar method to get him laid before Jesus! How you could fail to know this, or knowing could forget it, is strange: as also, how it could have escaped your notice or memory, that

* John v. 36, x. 24, 25, 37, 38, xiv. 11, xv. 24. Mark ii. 10, xvi. 20. Matt. xi. 4, 5, 20, 21. Acts ii. 22, x. 38, xiv. 3. Heb. ii. 4.

Lazarus was raised before a great multitude of people, some of which were the friends of the chief priests and Pharisees: or that a few days before our Lord's death, when it was no longer necessary to use such precautions as he had formerly done, the blind and the lame came to him in the temple, and he healed them; and the chief priests and scribes saw the wonderful things that he did.

But to dismiss a head on which I could not have wished that you should have given me such advantages, I must just touch upon your other objection against the validity of the argument from miracles, taken from Christ's rebuking those that sought them. In some circumstances, it is evident that he did: but all that we can infer from hence is, that there were some circumstances, in which they were unreasonably demanded. Thus for instance, when he had in the presence of multitudes, (who are, by the way, expressly distinguished from his disciples,) healed the lame, the blind, the dumb, and the maimed, and many others, who had been cast down at his feet; and after that, had fed four thousand, with seven loaves, and a few small fishes: we are immediately told that the Pharisees and Sadducees came tempting him, and demanded that he should show them a sign from heaven; thereby insolently taking upon them to prescribe to God himself, what kind of miracles they would have wrought for their conviction. On this he very justly called them a wicked and adulterous generation, and referred them (with greater propriety than most commentators have been aware) to the grand miracle of his resurrection, which was attended with a most illustrious sign from heaven; the descent of an angel, in the sight of the Roman soldiers, who guarded the sepulchre: which they themselves testified to the Jewish rulers, and perhaps to some of these very persons who now presumed on so unreasonable a demand.—He elsewhere blames those, who would not believe unless they saw signs and wonders; that is, who would not yield to the most credible testimony of others, though the witnesses were ever so numerous and worthy of belief, unless they had that of their own senses added to the rest.—It is very probable, some very indecent things had been said by his enemies while questioning with his disciples, to occasion such a severe expostulation as that, O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? We cannot suppose, from the known candour of our Lord's character, that this was said without some peculiar reason; and as the words refer to much condescension and long-suffering formerly used, in giving them much ampler satisfaction than they could strictly have demanded, so we see, that whatever insulting airs any of his enemies might have put on, when they found his disciples baffled by so stubborn a dæmon, Jesus rebuked him with an air of irresistible authority, and immediately cured the child in their presence, and that of all the multitude.

Now, when these facts are set in this just and easy light, I leave it, Sir, to your invention, fertile as it seems, to show how it follows as a conclusion from these premises, that our Lord judged miracles not to be proper proofs of a divine mission, and did not perform his miracles as such proofs. I shall only add, that as God never intended every individual person should be an eye-witness to miraculous operations, it seems an amiable instance of wisdom and goodness in such cases as these we have examined, as well as in that of Thomas, to check the petulancy of such, as in those days would not yield to any testimony, but that of their own senses, on such an occasion.

All that remains to be examined under this class of objections, is "what you say concerning the possibility of miracles being used by impostors." (P. 46.) This is indeed an important topic, and has been handled with that accuracy which it deserves by those who have professedly written upon it. Some persons of great eminence in the learned and Christian world have so very lately examined it, that it is quite unnecessary for me to resume the controversy here: and you touch but slightly upon it, conscious as it seems, that after what they have said, it deserves little stress. I shall, therefore, answer, in almost as few lines as your own, only saying,—that I see no reason to believe, that the phrase "lying wonders" in Scripture signifies, as you in your objections suppose, true miracles to confirm a lie;—and that the patrons of Christianity challenge all its enemies to produce any instance of miracles wrought expressly to confirm a falsehood, which have not been immediately, and on the very spot, opposed by superior miracles on the side of truth; and these attended with such visible degrees of superiority, as to render the triumph of truth more sensible, and more illustrious, than, in those instances, it could have been without such opposition.

What follows in your 51st page, concerning the degree in which antiquity impairs the weight of miracles said to have been wrought many ages ago, has in part been obviated already; and has been so often urged by the enemies of revelation, and so largely considered by its learned defenders, that I think myself fairly dispensed with from insisting further upon it here. I shall only add, that it must be a sensible pleasure to those that wish well to Christianity, to see its opposers reduced to the wretched necessity of attacking it with such arguments, as, if they will prove any thing against it, will also prove that we can have no rational evidence of any thing that was done before we were born; or indeed of any thing which we have not seen with our own eyes: an absurdity, which I suppose no man living can practise upon his own understanding, so far as deliberately to admit it, though infidelity can sometimes remove its mountains, and bury them in the depths of the sea.

But there is another very different medium, by which you endeavour to prove that Christianity is not founded on argument, i. e. that we are not to expect rational proof of it; which will require a larger and more particular discussion: I mean, "that we are required to believe it on so high a penalty." It seems, methinks, at the first proposal, that this medium is of a very extraordinary nature. One would imagine the argument lay the contrary way: that if God required our assent to it on pain of eternal ruin and condemnation, he must have made the evidences of it very clear and strong, and such as every upright mind must be able to see the force of, on a diligent inquiry, which such minds will not fail to make. However you, Sir, are pleased to insist upon it in a contrary light, and to argue from it, that something more convincing than any argument, even an immediate revelation, must be necessary to justify such a demand.

The terms in which you urge this consideration are so triumphant, that they rise even to insult. "With what regard, with what patience rather, can one," who expects reason for his faith, "be supposed to attend to questions propounded to him, under the restraints of threats and authority? to be talked to of danger in his decisions, and have the rod held out with the lesson? to have propositions tendered to his reason with penalties annexed?—He disdains, with all justice, an attempt equally weak and unjust, of frighting him into a compliance out of his power." (P. 8, 9.) It would be tedious to repeat a great deal more which you say in the same strain; in which I heartily wish, that the ignorance which you seem to discover in the state of the question, may another day be allowed as some excuse for the rashness and arrogance of the language in which you treat it; which will not universally pass for demonstration, though some may be weak enough to be carried away with the torrent.

I know indeed, that the sentence which the gospel pronounces against unbelievers has been thought by many a considerable objection against the Christian scheme; on which account I the rather take this opportunity of opening my sentiments upon it, especially as I apprehend it has often, on one side or the other, been set in a very wrong point of light.

Now here I shall not attempt to solve the supposed difficulty by pleading, that the denunciation only refers to the case of those, who should refuse to admit the testimony of the apostles, confirmed by miraculous works of which they were themselves eye-witnesses. The answer would not be allowed by you, since your objection lies against the demand in any circumstance of evidence: nor do I indeed think the foundation of the solution just and true; since whatever reference one text in question* might have to the testimony immediately borne by the apostles, there are many others which cannot be so evaded. I therefore encounter the objection in all its force, allowing that every one who finally rejects Christianity is in a state of condemnation, and that there remains for him only a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries.† But I conclude, on the principles of common equity, that this only extends to those who have capacities and opportunities of inquiring into its evidences; since ignorance absolutely unavoidable is a plea so considerable, that it must have its weight before a wise and righteous God. In the instance of idiocy and lunacy, all the world allows it; and as the only reason of that seems to be, that ignorance is then unavoidable, wherever it is so, it must certainly, on the like principles, be allowed. But with these limitations I freely declare, that the sentence which the gospel passes on unbelievers, is so far from appearing any objection against Christianity, that I apprehend it greatly increases its internal evidence, when taken in conjunction with the rest of the scheme; though considered alone, it would to be sure be very absurd, to pretend it to be any proof at all.

For the illustration of this, I must first remove one mistake, which seems to me a source of perpetual confusion on this head, and on which most of the confident things which you have ventured to say on this awful subject depend, and with which they fall to the ground; I mean, that an assent to the truth of Christianity is the main thing intended by the word faith, and required under so high a penalty. On the contrary, nothing is more evident to me, than that (as I have largely shown elsewhere,) faith in such passages of the New Testament as are here in question is considered as a practical thing, which includes in it, what the word exactly expresses, an act of trust, or committing the soul to Christ, to be, under his influence and care, formed for happiness, and conducted to it, according to the method of salvation exhibited in the gospel.

It is true, indeed, a persuasion of the speculative truth of Christianity must be the foundation of such a faith, but it is far from being the only, or indeed the primary, property of it; nor is it that, which is chiefly referred to in these passages in question. I readily agree with you, that such an assent of the understanding, simply considered, could not, without great absurdity, have been demanded under so high a penalty, or indeed under any penalty at all.

* Mark xvi. 16. † Heb. x. 26, 27.

and this is all that your arguments and defiances amount to. But if provision be made, that (excepting as above, all to whom the gospel comes, shall on due consideration see irresistible evidence to determine that assent, they may justly be threatened with fatal consequences as unbelievers, whether that speculative assent be or be not produced. Since it will appear, on that supposition, they have either on the one hand, notwithstanding fair and solemn warning, criminally omitted taking those measures which would infallibly and necessarily have produced a conviction of the truth; or on the other hand, being convinced of it, have acted contrary to what they knew in their own consciences that reason and duty required.

Taking the matter in this view, it may perhaps seem so clear, that some of my readers may wonder I should pursue it any further: yet as you lay so great a stress on this supposed difficulty, and as so many other persons have seemed shocked with it, and some, (as I have been informed,) have carried it so far as to reject Christianity, because they were threatened with damnation if they did not believe it, I will more particularly open to you that view of things, which convinces me that these damnatory sentences increase, rather than weaken, the internal evidence of that gospel to which they are annexed. And here I shall more particularly show, first,—that there is not in the general any absurdity, in supposing such a sentence may attend a revelation from God; and then,—that there is a peculiar propriety in it, when connected with such a sort of revelation as Christianity in other respects appears to be.

For the illustration of the first of these, I would desire you, Sir, calmly to consider, whether it be in the nature of things absolutely impossible, that an infinitely wise God should contrive such evidence of the truth of a revelation, as should be sufficient to convince every honest inquirer, who is capable of exercising reason in the common affairs of life; and such only as are here in question. Can a mathematician invent a demonstration, which almost every one of a common genius shall with due application infallibly understand; and cannot the great Former of the human spirit find out a way of effecting the like, by a proof of another kind? Or if no one argument which omniscience could furnish out, can have such a universal effect, (which I think it would be great petulancy and folly to assert,) could not this wise and glorious Being exhibit a complication of arguments so adjusted, that some one of them at least should be suited to strike every such inquirer, and to convince him? Nay, to bring the matter yet lower, when a strong complication of various arguments is provided, it is absolutely impossible, that an all-comprehending mind should contrive a scheme of providence, in consequence of which every sincere and honest inquirer should, either by some external occurrence, (as meeting with a book, or friend, in some critical moment of doubt or danger,) or by some inward impression, (his thoughts being fixed and guided, as it seems to him, in a natural way, and without any particular revelation,) be led into such views of the evidence as shall engage his assent; while at the same time a mind under the strong force of vicious prejudices, shall be left to harden itself against opening proofs, to turn away from the increasing light, and to aggravate trifling objections, till it utterly rejects a most salutary scheme. I ask you, Sir, and I ask every reader, whether you, or he, will venture so to limit an all-wise and almighty Being, as to say, that it is absolutely impossible he should adjust matters, as on any one of the three former suppositions? But if you cannot say, and prove it to be so, then be pleased with me to reflect on the consequence of supposing any one of these to be a possible case.

On such a supposition, I would ask you, whether it would not be just with God to condemn those who should reject a revelation attended with evidence so adjusted and supported? that is, on this hypothesis, to condemn those who through vicious prejudices should refuse an upright and candid inquiry into the truth, and perhaps into the evidence of it, attended with some circumstances which tend powerfully to strike the mind, and awaken examination and attention? I see not, how the justice of this could be denied on any principle, which will not infer, that God cannot punish any vice of a sinner's mind, or any irregularity of his life, and will consequently overthrow natural religion.

Let us then imagine, in hypothesis at least, (since it appears no impossibility,) the evidence adjusted as above, and the resolution of punishing the infidel formed; I would further ask, whether in such a circumstance it was, or could be, unworthy the divine Being to declare such a purpose and resolution? Some valuable ends, which might be answered by such a declaration, are obvious enough. It could not indeed convince any man's understanding, that the doctrine so enforced was true; and I do not know that any one was ever weak enough to pretend it: but it might in some degree awaken the attention of an inquirer; since though he could not believe the threatening till he discerned the evidence of that revelation of which it makes a part, yet he would easily see, that if it should indeed prove true, it must be a truth of vast importance; and would also see, that whatever degrees of probability appeared to be in its favour when first proposed, there must be equal degrees of probability that he would be miserable in consequence of rejecting it. Besides, this declaration might excite the persons employed to publish the revelation of which it made a part, to act with greater ardour and spirit, and to suffer with greater courage and resolution, when they knew that the happiness of mankind was so intimately concerned in it. It might also awaken in all who embraced this revelation, a concern to keep it pure and unmingled with any thing, which by a wrong association of ideas might occasion a prejudice against it, whether from the absurdity of its supposed doctrines, or the immorality of those who received and maintained it; since such prejudices might prove so fatal. Now each of these appears to me a very important end, of which many objectors against this part of Christianity seem to be very little apprized.*

On the other hand, Sir, if no such threatenings were annexed, and the purpose of God to execute his deserved pleasure on the rejecters of this revelation should at length take place, would not the unhappy creature have room to make some such reflection as this, when he was plunging into a final destruction? "Why was I not admonished of the danger of unbelief in such a case as this? When so many other things were declared, and so many other messages sent, why was not this one article added, by the messengers who brought the rest?" Now though conscience might tell such a wretch, that every vicious prejudice was penal, and that if mercy were indeed offered and slighted, the consequence must be dangerous and fatal; yet it seems congruous to the divine wisdom and goodness, to foreclose such a plea as this, even in the mouth of a perishing sinner.

On this view I hope it will appear not incredible in hypothesis and speculation, that a revelation might come from God, the evidence of which should be so adjusted, that all who have an opportunity of examining into it might be required to receive and submit to it, on pain of God's highest displeasure; though you, Sir, have been pleased to paint this as a supposition in itself flagrantly absurd. Nay, I apprehend, it must follow from these principles, that the very supposition of a revelation in general implies, on the one hand, sufficiency of evidence to every candid inquirer; and on the other, certain divine displeasure against the rejecters of it, which if not expressly declared, will at least be implied.

But how far this is from a real absurdity, may further appear by viewing the matter in an opposite light. Let me imagine, a man should profess to bring me a divine revelation with great solemnity; and yet at the same time should declare, that I might reject it without any danger. I know not how others might judge, but I am sure this would appear to me so incoherent, that I should hardly give myself the trouble of inquiring into his credentials, unless some very striking circumstance appeared at the first view. For it would be natural to conclude, it may be true, or it may be false. And if it be true, by the confession of the messenger I have no great concern in it; I may be happy without paying any regard to it. It is therefore comparatively a trifling concern, and by consequence so much less likely to be the subject of a divine interposition.

Take it therefore in any light, and it appears to me, that an obligation on some high penalty to inquire into credentials, and by consequence to receive and obey the command, is in the nature and reason of things to be supposed as the counterpart of the honour of receiving a message from God; and, as the law speaks, the end runs where it comes to a man, (if I may be allowed the expression,) with this awful encumbrance, "He must expect it at his peril." And agreeably to this remark, we always find, so far as I can recollect, through the whole series of the Old Testament, that where the message sent from God was disregarded, some signal punishment was inflicted on the person to whom it was addressed, which I mention, not as arguing from it, but as a circumstance illustrating in one view the threatenings above, and in another receiving illustration from them.

These, Sir, are the principles, on which I said above, that threatenings against those who should disbelieve and reject a revelation in question, are so far from being any arguments against its being reasonable and divine, as some have vainly pretended, that on the contrary, they are so suitable

* Agreeable to what I have said above, of the various use of such threatenings, it may be observed, that many of those passages of the New Testament which express the divine purpose of punishing the rejecters of Christianity, are not immediately addressed to unbelievers, (from whom they are at other times, as was very reasonable, solemnly warned;) but to those who were to be preachers of the gospel, whom therefore if any such read this passage, I presume will endeavour in the bowels of Christ seriously to consider them. Thus it is a fearful charge to the twelve apostles, (Matt. x. 15.) and to the seventy disciples, (Luke x. 12.) that our Lord represents to believers as entirely as would be so dreadful a destruction, that it should be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for them. And it was to the apostles also, that, when risen from the dead, he says, that after remission to go and preach the gospel to every creature, (Mark xvi. 16.) He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved, but HE THAT IS UNBELIEVER NOT, SHALL BE DAMNED. Many passages of the same purport in the Epistles, are addressed to Christians as themselves in danger from their awakening their utmost attention to the case of those wretched creatures who were in so extreme danger. Compare 2 Thess. i. 7—9. 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26. and Jude ver. 23.

I must also take the liberty to add, that there appears to me a very beautiful propriety in the manner of our Lord's expressing several of these denunciations, which is not in a direct but an oblique form; which particularly became that gracious Messenger of the most free love, who sought the world, not to condemn, but to save it. Thus the awful doom of Capernaum and Bethsaida is addressed to Christ, not when speaking to them, but when distant from them, in the form of a lamentation over them. Matt. xi. 20—24. So likewise is Jerusalem lamented over, as abandoned to destruction for the murderous and perverse unbelief, over which Christ was at the same time weeping. Luke xix. 41, &c. and other words, when such expressions, and the like, as from mount Olivet, Luke xxiii. 42. "Now that all these things were to be predicted in broken language, and with a flow of tears, expressing on the one hand the benevolence of our Lord's temper, and engaged him to mourn over the direful consequences which sinners could bring on themselves; and on the other, the inevitable certainty and unutterable terror of that destruction which was coming upon them. It is one instance among a thousand, of that great wisdom which runs through all our Lord's behaviour, and appears in almost every thing, that his cause should meet with no unnecessary prejudice among many who set up for critics in the Christian writings, and be favoured with the decorum, and the beauty, of a dress. I have known a reserved hearer touched, and even charmed, with the tenderness which a faithful friend shown in passing a capital sentence upon him: and I wonder it should not be the case here.

to a wisely-concerted scheme, that the omission of them would rather be an objection against a pretended revelation, than any argument in its favour.

I shall beg leave, Sir, to detain you a little longer on this head, while I attempt to show that these reasonings, which appear of general force, have a peculiar and singular weight when applied to Christianity: which will appear from considering the degrees of evidence to which it pretends, and several other circumstances attending the scheme itself, and the manner in which it was introduced into the world.

I have discoursed at large already on the kind of evidence with which Christianity was attended, during the ministry of Christ and his apostles, and have referred to several passages in which the rejection of it is charged on such vicious prejudices, as must render men highly criminal before God; and some other passages to the same purpose may be seen in the margin.* I shall only add here, that I apprehend, our blessed Lord (who said nothing in vain, and in whose short sentences there is often a weight far beyond what the generality of his enemies, or his followers, have considered) seems expressly to have asserted the most extraordinary of all the suppositions made above to be fact; I mean, that of a divine superintendency over every well disposed mind, to lead it into the evidences of the truth of his doctrine. And this, you will observe, he hath spoken in terms suiting not only the period of his own, or the apostles' ministry, but future ages too. You will perhaps, from this general hint, recollect that important passage;† If any man will do his will, i. e. the will of my Father, εαν τις θελη ποιειν, "if he be resolutely determined upon it," (as I have elsewhere observed the phrase plainly signifies,‡) he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself. And the prophet Isaiah seems long before to have represented the matter much in the same view, though, according to his manner, in more figurative terms; when he says, An high-way shall be there; and it shall be called the WAY OF HOLINESS;—the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein.

I might also show at large, if I were not afraid of running out this letter to too great a length, that not only those degrees of evidence to which Christianity pretends, but also several other circumstances attending the scheme itself, and the manner in which it was introduced into the world, render the threatenings annexed peculiarly suitable to it, beyond the degrees in which they might, on the principles above, have suited a revelation in these respects different from the gospel.

It is very material for the illustration of this point, to recollect that the Christian scheme supposes mankind under guilt, and obnoxious on account of it to misery, to dreadful final misery; and accordingly makes its proposals not only under the notion of a benefit, but of a remedy; of a remedy without which men were perishing. Now the necessary consequence of this must be the death and destruction of those who reject it. In this view the sacred writers with great propriety sometimes place it. God sent his Son into the world, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish; and therefore he that believeth not on him, is condemned already, because he hath not believed:—it plainly appears from his unbelief, that he is actually under sentence; and as it follows afterwards, The wrath of God, that wrath from which he might otherwise have been saved and rescued, abideth on him. And to this purpose Christ declares elsewhere, If you believe not that I am he, you shall die in your sins; shall perish with the guilt of all those transgressions on your heads, from which I was so sincerely willing to have delivered you.

The threatenings in question are also congruous to the importance of those blessings, which are offered to all who embrace and obey the gospel. These are well known in speculation; but were they duly considered, they would appear to have much greater weight than many are aware. A full pardon of all the most aggravated sins which the true penitent has ever committed; the communication of divine influences, to enable us to conquer the power of sin to which we were enslaved, and to fit us for happiness present and future; an admission into the family of God, and a participation of all the joys and privileges of his children; the reception of our separate spirits into the presence of God, and to the most glorious society, enjoyments, and services there; and at length, the resurrection of our bodies, and the eternal happiness of the whole man: such favours offered to condemned sinners by the offended Majesty of heaven and earth, must certainly have drawn after them severe punishments on the presumptuous creatures by whom they were slighted and despised, had they been notified and proposed by the meanest inhabitant of the celestial world, or even of our own, as an ambassador from God. But when to all this it is added, that a person so glorious, so excellent, and so divine, as the Son of God himself, his only-begotten Son, became the messenger of his Father's love and grace to us; and that he might testify it in a more effectual manner, became also, for many succeeding years, an inhabitant of our low world; and at length submitted to such extreme evils, even to death itself, to a death attended with such astonishing circumstances of ignominy and torture, for this great reason among others, that he might affect our minds with powerful sentiments of religious

* Acts xiii. 46. xviii. 6. Rom. ii. 8, 9. 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4. 1 Thess. ii. 14-16. 2 Thess. i. 6-9. ii. 10-12. Heb. iii. 7-14. vi. 7, 8. 1 John v. 10.

† John vii. 17.

‡ See Family Expositor, vol. ii. p. 47.

veneration, of gratitude, and love; who can wonder, if there be an awful counterpart to all these miracles of condescension and mercy? Who can wonder, if the contempt of such a gospel, so circumstantiated, and so sealed, be penal in proportion to the degree in which it is criminal? Can it possibly be imagined, that the Son of God should become incarnate, and bleed, and die; and that his Spirit should afterwards be sent down from heaven, with all that splendid apparatus of various languages instantaneously taught, and miraculous powers every where exerted; and all this to make way for a discovery, which those to whom it was sent might trample upon with impunity? that they might reject and deride it themselves, and perhaps make it almost the only serious business of their lives, to expose it to universal contempt; and yet, though living and dying impenitent, partake in the day of final retribution, with that Redeemer whom they have rejected and opposed, in the joys he will bestow on his faithful servants, and which he will share with them? This, Sir, is such a shocking incongruity even in hypothesis, that you yourself could not forbear exploding it; and I think you have done it with great propriety and spirit. (P. 45.) It is indeed as you represent it: The least intimation of mercy to the finally unbelieving and impenitent would have been a blemish on the whole scheme, and a kind of toleration for that neglect, which in such a case it would probably have met with in the world. Whereas it is now with the most becoming majesty, that such a dispensation of wonders terminates in a day, when this humbled and dishonoured Saviour shall appear in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of Jesus Christ; who shall therefore be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

Permit me only to touch on one consideration more, which illustrates the congruity of these denunciations, as a part of the gospel scheme; and that is, the difficulties through which that scheme was to struggle in its early infancy. It was wisely ordered by Providence for the establishment and edification of succeeding ages, that the first professors of Christianity should encounter great hardships and sufferings on account of it; and it would be easy to show, that a scheme calculated for universal reformation must expose to such trials, when it made its entrance into so degenerate a world. Now in this view there was an evident necessity, that the fear of him, who after he had killed could cast both soul and body into hell, should be opposed to the threats of cruel persecutors. It was necessary, that the danger of rejecting, deserting, or even dissembling, the faith, should be plainly and affectionately represented; otherwise men would have held themselves fairly dispensed with from inquiring and looking into a scheme, so likely to prove destructive to their fortunes, and even to their lives, in this world, and by its own confession, by no means necessary to avoid greater evils in another.

From all these reasonings it appears to me undeniably evident, that as some severe threatenings to those who reject it must probably in any case attend a divine revelation; so these threatenings are so evidently congruous to the peculiar nature, design, and circumstances of Christianity, that had they not made a part of it, the absence of them would have been a great diminution to its internal evidence, and probably an effectual bar to its propagation in the world.

I am sensible, Sir, the grand objection against all these reasonings is taken, from the appearance of a virtuous and amiable disposition in some who disbelieve the gospel, and from the possibility that a wrong association of ideas in others, leading them to conclude those things to be contained in the Christian revelation which do not indeed belong to it, may engage some to reject the whole from the apparent absurdity which they see in these spurious, though solemn, additions to it; as for instance, in those vast tracts of land, in which transubstantiation and image worship are represented, not merely as consistent with Christianity, but as in a manner essential to it, by those who are its established teachers, and may therefore be presumed best to understand it.

As for the latter of these cases, it must be considered how far the person so mistaken in the idea he has formed of Christianity has fallen into that mistake necessarily, and how far it may be charged on his own negligence or mismanagement. It is possible, that in some countries Christianity may be so misrepresented, and the common people may be so utterly incapable of coming at its true contents, that they may be looked upon as persons unavoidably ignorant of it; and consequently are not included in the number of those, whose case we are now considering. But if any may have recourse to the Scriptures, and will not give themselves the trouble of searching them, to see whether these supposed absurd doctrines are really contained in them, or no, they must stand by the consequences of their indolence and rashness: and I fear, the nobility and gentry in popish countries, (who are the persons among whom deism probably prevails most,) are generally in this case. Such might easily have discovered so much good in Christianity, and so many arguments in its favour, as might have proved it worth their while to have read over the New Testament again and again, with an honest desire of knowing what are indeed the doctrines and precepts contained in it. I question not, but such an employment would have been a much more rational and useful way of spending time, than what the persons in question have often preferred to it; and it is not so obscure, as to leave a candid reader in such a case capable of imagining it teaches, or requires, any thing absurd.

As for the supposed virtues of some who know the gospel and reject it, I fear, Sir, when they come to be tried by the great standard of true excellence in character, they will be found exceedingly deficient. Virtue is a word of a very dubious signification; and, as it is generally used, that man is denominated virtuous, who is temperate, just, and humane, in his conduct, be he never so destitute of religion. Now with regard to such persons it is evident, that a wise and righteous God will never treat them as if they had been debauched, unjust, and inhumane. Nevertheless, if such as these live without God in the world; if they cast off fear, and restrain prayer before God; if (which the very fact of their rejecting Christianity proves) they will not set themselves to inquire diligently and impartially into the intimations of the Divine Will; if they are unhumbled before God for the various transgressions of their lives, and so proudly conceited of their own reasonings, that they will set their preconceived opinions on particular subjects against all the weight of internal and external evidence attending the Christian revelation, when contradicting those opinions; I cannot see on what ground they can complain, if they be finally treated as persons, who, while they have reverenced men, have forgotten God. Nor can it be imagined, that, under the load of so much guilt, they will have any claim to future rewards, merely because they have had sense and good nature enough, to judge rightly concerning what would generally be the best interests and enjoyments of human life, even if there were no Deity; and so have chosen to live like men rather than brutes, so far as sobriety and mutual kindness are in question.

Had the best of men a suitable and continual sense of the majesty and purity of the divine nature, and of that love, duty, and zeal, which a reasonable creature owes to its Creator, they would, with all their human and social virtues about them, fall down into the dust before God, and say, Enter not into judgment with thy servants, for in thy sight shall no man living be justified! and they would feel a load of guilt pressing on their consciences, and engaging them most attentively to listen to a scheme by which free and full pardon might be expected, in a way most honourable to the rights of the divine government. And if no admonitions can bring those who are now insensible to such a temper, we can only lament, that their conviction is delayed to so late, and probably to so fatal, a day.

But if there be any where in a Christian and protestant nation, a man not yet thoroughly convinced of Christianity, who, on the principles of natural religion, reverences and loves the great Author of his being; who pours out his soul before him in the exercise of public and private devotion; who humbly traces every intimation of his will which he has already received, that he may yield a constant and uniform obedience to it; and seeks illumination from the great Father of lights for the further discovery of it: if there be a person, who though yet in the state of hesitation concerning the divine authority of the Scriptures, will diligently search them, not with a view to cavil and object, but honestly to see what is the genius and design of them, and will also read and consult the ablest defenders of Christianity, in order to gain a fuller information in its evidences; I will venture to pronounce, that such a man is not far from the kingdom of God, and doubt not, but that according to the declaration of our faithful Saviour, he will ere long know that the doctrine is of God. I cannot believe that such a one ever died an infidel; because I have abundantly stronger evidence that Christianity is true, than I have of the virtue of any one who died denying it. But you well know, Sir, that the generality of our deists are quite out of the present question, being most of them such as a Roman censor would not have borne in any of the highest ranks of their citizens, how eagerly soever any may plead for their admission into the New Jerusalem, the presence of God, and the mansions of the blessed.

Nevertheless, it is possible some may object with regard to the person whom we described above, as making so hopeful a progress towards embracing the gospel, what will he be the better after all, when it is embraced? What can the single circumstance of believing Christianity to be true effect towards recommending a man to the divine favour, who is already supposed not only temperate, just, and benevolent, but devout too? This is a question which I have sometimes heard advanced, though I do not recollect that you mention it; but I wonder it should enter into any mind, who knows what the faith which constitutes a man a real Christian is, according to the account given of it above, agreeable to the whole tenor of the New Testament: and, by the way, had you, Sir, considered that, you would have found very little room to triumph (as you do, p. 10.) in our being obliged to pray for its increase. Were it merely a speculative assent, your arguments on this head would be as conclusive as they are foreign to the Scripture idea of it; which is a cordial and practical acquiescence in the scheme of salvation by Christ. This, Sir, evidently includes in it a becoming affection towards the Son of God, that illustrious person, whom, venerable and amiable as he is, every infidel must necessarily neglect, and to whom, when once revealed, God may most reasonably require express homage, duty, and subjection, on pain of his highest displeasure. Faith also, in this view of it, will be the foundation of such deep humiliation before God, of such ardent love to him, and does, in one word, so illustriously ennoble and improve all the other branches of a lovely and virtuous disposition; that surely no one who has either felt its power, or even studied its nature and genuine influence, can long doubt to what purpose it is demanded and insisted upon. And he that has observed the effects it has produced, and the illustrious as well as numerous victories it has gained over the world, beyond what any other principle could ever obtain, would be unable to depreciate it, without greatly debasing the nature and extent of that moral virtue, which he pretends to exalt in preference to it; as I think it were easy to show at large, if the compass of this letter would admit it.

And thus, Sir, I have given you my deliberate thoughts on the reasonableness, justice, and necessity, of the awful sentence which the gospel passes on those who reject it; and whether it may move you to gratitude, to anger, or to scorn, I cannot dismiss the subject without solemnly and earnestly entreating you seriously to reflect upon it, as your own concern, and to ask yourself, as an immortal creature shortly to appear at the tribunal of God, whether you have not reason to humble yourself before him in the review of this, when compared with the manner in which you have ventured to talk on this tremendous subject? Your heart may perhaps be less impressible; but I am sure that, for my own part, were I to think, I will not say as an humble Christian, but as a sober and religious deist in character ought, if Christianity had never been heard of, I would not for the whole world presume to say, as you have in effect frequently done, "that an infinitely wise God could not give a revelation attended with such rational evidence, as should render every man to whom it came* justly obnoxious to high penalties for rejecting it." Nay, I think it would fill me with astonishment and grief, that a mortal man should be found arrogant and petulant enough to limit the Majesty of heaven by such an assertion; and to declare in express words, a disdain at the mention of his lifted rod, when held out over those who should despise his appointed method of pardon and salvation. May the hour never come when this ill-judged bravery shall be lamented amidst inconsolable horrors!

After so copious an examination of this important question, in which I have laboured to give you, and my other readers, all the satisfaction I could, I have not left myself room to mention many other things in your essay, which might admit and require animadversion. Of those yet remaining unhandled, your account of the agency and office of the divine Spirit seems the most considerable. I leave my reader to consult it for himself, as it stands in your 56th and following pages: in which he will find a mixture of truth and falsehood so blended together, as, on the whole, to amount to a scheme apparently contrary to fact; and in theory so wild, that he will not find it easy to believe it could be seriously proposed by any who enjoyed the use of his reason; or that you in particular meant any thing by it, unless it were to expose Christianity, by representing this as its doctrine, and its grand foundation.

You must at least, Sir, add the sanction of your name to your pamphlet, before you will be thought seriously to teach, (as in p. 59.) "that every baptized person is inspired in a moment with an irresistible light from heaven," which yet, according to your 63d page, may be resisted, and thereby make infidelity criminal; "a light by which our faith is completed in an instant, the most perfect and finished creed produced at once, and made self-evident to the mind in which it is lodged, in a way perhaps little differing from intuition itself; such characters being stamped upon the heart, as no misrepresentation can ever possibly intervene to corrupt, no succeeding suggestions of a different style to dispute the preference, or shake its authority in the mind." In one word, "we are" in consequence of this extraordinary operation, (if we are to take the matter as you represent it,) "brought under a monitor and guardian, which does not leave us for a moment to the possibility of error and imposition." These, Sir, are your own words; and if any reader, to whom I am personally a stranger, should question whether any thing so absurd as the last clause is any where in the world to be found, your 60th page will convince him how faithfully they are transcribed.

I apprehend, perhaps with you, that merely to propose this notion, is to confute it. However, for the credit of the Christian world, I am glad to say, it is no very common one, and may, for any thing I at present know, be quite peculiar; whatever unguarded approaches some good men may have made towards it, or whatever airs of infallibility they may have assumed, which, to do you justice, I cannot but imagine you meant by all this gallimatia to expose. It would be an easy matter to vindicate the Scriptures, which you have pressed in to support this strange representation, but every good commentary upon them may furnish the reader with an antidote against such an interpretation, if his own reflections do not (as might reasonably be expected) immediately supersede the necessity of having recourse to any commentary at all. I shall not therefore at present pursue the matter any further; but leave you to be confuted, I will not say by every rational Christian writer on this subject, but even by every other which any good Christian has called into, on this head, or on any other: for every such error as effectually confutes this notion, as a thousand volumes of the strictest argument could do it.

* N. B. I here suppose extraordinary cases allowed for, as above.

Nevertheless, Sir, if you still continue to urge the matter, and the public seem desirous of it, I may perhaps take this your third general under as particular a consideration as your two former. In the mean time, I am satisfied, that none who knows me will imagine, that I have declined the task from any suspicions which I entertain concerning the reality or importance of the operations of the blessed Spirit on the mind, to enlighten and renew, to sanctify and strengthen, to cheer and to guide, the children of God, and the heirs of glory. I am continually bearing my testimony to this great and weighty truth in my sermons and writings; as I can never expect that any course of preaching or writing can be useful to the souls of men, in which so glorious a doctrine of Christianity is either denied or omitted.

There are many other particulars in your letter, about which I shall have no controversy with you at all, but shall willingly leave those deities to plead, whose altars you have cast down. The imputation of the faith of sureties to the baptized infant;—the necessary connexion between the administration of that rite, and the communication of some extraordinary influences of the Spirit;—the power of the magistrate to determine articles of faith, and to impose forms of worship by sanguinary laws, or laws in any lower degree penal;—the compelling young persons to declare their sentiments on some of the nicest theological controversies, before they can be supposed at all to have examined them,—and frowning severely upon them, as soon as they appear to suspect, what they never had any convincing evidence to engage them to believe:—these, and some other particulars, (which lie between the 95th and 101st page of your book,) I confess you have rallied with a just severity. And I am particularly pleased with the serious air with which the raillery on these heads is carried, even to the defence of fire and faggot in the cause of religion; from which I presume, Sir, you apprehend yourself to be in no danger. It will, no doubt, be of service to those readers, who, without such a key, might, in the simplicity of their hearts, have been led into a wrong judgment of your views, from those airs of devotion and orthodoxy, which you assume in other passages.

A design to overthrow natural religion, as well as revealed; to confound the nature of virtue and vice, and subvert, so far as a mortal can do it, the throne of God among men; to destroy all the foundations of truth, justice, and benevolence, which arise from a persuasion of his divine presence and providence, leaving us to all the absurdities, the temptations, and miseries of atheism, is so black and so horrid an enormity, that I would by no means charge it, by any train of consequences, even on a nameless author. And indeed I will not allow myself so much as to think, that you were capable of setting yourself about it, as our law expresses it in matters of much less importance, "knowingly and with malice forethought." Charity teaches me rather to hope, that it was in mere sport, and wantonness of heart, you have thrown about these firebrands, arrows, and death. But what the sport has been, the weapons themselves shall show: and whatever you meant, I think it my duty, before I conclude, to show, that you have, in fact, laid the foundation of the Temple of Confusion, (if I may be allowed the expression,) and pointed out the way to the utter destruction of religion, in every form, and in every degree. I hope, therefore, Sir, that how ungrateful soever the subject may be, you will give me a patient hearing, while I spend a few moments in the illustration of it; partly lest some unthinking people, dazzled by the sophistry of your boasted arguments, should implicitly follow you, not knowing whither they go; and partly, as I insinuated in the entrance of my former letter, that I apprehended your pamphlet had such a tendency; for I should think I acted unworthy my character as a Christian and a divine, if I left such an insinuation entirely supported. And indeed, Sir, if your pamphlet has those views, which (so far as I can learn) are universally imputed to it, I should hope nothing might be more likely to convince you of the weakness of those arguments, by which you attempt to shake the foundation of Christianity, than to show you, that if they prove any thing, they prove a great deal too much; prove, what I hope you would abhor, as infinitely the most pernicious of all falsehoods.

In order, if possible, to make you sensible of this, give me leave to suppose an atheist, or if that be too great a monster to be supposed, a sceptic, who has, and will have, no fixed sentiments in religion of any kind, addressing himself to you, or to some patron of natural religion, on your own principles, and in many of your own words, to some such purpose as this:

"It is a most absurd thing, so much as to pretend to offer any defence of religion, so far as even to argue the existence of a Deity from the works of nature, or to go about to prove that we lie under any obligations to sobriety, honesty, or mutual kindness. If such disputes as these be allowed, there is no ensuring conviction. (P. 5.) If the motives, even to these virtues, may be examined and considered, they may be innocently rejected too: for who shall ascertain the moment when I am to become virtuous, if I am allowed to examine why I am to be so?' (P. 93.) Your boasted rational evidence of these things is a false, unwarranted notion, without the least ground to support it in nature.

(P. 7.) You say, all men are to think alike upon these topics, all to acknowledge, there is an original, intellectual Being, endowed with all natural and moral perfections, and that all the rules of virtue and duty are to be inviolably observed: but how should these reasons of yours, whatever they are, and which therefore I will not condescend so much as to hear, produce this unity of opinion in these important articles? I disdain to bestow a second thought on so preposterous a scheme. (P. 8.) Tell me not, that by neglecting to inquire into the existence of a God, and thereby running into an utter disregard to all that gratitude, veneration, and obedience, which, you say, I owe him, I may incur his displeasure; or that by refusing to inquire into the nature and obligations of virtue, I may incur a thousand other inconveniences;—I cannot have patience to be threatened into consequences, to be talked to of danger in decisions, and to have the rod held out with the lesson. (Ibid.) It is impossible there should be any such thing as rational religion; for if it be necessary at all, it must be equally necessary for all men, and at all times. Children must love and fear the Deity, before they could know any thing of him: and their knowledge, if built upon such principles as these you offer me, would come quite too late to regulate the practice. (P. 13.) You say, you find religion reasonable in speculation; but I tell you, in your own words, that is nothing to the purpose: the question is, Whether I, and every man, be bound to believe it? (P. 18.) And who can imagine this, who considers, how few men are qualified for reasoning; (p. 17.) and how possible it is, that if the examination of these things were to be attempted, a man might not live long enough to go through with the proof? (Ibid.) What if indeed it be so, that the perfections of the Deity, and the obligations of virtue, may be rationally demonstrated; yet, you know, the generality of apprehensions extend not beyond a simple proposition, and are thrown out at once at the very mention of a medium: (Ibid.) nay, the very ablest and best of men are (as you have taught me) disqualified for fair reasoning by their natural prejudices. We atheists have contracted a partiality for particular objects and notions, familiarized to us by long acquaintance: an honest and natural fondness for Hobbes, and Spinoza, and the rest of our old friends, will never permit us to exert our judgments in a disinterested manner; not to say, how many of the living may be concerned in the event." (P. 23.)

"Besides," might your atheistical or sceptical disciple say, "it is an immense task you would assign me, a task for which years will not suffice, to run through all the acute and metaphysical writers, masters in Israel, who have each of them had their darling argument, and many of them perhaps written whole folios to illustrate it. Or if you would lead me to quit the high priori road, (without examining which, it is nevertheless plain that I can have no full idea of the subject,) and would argue from second causes and the harmony of nature, how can I judge of this without understanding the laws of nature? and how can I attain the knowledge of those laws, but by a deep and long attention to mathematical studies? As I must take the faith of a Deity in the way to complete virtue, according to your circular argument, that he who comes to God, must believe that he is; (p. 78.) so I must also take Sir Isaac Newton's Principia, after a great many other preparatory books, in the way to that faith. And however the gentlemen of the Boylean Lecture, on whom you so pleasantly exercise your talents of raillery, may confine their hearers to examine only into the evidence on one side of the question; I hope you, Sir, will give me leave to hear what my brethren, the atheists and fatalists, have said to destroy religion, as well as what its votaries have said in its defence."

"Now," may he proceed to say, "if by some happy conjunction of circumstances, I have genius, and learning, and resolution, and leisure, and fortune enough to go through this encyclopædia of ethical and physico-theological studies, it is not the happiness of one in a thousand; and yet according to you, natural religion and morality are matters of universal concern. And which is worse than all, when I have finished this course, in some future distant period of life, if I happen to attain it, the event of this examination is quite uncertain. Perhaps all my labour may be lost, and I may find myself obliged to sit down in my present infidelity; or if I attain to any notion of these things, they may be changeable with every wind of doctrine. (P. 26.) Nay, if I continue to believe, my faith will administer no comfort in the reflection; for I shall continually forget the fundamental principles, on which I have formed my determination; (p. 29.) and even while I remember them, my faith will never influence my practice. (P. 13.) You," may this importunate echo of your philosophy and wisdom retort, "you, who have studied what virtue is, tell me it will require me to deny my appetites, and to bridle my passions: but what will all these principles (even the rational apprehensions of the presence of God himself, a view to his favour, and the expectation of immortality) do, when weighed in the scale against demonstrative good, (p. 32.) i. e. the pleasure of sense, and the ties of secular interest? The most valuable mortifies to be of small regard, when compared with that which is actually before us. To what purpose then should I lay [illegible] to be [illegible] vessel, which, even while you talk [illegible] the plan of it, you tell me will founder in the first storm [illegible] be not saved by miracle?"

And now, Sir, arise and plead the injured cause of God and of virtue, against all this train of wretched sophistry; and I will venture to say, that the arguments, and the distinctions, by which you confute the atheist, shall be your own answer. You will not, for shame, acknowledge that he reasoned justly, in a speech like this, which I, or rather yourself, have put into his mouth. You would not urge him to throw up all thoughts of the reasons and evidences of natural religion, and to wait "till he be inspired in a moment with an irresistible light from heaven, by which his faith should be completed in an instant, a perfect creed produced at once, and made self-evident to the mind, in a way little different from intuition." (P. 59.) I charitably believe you would think the subject too serious for such kind of jargon, and forgetting your harangue to your Oxonian friend, you would gravely inculcate very different principles.

You would, no doubt, show your antagonist, that he talked in a very crude and indigested manner, and confounded things, which should by all means be carefully distinguished, and indeed are very easily distinguishable.—You would then to be sure own, and urge, that all mankind are capable of some reasoning, unless they be lunatics, or idiots, who are confessedly out of the present question: and that the great proofs of religion are so plain, that a few words, and a little time and labour, may clear them beyond all reasonable objections.—You would remind him, that common sense might teach him in general to distinguish between what is essential, and what is merely circumstantial, in an argument, and might find out a medium between being exquisitely learned in the history of controversies relating to the Deity, and utterly unacquainted with any reason for believing his existence.—You would tell him, that the great Author of nature, having given him some hints of his being and perfections, (which the very questioning of them, or even the denial, would prove he in fact had,) might justly require, that he should seriously and candidly weigh at least the most obvious proofs which, if he did, he would undoubtedly see his obligations to believe and practise accordingly. And when he urged the inefficacy of these persuasions to influence his practice, you would perhaps add, before you were well aware,—that if a rational creature could commit such an outrage upon reason, as to rush on to prohibited gratifications, in the apprehended presence of God, and at the known expense of his favour, he must charge the fatal consequence on himself alone; and might, in the mean time, be ashamed to confess himself so mean a slave to every irregular propensity of appetite and passion, and to talk of the demonstrative good of those baits, which he knew in his own conscience to be the instruments of final destruction.

In short, Sir, not to swell this recapitulation, into which I am thus accidentally fallen, to the length that you have yourself given, (p. 109—111.) I think you must answer him by the very same considerations, which I urged in my former letter, when replying to you, and by consequence must confute yourself. And as one who knows the importance of the matter, and wishes nothing more sincerely than to see you extricated from these labyrinths of sophistry and error, I do now beseech you, that you would enter into your own conscience, while the matter stands in this point of light, and ask yourself, how you could possibly, on your own principles, reply to this enemy of natural religion? I dare say, the public would be pleased to see how you would manage the debate. But if you could not defend even natural religion without confuting yourself, then consider how you will answer it to God, and to the world, not openly to renounce tenets that must be so utterly subversive of it.

You are pleased, Sir, in one of your concluding pages, (p. 112.) to intimate your purpose of offering up in behalf of your young friend "your most ardent prayers at the throne of grace, that God would illuminate and irradiate his mind with a perfect and thorough conviction of the truth of his holy gospel." But if the end of your letter be indeed, what I find every body I converse with supposes it was, to overthrow what you here call "the holy gospel," and presently after, "that divine law dictated by the Holy Spirit;" I cannot forbear saying, that such a speech as this would become an atheist much better than a deist. It is, in that case, so notorious an insult on the majesty of God, and the throne of his grace, as one would imagine no creature should dare to commit, who apprehended but a remote possibility that he might at length be obliged to prostrate himself before it, and ask the life of his soul there. It would pain my heart so much to think you should be capable of carrying impiety to such a height, that I am sometimes ready rather to forget all that looks like infidelity and profaneness in what you had before written, and charitably to hope, though against hope, and though it be perhaps at some expense of my character that I should mention it, that you are indeed a devout though irrational believer of the gospel, and that your treatise is to be numbered amongst the wonders which enthusiasm has wrought. But whether you wrote this passage in earnest or in jest, it is with all seriousness I now assure you, that I pour out my ardent prayers before the throne of grace for you; that by the secret influences of the blessed Spirit on your heart, (to whose agency no prejudices are invincible,) you may be led into a wiser and happier way of thinking than you seem at present to entertain; and that God may not charge to your account the ruin of those souls, whom this unhappy pamphlet, whatever was intended by it, has so palpable and so fatal a tendency to destroy. Could what I have written, in either of these Letters, be at all subservient to the accomplishment of this wish, it would be one of the most sensible pleasures which can ever reach the heart of,

Sir,

Your faithful humble servant,

P. DODDRIDGE.

Northampton, Dec. 1, 1742.

LETTER III.

SIR,

WHEN I concluded my last Letter to you, I was not determined upon this Third Address: but I make it in compliance with the request of several of my friends, who think, that in order to do full justice to the work I have undertaken, I ought to consider your Third Part. This they the rather urge, as it may give me an opportunity of vindicating an important doctrine of Scripture, which some of the friends of Christianity have unwarily represented in such a view, as to encourage its enemies to endeavour to plant their artillery against the gospel, on that ground, from whence, if there be due care taken, it is most capable of being defended. I am the more willing to comply with this request, because I find your ingenious correspondent at Oxford (whose letter to you has, I doubt not, given the world a great deal of pleasure) has modestly omitted the discussion of this, as well as of several other points, which I have examined at large in my two former letters.

I proceed therefore directly to the consideration of what you have advanced in the third part of your book; in which you undertake to show, that Christianity cannot be founded on argument, i. e. that we cannot be obliged to exercise our reason in discovering its evidences, or judging of its doctrines, because God has prescribed another, and very different method of coming at the knowledge of divine truths; which is (as you represent it in the 56th and following pages) the immediate operation of the Holy Spirit upon our minds, infallibly dictating to us the whole scheme and system of them, in such a manner, as to leave nothing to be done by ourselves, but merely to receive and assent to doctrines seen by their own light, under the influence of his teachings.

Now here, Sir, had you separated some things, which you offer in illustration and proof of this general assertion, from the rest, I should have been very ready to have acknowledged their truth and their moment, and, had it been necessary, (which I am well aware it would not have been, to have joined with you in this defence of both,) you will easily see by what I am further to offer, and must indeed well perceive from what I have already written in this controversy, even though you should be ever so much a stranger to my other writings; in all which I am continually referring to the necessity of divine influences on the mind, to form it to knowledge and holiness; and in some of which, (particularly my seventh Sermon on Regeneration,) I have set myself to defend the doctrine at large, in a manner which must certainly appear very sincere, and will, I hope, be found thoroughly convincing to all, who will seriously weigh it, and will abide by Scripture as the standard of their faith.* But my complaint is, that what you teach on this head, though in many places very true, and expressed with great propriety, is intermingled and connected with other assertions, which seem to me quite unscriptural, and extravagant; and which, if they were to be admitted, must necessarily end in the subversion of Christianity. For all your scheme centres in this, "that these influences and assistances of the Spirit of God are of such a kind as to contain an ample revelation of the whole system of Christianity, to every particular person who is the subject of it, so as to supersede the necessity of any rational inquiry into the evidences or contents of religion; and in such a manner as to place him above all dependence on Scripture, and, in one word, to make him absolutely infallible."

That the reader may not imagine I mistake your meaning, and aggravate the matter beyond due bounds, I shall transcribe a few passages of yours, in which it will plainly appear that you carry the matter to this extravagant height. And whoever attentively considers the connexion of many of these passages with the rest, will immediately find, that what is most extravagant in these assertions, is so essential to your scheme, that were these passages to be moderated, the mention of this doctrine would be quite foreign to your purpose.

such an influence, you call it, in the general, " A constant and particular revelation, imparted separately, and supernaturally, to every individual." (P. 112.) And elsewhere, (p. 56.) you speak of the Spirit as " the great Dictator, and infallible Guide, who is the promised Oracle to attend believers to the end of the world, to irradiate their souls at once, as the all-sufficient Origin of faith, in opposition to the aids and advices of reason." This you call (p. 58.) " the light of inspiration, and infused evidence, which is of immediate influence, and operates, as in the case of Saul, (as if that were to be considered as a common standard,) without delay :" " A principle, which effects conversion" (you must, I suppose, mean, to the belief of Christianity as a speculative truth) " by an irresistible light from heaven, and flashes conviction in a moment ;—producing," as you express it, (p. 59.) " the most perfect and finished creed at once ;"—so as to be " the sum and substance of all argumentation, and" (whatever that sublime expression may mean) " the very spirit and extract of all convincing power, of a nature, perhaps, but little differing from intuition itself ;—in consequence of which there is nothing in the suspicious repositories of human testimony," (in which, it is evident from other passages, you include Scripture,) " that can deserve the least notice, or be thought worthy of a moment's attention on this subject." You call it, (p. 60.) " a present and standing miracle of our own, in consequence of which we stand no longer in need of any of the credit of ancient miracles." You tell us, it produces " such indelible characters stamped upon the heart, as no misrepresentations can ever possibly intervene to corrupt." And say, " that this faithful monitor and guardian has promised to continue this office to the end of the world, that we may not be left liable one moment to a possibility of error and imposition." So that, (not to multiply citations from many parallel passages,) as you express it, (p. 90.) in as strong and determinate terms as can be imagined, " actual infallibility is the only title whereon to ground any plausible claim to our discipleship."

Now, Sir, I seriously apprehend, that every intelligent reader will immediately conclude, that if this representation of the matter were indeed the genuine doctrine of Christianity itself, this third part of your treatise, separate from the two former, which I hope have been already sufficiently confuted, would alone be an unanswerable demonstration, that Christianity was false. If this be its language, and these its engagements, it is evidently condemned out of its own mouth, for surely all Christians are not in fact infallible. Every error, and every contradiction, maintained by any of them, on one side the question or the other, evinces this ; unless both parts of a contradiction could be true. You must therefore, on these principles, reconcile error and infallibility, which it seems very difficult to do ; unless you should think fit to evade that necessity by saying, that they only, among all the contending parties, are to be acknowledged for Christians, who are free from error ; from any error, of any kind, or any degree, in any question in which religion is concerned. And this surely, in the judgment of every candid and impartial man, would be no other than acknowledging, that there is no such thing as a Christian now in the world. And this would consequently prove Christianity itself false, as it is confessedly a part of the scheme, that it was to be perpetuated to all ages by a succession of faithful disciples ; which, according to the whole of your argument, it was the design of this extraordinary agency of the Spirit to secure.

The absurdity of this is so flagrant, that I suppose you will rather choose to say, that the reason why Christians fall into error is, because they do not follow this infallible guide. But you must give me leave to remind you, that you have cut yourself off from this retreat, by asserting this light to be irresistible, and to flash conviction in a moment ; and by saying expressly, that it is an indelible character, instamped (as it seems by what you elsewhere maintain) at our baptism, and incapable of being corrupted. You cannot surely imagine such a subterfuge consistent with saying, (as in the place quoted above,) " that actual infallibility is the only title to the claim of being a disciple." An actual infallibility, liable for want of due attention to be mistaken, is as incoherent an idea, as that of a square circle, or a cylindrical cone. Christianity must appear ridiculous, if it taught such a doctrine ; and you will, I hope, Sir, examine your own conscience, as to the view in which you wished it should appear, when you fathered such a scheme upon it.

As I cannot remember ever to have seen the doctrine of the Spirit's influence set in so injurious a light, and turning so visibly to the reproach of that gospel, to which, when duly explained, it is so distinguished a glory, I shall therefore set myself to canvass this point at large : and hope to show, that this misrepresentation of what the Scripture teaches on this head, is as gross as the scheme itself is inconsistent and absurd.

Now that this point may be set in as clear and easy a light as possible, I shall endeavour to show,

First, That the Scripture may say many very important things of the agency and operation of the Spirit on men's minds, without carrying it to such a height as you suppose.

Secondly, That it says many things concerning these influences, and the persons under them, utterly inconsistent with your scheme. And,

Thirdly, That the passages on which you build your hypothesis, will none of them, if fairly interpreted, support it, and several of them are in themselves sufficient to subvert and overthrow it, though they have been unnaturally pressed into a contrary service.

Most of what I have further to offer in reply to your Letter, will be comprehended under one or other of these heads: but before I enter into the discussion of them, I must take leave to premise one preliminary; which is, That the question we are debating, is not by any means to be decided by human authority. I am very sensible, Sir, that some eminent divines of the Roman communion, and of the established church at home, as well as among our nonconformists, have, in the zeal and humility of their hearts, expressed themselves in a manner which cannot be defended, and thereby have given too plausible an occasion for your dangerous and fatal misrepresentations. Yet I am not aware, that any of them, even Bishop Beveridge, or the celebrated Archbishop of Cambray himself, ever ran your lengths; and their other writings show, how utterly they would have abhorred some of the consequences which you have drawn or suggested, from these principles. But my business is with the law, and with the testimony; and where these holy and excellent men have not spoken according to that rule, I cannot believe that celestial light to have been in them, or suppose their minds under the guidance of that Spirit, whom, though by ill-judged methods, it was undoubtedly their sincere and affectionate desire to glorify. Taking the matter, therefore, as the Scripture represents it, it will be very easy to show,

First, That the Scripture may say many very high and important things concerning the agency and operation of the blessed Spirit on the hearts of believers, without carrying it so far as you represent, or laying any just foundation for the arguments you would build on such passages.—Many things may be said of the Χαρισματα, or the extraordinary gifts and powers of the apostles and primitive Christians, which were so peculiar to that age, that we have no personal concern in them at all:—and many things might be said of those operations which were to continue in all ages of the church, which though of great moment and universal concern, may fall very far short of what you assert, and must maintain, in order to establish the consequences you would connect with these principles.

It is of great importance here to recollect, (though you have artfully contrived, if possible, to keep your readers from such a view,) that many things in Scripture, which relate to the operations of the Spirit of God on the mind, have a reference to those extraordinary gifts, which were peculiar to the apostles, and in which we of these later ages have no further concern, than as the general knowledge of them may establish our regard to the writings of those eminent servants of Christ, who were wisely and graciously distinguished by their divine Master, by such extraordinary endowments, to fit them for the extraordinary office they sustained: an office, by which they were called out to plant the gospel, amidst a thousand oppositions, discouragements, and dangers, in countries where it was before utterly unknown; and also to draw up those important and sacred records, by which the knowledge of it was, in the purest and most comprehensive manner, to be communicated to the remotest ages and nations. It would be quite foreign from my purpose, to enter into a nice enumeration of their peculiar gifts and powers. It plainly appears congruous to the general scheme of Providence, so far as we can judge of it, that persons destined for such a work should have some uncommon furniture for it; not only beyond what could be expected by Christians in future ages, when the gospel was settled in the world, and many ordinary helps provided, of which the church was then destitute; but also beyond what could be pretended to by private Christians, or even by subordinate ministers, in those early days: and accordingly, modest and humble as the apostles were, we frequently find them speaking in their writings as the authorized ambassadors of Christ, who bore unequalled credentials from him; to whose decisions therefore, both churches and their ministers were to submit, if they would not incur the guilt of despising their common Lord.

It will on these premises therefore be very readily granted to you, that these holy men might, as you speak, "have many particular revelations, separately and supernaturally imparted to each;" and that in such a manner as, while they were receiving them, might so far supersede the exercise of reason, as to leave them only to observe, report, and record, the oracles of God, delivered to them, as of old to the prophets, who spake as they were immediately moved, or borne on, by the Holy Ghost, though all the Israelitish people had no warrant to expect to be so immediately instructed and favoured. Whatever were the peculiar signification of the word of wisdom, and the word of knowledge, which were given to the apostles by the Spirit, concerning which there has been, and perhaps still may be, much debate,) it is put out of question by many evident passages in the New Testament, that the apostles were divinely assisted in the interpretation of the sacred oracles of the Old, and were also favoured with such comprehensive views of the whole Christian scheme, as they could not have learnt by any human methods of investigation, or even by the personal instructions they had received from Christ in the days of his flesh, who expressly referred them to the Spirit as the great Teacher, by whom they were to be instructed in many things which then he was with them, they were not able to bear. These were such things, as eye had not seen, nor ear heard, neither had it entered into the heart of man to conceive them; and it is easy to imagine, that with respect to these, they might very properly say, in a sense peculiar to themselves, God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit, which searcheth all things, even the deep things of God: for we have received the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things which are freely given us of God; which things also we speak, in words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, so as to be judged by no man, because we have the mind of Christ.

These, Sir, were glorious apostolical prerogatives, in the highest sense which the words will bear; yet I cannot but observe, that, so far as we can judge by the New Testament, the degree of inspiration granted to them would not warrant some of those expressions which you use, when describing that which you suppose common to every Christian. You will find it hard to prove, that all this conviction was flashed into their souls in a moment; that a finished creed was produced in their minds at once; and that none of them were for a moment left liable to a possibility of error. I think the contrary is demonstrable, even with regard to them; though I doubt not their being at length led into all necessary truth, and qualified to transmit it to us, without any mixture or alloy of falsehood.

The Scripture may also, without establishing your peculiar doctrines on this head, further teach, (as I am well satisfied it does,) that the Holy Spirit was to continue with the church in all ages, even to the end of the world; that it was to be his stated office to convince men of sin, to direct their believing regards to a Saviour, and to glorify Christ, by taking of his things, and showing them, not only to the apostles, but to succeeding believers. It may teach us, that, by his influence, God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shines into our hearts, to give the knowledge of his glory, as reflected from the face of his Son; that he irradiates our understandings, and sanctifies our affections, so that in consequence of this, when we commence cordial believers, we are born of the Spirit. The whole genius of Scripture may lead us (as I am fully persuaded it does) chiefly to ascribe unto his gracious influences our understanding in divine things, as well as our dispositions to comply with the method of salvation which the gospel exhibits, and with the precepts it establishes. All this may be granted, may be asserted, may be contended for, without maintaining "a constant and supernatural revelation, to be imparted to every individual, so as to be the all-sufficient origin of faith," not only in neglect of the aids of reason, but "in opposition to them." There may be all that I have here supposed, and yet there may be no "irresistible light, to flash such a conviction in a moment, as to produce a finished creed at once; so that from that illustrious era of illumination, "Scripture should be thought unworthy of a moment's attention, and a standing miracle produced, which should supersede our necessity of attending to those which were anciently wrought in confirmation of the gospel." Great encouragement may be given, in the use of rational means, to hope for the continued influence of the Spirit to improve our knowledge; though we may be, not only for a single moment, but during every moment of our lives, liable to err in the circumstantials of religion: nay, I see no reason to ground the claim of our discipleship upon any pretence at all to actual infallibility.

Prove Sir, if it lies in your power, the necessary connexion between what I have here acknowledged, (I think, with most other Christians in all ages,) and that part of your scheme, which I here deny to be by any means a consequence from it. For you must easily see, that these controverted branches of it are the only foundation of that conclusion, towards which you are all along driving: since upon any other hypothesis, but that which the extravagant language I have so often repeated expresses, the humble and diligent use of our own reason in matters of religion is so far from being superseded, that, on the other hand, it will (as I shall presently show more at large) appear a most necessary duty, in consequence of this very promise of divine assistance; if we would not turn it into an ungrateful insult on those natural methods of information which Providence has given us, and to the improvement of which the promises of grace were intended to animate us.

Having thus illustrated and confirmed this general remark, which may be applied to a multitude of texts in the New Testament, which it may not by any means be necessary particularly to enumerate in this debate, I now proceed,

Secondly, To show that the Scripture says many things concerning the influences of the Spirit, and the persons under various degrees of them, which are utterly irreconcilable with your representation of them, as stated above.

And here the leading thought is, that the New Testament, (of which we here especially speak,) frequently supposes, and expressly requires and institutes, the use of such means, in persons under the illuminating and sanctifying influences of the Spirit, as you suppose to be entirely superseded by those influences.

And for the truth of this, I appeal to the whole tenor of the sacred writings, in which you find such exhortations and instructions given, and such regards required to them, as must certainly prove, how far the Christians to whom they are directed, were from such an extent, and such an infallibility of knowledge, as you suppose inseparably connected with a claim of discipleship, and necessarily to result from the teachings of their divine Monitor. But it would be tedious and useless to take up my reader's time with particulars: let him read over the Epistles to the Corinthians and Galatians in particular with your principles in his view, and judge whether almost every chapter, and in some places every verse, does not strongly declaim against them. Indeed, according to your representation of the matter, nothing could have been more superfluous, than the very institution of a stated ministry in the church. According to St. Paul's view of it, this was a great and important design of our blessed Redeemer, when after the triumph of his ascension he distributed the royal donative of his Spirit, and gave under its influence, besides apostles, prophets and evangelists, pastors and teachers;—to perfect the saints for the work of the ministry, in order to the gradual edification of the body of Christ; till all should come, in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, even unto the complete measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, or to the state of a full-grown Christian. Reconcile this, Sir, if you can, with your scheme of their shooting up at once, into the full knowledge of every thing relating to religion, into actual infallibility, and such a glorious independency on all the methods of human instruction.

The contrariety of this to the whole scheme and tenor of Scripture is so plain, that I shall add on this head only one remark, as a specimen of many more which might fill a volume: I mean, that such advices are given even to those who were appointed the teachers of others, and consequently must be supposed to have a peculiar share of divine and supernatural illumination; whereas, on your hypothesis, they would have been unnecessary, even to the least and meanest of their charge. Thus, when Paul takes his leave of the elders at Ephesus, he solemnly commends them to the word of God's grace, as what was able to build them up. And in terms yet less liable to objection, when writing to Timothy, (though as an evangelist, superior by far to the class of ordinary ministers, and endowed with miraculous gifts nearly approaching those of the apostolic office,) he charges him, in his First Epistle, to give attendance to reading, and to meditate on the divine things he had learnt: and yet more expressly in his Second Epistle, as Timothy from a child had known the Holy Scriptures, which the apostle testifies were able to make him wise to salvation, through faith in Christ Jesus, he solemnly charges him to continue in the things which he had learned; that is, no doubt in the study of those Scriptures, as well as of those instructions he had received from Paul; each of which would, according to you, have been equally superseded. And then, instead of talking of "manuscript authorities, and paper revelations, the suspicious repositories of human testimony, in which to a man illuminated from above, there could be nothing of consequence enough to engage a moment's attention," (your own never to be forgotten words,) the apostle closes the period with this remarkable testimony; All Scripture (or the whole Scripture) is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, as well as for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God, i. e. not only the Christian, but the minister, the evangelist, the apostle, may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good words.

And thus, Sir, by the review of these passages, in comparison with a multitude more which might easily be added to them, we are taught the true Scripture doctrine of the illuminating influences of the Spirit; (which are now chiefly in question;) and I shall endeavour in a few words to propose it, without the assistance and encumbrance of those technical phrases, which modern divines have introduced; and which, how profitable soever many of them may be esteemed, I suppose are absolutely necessary, to any who regard the Scripture as a complete rule.

Now I apprehend the substance of it to be this: God is the great Father of lights, the Author of all the understanding divided among the various ranks of created beings; who, as he at first formed the minds of angels and men, continues the exercise of their intellectual faculties, and one way or another communicates to them all the knowledge, of every kind, which they possess.* But whereas there were certain points, which it was necessary for men to know in this fallen state, in order to their recovery and final happiness, which they could not possibly have discovered by the most accurate and intense use of their natural faculties; God was pleased by his Holy Spirit, in a manner which we cannot particularly explain, to reveal them to the apostles; and after having furnished them with sufficient credentials, to prove, to all impartial inquirers, that the extraordinary doctrines they taught, were not the reveries of a heated imagination, but indeed instructions from heaven, he directed these apostles, by an extraordinary influence on their minds, to record the history of such facts, and to write such instructions to the churches with whom they were immediately concerned, as should happily contain an exact, practical, and full representation of the genuine Christian doctrine, as well as of the manner of its being introduced into the world, and established in it. This grand design is so happily executed, that I doubt not but every person of common capacity might, on reading the New Testament, understand, by the mere use of his natural faculties, what the institutions of Christ are; as well as he might understand those of Solon or Lycurgus, by reading the writings of Xenophon, Plutarch, or any other ancient historian.

* [illegible]

But I further apprehend, that as the gospel was a scheme, in which the divine glory and the salvation of men were so intimately concerned, the Spirit of God, which had in a more imperfect degree operated on men's minds under the Mosaic dispensation, to assist their understandings in apprehending the sense of the sacred oracles, and to affect their hearts in conformity to their practical design, did, and does, in a yet more abundant manner, interest himself in the preservation and efficacy of this nobler institution, in the first establishment of which he had so illustrious a part.

There is reason to think, that in the earliest age his interposition, even in those who were not the original depositaries of this revelation, might be more sensible and remarkable than now. It seems very congruous to the nature and circumstances of things, so far as we can judge of them, (for I take not upon me absolutely to assert it,) that among the other miraculous gifts bestowed by the apostles on the first ministers, whom they settled in new formed churches, some of them might immediately relate to the understanding and memory of the persons so ordained; in consequence of which they should, for the benefit of the flocks respectively committed to their care, more readily apprehend, and more exactly retain, what the apostles taught them, than in the mere strength of their natural faculties they could have done.

Yet, as the Spirit was to abide with the church always, and all true Christians are, agreeably to that promise, represented as born of the Spirit, as led by it, and, by virtue of its operations, as one with Christ, it seems to me apparent, that to confine his operations to the miraculous gifts and powers of those early ages, is in a great measure to subvert Christianity, or at least to rob it of its greatest glory, and its professors of their noblest support and encouragement. But, if we grant his continued influence on the minds of Christians in any degree, as we cannot suppose it to be a blind and irrational impulse, urging us to what we see no just reason to pursue, it is very analogous to the reason of things to suppose, that he operates upon our understandings, as well as on the other faculties of the soul.

We readily allow, that the manner of these operations cannot be clearly and fully expressed, as neither can we explain that of sensation or memory. But this ignorance of the particular manner does not, as one would imagine some apprehended, leave men at liberty to assert, at random, whatever they please about it. We may reasonably conclude, that it is not the stated office of the Divine Spirit to reveal new doctrines, which the Scripture does not teach; for if it were, God would undoubtedly, as when he formerly added to prior revelations given to his church, furnish the persons to whom such discoveries were made, with proper credentials to authorize their report: and if this cannot be proved, it ought not to be asserted. Nor can we imagine it his office to reveal by an immediate suggestion, the doctrines already delivered in Scripture, to those who may have daily opportunities of learning them from thence. My First Letter proved, that there is in the nature of things no necessity for this, since the truth of the revelation may to such be known without it; and to say, that where that truth in general is known, there is a necessity of such a revelation of particular doctrines, in order to their being understood, is making a sad compliment to the written word of God, and is indeed making it quite an insignificant and useless thing. If any such facts can be produced, let the evidence of them be laid before the world, and all due regard shall be paid to them; but in theory it seems improbable, because so plainly unnecessary, that God should do that in a miraculous, which he has so amply provided for in an ordinary, way. Of this at least I may be very confident, that he hath never given any encouragement, either in the Old Testament, or in the New, which should lead men to expect and hope, that he should thus come, and whisper in their ear, by immediate inspiration, the truths and doctrines which he speaks aloud in his word, and which they will neither read nor hear there. I think a man might as well expect, that if, when entering on a course of study, he were to put out his own eyes, God should, by miracle, give him the complete and orderly idea of all the characters of books, which he might otherwise have read.*

Far be it from me in the mean time to deny, that God may, by an extraordinary agency, render men's faculties more capable of apprehension, where divine things are concerned, than they might otherwise be. He may, no doubt, do it: he may also awaken a dormant idea, which lay neglected in the memory, with unusual energy; he may secretly attract the more attentive regard of the mind to it; and give a man both an inclination and an ability

* I must entreat the reader to observe, that I do in the [illegible] Serm. VIII of tracing its various relations, with an unusual attention, so that a lustre before quite unknown shall be (as it were) poured upon it; while in the mean time prejudices, which rendered the mind indisposed for the search, or admission and acknowledgment, of truth, may be suspended, and even by imperceptible degrees dissipated. In all these particulars, there may be a real operation of the Spirit of God upon men's minds, under which they may not themselves be conscious of any thing at all extraordinary, though it be indeed so. You well know, Sir, that in the natural world, the divine agency accomplishes all by second causes, and yet in such a manner, that hiding itself (as it were) behind them, it is seldom taken notice of: according to that fine expression of Mr. Thomson,

> All the HE works in all: yet HE, alone
> Seems not to work ——

As Christians, we must believe that angels are employed for our preservation from day to day; yet I suppose we generally pass through life, without being able to fix on any one circumstance concerning which we can assuredly say, "This was the effect of angelic interposition." And thus may there be a real operation of the Holy Spirit upon the mind, to render it more susceptible, or more tenacious, of divine knowledge; while all seems to be done by the regular exercise of the human faculties, in concurrence with which God works. And in consequence of this, a divine truth so learnt, may not, and will not, be considered, as an immediate revelation from God, nor be assented to as on the credit of this operation; but as on the evidence of reason or Scripture, which the mind under this guidance is enabled to discern.

And on this head I desire it may be remembered, (for it is too evident to be disputed,) that our obligation to attend to any particular notice which God has given us, either of truth or duty, does not depend on its being a notice given us in this or that distinguishing way, whether natural or supernatural; but upon that which is common to all kind of notices from God as such. Nor does our obligation to follow any good inclination, which arises in our mind, depend upon its being naturally or supernaturally produced, but simply, or at least chiefly, upon the evidence we have of its being good. Nay, I will venture to say, (on this foundation,) that it seems to me that extraordinary divine influences, imparted in this imperceptible way, are much more suitable to the wisdom and goodness of the adorable Being from whom they come; as they much better agree with a state of trial, and with the general scheme of conducting us by faith rather than sight: as it likewise does, that angels and devils should be invisible to human eyes.

On the whole, therefore, comparing one part of this account with the other, when our minds have been deeply impressed with divine truths; when we have been awakened diligently to attend to them, studying the Scripture, not merely as matter of curiosity, but with a serious desire of learning how the favour of God is to be obtained, when we have felt our hearts strongly impressed with good affections; when we have been animated by an inward vigour, much better felt than described, to vanquish strong temptations, and with patience and resolution to discharge our duty in the midst of difficulty and discouragement; I think, the whole tenor of Scripture directs us to ascribe this, not only to the goodness of Providence, in making us rational creatures, and making us acquainted with the excellent revelation of truth and duty contained in Scripture; but also to the secret and gracious influences of the Holy Spirit on our hearts, in concurrence with those other advantages. And it seems to me quite trifling, to amuse ourselves with nice speculations, where nature ends, and where grace begins, or what specific difference there is between the knowledge we obtain from each, while their operation is united. Should a number of mechanics, to whom their master has allowed two candles for their work, instead of pursuing their business, set themselves curiously to observe the difference between their size and materials; (if such difference there were;) and in consequence of those observations to dispute, whether in the compound light of both they could distinguish the rays of each, by any peculiar purity and lustre apprehended in the one, rather than the other; we should certainly think them very idly employed, and their master would give them very little thanks for so ill-judged a curiosity. On the like principle, I freely acknowledge, it has often grieved me to the heart to observe, how many volumes of polemical divinity have been written on questions, which neither need nor admit determination on this topic, as well as others.

But it is much for the honour of Scripture, that it meddles not with these niceties. It lays down the general principles I have mentioned, and exhorts men to take all proper measures to obtain the knowledge of divine things, by reading, by meditation, i. e. undoubtedly by the exercise of their rational faculties, which it expresses by being men in understanding: and it further directs, that all these pursuits should be undertaken, and carried on, in an humble dependence on God, who giveth wisdom, and out of whose mouth cometh knowledge and understanding. He begins the good work in us, he carries it on until the day of the Lord, and worketh in us both to will and to do. Under these influences, we ascribe unto God the glory of every intellectual, moral, and spiritual attainment, humbling ourselves before him, that these attainments have been no greater; which they undoubtedly might have been in consequence of a more diligent use of the means and opportunities which he has afforded, and to the faithful improvement of which he has given, and limited, his promises of further supernatural assistances; though I am very far from saying, they are imparted only to such as might on these promises have pleaded a claim to them.

This, Sir, I really take to be the Scripture doctrine of divine influence, and particularly of the Spirit's office in illuminating the mind; but you easily saw that this, instead of establishing what you teach of throwing aside the exercise of reason in religion, would utterly have overthrown it, and would (as I observed above) have made the diligent use of that reason, in concurrence with humble prayer, and the use of proper means of information, the only way in which we could warrantably have expected such enlightening and sanctifying influences. You therefore have thought fit to give another representation of the matter, directly contrary to what I have stated above; and you have attempted to prove it by many remarkable passages of the New Testament.

Now I really apprehend, and own, whatever you might intend by this argumentation, that if these Scriptures are rightly applied, and will establish the purpose for which you bring them, Christianity is overthrown; and all I have been saying, in this part of my Letter, must prejudice, rather than support it; since if your representations are just, it teaches a doctrine, not only absurd in theory, and false in fact, but also self-contradictory; and contrives to render entirely vain and insignificant all those grand preparations, which it describes as made for teaching the gospel in a natural way, and the prudent use of which it so warmly inculcates, in a multitude of other passages. And therefore,

Thirdly, I shall consider in this view what you allege from Scripture upon this head; which I shall handle as an objection, drawn from the supposed absurd and contradictory representation of the doctrine of the Spirit's influence in certain passages of it; and show, that those texts on which you build your hypothesis, will none of them, if fairly interpreted, support it, and several of them are, in themselves, sufficient to subvert and overthrow it.

Now here, Sir, it seems proper to observe to the reader, that you have no where marshalled your arguments on this head; perhaps conscious, that they would make but an indifferent figure, when professedly brought together. You choose rather to boast, that they are many and great, than particularly to show us what they are: and therefore, after slightly mentioning a few texts in your 68th page, which I shall presently examine, you gallantly say, "It were endless to recount all the innumerable passages, throughout the whole Scripture, that concur in ascertaining this:" and then you intermingle the mention of several other texts, with the course of your declamation on this subject; not canvassing the sense or connexion of them, nor seeming to attend to any thing more than the sound: for which in the 105th page you make a general, and I think a remarkable, apology: "That in the haste of your zeal you may have laid yourself open unguardedly enough, if the thing were to be examined according to the rules of strict criticism; but that it is enough for your design, if the main drift and scope of your argument may be allowed to be, upon the whole, maintained only with some tolerable degree of propriety, so as to carry just the face of something plausible and consistent."

Your young friend, in his reply, has touched upon this extraordinary passage of yours, in so handsome a manner, as to render it less necessary for me to insist upon it. I am very ready to make you all the acknowledgments, which such a frank confession of your uncertainty, on a point which you have so often confidently asserted, can be supposed to merit. But really, Sir, I cannot agree with you, "that a critical punctuality is not at all material to the purpose in hand." If so desperate a charge be advanced against the gospel, as that it teaches the monstrous doctrine, which I have from your own Letter represented above, I am sure it ought to be proved in the most convincing manner, with such a critical punctuality as shall make it apparent, not only that some passages in it may possibly admit of such a sense, but that those on which you lay the main stress of your argument, cannot with any tolerable propriety bear any other. And if, when both the interpretations were proposed, there were some degree of probability in favour of yours, which I am persuaded will never in any one instance be the case; it would remain further to be examined, whether that preponderancy of probability were sufficient to counterbalance all the arguments in favour of Christianity, which must otherwise be given up as absurd. But this last consideration, which I mention chiefly on account of its great weight in every objection against the gospel, and because it seems to be so often forgot, need not to be insisted upon here; as I believe the reader will easily perceive, when the particulars are examined.

I have therefore given myself the trouble of collecting your proofs, as carefully as I can; and when I have placed them in what I apprehend their most natural order, I shall consider them particularly: and so much the rather, as several of the texts must be acknowledged to have some difficulty attending them, and I apprehend the examination of them may be agreeable and useful to many of my readers; though it be so unnecessary with regard to yourself, who it seems meant nothing more, than to amuse the world with what might carry just the face of something plausible; a trial of skill, which on so weighty a subject might well have been spared, and which may perhaps on the sequel be found, what attempts on Scripture generally are, rolling a stone which may return upon the mover, and may prove far more burthensome than was at first imagined.

Now here, that we may proceed in something of method, I will range the texts you have been pleased to produce, (either as containing your doctrine, or as referring to it,) in such an order, as I imagine may give the best varnish to the conclusion you would infer from them; at the same time mentioning the page in which you cite them, that the reader may be fully satisfied, they are such as you have thought fit to mention, how needless and how unfortunate soever to your cause the mention of some of them may appear.

In different places therefore you think proper to remind us, that our Lord himself taught, that no man could come unto him, unless it were given him by the Father; (p. 57.) and promiseth the Spirit, who was to testify of him, and to lead his followers into all truth: (ibid.) that accordingly, the apostles declare, that faith is the gift of God; (ibid.) and that he who believeth, hath the witness in himself, (p. 56.) which is so necessary in order to faith, that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost; (ibid.) for the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned, (p. 103.) even by that spiritual man, who judges all things, while he himself is judged of none: to him is made known that internal word, which is in his mouth, and in his heart, so that he need not say, Who shall ascend into heaven, or who shall descend into the deep? (P. 79, 80.) In reference to this therefore, he who believeth not, makes God a liar. (P. 54.) Without granting this, you tell us, we can never account for the apostle's pronouncing an anathema on himself, or an angel from heaven, who should preach a contrary doctrine; (p. 11.) or for his exhorting Christians to be all of one mind, and to think and speak the same thing, which without such an infallible universal teacher would be quite impossible. (P. 65.) With reference also to this teaching we are exhorted to become as little children, that we may enter into the kingdom of God; which you seem to understand as a command to lay aside our reason wherever religion is concerned: (p. 75.) in which sense, it seems, every high thing, i. e. every argument, is to be captivated to the obedience of Christ. (P. 84.) And finally, that if faith were built upon any other foundation, it would be utterly absurd to pray for its increase. (p. 10.) and that infant baptism, here taken for granted to be a divine institution, would on any other scheme be unjustifiable and unintelligible. P. 62. These, Sir, are as far as I can find) the grand foundations, on which you build the doctrine I am now opposing; but how precariously, I question not many will see from reading the enumeration I have given in this connexion, which is that I would have chosen for them, if they had been in this view my own arguments. Nevertheless, for the reasons given above, we will discuss them a little more particularly.

That we may remember what we are about, I must entreat my reader to recollect, that if the texts above answer your purpose, they must prove an immediate revelation of the whole system of Christianity, to every particular Christian, in such a manner, as to make it unnecessary for him to inquire into any other evidence from reason or Scripture, to evince the truth of the gospel in general, or of any branch of it which might be proposed to his examination.

Having premised this, I hope to make it appear, on the review,—that some of the texts in question do not refer to any revelation of truth at all;—that others were peculiar to the apostles;—and that no one of them will answer your purpose; because there is none but what may be fairly interpreted, in an important and useful sense, far short of what you would give it. I think, every one of the texts will fall under one or another of those three classes. And here, as I am not at puzzling the cause, but at stating the truth in a fair light, I shall at once allow you every where, as much as I do in my conscience think ought to be allowed to each passage in question; though I am very well aware, (as you may perhaps learn from some other hand,) that a great many things might be said to render some things dubious, which in the course of the argument I am ready to grant you.

When our Lord tells us, No man can come unto him, except it be given him of the Father; and the apostle testifies, that faith is the gift of God; it may indeed imply, that any one, who is brought cordially to believe the gospel, and to apply to Christ for salvation, according to the scheme laid down in it, has reason to ascribe it, not only to the divine goodness in granting him a revelation of the great truths of our religion, but also to the secret influence of divine grace upon his heart, so [illegible] his attention to those truths, and affecting his soul with them, as effectually to produce that cordial consent to the terms of the Christian covenant, which is often in Scripture expressed by "believing," or by "coming to Christ." And how many thousands will gladly acknowledge the reality of such an influence on their minds, who pretend to no immediate revelation, and who embrace the gospel because they see and rational evidence of it, as they apprehend sufficient to convince every impartial inquirer; an evidence within the reach of all who live in a Christian country; nay, actually attained by many, who, clearly as their understandings are convinced, feel nothing of the efficacy of these truths on their hearts!

Again, Our Lord pronounces, that the Spirit shall testify of him. But you will please to recollect, that this promise was immediately addressed to the apostles; and that it would have had an important meaning, if it had only referred to those miraculous works, by which the Spirit confirmed that glorious and convincing testimony, which the apostles bore to the truth of the gospel.—A promise to them, to guide them into all truth, might also be peculiar to the extraordinary office which they sustained, in order to the execution of which it was necessary, that these things should be taught them by an immediate and personal revelation, which thousands more might receive without any such revelation, from their lips or their writings. So that, if such an immediate revelation to every Christian in all ages, cannot be proved from some other argument, it is certain that the mention of this scripture will prove nothing to the purpose, and St. Paul's question, "Are all apostles?" will be a sufficient reply to the allegation of it on this occasion.

It seems indeed much more to your purpose that the apostle John, when writing to a community of Christians, speaks in language bearing some resemblance to this of our Lord, to him and his brethren in that illustrious office, particularly where it is said, that he who believes hath the witness in himself; and that they had an unction from the Holy One, and knew all things. Yet will neither of these expressions, which are some of the strongest used in the whole New Testament with reference to this point, by any means answer the purpose for which you produce them.

The believer may surely be said to have the witness within himself, as his personal experience of the power of the gospel on his own heart affords him a noble internal evidence of its truth. This is the interpretation, which Dr. Watts has at large given of this text, in his excellent Sermons upon it; and what I have said in my First Letter may, I hope, do something towards setting it in its just light. And though I acknowledge, that it is a very possible case, that some Christians may be favoured by God with uncommon operations on their souls, in consequence of which the evidence of their own sincere piety may, in an extraordinary manner, be cleared up, and their dejection and distress of spirit removed; yet I apprehend, that given above is the only sense in which it can be universally asserted concerning every believer, that he has such a witness within himself: as if it had been said, The true Christian, in whatever state or circumstance, has a work within, which, were it to be attentively surveyed in its proper light, would appear a glorious evidence of the divine authority of the gospel, by means of which it was to be produced.—And as this is the work of the Spirit of God upon the Christian's heart, it is an unction from the Holy One, in consequence of which he knows all things: not absolutely, so as to be omniscient, which I think you do not yourself pretend to be the sense of the phrase; but he knows, (according to that lax sense in which the word all is frequently used,) whatever is absolutely necessary for him to know, in order to his salvation and happiness, which is to him "all in all." He knows many great and glorious things, of which all who reject Christianity remain ignorant, and which those, who, though they profess it, yet do not cordially believe it, know but in a very lifeless and unaffecting manner, so that it hardly deserves to be called knowledge. In consequence of this, the happy persons spoken of above need not that any should teach them,* i. e. they need not to be taught over again those great lessons, which to the rest of the world are the most necessary of all others, and such as the apostle had been laying down above, that Jesus is the Christ, and that God hath promised us eternal life in him. Yet it was necessary, in the ordinary method of divine proceeding, that, previous to this anointing, they should be taught these things by human methods of instruction, as St. Paul argues; "How shall they believe in him, of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?" Nay, it is plain from other passages in this epistle, that the apostle John thought other lessons might be useful to them, though this unction of the Spirit had been poured out upon them, and had effectually taught them this.

I now come to that text of the apostle Paul, which you mention immediately after laying down the proposition of your Third Part, as if it were in so many words a demonstration of your doctrine, and call it "one plain word, by which it is fully set forth," that no man can say, Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.† But here, Sir, I suppose you will not maintain, that this text means to assert, that it is impossible for any man, without some special assistance of the Holy Ghost, to utter these words, Jesus is the Messiah; or even that it is impossible, without an immediate revelation of the truth of Christianity, to make a hypocritical profession of the Christian faith. Common sense therefore, and common justice, will require, that they be taken in a qualified interpretation of them. And I think, the design and meaning of them may best be fixed by consulting the context: a task, which in this, and every other place, seems too great a drudgery for such a sprightly and free genius as yours; and yet, Sir, quite necessary to every man, that thinks it worth his care not to speak at all adventurous when he quotes Scripture, and especially (as one would imagine) important, where a text is introduced with such a grand parade.

* 1 John ii. 27. † 1 Cor. xii. 3.

The apostle, in the chapter referred to, is evidently discoursing on the subject of spiritual gifts, or some extraordinary operations of the Holy Ghost in the primitive church, concerning which the state of things at Corinth made it necessary that he should give some directions. Now he lays down this as a preliminary, that there was no reason to apprehend, that any but Christians had any room to pretend they were under such operations; and on the other hand, that every true Christian, whether he were or were not distinguished by his miraculous gifts, had however felt the power and operation of the Spirit of God on his heart. And this I take to be the general sense of the 3d verse, on which you lay so great a stress: "No man, to be sure, speaking by the Spirit of God, calleth Jesus accursed. The Jews, who pronounce their solemn anathemas upon Christ, and blaspheme his name," (to which this phrase seems clearly to refer,) "though they may pretend to the Spirit of God, so often spoken of in their Scriptures, make a vain and impious pretence to it. And no man can call Jesus Lord, i. e. can really and cordially acknowledge his authority, but by virtue of the operation of the Holy Ghost upon his heart. So that some reverence is due in this respect to every Christian, even though his gifts should not be peculiarly bright; nay, though" (which for any thing I can find might often have been the case) "he should have received none of those miraculous gifts at all, about which you Corinthians so eagerly contend." In this easy view of the passage, the remark seems exceeding pertinent. But what imaginable connexion is there, between a sanctifying influence on the heart, productive of real piety, and a full revelation of a perfect creed at once, or of any single article before unknown, "with a light little different from intuition itself, and which renders the assistance of reason and Scripture quite superfluous." The manner in which the apostle addresses to the real Christians at Corinth, abundantly demonstrates, how far he was from supposing that to be the case, and how far he would have been from allowing such an inference from any principle laid down by him, here, or elsewhere.

As little to your purpose will you find that other boasted passage of St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans, which you quote in your 79th page, as if it were the very design of the apostle to establish your whole notion and doctrine in it. Accordingly you say, "But the passage that most fully, and beyond all possibility of misconception, describes to us the true nature of faith, in manifest opposition to that mistaken notion of a rational one, which some had it seems erroneously entertained, is in the tenth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, where the whole question is discussed at large, and thus precisely determined." And then you quote the words themselves, which are these: "The righteousness which is by faith is on this wise, Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven?—or who shall descend into the deep?—The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thine heart," &c.*

Now, Sir, you must pardon me, if I express my surprise, that you should thus pompously quote a passage, in which the clearness of the Scripture revelation is asserted, to prove that it is attended with such obscurity, that it is not to be expected, that any man should understand it, otherwise than in consequence of an immediate revelation, i. e. by miracle. I readily acknowledge, that the passage is something difficult; but it seems to me so far from clearly expressing your doctrine, that I do not see how it can bear to be interpreted so, as in any measure to give it the least countenance.

You well know, Sir, that these words are an allusion to, and a quotation from, the Old Testament;† where Moses, in his eloquent manner, congratulates the people of Israel on their being favoured with so clear and so full a discovery of the will of God in his written law; in consequence of which there was no need for them to say, Who shall go up for us to heaven?—or, who shall go over the sea for us?—The word is very nigh thee, says that illustrious legislator, even in thy mouth, and in thine heart, that thou mayest do it: it is easily understood, easily remembered, and on the whole, admirably fitted to impress and affect the mind. In allusion to this, the apostle, with great beauty and propriety, tells the Christians to whom he wrote, that the revelation of the gospel by Christ was as plain and evident, as that of the law by Moses: The righteousness which is of faith (i. e. the gospel, which teacheth us the way of justification by faith) speaketh on this wise, Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above;) or who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead:) as if he should have said, "Had Christ never descended from heaven, or had he never risen again from the depths of the earth in which he was buried, we might indeed have been at a loss to know the way of salvation, and might have been left, like the rest of the world, in a thousand doubts and uncertainties; but now, since Christ has descended from heaven to bring the gospel, and has risen from the dead to confirm it, we well know the way: and blessed be God, it is very easy and practicable.

* Rom. x. 6, 7, 8. † Deut. xxx. 11, 12, 14.

open to every one that shall receive the gospel, and very nigh him, in more senses than one, in the mouth, and in the heart. Let but the mouth, and the heart, do their respective parts, the one cordially believing in Christ, and the other courageously confessing him, in such a manner as to approve that inward sincerity; and salvation may be obtained, even though the law hath been broken, that awful law, which, intelligible as it was, did still rigorously insist upon it, that the man should exactly do its precepts, who would hope to live by them."* This, Sir, is the assertion and illustration of the apostle; and how widely this differs from the view in which you have introduced it, I am persuaded that you and my other readers will easily see. They will, no doubt, think the turn you have given it an instance of admirable invention and dexterous address; and as you seem not solicitous that it should be thought solid, I hope all parties will be agreed.

Another of your texts, which I would by no means leave uncanvassed, and which, at first appearance, seems much more favourable to your cause than the former, though not so much gloried in, is that of St. Paul in his first Epistle to the Corinthians: The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned, &c.† From hence you would infer that it is only by an immediate inspiration from the Spirit, that divine truths can be known, and consequently that reasoning must be quite superfluous in such a pursuit. I shall not here reply, as some have done, that ψυχικος signifies a man who proceeds in his religious inquiries merely on principles of natural reason; while πνευματικος signifies one who admits of a divine revelation, and allows arguments deduced from its authority. If this were to be granted as the sense of these two words, the meaning of the text would be, that revelation teaches some things which reason could never have discovered. This, I think, is the sense Dr. Clagget gives of the passage, in his laboured explication of it; but I cannot acquiesce in it, because it will by no means follow from hence, that the natural man cannot receive them, and they must be foolishness to him: on the contrary, were a man to reason well, he might in many instances discover harmony, beauty, and wisdom, in those doctrines, schemes, and facts, which are known only by revelation. I shall therefore grant, that by the natural man we are to understand, one who is sunk in the animal life ‡ one, who under the influence of those false maxims, which the corruption of mankind has introduced into the world, is rendered carnal, and sensual, and consequently attached to views of secular interest, or vain glory. Such persons are indeed unwilling to admit of such truths as the gospel teaches, and therefore choose rather to object against its evidence, than to submit to its instructions. This the apostle might well assert; and as the counterpart of the thought might lead his readers to reflect, that they who feel these prejudices conquered in their minds, and are brought to discern the beauty and glory of those truths which the gospel teaches, have reason to ascribe it to the influence of the divine Spirit on their hearts; or in other words, to own, that these truths (which were at first revealed to the apostles by the Spirit of God, and therefore are called his things) are spiritually discerned. In consequence of which the happy man, almost like one restored to sight among the blind, ανακρινει παντα, discerns all the objects with which he is surrounded, while he himself υπ' ουδενος ανακρινεται is discerned by none of them; but perhaps is proudly censured, by these prejudiced and bigoted creatures, as a mere visionary, for those judgments which are most rationally formed, on principles which every impartial inquirer would understand. If this easy interpretation of the words be admitted, they will appear quite foreign to your purpose, and applicable to multitudes to whom no single truth of Christianity was taught by miracle, but who by divine grace was inclined to receive that gospel, which the apostle tells us, in the preceding verse, he and his brethren taught, comparing spiritual things with spiritual: a care, which, whether it refers to the manner of their investigation, or to that of communicating the sacred knowledge, would be quite unnecessary on your hypothesis. So unlucky for your cause will criticism and connexion be found, in this instance, as well as the former.

That he, who disbelieves the gospel, maketh God a liar, (i. e. rejects his testimony as unworthy of credit,) will be true, if God has borne any testimony to the gospel at all, which is, or might be, known by such a rejecter of it; and will be no less the case, where the external testimony of miracles is in question, than if the inward impression, which you maintain, were to be granted. This text, therefore, by no means determining how the testimony is borne, can be of no service to your cause.—Nor will that cause find a surer refuge in those words of St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians: Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach a different gospel to you, let him be accursed.§ This is only a strong way of saying, that the gospel, which they had already been taught, was so assuredly true, that any one, who should presume to contradict it, far from being worthy of any regard, would rather be

* Rom. x. 5. † 1 Cor. ii. 14.

‡ This, I think, the etymology of the word ψυχικος may well intimate: and the use of it elsewhere may warrant the explication. Compare 1 Cor. xv. 44. Jam. iii. 15. and Jude, ver. 19. on the two last of which passages it is rendered sensual.

§ Gal. i. 8.

worthy of a curse; and that it would be an argument of damnable apostasy, in an apostle, or even an angel, to attempt to subvert it. Were this passage to be taken in the most rigorous sense that can be imagined, it would amount to no more than this; that the evidence which they had received of the truth of Christianity, was greater than God would ever permit an angel to bring against it, were it possible for one of those celestial spirits to revolt, and appear with a contrary doctrine. And this is what we all believe, upon this general principle, that God will never permit any evil spirit, (and such any angel contradicting the gospel would certainly be,) to work more and greater miracles to overthrow Christianity, than have already been wrought to confirm it. Now this might have been true, even though all the operations of the Spirit had ceased in the remoter ages of the church, or though the illumination of our minds by his immediate influence had been no part of his office.

But you triumph greatly in this thought, that without such a plenary revelation of the truth, to every particular person, by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost, it would be impossible that all men should be of one mind; which nevertheless the apostle prays that Christians might be, and exhorts them to labour after. But I wonder, Sir, you should not see, that when he offers this petition for them, or addresses them with such an exhortation, he plainly supposes, they were not at present under such a uniting guidance, in consequence of which (as you express it) they were preserved from the least possibility of mistake. So that, even on your own principles, you must be obliged to admit of some qualifying interpretation: and it so easily presents itself, that I think hardly any writer but yourself has missed it. To be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and the same sentiment, (as I think it is most natural to translate εν τη αυτη γνωμη;*) to have the same mutual disposition or affection, το αυτο φρονειν εν αλληλοις, as it is elsewhere expressed, † or εις αλληλους, as in the parallel passage, ‡) plainly signifies to cultivate harmony, or unanimity, or to maintain a friendly disposition towards each other, notwithstanding some diversity in their taste, opinion, or customs. And that this is the meaning of the expression is evident, from what the apostle elsewhere says, both to the Corinthians and to the Romans, to whom these exhortations are addressed; where he supposes there would be a difference in opinion and practice among them in some things, and yet urges them to think favourably of each other, and to receive one another, § as Christ had received them all, if sincere Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles, and how different soever their apprehensions might be, as to the lawfulness or unlawfulness, the expediency or inexpediency, of some practices which were in question among them. And thus does the apostle explain himself in that parallel text, ‖ where, when he had so tenderly entreated them, by the consolation of Christ, by the comfort of love, and by the communion of the Spirit, that they should be like-minded, [ινα το αυτο φρονητε, that ye may be unanimous,] he adds, having the same love, being of one accord, την αυτην αγαπην εχοντες, συμψυχοι, which two phrases explain the former; as if he should have said, Let your souls be joined together in the same love: and then he adds, το εν φρονουντες, which if it be not a mere repetition of the first clause, το αυτο φρονητε, be unanimous, may perhaps be rendered, attend to and prosecute (the το εν) the one thing, that great concern of vital practical religion, the service of God and the salvation of the soul, which our divine Master has recommended to us as the one thing needful. How well this interpretation suits the Greek word, φρονειν, used in all these places, you, Sir, if at all conversant with Greek writers, cannot but know. And if you are a stranger to them, which I would not suppose, I am sorry you have been misled by an English translation, to fasten an absurdity upon the sacred writer; as if he was childish enough to imagine, that entreaties could bring people to think alike in disputed points; and this without telling them (which on your supposition must be the case) what that one thing was, in which they were to think alike. Whereas on our easy and obvious interpretation there needed no such explication at all; as the exhortation referred to a charitable temper, recommended in a variety of strong expressions, and not to this or that particular sentiment. And, permit me to say, though by way of digression, Would to God these texts were rightly understood by Christians in general; and that such a divine principle of mutual love, in consequence of our union to Christ, might prevail more, where we cannot in your sense be of one mind, nor unite in one external form, whether of worship or discipline! I would hope, the attacks made on common Christianity are in some measure leading us to this. And I heartily pray, that infinite wisdom may overrule that evil, to the production of so great a good.

The only scriptures in the catalogue which I gave above, which remain yet unhandled, are those which relate to our becoming as little children, that we may enter into the kingdom of God,¶ and to the captivating every thought to the obedience of Christ. The former of these passages stands more immediately opposed to ambitious views of worldly greatness, than to an overweening opinion of our own understanding; though I readily acknowledge, that according to the genius of our Lord's teaching in general, it may well be considered as a warning against the latter, to which the text in Corinthians does no doubt relate. But what can you infer from hence to support the peculiarities of your doctrine? We readily grant you, that such texts remind us of what indeed reason itself would teach, if impartially consulted, that when we have discovered the evidence of a divine revelation, which the natural weakness of our minds might engage us to wish, and to inquire after, we are teachably to submit to its instructions. We are to be sensible, that our own understandings, when compared with the Supreme Intelligence, are infinitely less than that of a little child, when compared with ours. We are therefore humbly and quietly to sit down, as it were, at the feet of the Divine Teacher; and though several plausible objections may arise in our minds, and many things taught may be inconsistent with our preconceived prejudices, and with what through their influence we should have expected, we are to suffer those prejudices to be overruled by so high an authority, and to acquiesce in this, that the Lord has said it: and this is as really our duty, when he is speaking to us by his messengers, as it was theirs when he was speaking immediately to them. So that you can never infer from hence a personal, and much less a complete and instantaneous, inspiration, till you have proved, either that I can never be assured that God speaks by another, or that if I am, I may disregard it, and dispute against it. The latter of which is so notoriously absurd, that I never heard it seriously maintained; and the former has been a thousand times confuted by those who have written in defence of Christianity, and so lately in particular by those who have answered that unhappy creature who called himself the Moral Philosopher, that I need say nothing of it here, especially after what I have written in my former Letters.

* 1 Cor. i. 10. † Rom. xv. 5. ‡ Rom. xii. 16. § 2 Cor. xi. 11. Rom. xv. 7. ‖ Phil. ii. 1, 2. ¶ Matt. xviii. 3.  2 Cor. x. 5.

But I cannot dismiss the head without reminding you of one important scripture, which illustrates the explication I have given of those last mentioned with a beautiful variety of most proper expression. I mean that in the First Epistle of Peter, where the apostle exhorts Christians, that laying aside all malignity, and debate, and hypocrisy, and envy, and calumny, (so common among some who call themselves Christians, and so often exercised against the most faithful and zealous ministers of the gospel,) they should, like new-born babes, desire (as we render it) the sincere milk of the word, that they might grow thereby.* It is in the original τὸ λογικὸν ἄδολον γάλα, the rational guileless milk. Which is as if he had said, "The instruction we give to those of you who are yet but little children in Christianity, is sincere and unadulterated, as milk that flows immediately from the breast of the mother into the mouth of the infant; and if you will exercise your reason honestly and wisely, you may easily see, how excellent and useful our doctrine and precepts are. Come then, with the gentleness and simplicity of little children, and receive them; while we are ready, with all the tenderness of an affectionate mother for her suckling, to impart them to you; to impart, not only the gospel of God, but, if it were possible, even our own souls also, because you are dear to us."†

This is indeed, according to the wise and affectionate expression of St. Paul, to be at once in malice children, and in understanding men.‡ For I can think of nothing so rational, as diligently to examine the credentials of any thing offered us as a message from God, and then humbly to submit to it without cavilling and disputing, when we are satisfied that it wears the stamp of his authority. Whereas to set at nought all the internal and external evidence of Christianity so often represented, insisting on it as the absolute condition of our believing, that if it be immediately revealed to us from heaven by miraculous, perfect, and irresistible inspiration, is so far from looking like this infant simplicity, that it seems much more to favour of that malignity and haughtiness of temper, which such passages as these were intended to guard us against. So unhappy have you generally been, from first to last, in the choice of those scriptures by which you would just add some face of probability to a notion in itself so absurd, as that which you have advanced concerning the illumination of the Spirit.

There are several other scriptures, Sir, which, in the course of your harangue, you have occasionally touched upon; as if you thought they afforded some countenance to that notion: but the inference is so precarious, that one would really imagine, you mentioned them only with an intent to make your pamphlet as rich as possible in such kind of burlesque. I am sure you will acknowledge, that those I have already canvassed are the strength of your cause. However, for the vindication of the others from that injury you have offered them, I shall touch here (by way of digression) on two or three passages of Scripture, which you, Sir, seem to have brought in merely for the sake of exposing them to contempt: a contempt, of which I think they will appear by no means worthy, and consequently which may fall where it was least intended.

In your 66th page you refer to what is said of the Samaritans,§ and tell us, "It is recorded many believed in Christ readily for the saving of the woman." And then you add, with great triumph, "a notable foundation truly for confidence and conviction, and perhaps martyrdom," &c. Now, Sir, it is hard to imagine for what purpose this reflection could be introduced, unless it were to give a specimen of your good-will to the Scripture: it seems in effect telling the world, that you think St. John has assigned a very ridiculous reason for their faith, and consequently was a despicable writer, in this instance at least. I shall not insist on your quoting the text with the addition of the word readily, which is perhaps in Italics by mistake of the printer. But I desire it may be remembered, that we cannot infer from this expression, that these Samaritans were brought to a true and saving faith in Christ, so as to continue in his word, and approve themselves his disciples indeed; which you artfully take for granted, in your manner of putting the case. You will find little reason confidently to infer this, from its being said they believed in him, if you recollect, that the evangelist, but a few paragraphs before, (i. e. in the conclusion of his second chapter,) had spoken of many who believed in Christ, to whom he would not commit himself, because he knew what was in man; i. e. he knew their faith was not resolute and sincere, nor they persons on whose steadiness and fidelity he could depend. So it is very possible, that some of these Samaritans, knowing the woman, might from her report learn to conceive of Christ as an extraordinary person, from whom therefore they entertained some great expectation; though they might not have the resolution to follow him fully, as you suppose they would of course do, even to martyrdom. Indeed when Christ was come into their city, and had discoursed among them, we are told, that many more believed, because of his own word; and they declare, that now they believed, not because of her saying, but because they had heard him themselves; which intimates, that they looked on her testimony as a very small matter, when compared with the satisfaction which their personal converse with Christ had given them. And if any of the persons, who at first declared their regard to Christ on the testimony of the woman, could afterwards be so regardless of him, as not to give him the hearing, though he abode two days in their city, it was surely a very bad specimen of that faith and zeal, which you think would have engaged them to lay down their lives in his cause; as it would plainly show that they apprehended themselves very little concerned with him, how extraordinary a person soever he might be.

Presently after you mention another text, as it seems, much with the same pious design, namely, that in which our Lord upbraids the two disciples on their way to Emmaus, saying, Oh fools, and slow of heart to believe, &c.! * And then you add, "Can any one imagine, all this was merely because a narrative of four hours had not wrought a thorough conviction? Is it to be believed, that God would reproach any of his creatures with a defective intellect, when he was pleased to give them no better?" We have here, Sir, a complication of mistakes: the one (as in a former instance) founded upon the impropriety of our translation, in rendering ἀνόητοι, fools, which (as I have elsewhere observed †) ought to be translated, in a softer manner, thoughtless or inconsiderate creatures; which contains no reflection at all on the natural defect of their intellect, but on their culpable neglect of using the rational powers which they possessed. I cannot forbear adding, that if the miraculous illumination, which you suppose referred to, had been so irresistible and instantaneous, as you tell us it was, there would have been no room for any such reflection, and consequently the text would be left quite defenceless, which on the common interpretation admits of so easy a solution. There is another error in supposing, as you do, that the ground of this gentle reprehension was only, "that a narrative of four hours had not wrought a thorough conviction."‡ If you mean by a narrative of four hours, our Lord's discourse with them as they were walking to Emmaus, it is unlucky indeed. For not to say, how many hours this conversation might employ, which is not very material; it is certain, this reproof was previous to the principal part of this conversation, as you will easily see in the passage itself, and referred to the opportunities they had enjoyed for months and years before, of acquainting themselves with the prophetic writings; which if they had diligently and impartially done, they would have judged it no incredible or improbable report, which they had received from the women who had been at the sepulchre, and affirmed that Jesus was risen from the dead.

I shall take notice but of two passages more, which you have in like manner disguised, that you might the more easily expose them. These are what you introduce in page 78, where you say, "That the Scripture test and standard for finding out the spirits of truth is no more than this: Hereby shall ye know them: Every one that confesseth that Christ is come in the flesh is of God. Now, (say you,) this is evidently what philosophers call arguing in a circle, and begging the question;" (which, by the way, are not [illegible] terms;) "but in faith we see it is a necessary preliminary. He that cometh to God must believe that he is. As to the latter part of this sentence every body will perceive, that, however dignified by Italics, it is a scripture of your own making. It is indeed said in the Epistle to the Hebrews, that he who cometh to God, must believe that he is. The sense of which is plainly this, "that a persuasion of the being of a God must be the foundation of all rational religion, and particularly of all devotional addresses." And how a person of your sense could think of representing this as a circular argument, it is almost impossible to imagine; unless it were merely to humour the character you had assumed, of a Christian whose rapturous and enthusiastical divinity might transport him into an entire forgetfulness of his logic, and perhaps teach him to reckon that forgetfulness among the special gifts of the Spirit, which he imagined he had received?—But as to the former, or to speak more properly, the only text of Scripture which you have here repeated, (for the other is merely burlesqued,) I mean that in John,* Archbishop Tillotson might long since have furnished you with an explication, which sets it above this cavil, which I confess, from the mere sound of the words, might easily present itself to the mind of a superficial reader. He justly observes, (if I remember his interpretation right,) that this epistle was written, when Christianity had been for a considerable time settled in the world; and that it might now be considered as a test of doctrines, sufficiently confirmed by a train of most illustrious miracles, and a variety of other evidence. In consequence of this, a person, presuming to teach by any spirit, that Jesus was not come in the flesh, might as reasonably be rejected by Christians, as a pretended prophet among the Jews, who, upon the credit of a dream, or a vision, should attempt to draw them to idolatry. The evidence attending the Mosaic religion was so vastly superior to that, which could be supposed to arise from any pretended dream, vision, or sign, that he might be justly and reasonably rejected without looking into his credentials. But will this, Sir, at all prove, that these persons to whom the apostle addresses, received Christianity at first without any evidence at all; laying it down as a first principle, that it was true, and (resolving nevertheless to reason a little) inferring from thence it was true, and roundly concluding it is divine, because it is divine? This, Sir, is your candid representation of the matter: but I would hope, few readers' heads are weak enough, even after your whirl of words, to be turned round in this imaginary circle.

* Luke xxiv. 25.

† [illegible]

‡ [illegible]

But to return from this digression, I shall proceed now to examine the only two arguments which I remember on the head I have been speaking to, that are yet unanswered; I mean, that from our being required to pray for the increase of our faith, and that which you draw from infant baptism.

I readily grant you, (without cavilling at the argument as drawn from a particular scripture,) that it is our duty to pray that our faith may be increased: but I think no argument can be drawn from hence, to prove that it is not to be promoted by rational methods; any more than we can argue, that virtue is not to be rationally cultivated, because we are to pray for its growth in our souls. What I have already said of God's operating upon us as rational creatures, and in concurrence with the exercise of our own faculties, when compared with what I have said in my Second Letter, concerning the nature of true faith, is an abundant solution of this objection. Reasonably may we desire, that God would awaken our minds to diligence in searching after truth; that he would present the evidence of it before us in a clear and convincing light; that he would guard our hearts from those corrupt prejudices which might obstruct its entrance into them; and that he would remind us, from time to time, of those great religious truths which we do believe, with such spirit and energy, that our temper of life may, in a suitable manner, be influenced by the realizing persuasion. In such a prayer, methinks, every virtuous deist must join; as I firmly believe, that would men heartily join in it, and act accordingly, they would soon cease to be deists in the negative sense of the word. And in proportion to the degree in which we see evident reason to believe the truth of Christianity, we may reasonably pray, that God, by the influences of his Holy Spirit on our minds, would give us more comprehensive views of its evidence, and would impress a more lively sense of its great principles on our hearts; that our faith may not be a cold assent, but powerful in the production of its genuine fruits.

It is, on the other hand, very true, that a man, who does not see reason to believe the gospel to be a divine revelation, cannot rationally pray to be confirmed in that belief, or even to be brought to it; but it is evident that whatever rule the Scripture gives on this head, it gives to those who profess to admit its divine authority. And a search into rational evidence is so far from being inconsistent with such a prayer, that where doubts and difficulties arise in the mind, which, though they do not entirely destroy the assent, introduce perplexity, such inquiry is the wisest method we can take to secure an answer to our prayers: provided they be reverently, prudently, and candidly made. But this rather belongs to the subject of my First Letter. What I have just now said, may be sufficient to show, that the Scripture, if it encourages us to pray for the increase of faith, (which I readily allow that it does,) gives us no room at all to expect any new revelation in answer to those prayers, which is the only view in which the mention of them could be material to your cause.

I shall conclude this head with asking you seriously, whether you think Simplicius desired or expected an immediate revelation, like that which you describe, when he prays, "that God would accurately rectify the reason which he has given us, and remove the mist that hangs upon our understandings, that we may discern things human and divine!" If you think such a prayer as this consistent with the use of reason, which he desires might be purified and guided, you will easily see, that we may on the very same principle pray for the increase of faith, without any of those enthusiastical apprehensions, which you represent as essential to Christianity.

* 1 John iv. 2.

There yet remains to be considered the argument you draw from infant baptism, which you apprehend would be very absurd, if it were not supposed to be attended with such a communication of the Spirit, as that which is now in debate between us. "Can a man," say you, "be baptized into a rational religion?" (By which I suppose you mean, Can that religion be rational of which infant baptism is a part?) "Where is reason concerned, when babes accept the terms of salvation by deputy, and are entitled to all the privileges of the most extensive faith by another's act? By the baptismal ceremony they commence true believers at once, and are made heirs of heaven, you know, by the faith of their bondsmen." (P. 9.) And to the same purpose, in your 69th page, "The merits of the most finished conviction are already theirs by imputation," &c.

Now here, Sir, I am obliged to say, that if there be any form of baptism in the Christian world, which justifies such inferences, and such a manner of speaking, I am extremely sorry for it. But I am very confident, the Scripture teaches nothing of this kind, and it is by that, and not by the tokens of any particular church, whether popish or protestant, that the merits of this cause are to be tried.

I cannot see how any sponsor, whether he be or be not a parent, can pretend to answer for a child, that he shall believe or obey the gospel: nor does the bringing children to baptism by any means imply it. What reason we have to conclude infant baptism a rite of divine institution, I shall not now inquire. It is enough if I show, that admitting it to be so, (which I really think it is very reasonable that we should admit,) it by no means implies this absurd consequence. Other ends might be answered by it, valuable enough to justify the wisdom of the ordinance: as for instance, Hereby parents may give a public token of their faith in Christianity, and their consequent desire that their children may partake of its benefits, and answer its demands: Hereby they may solemnly declare their resolution to train them up in the institutions of our blessed Master, and their resignation of them to the disposal of Divine Providence, if God should see fit early to remove them: This also may remain, throughout all generations, as a memorial of the tenderness which our Lord showed to little children, and of the perpetuity of that connexion, the efficacy of which reaches from one generation to another. And to add no more, it may be a proper occasion for affectionate addresses to the children afterwards, as being already listed under the banners of Christ, so far as they could be listed by the act of another; so that they must either confirm, or, in effect at least, renounce, what was then done. All these valuable purposes, and many more, may be answered by infant baptism. But it will by no means follow hence, that this rite affects the eternal state of the child, or that it did affect it, there must be such an extraordinary communication of the Spirit to it, as you suppose. You allow, in express terms, that there is no act of the child at all, and that it believes nothing. How this consists with its having a perfect faith wrought in its mind at once, is not possible for me to conceive. I must therefore conclude, that you meant nothing more than to expose this practice, as you elsewhere expose persecution, by intimating that it cannot be defended, unless your doctrine were to be granted; whence you are sure, every thinking man, who yields to this part of your argument, will conclude that it cannot be defended at all. On the other hand, it seems sufficient for me here to have shown, that your notion is not connected with Christianity, even allowing infant baptism to be a part of it. May the time at length come, when a zeal for the honour of the gospel shall more effectually engage all its ministers, to adhere to the purity both of its doctrines and institutions, and not to overload it with those additions of their own, which furnish its adversaries with matter of triumph! In the mean time, may those adversaries consider that they are answerable to God for the impartiality, with which they inquire into the contents of Christianity, and that they are not to take their notions of it from the New Testament alone, which it pays [illegible] pleased to have done, you would never have mentioned this argument; nor from any thing you could have met with there, could you ever have thought of it.

Having thus despatched the [illegible] of your pamphlet, I do not remember any thing very material in it, which I have left untouched; for little slips, which neither affect the main argument, nor the honour of Scripture, are not proper for the notice of one, who values his own time and his reader's, and seeks not to insult his antagonist, nor to expose him to any unnecessary contempt. Yet I cannot close without a remark or two on what you insinuate, with no small [illegible] concerning "the ingenuous contrivance" [illegible] pleased to call it) of abating the degree of evidence to leave the more room for the merit of voluntary with the duty of cultivating a pious propensity to the affirmative, soliciting the assent of our own minds, and endeavouring to help our unbelief." (P. 111.) This manner of representation is so ludicrous, that it is not easy to determine your meaning. But I suppose it to be this. Some considerable writers in favour of our religion have often said, what indeed many passages of Scripture seem to favour, "that the degree of evidence attending it was wisely adjusted in such a manner, as to make it as a touchstone to the temper of those to whom it came; and that instead of quarrelling with Providence for not giving it the greatest possible evidence, we ought rather to adore its wisdom in such an adjustment." This seems to be the notion you ridicule; and if it be, I wish, that for your own security from the rebound of ridicule ill placed, you had condescended to show its absurdity.—Seriously to maintain that such a sentiment is contemptible, would indeed be another stab at natural religion, as well as revealed. Do you imagine it, Sir, impossible, that the blessed God should have given any more convincing proofs of his being and perfections, than those which every man now actually sees? I grant, these proofs are sufficient to convince any reasonable person: but I ask it again, Whether God could not contrive any which should be more striking, and in fact more effectual? To say, that he could not, is limiting the Holy One of Israel in so foolish and so profane a manner, that I hope, Sir, you would abhor the imputation of it: and to own, that he could have done it, and yet has omitted it, if at the same time he acts wisely, is in effect owning the notion you so scornfully reject; or, in other words, owning that an evidence attempered and abated in a certain degree is such, as it is fit for God to give, and to prefer, in many instances, to higher degrees in their own nature very possible.—And where, I beseech you, Sir, is the absurdity of thus trying men's integrity, any more than of trying their other virtues in the course of life? Is it not possible, there may be a certain degree of pride, or of licentiousness, so odious to God, that he should give even to his own revelation, only such a degree of evidence as he knows such persons will, through the free and criminal abuse of their own faculties, be ready to reject with scorn; while persons of a more humble and ingenuous temper will see and submit to it? Nay, I will add, must it not of course be so in the nature of things, that the internal evidence of any revelation must strike those minds most, that have the truest taste of moral excellency. One would have thought, that what the sagacious author of "the Analogy between Reason and Religion" has there said on this subject, might have engaged any one who has read it, as you intimate you have done, to treat the topic with more respect; and I shall remit you to a repeated perusal of that solid and useful treatise, with only this one further question, "Whether you do not think there is such a thing in the human heart, as the counterpart to the character you deride,—an impious propensity to the negative, a soliciting the dissent of our own minds, and an endeavouring to promote our own unbelief?" If you think the will has no remote influence upon the understanding as to its inquiry into truth, and that corrupt affections never lead a man into error, from which (had his heart been more upright) he might easily have been preserved, you contradict not only yourself, (compare p. 63, 64.) but the common sense and experience of mankind; and introduce an universal fatality, that worst of monsters, which will swallow up virtue and religion together, and leave the mind an easy prey to every error, and to every vice, which will owe its cheap victory to the air of irresistibility, with which it makes its appearance.

And is this, Sir, after all, the situation in which you would wish to leave the mind of your reader? or is it such a situation, that a wise and benevolent man would think it worthy of his time and labour, to endeavour to bring his own mind, and that of others, into it? I would entreat you, Sir, at parting, seriously to consider, how far you would have reason to rejoice in the success of what you have written, if it should be thus successful. I should think nothing more instructive and edifying to you, than to pause on the consequences. You would indeed thereby gain a triumph: but would you, if you were a soldier, for the sake of that, lay your country in ruins? And what else would your success in this controversy do? Let us suppose men convinced, that neither Christianity, nor natural religion, are capable of being rationally defended, or (if you like the expression better) are founded on argument: and what follows? You would indeed thereby free some, for whom it is possible you may have some peculiar concern, from the great anxiety which the secret apprehensions of religion give them, in the pursuit of their prohibited pleasures: yet could you not secure them entirely from some recoilings of heart, and anguish of conscience, which will sometimes be thrown into convulsions even by these very opiates. At least, in the intervals of these agonies, you would embolden them to lay the reins on the neck of appetite and passion, which, where human laws, or an innate generosity of temper, did not restrain, would trample down every other obstacle, and drive on to the ruin of society. And as for those who are truly religious, you would, as Tully speaks, on supposition of a much smaller evil, (the ruin of friendship,) take the very sun out of their heaven. You would destroy the entertainment of their solitude, the cement of their friendship, the joy of their prosperity, the support of their adversity, the light of their life, the hope of their death; and would leave the most pious mind of all others the most desolate. For what desolation can be imagined equal, or comparable, to that of falling from so high a hope, from so glorious a prospect, into the gloomy, cheerless, and hopeless state, in which a mind destitute of religion must of necessity find itself? If this, Sir, were to be the certain effect of reading your book, (as I think it must be, if the principles of it were to be admitted, and its consequences pursued,) what a calamity must it have been to any wise and good man to meet with it. I shall not aggravate at large; but only add, that to have been, though ever so undesignedly, the instrument of such mischief, the fatal occasion of grieving the good, of hardening the bad, of subverting religion, and, by an inseparable consequence, of dishonouring God, and of ruining men, is certainly to be numbered among the most lamentable evils.

It is possible, indeed, that you did not lay a plot for all this. If you will permit me, Sir, to speak with all plainness and freedom, I am ready in my own judgment to conclude, from comparing one thing with another, that you are a kind of humourous sceptic, who intended chiefly to amuse the world, and to show your address in puzzling the cause, and attacking Christianity in a peculiar disguise, which you apprehended you could manage artfully on a side which seemed to you most open. Perhaps you attended to no further consequence, than that some of your readers would smile, and some of them would be confounded, and many say you had played your part in a dexterous manner, and cut out work for divines, who, amidst the variety of forms you assume, might find it more difficult to deal with you, than with at [illegible] openly declares war, and wears a habit by which he may more certainly be known. Views like these may amuse and animate a light imagination, and it may look no further. But the effect of action depends not on our foresight. This is certain, either religion, both natural and revealed, must be judged irrational; or your book, whatever you meant by it, must be judged pernicious, and must draw after it a very solemn account in the presence of God. I heartily pray, you may be thoughtful of that account in time, and dismiss you, as you did your young correspondent, with a text of Scripture, which contains an admonition, the weight of which no intelligent heathen could question. How gaily soever you may have affected to sport yourself with these important topics, "be not deceived, for God is not mocked;" but "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." A harvest of future glory, I suppose, no man in our age and country expects to secure by opposing Christianity; and I will venture to say, that, so far as I can learn, few of its enemies, various as their forms, and specious as some of their pretences may have been, have for the present raised the character of their knowledge, or of their virtue, among the best judges and examples of both, by any attack they have made upon it. And if you, Sir, how considerable soever your natural talents may be, should prove the first exception to this general remark, it will be a great surprise to

Your most humble servant,

P. DODDRIDGE

Northampton, March 1, 1742-3.

A FRIENDLY LETTER

TO

THE PRIVATE SOLDIERS, IN A REGIMENT OF FOOT,

WHICH WAS ONE OF THOSE

ENGAGED IN THE IMPORTANT AND GLORIOUS BATTLE OF CULLODEN

GENTLEMEN, April 16, 1747.

I HOPE you will excuse whatever freedom may attend this Address, as it proceeds from sincere respect and affection. I look upon a brave soldier with great esteem. He is the guardian of his country; and every one who is a friend to it, ought under that character to honour him, and love him: and they in particular, who were, as you have been, the happy instruments in the hand of God, of delivering us from the worst of enemies, and of cutting off great numbers of those traitors and rebels who would have left us nothing worth fighting or living for, have a peculiar claim to our regard.

You, gentlemen, to whom I now write, had your part in the labours and dangers of that glorious day; and blessed be God, you were preserved in it; preserved, I hope, to be further blessings to your country. Divine Providence has now (as the date reminds me) lengthened out your lives to another year: and I should be very ungrateful, if I did not wish, that your years may be happily multiplied, and that God may reward and bless you with present prosperity and future happiness. But to pretend to wish this, and not to endeavour to promote it, were unworthy the profession of a Christian. I cannot therefore allow myself to be silent on an occasion, in which I am sure both are nearly concerned.

Give me leave to speak plainly to you. It is the character of a brave man, to love to hear the truth without reserve or disguise: it is the character of an honest man and real friend, to speak it. I had ten times rather commend than blame; but as circumstances at present stand, I will do so much violence to my own inclination, as plainly and boldly to tell you, I am extremely grieved to see, that so many of you have so little sense of the goodness of the blessed God, your protector, and that you take no greater care to secure his favour, upon which your safety and happiness both for time and eternity does so evidently depend.

You will however observe, that I charge nothing that is amiss upon the whole body of you. I have the pleasure to be informed, that there are some among you of a very worthy character, who seem to have a sense, not only of decency and morality, but of true religion; and I hope, that such will always meet with the distinguished respect and encouragement which they deserve. No single man among you therefore would have been charged, nor consequently injured, if I had mentioned the name of your regiment, or the town in which you are now quartered: but out of my tenderness to you, I forbear this; and suppress my own name, as of no importance in the present address. And with this precaution, which (if you think at all) you must see proceeds from great respect, I will now go on to tell you as plainly as possible, what it is that offends and grieves me; and what, if God may bless this weak attempt, I sincerely desire to be the instrument of reforming.

The evil which I have most immediately in view, is, that you do in such an open, contemptuous, and indeed outrageous manner, profane the great and glorious name of God, and mock at his most awful judgments. I write to you in the warmth and anguish of my heart, under a very late and lamentable instance of this; which is one, among many others. In walking out, not an hour ago, a few yards from my own house, I have heard one company of you swearing on the right hand, and another on the left. I have heard the same abominable language from the windows of the houses where you are quartered: and it often reaches me, and wounds my ears, as I sit in my study.—You are calling upon God to damn you; to damn your souls; to damn your blood: and this is your language to each other; the wish you are forming for friends, as well as enemies. My heart burns with indignation, and melts with compassion at the same time, while I hear this foolish, this detestable language. I know, that to reprove you as I pass by you in the streets, would be more likely to provoke and exasperate, than to reform you: and therefore I do humbly and meekly, yet earnestly, beseech you, to hear me a little, while I address you in this manner, that I may deliver my own soul at least; and that, if it be possible, I may contribute towards delivering yours.

Permit me therefore to ask you, Sirs, Do you believe there is a God? and that there is such a thing as damnation?—If you do not, how absurd is it to talk of it, and to wish it to yourselves and each other!—If you do, as I dare say you do, let me beseech you to consider, who this God is; and what is damnation.

Do you not indeed know, that God is the greatest and best of all beings? that he made you? that he preserves you every moment? that he gives you breath, while you use it thus to his dishonour? And have you never been told, or have you forgot, that he said once from the midst of the flames, while the mountain was trembling, and a whole mighty army were ready to die with fear; "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain: for the Lord will not hold him guiltless, that taketh his name in vain?" Have you not often heard this? And have you not often said, on hearing it, "Lord have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law?" How monstrous then is it, thus insolently to break it continually, almost with every breath! Who are you, that dare thus boldly to provoke God Almighty to his face? Can you possibly imagine, that you are able to resist him? If you were ten thousand times as many as you are, could he not bring you in a moment all down together to the dust of death, and to the flames of hell?

Let me ask you again, do you know what damnation is? Did you ever consider what it signifies? Why, to be damned, is to be pronounced accursed by God in the great day of judgment. It is, for God to say to a poor creature, Depart from me accursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. It is, to be plunged into that lake, which burns with fire and brimstone, and burns for ever, which is the second death. It is, to go to that place, where Christ tells us, the worm never dies, and the fire is never quenched. And do you indeed wish this to yourselves? Do you think you could bear it? Poor creatures! How have I seen some of the strongest and boldest men in our army ready to faint, when they have been hung up, perhaps not for an hour, by one hand, while their foot has stood upon a precipice! Can you not then bear that trifling punishment? And can you bear damnation! If you cannot, why do you call for it?—Could you wish it to the worst enemy you had in the world? Surely you could not do it deliberately. And yet, you wish it to your friends; you wish it to yourselves.

Take heed, Sirs, take heed: you wish it in the presence and hearing of God; of that God, who can send it upon you. And let me tell you, your oaths and curses are all set down in the book of his remembrance: he cannot possibly forget one of them: and he will bring you into judgment for them. And what will you do in the day of that judgment? The laws of man you despise; the laws of your king and country; though you pretend a great deal of regard for your king, and for the nation. You trample upon their authority every day; and your fellow-subjects have not courage and virtue to attempt to bring you to justice for it. But do you think, that therefore you shall trample on the law of God, and go unpunished? Take heed, Sirs, as you value your souls, take heed. He may execute his justice upon you much sooner than you think of it.

You drown your senses in liquor. Often I see that likewise, with the greatest concern; though to be sure, this and your swearing escape the view of your officers, or they would not bear it. But reflect again, can it escape the observation of the great and blessed God? And will it be any excuse before God, that you added sin to sin? That when you dishonoured him, and profaned his great and terrible name, you also dishonoured your own nature, and made brutes of yourselves? Will it not rather provoke God so much the more?

Oh, Sirs, by the grace of God set yourselves immediately to repent and reform.—Do it while there is room to do it. You may perhaps be called abroad in a few months, and whole ranks of you may be mowed down at once by the artillery of the enemy, or distempers at home may be as fatal. And what will you do, when your separate spirits come to stand before God, and you must answer to him for all this wickedness; for all this unprofitable wickedness, which you have committed upon no temptation! which with respect to swearing is so evidently the case.

Sirs, the hour is certainly coming, when it will be too late to think of repentance and asking pardon. But I hope it is not too late now: God is gracious and merciful, that God, whom you have so often affronted, and challenged to throw you. He is a God forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin. If you now humble yourselves before him, if you seek his pardon through Christ, and seek his Spirit and grace to teach you to forsake sin, and to love and practise your duty, there is still hope concerning you.

It is the business of this letter, seriously to exhort you to do it. I know your hearts are hardened by the practice of sin; but if you are a little alarmed by what I have now been setting before you, perhaps God may soften them. Yea, he will surely do it, if you earnestly, and seriously, and resolutely ask it.

I have no interest at all in representing these things to you. I am at some expense to do it. It proceeds entirely from a real regard to the honour of God, and the salvation of your own souls; and indeed, I may say, from a regard to your own reputation too. For this is a most mean and infamous practice; quite below your character, as gentlemen. And accordingly I must here remind you, that I have never heard your officers fall into such language; nor heard it commonly reported of them, that they use it. No; they are sensible that it belongs not to gentlemen, but to the lowest and vilest of the people, to the very dregs and refuse of mankind. The wretches who die by the hand of the hangman, have generally been accustomed to such language, as that of which I now desire to cure you; and perhaps, it is by the judgment of God upon them for swearing and cursing, that they have been left to commit other crimes, for which they die, and are made a curse. This consideration might, methinks, teach you to scorn it: but the others, that I have urged, are of infinitely greater importance. Your souls, your immortal souls, are as it were murdered by these hellish weapons, with which you pierce yourselves through every hour, or almost every minute. Adore the divine goodness, that you have not been taken at your word; and that experience, dreadful experience, has not taught you, to know what damnation is. I pray God, that it never may. I pray God, to bless this plain, affectionate, and well-intended letter, as the means of doing some good on some of you. And if this evil can be endured, there will be more room to hope other happy consequences may follow reformation in this respect.

But while I am thus speaking to you, let me add a few words more, to entreat you to a religious observation of the Lord's day, to a careful attendance upon the public ordinances of God, and to a readiness to receive good instructions from any one, who will be charitable enough to give them you. But above all let me urge you, to pray to God, that he would pardon you, and teach you better things. Yes, Sirs, having called upon him so often to damn your souls, now begin to cry to him to save them: and rest not, till that cry be answered; as, if you persevere in the request, you will find it most certainly will. God grant that it may be so! and that as you have been in one respect, you may each of you be in another, like a brand plucked out of the burning! It is, I am sure, the earnest desire, and by the grace of God it shall be the frequent prayer, of,

Gentlemen,

Your affectionate friend,
and faithful servant, &c.

LETTERS,

FROM

THE REV. PHILIP DODDRIDGE, D. D.

WITH

NOTES EXPLANATORY AND BIOGRAPHICAL.

LETTERS.

From a volume of Letters to and from Dr. Doddridge, published in 1790, by Thomas Stedman, M. A.

LETTER I.*

From Mr. Doddridge to Mr. Hughes.†

Kilworth, December 21, 1721

DEAR SIR,

I RECEIVED both your letters, and had set apart this afternoon for answering them. My fond heart would easily have dictated enough to fill a sheet of paper: but Mr. Cope tells me the roads are so bad that he must set out almost immediately, if he intends to reach Duffield by to-morrow night. I am obliged therefore to be much shorter than I intended, but I hope you will put no unkind construction upon it.

I am charmed with the profession you make of your friendship; for I value it so highly that I can never think I have too many assurances of it; and yet I have not the least suspicion of your sincerity. I know the generosity of your temper, and I perceive I love you so well, that I can easily persuade myself, that I have a share in your affection. I know the last argument is not logical, but I am so well satisfied with the conclusion, that I do not examine how I came by it; and especially as you have furnished me with many better arguments.

I am extremely glad to hear that you are so well recovered from the small pox. I could not but have a thousand tender apprehensions for your safety, and return my thanks to that kind Providence, which by so seasonable an interposition hath delivered you from so much danger, and still continued you to be the joy of your friends, the glory of your family, and ornament of the church.

I am very much pleased to hear that your situation at Findern is so agreeable; and particularly that you have such a companion as Mr. Cater. I am charmed with the character you give me of that gentleman; and indeed when I heard of the fineness of his imagination, and the strength of his judgment, the sweetness of his temper, and character of his morals, I should have said,—this gentleman is Mr. Hughes's friend,—though I had not been told so. How glad should I be to make the third among you, and how agreeably does it flatter my nature to think, that I have sometimes the honour of being the subject of your discourse.

I never doubted but that when you came seriously to peruse the inspired writings you would be sensible of the charms of them; for no man has a better relish for fine writing than yourself. I have lately been perusing Solomon's Song; and upon the whole cannot but think it an incomparable composure, and that the author was as much the noblest of poets, as the deepest of philosophers and the wisest of kings. The sixth chapter is not inferior to any of the rest of it, and I am particularly pleased with the tenth verse, "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?" I never read these charming words but with a double pleasure, when I remember the inimitable grace with which I have heard you repeat them.

I have lately been reading Sprat's History, and the greatest part of Sir William Temple's Works; and my sentiments of them are entirely the same as yours and Mr. Cater's. I am now perusing Scott's Christian Life, and I find so many new pleasures in it, that I cannot forbear giving you the mortification of thanking you again for it.

I could add a great deal more of this nature, but Mr. Cope frees you from any further trouble by calling upon me. I conclude, and subscribe myself

Your affectionate friend,

and obliged humble servant,

PHILIP DODDRIDGE

* From the author's short-hand copy.

† Mr. Hughes's father was a dissenting minister at Wem in Herefordshire, and his grandfather, Obadiah Hughes, was ejected from his Studentship in Christ Church, Oxford, by the Act of Uniformity, in 1662. I take him to have been related to John Hughes, Esq. agent for the Siege of Dunkirk, and who wrote several papers in the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian.

LETTER II.*

To the same.

Jan. 8, 1722-3.

Dear Sir,

I expect to see Dr Latham† or Mr. Benyon‡ to-morrow; and therefore answer your letter so soon. I can hardly prevail with myself to condole with you upon your misfortunes, since I perceive that while only two or three particular persons are treating you unkindly, the rest of the world do ample justice to your merit. I have heard of you again and again by several of my acquaintance, who speak of you as the ornament of Findern: I am very glad to hear that your character is so well established, and that those who go about to attack it are likely to do themselves more mischief than they can do you. I think the Spectator somewhere tells us, that "no music is so sweet to a man as his own praise;" methinks he should have excepted the pleasure that an honest and generous mind takes in hearing his friend commended. One thing I can confidently affirm, that though I passed the holidays very pleasantly, at least some of them, in the company of a very agreeable lady, and you know I was always an admirer of the sex; yet nothing gave me so much satisfaction, as a few minutes' conversation with Mr. Benyon, when the discourse turned upon you.

He told me, among other things, that you were making yourself master of the French language. I am heartily glad to hear it, because it will give you an opportunity of entertaining yourself with some of the finest writers in the world. Many of them had certainly very great genius, and were intimately acquainted with the ancients, those great masters of eloquence and poetry. Of all their dramatic poets, I have met with none that I admire so much as Racine. It is impossible not to be charmed with the pomp, elegance, and harmony, of his language, as well as the majesty, tenderness, and propriety, of his sentiments. The whole is conducted with a wonderful mixture of grandeur and simplicity, which sufficiently distinguish him from the dulness of some tragedians, and the bombast of others. One of his principal faults is, that the jingle of his double rhyme is frequently offensive to the ear. I lately met with the Archbishop of Cambray's Reflections upon Eloquence, which I think one of the most judicious pieces I have ever seen. There are some fine criticisms at the end of it, which well deserve your perusal.

As for the French sermons, they are, as far as I can judge of them, very much inferior to those of our English divines. Bourdaloue's, though much regarded, appear to me little better than empty harangues. Cheminais' are many of them very good; but I never met with any of them that are to be compared with those of Mr. Superville, the protestant divine at Rotterdam. He especially excels in the beauty of his imagery, descriptions, and similes; and some of the most pathetic expostulations I ever saw. In short, I believe he is perfectly to your taste; only there is one thing which will displease you as much as it did me, which is, that many of his arguments are very inclusive, though generally as good as high Calvinism will bear. I hope you will not be displeased with the freedom I take in advising you to entertain yourself with him and the other authors I have mentioned, as soon as they fall in your way. And yet perhaps there may be something of vanity in this advice too. French is a language which I have been acquainted with for many years, and you, Sir, have just began to study it; and so I am willing to improve this short interval of superiority, because I am sure, it will be but a little while before you excel me in that, as much as you do in every thing else. I must not add any thing more, but that I earnestly desire you will take care that you do not impair your health, by rising so very early in the morning, for I will assure you it is one of the dearest things in the world to

Your affectionate friend,
and obedient servant,

PHILIP DODDRIDGE.

LETTER III.§

To the same.

Hackney, 1722-3.

Dear Sir,

I acknowledge there is a great deal of spirit in the turn you give to the concluding words of my letter, though it be extremely different from the sense in which I meant them. You tell me that I am a good preacher, but a very bad prophet, when I say that you will quickly understand French better than I do. I am very much obliged to you for giving me a character, which I should otherwise perhaps have been puzzled to make out a title to: but you must give me leave to say, that in the latter part of your sentence you hardly do me justice. It is true, I do not lay claim to the gift of prophecy: but I think I shall be very capable of supporting it, if all my predictions are as well made out as that which concerns you. I assure you, that though I judge by your own account of it, which is expressed in the

* From the author's short-hand copy.
† My learned friend, and the author of a volume of sermons on various subjects.
‡ A gentleman of a very good estate, and Dr Samuel Benyon, a celebrated minister, and father of Shrewsbury.
§ From the author's short-hand copy.

most modest terms, you have already attained a much better acquaintance with the French language than I can possibly pretend to. It is true, I have had an opportunity of conversing with several French people, and so am not entirely a stranger to the pronunciation; but I assure you that I never read half the books that you mention. Indeed it shames me out of my own negligence, when I consider the improvement you make, and the business you despatch, while I am afraid I am not improving my time to half so good a purpose. Besides, the character that you give me of many of the writers that you mention, which I know is entirely to be depended upon, will engage me to read them whenever they fall into my hands; especially Bouhours, Patrou, Pelisson, and St. Evremond.

I do not know what character my friends may have given you of my sermons; but I am sure, if it be a very advantageous one, it will be my most prudent way to take care not to undeceive you, by preaching before you; for if I may be admitted to be any judge of my own performances, they will by no means answer your expectations. They are all upon the plainest and most practical subjects, and it is happy if they are at all calculated, as I am sure they were principally intended, to inform the judgment and awaken the consciences of the lowest of the people, and to fix their resolution for a course of rational, steady, and undissembled piety. It is not because I despise the charms of eloquence, &c. that I have entirely laid them aside. I know that I am not at all master of them, and so choose rather not to attempt them, than by an awkward imitation to darken the subject to the vulgar part of an audience, without approving myself to the nicer judgment of the more polite. In short, I am grown very familiar with the old puritans, and consequently I am a great favourite with the old women. Pray congratulate me upon this good fortune, which is entirely beyond my expectation or my hope.

But after all, you must not imagine that I have entirely lost all relish for finer compositions; on the contrary, I assure you, that I attended on Dr. Latham's sermon at Leicester, with pleasure, and frequently with transport. The most rational and pathetical thoughts were delivered with such elegance, propriety, and harmony of language, as could not but charm even stupidity itself; my attention was so entirely engaged, that I had no room for reflections of any other nature, except for this one, "How much does Mr. Hughes admire Dr. Latham, and how capable is Dr. Latham of relishing the performances of Mr. Hughes!"

You cannot imagine how much I miss your company at Hinckley. Mr. Cope and Mr. —— left us at Christmas, as you very well know. Mr. Some is not returned; so that, in short, I have not one person in the house that I have any intimate acquaintance with. You know nature designed me for a sociable animal, and I am sure you will pity my misfortune. I am forced to converse with the world, because I want agreeable company to converse with; and it is happy that I can meet with entertainment in the closet when I can find none in the hall, the parlour, or the garden.

You inquire about Mr. Sault's poems. I only know in general, that he intends to print them by subscription; but what the price is to be, or how the subscriptions are to be obtained, I have not yet heard. However, when I know, I will not fail to inform you. I am very glad to hear that you are commencing a familiarity with the Muses, because you are very well qualified to be a favourite with them. I assure you, that I will give you my opinion of your performances with a great deal of freedom, if you will honour me so far as to make me a judge of them. I pretty well know what I have to expect, and therefore I long for a sight of them.

I am, dear Sir,
Yours, &c.

PHILIP DODDRIDGE.

P. S. My most humble respects to Dr. Latham, if he honours me so far as to remember that he saw me at Leicester.

LETTER IV

To the same.

[illegible] Monmouth.

DEAR SIR,

I received your last of the 3rd instant the morning after it was written. I own I [illegible] a little at that severity with which you there complain of me, for the circumstance of the note you referred to. To have two folio pages with two lines, is indeed a very compendious, but not profitable, commerce. However, you must remember that I then told you, I quickly intended you a [illegible] more. [illegible] you see I have began them; but when I shall end I know not. I hope you [illegible] three pages and then you will be paid at the rate of [illegible] two hundred per cent.; for I have not been a quarter of a year in your debt. If you [illegible] so accurate a computation, you must recollect, that a few months ago I had thoughts of [illegible] which naturally led me into some speculations of [illegible] and contempt, which had not been before familiar to me.

As for yours of the 20th of April, I have read it over [illegible] that I can say a good deal of it by heart. I am exceedingly obliged to you for your [illegible]

pondence. You know that I am naturally of a social temper, and you contrive, in the abundance of your humanity, not only to give me pleasure in perusing your letters myself, but in entertaining my friends with the communication of them. I read the greatest part of them to several persons of taste and politeness, with whom I am acquainted, and they all seem to be charmed with them. Though they become perfectly familiar to me, I always read them with new pleasure; and am as much transported at the twentieth, as I was at the first, perusal of them. A love for my friends makes me participate with them in that elegant entertainment which they must receive from your writings; and my affection to you makes it very delightful to me, to see those whom I particularly love and value, forming such a generous idea of your genius and temper, as your letters must necessarily produce. But perhaps after all, this satisfaction in part arises from the pride of my own heart: I fancy people must needs entertain a very honourable opinion of me, when they hear a man of so bright a wit, and so amiable a character, addressing me with so much tenderness and respect.

You recommended Pliny to my perusal: I immediately procured him, and there is seldom a day in which I do not read two or three of his Epistles. I had before heard several high encomiums upon him; but nothing gave me so lively and so just an idea of his excellences, as to observe the perfection to which you had formed yourself by the study of him. Every letter of yours is a panegyric upon Pliny, though you do not mention his name. Let me entreat you to go on thus to recommend him, and to increase the pleasure with which I always take him into my hands; however, be sure when you do, not so far to exceed him, as to spoil my relish for him. At the rate you go on, it seems highly possible that you may; and if you do, you rob me of one of the most elegant amusements of my life; nor can I imagine how you will be able to make me amends any other way than by the frequency of your own letters. I say nothing of Henley's translation, which is lately fallen into my hands, and which I often compare with the original. I can say but little by way of commendation; and I know it would not be agreeable to the known candour of your temper to be severe upon a man, who honestly intended to entertain the world, and unveil the charms of your favourite author. However, if you would know my sentiments of this and several other pieces which I have lately read, I must refer you to a letter which I lately sent to Mr. Clark, which will save me the trouble of writing over again, what I am afraid you will think it was hardly worth while to have written at all.

Your sentiments on the head of retirement are very agreeable to that modesty and gentleness of temper, which make a very amiable part of your character. It is indeed an argument of the greatness of your soul, that you can despise fame, and retire with indifference out of the air of popular applause, when master of all the talents that may attract and command it. But after all, my friend, you must not think of passing through the world like a subterraneous stream, as you beautifully express it, or of spending your life in a hermitage, in this learned and polite luxury. God hath endowed you with capacities, which are not always to be buried in retirement. So bright a lamp was not lighted up to consume in a sepulchre, but to be fixed on an eminence, where its rays may be diffused with public advantage, and conduct many through this gloomy desert to the regions of eternal glory. . I hope therefore, and believe, it is your constant care to make all your studies subservient to the views of such services. When Providence calls you to a more public appearance, I hope you will be willing to quit your cell, charming as it is, that you may enter upon employments at least more important, if not more delicate, than those which you now pursue. This is a piece of self-denial, which duty requires us to submit to; and which will be acceptable to God in proportion to our fondness for those elegancies, which we are contented to interrupt and postpone, that we may attend to the advancement of his kingdom and interest. We know the applause of our heavenly Master will be an abundant recompense for all the pleasures we have given up for his sake; and before we receive that public remuneration, we shall find such entertainment in the exercise of benevolence to our fellow-creatures, and the hope of promoting their everlasting felicity, as we shall never find, in conversing with Virgil or Tully, Pliny or Addison, or any of the favourite attendants of our solitude. Popularity is in itself a most contemptible thing; but in this view, it may justly appear desirable: however you, my friend, need not be solicitous about it; do but appear in public and follow nature, and it will flow in upon you without further care. I cannot but think but that I may, with the utmost propriety, apply to you what Pliny says to Caninius Rufus, (L. i. Ep. 3.) "In modo enitere ut tibi ipse sis tanti, quanti videberis aliis, si tibi fueris."*

I cannot but acknowledge that I read with great pleasure your "reflections on that period of our existence," as you very emphatically call it, which passed before you left Mr. Jennings's. They are extremely agreeable to what I have often thought with relation to both of us at that time. It is happy for us that we see our mistakes. Percunt et imputantur, would be a melancholy thought indeed, if divine grace had not awakened us to improve some of our time like rational creatures and like Christians; and if we did not hope, by future diligence, in some measure to recover what we have lost. I was talking with Mr. Some this evening about our conduct then, and read him what you say of it. He heard it with great satisfaction, and remarked, that "the remembrance of former negligence and mistakes is often of considerable use throughout the remainder of life."

* Do [illegible] those excellent talents you possess, and the world [illegible] me will certainly do so too.—Hamilton's Translation.

I have not yet seen Mr. ——. He will be very welcome whenever he comes, but doubly so if he brings you with him. If he does not make haste I may prevent him, for though I have two congregations upon my hands on account of Mr. ——'s illness and absence, I hope to take a tour to St. Alban's about the beginning of September: and believe me, that except it be the pleasure of seeing so worthy a friend and so generous a benefactor as dear Mr. Clark, nothing is so great an encouragement to me to undertake the journey, as the prospect of spending a whole day with you at Childwick; when I expect most delightful entertainment from your collection of books and letters, but above all from your company.

You desire an account of my studies. I may, perhaps, some time or other, find an opportunity of laying open the whole course of them to your censure and examination, but at present have only left myself room to add that I am,

Dear Sir,

Your most affectionate

PHILIP DODDRIDGE

Pray give another name than that you propose, and let me know what your polite correspondents call you. I will not allow of Heraclitus.

N. B. This letter is more than half as long again as yours. I heartily thank you, that you were not curious in your writing, because it furnishes me with an excuse for not transcribing this, which I fear is hardly legible. Dr. Atterbury's translation of the Banishment of Cicero seems to me admirably well done. The language is exceeding beautiful, and many of his translations from Tully are as graceful as the Latin.

LETTER V *

To Mr. Hughes, on his ill success in the Lottery.

Nov. 29, 1725.

I HAVE just been looking over the account which my dear Atticus gives me of his misfortune in the late most disadvantageous Lottery. I will not remind him how many more were as unfortunate as himself since that, to a man of his temper, would be rather an aggravation than a relief of his affliction. And yet your own Pliny says, that when he was in danger of being destroyed by that eruption of Mount Vesuvius, which proved so fatal to his learned uncle, "Possem gloriari,—nisi me cum omnibus, omnia necum pericula mortemque contemnere humanitatis solatio credidissem," L. vi. E. 20. which is so odd a saying for a heathen his moral or humanity, that I could not forbear mentioning it, to ask your opinion of it. However, my good friend, I offer you no such miserable consolation. No: were I to speak of others as concerned in the same adventure, I would rather suggest, that it is possible Providence may have ordered the wheel so, that while you seem to be neglected, other persons of a less worthy character, but in more necessitous circumstances, may be relieved. It is possible, that in consequence of your drawing a blank, some honest family may have been insensible of all its bounty, but is awakened by so apparent an interposition in its favour, to know and adore its munificence, and so is engaged to consecrate, not only his new acquisition, but all his former possessions, to the honour of God, and the benefit of mankind. If this should be the case, the world would receive greater advantage from his success, than it could have done from yours, as you would have only been possessed of the riches of the mind, in laying in a considerable stock of wisdom and knowledge, which this opportunity would have afforded you, and have laid out but little more than the value of your prize in works of generosity and charity. Not to say that this happy adventurer, on this supposition, has gained the pleasure of a virtuous life, and a happy immortality, by this little damage which you have sustained.

You imagine that your loss is [illegible] to your friends. But perhaps it is upon the whole a happiness Providence might know that I in particular, had not attained to such a strength of virtue, as to be able to bear such an accession to my fortune, as would have been the consequence of your getting one of the golden numbers. And so may have assigned them to others, whose friends are more fit to receive the advantage of them, or otherwise are not the objects of so tender a care. We ought not only to be contented but thankful for this.

I may more certainly add, that with relation to your own personal concernments, your heavenly Father, in his abundant wisdom and goodness, meant you kindly by such a disappointment. Perhaps he saw that so tender and so complaisant a temper was not sufficiently prepared to withstand the temptations of a plentiful fortune; and that you might have grown too fond of the world, which had opened so many new charms for your entertainment, and have been less mindful of that glorious end, which you are advancing towards in so pleasant a way. O, who knows that the way would in fact have been more pleasant to you? More external ornaments of life you would certainly have had, but not therefore certainly more inward content. Providence, no doubt, intends by this dispensation, to teach you to moderate your expectations, to submit to disappointments, to contract your regards for this world, and transfer them to the glories of a future state, and the durable riches which you will then possess; and if this divine temper be improved in your mind, by the loss of a few pounds, believe me, my dear Atticus, it will contribute more to promote the happiness of life, than the gain of so many hundreds or thousands with the injury of such a temper.

* From the author's short Catalogue.

Perhaps you will tell me, what I verily believe, that nothing in this affair is so afflictive to you, as that you are deprived of the pleasure of doing good with what you have lost, or expected to have gained. But I need not tell you, that in all our acts of benevolence, we ought not so much to regard the present indulgence of natural temper, as the approbation of God, and the reward of a future state. Now God sees all the secret generosity of your soul, your tender compassion for those that are in misery, your hearty desire of relieving them, your affectionate prayers to the fountain of good to communicate to them those seasonable supplies, which are not in the power of your own hand to give; and he has particularly been acquainted with all the generous projects you had formed for the public good, on supposition of the success of your late adventure. Now you know, that he does as graciously approve you, and will as bountifully reward you, for this honest and liberal sentiment and intention, as he would have done for the actual execution of them, if he had given you an opportunity for it.

And as such a generosity of soul, acting in proportion to present circumstances, is equally agreeable to God, and will produce as gracious a harvest in a future state, so it is attended with some considerable degree of the same satisfaction at present. You may now perhaps give a shilling with as true overflowing of soul, and almost as much joy too, as you could give a guinea if you were twenty times as rich. For as we are much impressed by present objects, the satisfaction which we find in the performance of a generous action towards any determinate person, seems to be proportional to that degree of pleasure which we imagine he will find in receiving the benefit.

Now a virtuous and generous beneficiary rejoices in the favour that is done to him, not merely according to the value of the favour abstractedly considered, but according to the degree of moral beauty which is to be found in the act of conferring it: and this is in a great measure to be estimated by the consideration of the circumstances of the benefactor. Therefore a man may receive a shilling from you now, with almost as much pleasure as he could receive a pound of you, were you twenty times as rich; and therefore you may in this respect bestow as much. Q. E. D.

Perhaps I have been a little too abstruse in my reasoning upon this head, but I think there is some meaning at the bottom, and my assertion is confirmed by my own experience; for I have found as exquisite pleasure in receiving some little services from my friends, when attended with circumstances of generosity and endearment, as I ever did in any of greater importance. And it seems to be the thought of Solomon, when he says, The desire of a man is his kindness.

After what I have said with relation to your loss, I must tell you that I am heartily glad you are so much more successful in the far nobler pursuit of learning and virtue. I have much to say as to other particulars, but you see I have but just left myself room to add, that I am

Your most affectionate

HORTENSIUS.

LETTER VI.*

To Miss ——— , on breaking her arm by a fall from a horse.

November 18, 1727

Dear Madam,

I have just received the melancholy news of your fall, and the sad consequences with which it has been attended. Mrs. W. who gives me this unwelcome information, adds, that though you are on the mending hand, you still continue very ill. I cannot set myself to any other business till I have taken a few minutes to tell you how sensibly I sympathize with you in your sorrows. As my obligations to your excellent family are very great, I cannot but have an undissembled affection for every member of it, and I am sure dear Miss ——— has always had her full share in my heart; as indeed, who could forbear to admire and love so much piety and good sense, when set off by the ornaments of a beautiful form, and a most engaging temper? I know too, that my friendship for you was both sincere and tender, but I was never fully apprized of its degree till since it pleased God to visit you with that affliction, which now lies so heavy upon you, and gives you the justest title to the compassion of strangers, and much more of friends. But, alas! how vain is the compassion of human friends in a case like yours; and indeed in any case! when it is left to itself, it can only sit down and weep over calamities which it knows not how to relieve. I do therefore, Madam, most importunately recommend you to the compassion of that God, who can easily raise you out of all your troubles, and can make your affliction the means of your happiness. How happy should I esteem myself, if I might be in any degree a worker together with him, towards promoting so excellent a service as your spiritual improvement by this afflictive providence. Permit me, Madam, humbly to attempt it, and hastily to mention a few hints of a serious nature, which I imagine peculiarly suitable to your present circumstances.

* From the author's short-hand copy.

It may seem nowise unsuitable to the occasion of my writing, to urge that submission to the divine will which becomes us under every chastisement. But this is, no doubt, the matter of frequent reflection and discourse with you; the known piety of your general character, and the remarkable meekness and sweetness of your temper, make it less necessary for me to insist upon it. I am fully persuaded, Madam, that you do not allow yourself to murmur and repine against the Lord who smiteth you. But pardon me if I ask, whether you be not too ready to forget your obligations to love and praise? I look upon it as one of the greatest defects in the character of good people, and as the foundation of many more visible irregularities, that they delight in God no more, and that they praise him no more. Too much is this excellent work neglected in the midst of health, prosperity, and cheerfulness; but when affliction comes, and especially when it comes in so terrible a form as this which has lately visited you, a Christian is ready to imagine, that it is enough to be quiet and resigned, and that he is fairly excused from such delightful exercises of soul, which seem unsuitable to so gloomy a season. But let us learn to correct so unreasonable a thought, and surely a little reflection might teach us to correct it.

With regard to your present circumstances, you, Madam, are exercised by the anguish of a broken bone, which may probably exceed the imagination of those who have not known it by fatal experience; but is it not just foundation of joy and of praise, that your life is still prolonged to you? It is true, your behaviour, so far as I have had the opportunity of observing it, has been such as could not deserve so much as the tenderest reproof of a friend; but you will humbly acknowledge, what no human creature can deny, that an omniscient and a holy God has seen many offences in a life which to men has appeared most unexceptionable and most amiable. And you are not to learn, that the smallest violation of his sacred law may justly expose us to all the miseries of a future state. And is it not matter of praise that you are yet in the land of the living, and within the reach of pardon and of hope? Nay, I do verily believe that, through divine grace, you are already in a state of reconciliation and favour with God, and in the way to everlasting happiness; and when you think of the glory that shall be revealed, and think of your own interest in it, surely your heart might overflow with thankfulness and joy, though your present agonies were multiplied upon you. These, Madam, are noble resources of consolation, which should not be forgotten in your most painful moments—that God is your Father, Christ your Saviour, and heaven your eternal inheritance.

But further, when you attentively survey the present dispensation, you will certainly find, that there is a mixture of mercy in it, and all that mixture of mercy is in a proportionable degree matter of praise. You have broken your arm; but had not mercy interposed, you would not have survived to have been sensible of it. A very small alteration in the circumstances of your fall might have made it fatal to your life. You are made to possess days of anguish, and wearisome nights are appointed to you; but does not an indulgent Providence surround you with comforts, which mollify your sense of that distress? I need not to insist upon those instances which so grateful a heart cannot overlook. You recollect the piety and tenderness of your excellent parents: you observe the respect and affection of many other agreeable and valuable friends: you review that affluence of worldly possessions which, through the divine goodness, is flowing in upon you, and furnishes you with the most judicious advice, the most proper remedies, and the most agreeable accommodations and entertainments, which your present circumstances can require and admit. And in the force of these united considerations, you own, that it is reasonable even now to praise the Lord, who is daily loading you with his benefits, and vastly overbalances your affliction with mercies.

But what if I should proceed still further, and maintain, not only that it is your duty to praise God for his other mercies, though he has afflicted you, but to praise him for this affliction as a mercy? I should say no more than the Scripture warrants, when it exhorts us "in every thing to give thanks," and tells us that "all things shall work together for good to them that love God."

I know, Madam, and I persuade myself you seriously consider, that the interests of the soul are vastly more valuable than those of the body. Now it is certain, that such a calamity as this may be the means of great improvement and advantage to your soul. It may wean your heart from the world, and fix it upon God more than before: it may make you a more lively and zealous Christian, and by consequence, more happy and useful in life, and more glorious throughout all the ages of eternity. And if it has a tendency to promote so exalted an end, you have certainly reason to bless God for it, though it be attended with some trying circumstances; as you would approve and be thankful for the setting of a broken bone, though it were a very painful operation, since it was so subservient, and indeed so necessary, to the pleasure and usefulness of life.

As all afflictions have, by the divine blessing, a tendency to lead the mind into some serious reflections, so every particular trial has its own peculiar advantage, which it is proper for us to study while we are under the pressure of it.

That I may give my dear and excellent friend all the assistance I can, I will mention some heads of religious contemplation which occur to my thoughts, as peculiarly proper to dwell upon while we are in actual pain. And if it please God to impress them deeply upon your mind, you will find, Madam, that it will be worth your while to have borne the smart of an affliction, which may prove so instructive and so beneficial.

1. It is now peculiarly proper to think, how insupportably dreadful must the agonies of hell be! If one drop of the divine displeasure, or one stroke which he inflicts in love to his child, be sufficient to throw us into so much distress, what must it be to fall into the hands of God, as an irreconcilable enemy, and to stand the shock of that horrible tempest which he shall pour out upon the finally impenitent? If it be so difficult to bear the disorder of one single limb, where other circumstances around us are just as we could wish them, and the tenderest friends are doing their utmost to ease and delight us under our sorrows, what must it be to dwell for ever in that region of horror, where every member of the body, and every faculty of the soul, shall be the seat of torment, and every surrounding person and circumstance conspire to aggravate and inflame it? "Fly, O my soul! from so dreadful a condemnation; abhor the thought of any thing which would expose thee to it; and adore the riches of redeeming love, by which thou art delivered from going down to the pit."

2. Another very proper reflection in our painful hours may be, how rich was the love of Jesus Christ, who would bear so much pain for our salvation!

"Do I find it (you will say) so difficult a matter to bear up under my present anguish, though only one member of my body suffers, what then did my Saviour feel, when he was expiring under the agonies of the cross! What was it to have the tenderest parts of his body pierced with thorns and with nails, and to be stretched out upon the cross, as on a rack, till almost every joint was out of its place, (which you know, Madam, was the common pain of crucifixion;) besides all that more intolerable torment which he bore from the immediate hand of his Father, which threw him into a bloody sweat, when no human agony was near him! Little, O my Redeemer! little can I conjecture of the bitterness of thine agonies, from the pain I now feel, but since that which I now feel is so acute and so grievous, let me take a few moments from my sorrows and my groans to admire and celebrate thy inconceivable love, which bore the sorrow which was infinitely more dreadful."

3. When we feel ourselves in pain, it is peculiarly proper to reflect on the great mercy of God in having formerly given us so much ease.

"How many have been continued in life while surrounded with innumerable calamities and accidents, which might not only have been painful, but mortal, to me; and in all this year how many days, how many weeks, have there been in which I have enjoyed uninterrupted ease; or rather, how few hours and moments have there been in which I have felt even the slightest pain! If God has changed the dispensation of his providence towards me, I feel the value of that mercy I was so insensible of. Let me now praise him for what I formerly enjoyed, but undervalued; since it might probably be the design of this present affliction to rebuke my former insensibility, and recover that tribute of praise which I had neglected immediately to pay."

4. When we feel pain taking hold of us, we may reflect how much reason we have to pity the pains and the sorrows of others.

"I have too often been forgetful of them when absent, and have been too negligent in praying for them, though perhaps their case has been attended with lamentable circumstances. Now I know, by my own experience, a part of what they feel, and perhaps no more than a part. Let me, after the example of my Redeemer, learn by my own sufferings, to sympathize with my brethren in theirs; and let me impart such compassion to them as I would now desire from those that are around me."

5. When we are under pain of body, it is proper to reflect, how vain is every thing in this world, and how infinitely preferable an interest in the divine favour.

One such day as many of those have been which you have lately passed, may serve instead of a thousand rational arguments to convince you of this. How has the accident of a minute impaired your relish for those entertainments which before were exceedingly agreeable to you! Those things, in which the greater part of mankind place their supreme happiness, are little or nothing in these afflictive moments. The delicacy of food, the ornaments of dress, nay, even the conversation of friends, are not now what you thought them a few days ago, but you find, Madam, that your God is still the same, and the thoughts of your interest in him grows more and more delightful, in proportion to that degree in which the charms of created objects fade and disappear. Yet, when your health and strength are completely restored, as I pray they may speedily be, created vanity may grow charming again, and tempt your heart to a forgetfulness of God. But then I hope, Madam, you will recollect the view in which they appeared in the days of weakness and of pain: and the more carefully you attend to that view now, the more likely will you be to recollect it with advantage.

6. In your present affliction, it is peculiarly proper to think of that heavenly world, which is, as I verily believe, the great object of your hope, and through grace, your eternal inheritance.

All the storms and tempests of life should force us into that blessed harbour. And I am persuaded our views of heaven would be more affecting, if we were to consider it as a place, where we shall be free, not only from all trouble in general, but from that particular trouble which at present lies heavy upon us, and therefore is apprehended in all its aggravations. It is proper under such an affliction as this, to reflect on the New Jerusalem: there shall be no more pain. "O my soul! dwell upon the thought, and in that view breathe after it, and rejoice in the expectation of it."

If these thoughts, Madam, which appear so proper in your present circumstances, be seriously attended to and pursued, you will soon see the advantage of them. Your heart, which is already so pious and excellent, will come like gold out of a furnace of fire, purified seven times; and upon the whole, you will reap such happy fruits, both for time and eternity, from these sad calamitous events, that you will no longer have room to question, whether it be the proper object of praise.

I am surprised to see, that before I was aware, my letter is swelled into a sermon. But I find, Madam, in this as in other instances, that it is easy to speak out of the abundance of the heart, which I am sure I always do, when I give vent to any sentiments of friendship towards you. There is a plainness and freedom in what I have written, which to some other persons I might think it necessary to excuse, but I will not make any apology to you, for I am sure you have so much good sense as to see, and so much candour as to believe, that this freedom proceeds only from that inexpressible respect and tenderness with which I am,

Dear Madam,

Your most affectionate

and most humble servant,

PHILIP DODDRIDGE

LETTER VII

To a Young Lady, proposing for a companion to the Author.

[illegible]

Monday.

Though I have not the happiness of a personal acquaintance with you, your good mother informed me at large of your character and circumstances, and it is by her desire that I use a freedom in addressing you which would not otherwise be pardonable in one who is a stranger. You will easily imagine that your concerns lie with a very great weight upon her mind. She is tenderly solicitous, that whithersoever you go the gracious presence of a heavenly Parent, and a pious sense of duty to him, may always accompany you. And as she knows you must resign some of those religious advantages, which you have long enjoyed, she has been urgent with me to put something into your hand which may be reviewed whenever you please, and which by the divine blessing may be useful to you, as being peculiarly suited to your present circumstances.

On my part, Madam, I undertake the task with a great deal of cheerfulness; not only to oblige her, who is my valuable friend, but with some encouraging hopes that it may be serviceable to you. And I will freely own, that I enter into the case with some [illegible] of a peculiar tenderness, as it relates to a lady in the bloom of life, of an agreeable person, and a promising character. I have had a great many anxious thoughts about you since your mother and I talked of you, which we have frequently done; so that you and your affairs are grown very familiar to my mind. And I begin to enter into them with something of the affection of a brother.

I hope this concern may sufficiently justify a plainness, which in such a case becomes almost unavoidable; and I persuade myself, Madam, that when you consider it as proceeding from such a principle, you will not be offended at it. I tell you that I almost tremble to think of the variety of dangers to which you are going to be exposed. I am young myself, yet I have already found by too frequent experience, that in the pursuit of [illegible] especially [illegible] sometimes with pleasing appearances, we are even on what is most delightful a dangerous prospect. But either entirely overcome with dangerous and threatening, or at most hurried by a transient glance upon it. You, Madam, [illegible] with a great deal of pleasure of meeting a variety of new objects in a new country, [illegible] [illegible] way, [illegible] [illegible] you have never yet seen,* but who has expressed the tenderest regard for you at so remote a distance. You are charmed with the prospect of meeting him in a place where he knows not any superior, of sharing with him in his plenty and magnificence, and being treated by all about you with the respect due to a Governor's sister. I own there is something very splendid and striking in such a view, and I heartily congratulate you upon it. But let me entreat you, Madam, to consider how possible it is, that you may never reach the country which is to be the scene of so many entertainments. There are unknown hazards in the voyage to the Indies; and it is possible that before you have despatched half of it, some unexpected event may happen to put a period to these hopes and to your life. Or, if you reached ——— it is certain that dangers will attend you there, and dangers which will be so much the greater, as you are the less sensible of them. I know that many of our foreign Governors live in a kind of princely grandeur and magnificence, so that you really need almost as much wisdom and goodness as if you were going to Court. You will see a great deal of vanity and pomp, and no doubt a great deal of luxury too, if not in the Governor himself, of whom I hear a very respectable character, yet at least in some of his retinue. You will hear a great deal of flattery, the shame of our sex, and the ruin of yours, and the dangers which conceal the sharpest and the most fatal stings, are those which will accost you with the softest airs and the most smiling countenance. On the other hand, Madam, it is very uncertain what advantages of a religious nature you will enjoy, to counterbalance these insnaring circumstances. Yet I think I may venture to say, that whithersoever you go, were it in your own country, and much more in a foreign land, it is at least a thousand to one, that you exchange for the worse when you quit the ministry of Mr. Jennings, with whose excellent character I am well acquainted, and in whose pulpit you have probably seen me, if you have seen me at all.

When I consider these things, I am very solicitous with regard to the end of them; and will plainly confess, I cannot but think there is a great deal of reason to fear lest this lovely flower which is now opening with so much beauty and fragrancy, should be blasted by too warm a sun, and wither in that luxurious soil to which it will be transplanted. Or, in plainer terms, I fear, what God forbid, that the impression of a religious education will wear off from your mind, and the vain allurements of an insnaring world will possess themselves of your heart, till by insensible degrees your virtue may be endangered and your soul ruined. I say not these things, Madam, to dissuade you from the voyage; no, it is not in my power to do it, and if it were, I should not by any means attempt it. But I represent the case in all its dangerous circumstances, so far as I apprehend them, that you may be awakened to a proper care in providing against them. And here it is evident, that your only security is in the protection and friendship of that God, who has all the seasons and elements under his command, and who, by his secret, but powerful, influence on the mind, can preserve it in the midst of temptation, and brighten it by all its trials.

And therefore my first advice is, that before you begin this important and doubtful voyage, you set yourself repeatedly to examine into the state of your soul, with regard to God and eternity. It would be doing you a great deal of wrong, to suppose you are ignorant of the state in which the gospel found us, and of that into which it is intended to bring us. You know the original claim of God upon us, and how far the most innocent and virtuous of us hath been from answering it exactly in all its extent. You know something of the fatal consequences which would have attended that revolt, had God treated us with rigorous severity; though none knows them in their full terror. You are acquainted with the gracious method he has taken of recovering us by a Redeemer from the ruin of the apostasy, and the way in which the invaluable blessings of the everlasting covenant are now offered to our acceptance. Let it be your immediate and diligent inquiry, whether you have fallen in with this merciful proposal, and have resolutely and entirely devoted yourself to God, with an humble dependence on the merits of his Son for your acceptance, and the assistance of his Spirit to form you to a holy temper, and animate you to the zealous discharge of all the duties he requires of you. If you have not yet entered yourself into this covenant, or are dubious whether you have done it or no, let it be your immediate care now to do it with the most serious consideration and entire consent, as knowing it to be absolutely necessary for your security and happiness in the safest and most cheering circumstances of life, and much more in such as I have now described. If you have the testimony of your conscience on the favourable side, as I would hope you have, permit me humbly to advise you, if you have a convenient opportunity, to confirm it in the most solemn manner at the table of the Lord. There commit your life and your hopes to his providential care. Open your heart to the influences of his grace; and publicly avow a determinate resolution that you will be the Lord's; that you will be constantly and eternally his; and that, in the strength of his Spirit, neither life nor death shall separate you from him.

When once this is done, you are happily armed against all the uncertainties of life, and the prospects of death in whatever form it may appear. Your soul may be calm in the midst of the tempest; when thunders roll, and lightnings dart from above, and the waves are foaming and the seas roaring around you, when the hearts of the most experienced mariner and the most courageous commander are dismayed, you, Madam, with all the tenderness of your age and sex, may sit down with a sweet tranquillity, as the charge and favourite of him, who has universal nature under his control; you may say, in the triumphant words of the Psalmist, "God is my refuge and my strength, a very present help in every time of trouble. Therefore will I not fear in the midst of confusion; though the sea roar and be troubled, so that the mountains shake with the swelling thereof: the Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is my refuge." Or, should the dreadful moment of shipwreck come, while ungodly wretches are meeting the first death with unknown agony, as apprehending that it will transmit them to all the terrors of the second, you may smile with a holy transport, when you see the rays of heavenly glory shooting through the gloomy passage; and, as Mr. Howe beautifully expresses it, may "embrace that friendly wave which, while you intended ———, should land you in heaven." On the other hand, should Providence, according to my most affectionate wishes and repeated prayers, conduct you in safety to your intended harbour, on this supposition of your early and sincere devotedness to God, you will be secure in the midst of temptation; not indeed in the strength of your own virtue, but in the watchful care of that good Shepherd, who tenderly carries the lambs of the flock in his bosom: every thing splendid and pleasing which you will meet with at ———, instead of alienating your heart from God, may be a means of raising it to him. All the advantages of your circumstances may be improved to the noblest purposes, and you may appear in that conspicuous station, as raised by Providence to display the charms of your character, and to recommend religion to others; as it never appears in a more amiable light than when practised by those who are entering on life, and are surrounded with the allurements of plenty and greatness.

* Probably, he went to India before the young Lady was born, or during her infancy.

And this, Madam, is what I would have you propose to yourself. It will indeed be happy for you, and for your dearest friends, if you continue safe in the midst of so many dangers. But methinks you ought not to rest here. I hope God will inspire you with a glorious ambition of adorning your profession by the lustre of uncommon virtue, and being eminently honourable and useful in life. For your assistance in this noble attempt, I will presume so far on your patience as to offer you some more particular advices, submitting them to your deliberate reflection, that you may judge how far they are necessary or important.

As God is the support of the whole world of his creatures, so I believe all, who are experimentally acquainted with religion, will readily allow, that proper and constant regards to God are the support of all the other branches of it. I would therefore, Madam, exhort you to the most diligent care in maintaining those regards. Let no day pass without some humble and affectionate visits to the throne of grace. Rejoice to think, that whithersoever you go, you are still in a province of that universal empire over which he presides; and as he is capable of being your best friend, remember, I entreat you, that neither duty nor prudence will permit you to neglect him. Let secret prayer and reading the Scriptures always be attended to with great diligence; and fix it as a maxim in your mind, that however the outward form may be gone through, these duties are in effect neglected, if they are not seriously and heartily performed.

Thankfully improve all those public advantages, which, when you arrive at the Factory, you may enjoy for the good of your soul. I would be much concerned, that you may not go abroad with an entire contempt of all religious opportunities which are not just such as you could wish. Though a form be probably less suited to your taste as well as mine, than the prayers we have been accustomed to, yet divine influences may make it very refreshing. I doubt not, but many pious souls in the established church, have daily converses with God in the offices of it (and I heartily rejoice in the thought). And as for the doctrines of it, you will not find much to complain of. The main doubt is, how these things will be handled. I hope Providence will so order it, that you may have the assistance of a clergyman, who will not only be careful to speak the words of truth and soberness, but will throughout the whole of his ministration and conversation be animated by a deep and lively sense of religion, an ardent zeal for the honour of God, and a tender concern for the salvation of souls. But if it should happen otherwise, endeavour to make the best of what you hear, and carry a few good books with you, which by the blessing of God may in part make up for the want of more suitable public assistances. You may then have an opportunity of hearing, as it were, some of the best of our preachers almost every day, and may be secure of meeting with some of the most valuable of their discourses. I would on this occasion recommend to you the three volumes of Dr. Doddridge's Sermons, his Discourses on the Love of God, his Hymns, Psalms, and Lyric Poems, Dr. Hervey's Christian Letters, in two volumes, and his Sermons to Young People, Sermatt's Reasonableness of early Piety, and I had almost said, above all the rest, Dr. Wright's Treatise on Regeneration, and of the Deceitfulness of Sin. I see not well how any of these can be spared, and I shall desire you to accept of the two last, bound together, as a small testimony of my sincere friendship. Above all, Madam, I would most earnestly entreat you to make the Scriptures very familiar to you. It is by these that the young may cleanse their way, and in the morning of life be formed upon maxims of the truest and the most important wisdom. David's Psalms, Solomon's Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, and the whole New Testament, are the parts of Scripture which I would especially recommend; and would entreat you to read them, not in a hasty and cursory manner, but with deep reflection, and earnest prayer to God for the assistance of his Spirit in the study of them; and on such a perusal, I am confident, you will find a spirit, a beauty, and a glory in them beyond what the generality of the world apprehend. This guide alone is incomparably preferable to all the books and the friends upon earth without it. Follow it steadily, and it will lead you to heaven.

As to your behaviour to your fellow-creatures, the directions of Scripture will be highly serviceable. In the most important article, your great care, Madam, must be to accommodate the general precepts of it to your own particular circumstances of life, and you must beg that God would give you wisdom to do it.

You cannot but know, that a young lady is exposed to a variety of temptations peculiar to her age and sex, especially in the company of gentlemen, whose professions and conditions of life may not incline them to the greatest decency and sobriety of behaviour; and it will require great prudence on your part to manage well here. I would not injure so fair a character by insinuating the most distant caution against any thing that is infamously bad. Your principal difficulty will be in keeping yourself free from those importunities which are on many accounts inconvenient, though rejected with the greatest resolution and resentment. And here, Madam, I would by no means advise you to put on an air of severity in the conversation of men, as if you were apprehensive of some criminal design in all they said or did. Such a behaviour is so far from being ornamental, that I will frankly confess, it appears to me not only groundless and ridiculous, but supercilious too. Yet there is, if one knew how to describe it, a kind of reserve mixed with the most cheerful freedom; that gaiety which strikes an awe on the licentious beholder, and inspires a reverence even for the most gentle charmer. It would make a man blush at the secret consciousness of the least irregular thought with regard to so excellent, I had almost said so sacred, a creature. I am afraid, Madam, the delicacy of my subject has made me a little obscure; but I fancy on reflection, you will find something of a meaning in it: and I imagine it to be much the same with that, which is much better expressed in the following epigram, which may probably be the more agreeable to you, as it is to me, for being the production of a lady about your own age. I had it from a person of quality, and am told that copies are but in few hands.

While thirst of praise, and fond desire of fame,
In every age is every woman's aim,
With courtship pleased, of coldly torture proud,
Fond of a train, and happy in a crowd,
While vain coquets affect to be pursued,
And think they're honest if not grossly lewd,
On every fool bestowing some kind glance,
Each conquest owing to some lewd advance
Let this sage maxim be my virtue's guide,
In part to blame she is who has been tried,
He comes too near, who comes to be denied.

It would be a very easy matter to insist copiously on these hints, and to add many others which would not be foreign to the case before us. But my letter is grown already to a very uncommon size; and I fear, that if I should go on to enlarge it, the review will be a burthensome task. What is still omitted, if I judge right of your character, your own good sense will in a great measure supply, under the directions of God's word, and the influences of his Spirit. And let me only entreat you, often to reflect on your conduct, and consider your ways; for I am confident, that the generality of mankind who are undone for time and eternity, perish, not so much for want of knowing what is right, as through a failure of resolution in the pursuit of it, which is very much owing to the neglect of thought and reflection.

I add nothing further but my hearty prayer, which I shall frequently repeat, that a watchful Providence may continually surround you, and give the winds and the seas a charge concerning you; that the influences of his grace may secure you from all the temptations with which God is calling you to encounter; and may make of you a lovely example of all the virtues and graces of Christianity; that after a safe, honourable, and prosperous visit to the Indies, you may be restored to your native land in peace, with a rich increase both of temporal and spiritual blessings; so that, upon the whole, your present and future happiness may exceed all that we can particularly wish or pray for upon your account.

I am, dear Madam,
Your affectionate friend,
and obedient humble servant,

PHILIP DODDRIDGE.

P. S. If Providence continue my life till your return, it will be a very great pleasure to me to see you either here or at London, and to join with you in returning thanks for those divine favours to which I have been so frequently recommending you in the sincerity of my heart.

LETTER VIII.

To a Young Gentleman, on his recovery from a dangerous illness.

1730

DEAR SIR,

THOUGH I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with you, I think it not improbable that you may have learned my name from your excellent parents, who honour me with their friendship in a degree far beyond what I could ever pretend to have deserved. They early informed me of your illness, and recommended you to my earnest and affectionate prayers: which I will assure you, dear Sir, you have had, and shall continue to have a share in them. God has been gracious to us, and heard our prayers. He has brought you back from the borders of the grave, when you had received the sentence of death in yourself. And now, my dear friend, for so methinks I have a kind of hereditary right to call you, give me leave seriously to remind you of the goodness of God in this respect, and to call upon you in his name to a proper improvement of it. I doubt not, but in the intervals of your disorder, you had some solemn thoughts of death and eternity. I doubt not but you cried to God, and formed some purposes for his service. But I know how ready our treacherous hearts are to forget such deliverances, and to forget those vows of God that are upon us; and therefore let me, with all simplicity and plainness, though at the same time with the sincerest respect, renew the admonition as in the name of my great Lord and Master, who, I would hope, means you graciously in inclining me to write to you upon this occasion. I would beseech you seriously to examine your heart and ways, and to ask yourself before God, "What if the fever had finished its work, and brought me down to the dust of death, and my spirit had returned to God who gave it, how would it have been received by him?" You are descended from the most gracious pair that I think I ever knew. But they cannot convey grace to you. Even from them, excellent as they are, you derive a corrupt nature. Ask your own heart then, "Have I ever been earnest with God for renewing grace? Have I ever pleaded with him in prayer, that I might experience that change which the gospel requires, without which no man can enter the kingdom of heaven?" These are matters of infinite importance, which must lie at the root of all our hopes of heaven, or those hopes will prove like a spider's web. I beseech you, therefore, dear Sir, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by all your prospects in the eternal world, that you take these things under an attentive consideration. I hope you have thought of them. I would fain persuade myself to believe you are experimentally acquainted with them. But I would court you to apply your heart to them more and more. I know, Sir, that in your circumstances of life innumerable temptations will surround you; and it is a good thing in order to be fortified against them all, that the heart be established with grace. You have all the encouragement you can desire to attempt the work of serious religion, and that betimes; for it must be done immediately, or perhaps it may not be done at all, probably it will not. You have a gracious God to go to, who is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. You have a most compassionate Redeemer, who shed his blood for the salvation of perishing sinners; and I humbly hope for your salvation. The Spirit of God has conquered hearts much harder than yours can be, even supposing you are now in an unrenewed state. You are the seed of God's servants: you were early devoted to God in baptism: you have a large stock of prayers laid up in the presence of God for you. I do really apprehend, even the covenant of God with believing parents bears a favourable aspect upon their children. And though I dare not say nor think, that it secures their salvation; for I fear fact lies strongly against such a presumption, as we are sure it did even in the children of Abraham, yet there is some peculiar encouragement for such to seek the God of their fathers. I believe the Spirit strives peculiarly with them; and that when they seek it, it is more immediately and more fully communicated to them than generally to others. And sure I am, that those early instructions they have received, have often a blessed resurrection in their hearts, even after they have been long forgotten, and the seed, which seemed to have perished, often brings forth fruit in abundance. And therefore, dear Sir, thank God and take courage. In his name and strength, set out in your heavenly pilgrimage, with the word of God in your hand and heart, and with your eyes to the Spirit of God, as your guide and strength: and be assured, there are many who will bid you good speed in the name of the Lord, and will rejoice to assist you in your course. I am not without hope, that our gracious God may at length favour me with more immediate and renewed opportunities of serving you.* In the mean time be assured, that I most cordially love you, though personally unknown. Be assured, my heart overflows with a true concern for your welfare, that I pour out my soul before God in prayer on your account; and that to hear of your health and happiness, and, above all, that your soul prospers, will yield me unutterable delight; for I am not merely in form, but with the utmost sincerity and tenderness of heart,

* It appears from [illegible]

Dear Sir,
Your most faithful and affectionate friend,
and humble servant,

PHILIP DODDRIDGE.

LETTER IX.*

Northampton, Dec. 8, 1742.

Dear Sir J——

Permit me frankly to speak my mind to you on a head, on which I fear to be silent, lest I should fail in a branch of duty and gratitude to a gentleman to whom I think myself obliged, and whom I would gladly serve to the best of my little ability. Be not angry, when I tell you, I was heartily grieved at the liberties you took last night, in using the venerable name of the ever blessed God in so light a manner; and in the needless appeals which you made to him, as to things which would have been believed on much less evidence than the word of Sir J——. I have not heard so much of that kind of language, except when passing by people of low education in the streets, for some years; whether it be owing to the complaisance with which gentlemen commonly treat our profession, or, as I rather hope, to a sense of what is in itself reasonable and decent.

I am sure, Sir, that your knowledge of men and things is capable of making conversation pleasant and improving, and of filling up your full share in it without these dreadful expletives; for dreadful I must call them, when considered in a view to that strict account, which must so certainly and so quickly be rendered up to God for all our words as well as our actions. I was the more solicitous, Sir, to mention the affair to you in consideration of your office as a magistrate; the dignity of which must certainly be most effectually supported by avoiding whatever it might require you to punish in others. In this view, Sir, permit me to entreat you to join your efforts with those of all other wise and good men to discountenance, and, if possible, to drive out of the world, this unprofitable enormity of swearing in common conversation; concerning the evil of which, I am sure it is not necessary to enlarge, when addressing myself to a gentleman of your good understanding.

I conclude, Sir, with my most affectionate good wishes and prayers for you, that the whole of your conduct in every circumstance of life, may be such as will yield the most pleasing reflections in the awful hour of death, and the most comfortable account before the divine tribunal to which we are hastening; and in the serious views of which, I have presumed to give you this trouble, hoping you will esteem it, as it undoubtedly is, a proof, that I am with great sincerity,

Honoured Sir,
Your most faithful
and obedient humble servant,

PHILIP DODDRIDGE.†

LETTER X.‡

Northampton, October 14, 1743.

My dear Friend,

Your letters, wise and good and kind as they were cordial indeed, and felt as much, had perhaps remained some weeks longer unanswered, if another had not reached me by the last post, on such an occasion as would admit of no delay; but which, tenderly as you have adjusted the matter, necessarily upbraids my former silence, and makes me quite ashamed of it. Yet sure I am, you would pity me, if you knew what I am necessitated to write. Indeed I spend so much time with my pen in my hand, that I am astonished at my own health, which was never better, excepting a pain in my right hand, which grasping the pen so much has occasioned, and by which I sometimes fear lest any tendon be strained, or perhaps contracted: yet, I thank God, it seldom affects any motion but that which seems to have produced it. Only, my good friend, remember this when I seem ungrateful to so much goodness as yours; which I really think, frequent and constant as my addresses to the throne of grace for you are, and tenderly as my heart interests itself in all the concerns of your health, usefulness, and comfort, I do not, and cannot, by any means, suitably repay.

Now I have begun I could write to you all day, and fill a great many sheets, were I to indulge my own inclinations: but as I know I have but a few minutes to write in, I must use them to the most material purpose that I can. But I cannot come to the important and affecting occasion and subject of

* He had resolution to reprove, in a gentle but effectual manner, persons of condition, words spoken by persons of rank and fashion, and had the happy art of compliplacing them upon some good reason they possessed, which he represented their irregularities cast by the means prevented their shewing any resentment. Ed. p. 150.

† After having written this letter, the Doctor made the following remark:—"I thought it more respectful to write to Sir J—— on this occasion than to speak to him before the company; but it caused his dismissal presently. I am the more in the dark, lest I should seem to be influenced by the interest of God, and the good of my friends, and the worst of men."

‡ To the Rev. Mr. Wood of Norwich.

your last, till I have congratulated you and your good lady on your recovery, and the re-establishment of your health to such a degree; in which I adore that God, who hears prayers, for his compassion to me and to his church. Tenderly did I wait every circumstance of information, during the time of your dangerous illness; and one way or another, so kindly did Providence order it, I had more frequent intelligence relating to you, than I ever had in double that time before or since. I doubt not but your resolutions for the service of God, your Deliverer and your Saviour, are renewed; and I rejoice in the support he gave you, and the mercy he has wrought out for you, methinks, as if my life and soul were in the place of yours.

But I will now, lest I leave not myself room to do it, condole with you and your friends at Woodbridge, on the death of that excellent and worthy servant of Christ, your uncle. Mr. Barker had informed me of the affecting providence by Mr. Ashworth, from whom I received the news of it near a week ago, and had desired me to advise the people to a suitable minister if I could. Truly, I think Mr. K—— a very suitable one, if they have no objection to a Baxterian Calvinist, (which, by the way, I think a very proper expression,) and I believe, they would find the good effects of his excellent gifts, for they are distinguished; and that the seriousness and sweetness of his temper, and prudence of his conduct, would make them very happy. I must profess to you, that I find it extremely difficult to direct vacant churches, in the moderately and Calvinistical way, (as most that apply to me are,) to suitable ministers. And I have hardly ever known the time when it was more difficult. I have no pupil to send out till Midsummer, and then hope, if God spare our lives, to furnish the churches with several excellent persons. The most probable means I can think of to direct you which way to look, in subordination to that upward prospect which I know you, dear Sir, have your eyes ever upon, is to mention two or three pious, sensible, and in the main, popular men, whom narrow circumstances force from their present situation, and to leave you to correspond with any of them as you may think fit for either of the places in question. The first of these I think you know, Mr. Wilkinson, now at Deal, if a wife and three children, with little but a place to depend upon, be no objection. He is an admirable preacher, and a most lovely man. My neighbour, Mr. Gainsborough, of Newport-Pagnel, will leave his people; he is a worthy man, but low-spirited, and seems to have some objections against Suffolk; but whether equally against all parts of it, I know not. Mr. Affleck, whom I formerly mentioned, is very much esteemed in Holland, where he is now supplying, during good Mr. Longueville's absence, and he is certainly, both in prayer and preaching, in my judgment, uncommonly excellent; and his temper and character remarkably good. But, as I formerly told you, he is a Scotchman; though really in his pronunciation much mended. He is a Calvinist, but of great moderation, exemplary humility, zeal, and activity for the glory of Christ and salvation of souls. This is all the information I can give you that I think material, and I leave you to advise our friends at Woodbridge and Wrentham as you judge most convenient.

Let me now conclude with our united and most affectionate services to yourself and lady, not forgetting my other friends at Norwich and in your former neighbourhood. I must not, by any means, omit to beg your prayers for Mrs. Doddridge, who expects to be confined in a short time. You know what a good wife is, and she is one of the best, and rises in value every year. I am,

Your affectionate friend and brother,

P. DODDRIDGE.

P. S. Fain would I, if possible, end my Family Expositor; with the third volume of which I rejoice, if you and my other friends are pleased. Truly I spared no pains to make it worthy their acceptance. I continue daily going on with the remaining books of the New Testament, and am now in Jude; so that I hope to end the first copy, from which, if I should be removed, the work might be printed, by the end of December: but I have carried the notes no further than Ephesians, being intent on the paraphrase, version, and improvements, as what to general edification seemed most material.

LETTER XI.

S—— May 4 1736.

I have sent my pen from a sermon which I am preparing for the press as fast as I can, lest it should be out of season to write to my dear friends. Mr. Wood, a letter, which must in every respect be unsatisfactory to him and myself, both with regard to its length and the particulars it will contain. I applied to Mr. C—— on behalf of Mr. F—— with all the earnestness any of his friends could wish; but had the mortification to hear by the last post from that gentleman, that the place which I was soliciting was disposed of before Mr. F—— died. I beg you would assure good Mr. F——, with my most cordial salutations, that I should have rejoiced in an opportunity of serving his grandson; and that I am extremely glad to hear he deserves so very good a character from such a person as Mr. Wood, whose recommendation weighs with me as much as that of any person I could name.

Much am I troubled to tell you, that at last, after much deliberation with myself, I am obliged to determine not to attempt seeing my Norfolk friends this year, though they are justly so peculiarly dear to me. I intended to have come, I longed for the journey, and rejoiced in the prospect, but various important considerations forbid it, and oblige me to defer it one year; but I hope, if God spare our lives, nothing will then prevent it. I have lost my assistant. I expect company in the vacation. I have a manuscript of Dr. Watts's, which will require great care to prepare for the press. When I was absent last summer, a Moravian teacher crept in, and has made a sad breach among us, and erected a little congregation, consisting chiefly of those who were members with us, and once among those who seemed most cordially affected towards me, some of them aged and experienced Christians. It is now a crisis among us. God seems bringing in many to supply the place of the seceders. It appears to me that my ministry at home was never more necessary. I am very desirous of finishing my notes on the New Testament, that if I should die quickly, an event which, entire as my health now is, I accustom myself to expect, the world may lose as little as possible. But indeed by me it can (fondly as your friendship magnifies the little creature) lose no great matter at any event. O that I could unbosom a little of my heart to you! but already am I called to lecture: what shall I say in the broken moment that remains? That every line you write to me increases my love, and, when you show not how very much you overrate my importance, increases my esteem. I think with horror of the character and case of the poor wretch that is gone, and should rejoice to hear that he died awakened and trembling. Such notions of faith, and of an abrogated conversion, if I may so call it, lost in years of folly and wickedness, seem to me full as mischievous as that of popish indulgences; and both spring from the same fountain, and are abetted by the same supporters, I mean the great enemies of our salvation. My wife joins her services to all, for she knows them all by name, and several of them by valuable tokens of friendship, indeed I may say all of them. Excuse this sad scrawl, which the dampness of the paper, just sent me in, almost obliterates. Mr. Lincolne may expect to hear from me soon, in the mean time please to tell him, his son goes on and set out well. But oh, the labourers are very, very few. Farewell, my dear friend. I am,

Your ever affectionate friend and brother,
and greatly obliged humble servant,
P. DODDRIDGE

LETTER XII.

Northampton, Feb. 27, 1744-5.

MY DEAR FRIEND,

YOUR former letter had so much prepared me to hear of the death of that worthy and useful servant of Christ, Mr. Saunders, that your last, which brought me the melancholy news, did not at all surprise me; though it could not but tenderly affect me. I have lost a friend who was mindful of me in his prayers; but God will remember his prayers and yours: and perhaps, I owe the pleasant manner in which I am now going on, and the visible blessing which, unworthy as I am, does indeed attend me in my congregation and writings, my academy and family, in part to the prayers of those whom death has long since separated from me, as well as of those my dear friends whom a kind Providence continues, and particularly and singularly, I am persuaded, to yours. May those petitions which I am so frequently repeating for you be as graciously regarded, as I trust they will, by the God of all mercy; for though I am less worthy of being heard, you are much more worthy of being remembered.

I take my part with my dear friend in the pleasure his humane heart must find in being the messenger of agreeable tidings to the distressed, or in seeing the appearances or openings of Providence in their favour, and it will always be a delight to me to be in any degree the instrument of giving him such a satisfaction. I shall not fail to inform Miss Ekins,* when I write, of the manner in which her letter was received by her cousin, and to cultivate to the utmost of my power every friendly and every generous disposition in her mind. Pray that she may be guarded from the snares which her tender age, lively temper, and plentiful fortune may concur to expose her to.

I fear my zeal to serve your neighbourhood, at your request, has transported me too far. Immediately on receiving yours about a month ago, I wrote to engage Mr. Laugher, of Stamford, an in-

* This excellent lady, daughter of Thomas Ekins, Esq. of Chester on the Water, in Northamptonshire, was Dr Doddridge's ward: she afterwards married the Rev. Dr James Stonhouse, and died December 10th, 1788. The following inscription on her monument erected in the Hot-Wells Chapel, near Bristol, written by her friend MISS HANNAH MORE, does but speak her exemplary virtues.

Come, resignation! wipe the human tear
Domestic anguish drop o'er virtue's bier;
But selfish sorrow hush the fond complaint,
Nor mourn the God she loved detain the saint.

Truth, meekness, patience, honoured shade! were thine
And holy hope, and charity divine:
Though these thy fortlet being could not save,
Thy faith subdued the terrors of the grave.

O! if thy living excellence could teach,
Death has a better emphasis of speech
In death thy last, best lesson still impart,
And write, PREPARE TO DIE, on every heart!

HANNAH MORE.

genious, serious, acceptable and worthy youth, once my pupil, and I think movable, to make you a visit. He has accepted the proposal, and will wait on you for your directions about the middle of next week, if God prosper his journey; and he will be where you please to order him for three following Sundays. If Denton have not young Mr. Saunders in view, and dare venture on so young a man as Mr. Laugher, who will be preaching among them, I hope he might be of service there. You might depend on his regard for your counsels, but I fancy, one way or other, his journey may answer some good end; as, being acquainted with him, you may have your eye upon him in future vacancies, as one whom I would wish removed from the little handful of people, among whom his good abilities are almost lost, to a station of more extensive service. I commit him and you to divine guidance. If he be agreeable, he may perhaps return soon after the time you mention, or if he cannot, I may send you another supply, and will endeavour to do so when you desire it. O, how pleasant is it to assist such a cause and such a friend! I was never better, but never busier, yet see what a long letter I have scribbled, but it is to dear Mr. Wood, who has a right to a thousand times more acknowledgments than he can ever receive from his ever affectionate, faithful, and obliged

P. DODDRIDGE.

P. S. I shall order Ophiomaches on your recommendation. Have you seen Bower's excellent History of the Popes?

LETTER XIII

[illegible] 1732

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND,

WHEN I quitted you with so much tender regret, after having received so many engaging favours, and spent so many delightful hours with you, I retained a secret hope, that I should long ere this have renewed the converse, in such an imperfect manner as pen and paper would have allowed me to do it, but the continued hurry of every day and hour that I spent in and about London, gave no opportunity of doing it, in a manner that would have been in any degree satisfactory to me. Of my safe arrival hither, I knew Miss Ekins would inform you, and what I wrote on the outside of her letter in short-hand, would just acquaint you with my getting well to London. That I esteem you as one of the worthiest men upon earth, and one of the most able and faithful of ministers in the present age; that I look on your excellent lady as one of the wisest and best of her sex, and number you both among the tenderest, most engaging, and delightful friends, I think you already are as sure of as any words of mine can make you; and you must be sure that we have a deep and lasting sense of the numberless obligations you heaped upon us at Norwich, and wherever else we had your company, unless we are, what I think we never shall or can be, lost to all sense of friendship and gratitude.

I was desirous, when I could write to you, to write at least a page or two and to give you some little intelligence as to the state in which I found things in London, and the probable success of the schemes which you know I was forming. Now here in the general, I am to tell you that, according to your repeated prayers when I was with you, and I doubt not since I was separated from you, the hand of my God hath been upon me for good, and whithersoever I have gone I have prospered. You may remember, that there were three affairs of a public nature which were the objects of my particular solicitude. The procuring a third tutor for my academy—the providing for lads not yet fit for academical education—and the doing something for the service to New Jersey, for the propagation of Christianity abroad. Providence has accomplished the first of these schemes, by the unexpected success of the second; and has opened some promising hopes concerning the third, beyond what had entered into my mind when I parted with you. The want of ministers and students is so easy and felt, and the necessity of the scheme for educating lads not yet ripe for academical studies, is grown so apparent, that between three and four score pounds per annum, have been, by well-disposed persons, without any pressing solicitation from me, subscribed for that purpose in and about London; and out of that it has been determined, that besides Mr. Clark, who with a salary of forty pounds per annum and his board, is to be tutor of [illegible] another tutor is to be maintained with a salary of thirty pounds, besides his board, who is to teach the languages, and as his salary chiefly arises from this scheme, he is also to superintend the education of those lads, who are [illegible] exercises, to attend with my pupils, and to make my inspections, though not under my personal instruction, in their grammatical studies; and I design those I find considerably in view before. I have heard of some others well disposed for this purpose, and whom I hope I shall, with this assistance, perhaps increased by applications yet in view, be able to obtain good and worthy ministers for. As for the scheme of the New Jersey, Mr. Allen, who came over on purpose to negotiate it, unhappily was taken ill [illegible] at the Old Bailey, and is dead, but I have had large conversation with Colonel Williams, who was the second man in the expedition to Cape Breton, and by whom indeed it was chiefly projected, and he encourages me to hope that Mr. Pemberton, the minister at New York, on my favouring the scheme, as I certainly shall, will come to Britain, and make a tour over its northern and southern parts, carrying along with him two converted and civilized Indians, as a specimen of what has already been done. He proposes to attempt a collection for the present in the chief congregations which he may visit on this journey; after which, he may very properly write such a letter in his own name to the dissenting ministers in England, as I expressed my thoughts of writing, and may with yet more decency and strength recommend and enforce the advices laid down in my preface to my sermon at Kettering, as this might seem the happiest crisis we could expect for carrying that plan into execution.—As for the affair of Breslaw, the good Archbishop of Canterbury did all he could to procure a brief for them, or a contribution some other way.

You will perhaps be surprised to hear, that application has been made to me from a son of Lord William Manners, brother to the Duke of Rutland, to desire admission among my pupils, though intended for a clergyman in the established church: and if he be willing to acquiesce in the terms and orders of my family, I shall not refuse it. I wonder at this one way, and I wonder also at Mr. ——'s purpose of removing his son from me: I fear it is either on some misrepresentation or foolish behaviour of the young gentleman, for I have always treated him with the fidelity of a real friend, and with the tenderness of a parent; and I am well satisfied, that, especially on the improvements which by means of a third tutor will be made in our course, there is no place of education in England, where, if a youth will do himself justice, greater advantages are to be found. But you see how I have run on. Were I to begin a second sheet, I should fill it before I had emptied half my heart. Let me conclude with the most affectionate and grateful services to all my good friends at Norwich, and those at Yarmouth, when you see them. My wife joins with me in these salutations, of which you and your charming lady claim a very distinguished share. O that we could see you here, and give you both, as a poor grateful child expressed it, "all your care again." Mr. Neal and Mr. Barker are particular in their salutations to you. I am,

With much more affection than can be expressed,

My dear friend, yours,

Blessed be God, for ever,

P. DODDRIDGE.

LETTER XIV.

Northampton, Dec. 4, 1750.

It is such a pleasure to me to write to you, that I sometimes am ready to wonder, I can command myself so far as not to be quite troublesome by the number and length of my epistles: and yet such are my daily and hourly engagements, that I often defer answering your kind, endearing, charming letters till I have reason to be ashamed, and till one of them overtakes another. This I am sure you will excuse, and could wish you knew how frequently and affectionately I remember you, and what an inward, heartfelt sense I have of your great importance to the public, as well as the value of your personal friendship. Your last letter illustrates both, and your generous readiness even to part with a most beloved and important friend, if it may be for her good, is a noble instance of it. As for Miss S——'s affair I will say nothing of it here, as I intend her at least a few lines, which I shall enclose with this, and which I know she will communicate to you. Of other things to which your letters refer, I will speak in as few words as I can, that I may get the more minutes for that great affair which lies so much on the head and heart of us both. For the congregation at Harlestone I am very tenderly concerned, but I am not able to assist them. I beg you will present my most cordially affectionate respects to Mr. Matchet, and all the rest of the gentlemen that signed with him, and tell them, that I am sensible of the obligations they have laid upon me by their very respectful and affecting application, and that I think it the part of gratitude not to send any one to them, concerning whom I have any doubt whether he would be thoroughly suitable or not; and that, therefore, in this extreme penury of supplies, which is by far the greatest I have ever known, I find myself incapable of assisting them. Yet I have a young gentleman with me of such a stamp as they would I am sure choose, who will enter on public work about Midsummer next. I would by no means have them wait for him, as it is impossible for me to answer for the views which may open upon him, or the turn his inclinations may take from unknown contingencies which may arise; but when he comes out, if they happen to be vacant, and he chooses the journey, I will, God willing, endeavour to engage him to make them a visit. Be pleased also to make my due compliments to Mr. and Mrs. Baker, in which Mrs. Doddridge concurs, renewing our thanks for the very obliging and agreeable entertainment we received at Denton; and mine, for the most complaisant letter, with which that very worthy friend has been pleased since to honour me. How happy should I have been in an interview with such worthy brethren and excellent friends as you tell me assembled at Rendham, at the opening of the new place of worship there. I assure you, dear Sir, and I beg the favour of you to assure the gentlemen who met there, when you see any of them, that there are no associations of ministers any where, which I attend with greater delight than those of Norfolk and Suffolk. Your remark on Colonel Williams's wonderful modesty is the very same which has been made by others. How amiable in such a hero! for such no doubt he is: and the acquisition of Cape Breton was, perhaps, more owing to him, taking in the whole process of his counsels as well as actions, than to any other person in the world. Yet how is he rewarded? Truly, nobly by Providence, if he carry off one whom I esteem among the greatest treasures of our island or our world. Mr. Finne is a most excellent person: he has been pretty successful in Holland, and such good consequences have already attended the applications made to several of our country congregations, that I believe a college of the reformed (that is, the Calvinists) will be formed at Breslaw; which will have a wonderful influence on the state of religion in Silesia, and probably be attended with the greatest effects of any thing that has happened in Germany, since that wonderful affair at Hall, if that which has been a mighty blessing is to be excepted. The intended college, after the German plan, is to comprehend all sorts of schools, but chiefly those for academical learning and the education of ministers; in which I apprehend that zealous, faithful, and able servant of Christ, Mr. Finne, (to whom I hope you will write a Latin letter,) will be greatly, if not principally, employed. I beg you will present my particular and most respectful services to that very venerable and amiable man, Mr. Crompton, and my hearty thanks for that parngraph in his very kind letter you were so good as to transcribe. Tell him, I read it with a mixture of pleasure and confusion; and that I honour and revere him more than I can express, and should think it a singular blessing of my life to have such an example and such a counsellor often near me. In the mean time I pray God long to spare his very useful life, and to relieve greatly in his wonderful restoration. As to the New Jerseys, I have written largely to Mr. Pemberton, whom I hope to see here in the summer; and leave all that relates to the scheme. I hinted to you in integro, till he or some other minister of credit and influence may visit us from those parts, and then I hope something will be done. In the mean time, I have sent your youth's scheme all round our country, and into some neighbouring parts, and find such encouragement from my own congregation and some others, that I hope we shall have a pretty tolerable fund. I cannot but observe at the same time, a wonderful concurrence of providence in raising up several hopeful and promising youths, who are desirous of education for the ministry, and I intend to take in all, in whom I am thoroughly satisfied; trusting in God to prepare oil, so long as there are empty vessels, and when we are broke I will beg for more. The addition of another tutor here is a circumstance of great importance; and as the scheme of an academy at Lisbon is entirely laid aside sine die, I am ready to believe, though I do not certainly know it, that we shall have some youths sent down to us from that quarter. But all this I leave with God, earnestly praying, that good may be done, and the interest of religion revived, and leaving it to him to determine how and by whom. If he determine to glorify his power and grace in the weakness and unworthiness of the instrument, I may have some hope that he will make use of me.

You see I am beginning on a new piece of paper but I must fill only a small part of it. I much deplored the death of Mr. Ford, of Sudbury. He was a man of great talents, and, which is incomparably better, great spirituality, integrity, and zeal for Christ; and we might, considering his age and constitution, have expected much service from him for many future years. But this providence adds to the joy my heart feels in hearing of the comfortable state of your health, for which I offer many prayers. I hope you will live to bless the world many, many years after I have left it. As for Sudbury, I have now in town with me Mr. Holman and Mr. Fen, who came to hear Mr. Hextal, of Creaton, once my pupil, a most pious, humble, zealous, and very able man, only of a weak constitution, who would, perhaps, be as fit to succeed Mr. Ford as any man that can be named. It would be a great grief to me to lose him from these parts, but I would not wrong the public so far, as to wish to retain him in so small a place all his life. I shall be glad that Mr. Taylor [illegible] may bestow his time and labours on unlocking Hebrew words, and hope the key he has left [illegible] Paul's Epistles, will not be able to keep the true sense quite shut up: indeed I think the door opens almost of its own accord. If I live to finish my Exposition on the New Testament, the proposals for which I am just publishing, and in which I am going on daily, and have now proceeded in translating to the Corinthians, (1 Epist. iii.) I shall make an attempt on the Minor Prophets, of which indeed I have already begun to make a new translation from the Hebrew, for my own entertainment and use, and I shall be glad of any light which Mr Taylor's Lexicon can give me.

Dear Lady ——— is in a very declining way. Pray devoutly for her important life; and pray for a blessing on the Family Expositor; and may God [illegible] would open its way into families, where it may be useful. I would go through all the labour attending it with pleasure, though I were sure I should not get one shilling by it.

The distemper among the horned cattle has again visited these parts; though, blessed be God, not with violence. All our horses too have been ill, yet few are dead. The small-pox is broke out dreadfully in the neighbouring villages—a most malignant sort. One rash young fellow, coming to a wake at Harpole, in our neighbourhood, from the bed of one infected with it, conveyed it to above forty of that village; all blooming persons, of whom many are dead. In seventeen families, three in a family, on an average, are down; and fourteen villages are invaded by it, and all in consequence of some of the inhabitants being present at that fatal dancing bout, the 15th of last month. The terror this has occasioned is not to be imagined. Oh, when shall we see the importance of inoculating children!* in consequence of which, whole towns have passed safely through, and not one life been lost. But you say right, the cause of these desolations is to be sought higher. The indolence and sensuality of the professing world terrifies me much. Yet, blessed be God, some are brought to a sense of their duty and danger, nor does he leave me without encouragement on this head. Much pleasure and satisfaction have I, when I can run away from the world, and spend half a day in meditation and prayer: and did we more frequently attempt this, I believe we should find the work of the Lord more prosperous among us. Religious societies are forming, and many learn to pray, truly, I think better than their ministers often do. O, these are things which rejoice my heart. I am quite well, and in good spirits. I never had a more promising set of pupils about me. God hear your prayers on my account. Go on, and heap as many blessings upon me as you can; and help me forward to heaven apace. And now I will add a paragraph of good Lady ———'s last letter to me, which I can more truly apply to you, my very excellent friend:—— "Prayers from me you will have: and I believe one of the last I put up will be to beg an abundant reward for you." The voice involuntary of my heart is, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth I desire besides thee." I expect soon to be unfettered from flesh and blood. I will, should the kind lot be appointed for me, rejoice over you as your ministering spirit; and I shall always have good news to bring you. I will watch carefully to protect your life long upon earth, for the sake of thousands; and then, by gentle operation, help to unfold your garments of mortality, and with my fellow-companions, waft your gracious spirit to the bridal feast of the Lamb, and with him, on Mount Sion, shout your glorious deliverance. Farewell, my kindest, best of friends, and live assured of the ever affectionate regard of ——." What have I to add—but instead of — —

PHILIP DODDRIDGE.

* Dr Doddridge published a small piece at Mr Sans concerning Inoculation for the Small-pox, which was written and published purposely with a view to remove the common objections from religious scruples.

LETTER XV.

Northampton, Dec. 22, 1750.

MY DEAR FRIEND,

IT is indeed true, that my affection for you is very great; but it is as true, that it cannot be greater than your almost unexampled goodness demands. In every thing but love I shall die your debtor. I cannot in these straits of time answer your excellent letter as it deserves; but I have been immediately mindful of the contents. As soon as I read it, I sat down and wrote two letters into Scotland, the one to Mr. Webster, the other to Mr. Robertson; and have pressed an answer from both as soon as may be.

On Thursday morning, at the appointed time, though my usual business and duties would have engaged me another way, my poor imperfect requests, hardly worthy to be called prayers, were offered for our two excellent friends; I hope with something of that partiality and disinterestedness of which you give so noble an example. As to the result, I expect the leadings of Providence to determine it much more out of regard to the petitions of others than to my own.

Thus much for the principal subjects of your letters. For the rest—receive our united salutations in the warmest terms which friendship, and love, and gratitude, can dictate. Pity me, and pray for me, as you do, in the midst of so many hurries. Oh, my poor, poor attempts of service! They shame me continually. My prayers, my sermons, my lectures, my books, (in hand,) my letters, all daily shame me. A secret consciousness of meaning well, and the remembrance of the great compassion of our heavenly Father, and divine Master, are almost my only supports. Remember me daily. O that I had more time and heart for secret devotion. Dear Dr. Clark's death has been a deep wound. Sadly did I perform the last office of respect to him. But I must not enlarge. Pray for the success of the Family Expositor. I am also printing the funeral sermon for my excellent friend at St. Albans. Lady ——— continues very ill. I fear we shall soon lose her too. But the Lord liveth, and blessed be our Rock &c.

I bless God, we are all pretty well, colds excepted. But the small-pox rages around the town, and we have a very bad fever in it: and a few days suffice for the journey of many into eternity, and may suffice for mine. May I but live for Christ while I continue here, and leave it to him to turn the key whenever he sees fit. God is adding serious lads to what we may call the humanity class, and so many others are offering themselves, that I begin to doubt how they will be provided for: but we must draw on the inexhaustible bank of the divine bounty and faithfulness, and think often of Jehovah-jireh. Respects to all friends at Norwich, shall in very deed conclude this hasty scrawl from,

Dear Sir,

Your affectionate friend, brother, and servant,
in everlasting bonds,

P. DODDRIDGE.

I have, at least, fifty unanswered letters before me.

LETTER XVI.

Northampton, Jan. 15, 1750-1.

DEAR SIR,

As I am much indisposed with a cough, which has lately been attended with a pain in my breast, and which forces me, which is a sad calamity, to lose my mornings in bed; and as I must this morning, though it is now between nine and ten, before I go to my academical work, send up part of Dr. Clark's funeral sermon, which I am to transcribe, that the press may not stand still, yet must I write you a few lines. But alas, my head and heart are so full, that many pages would not contain their full meaning. Let me thank you and my two excellent friends, so soon to become one, for the very delightful letter with which you have all honoured and comforted me. I hope the resolution of this day fortnight was under the best direction, and will be attended with the happiest consequences. I rejoice greatly to hear of the favour which the Colonel and his lady intend me.—One Mr. Samuel Davies, of Hanover County in Virginia, has sent me a charming letter of good news from a far country, which I want to communicate to your society, that you may praise God with me. Transcribing long letters is a painful drudgery. I think you should make a little purse to pay postage of such letters, and I would transmit them, and you should return them; and in that case I may perhaps send you this for a beginning. But I run on too far. I must only add, that Providence seems to engage Mr. ——, whom I intended for Harlestone, another way, and there is such a dearth of ministers as distresses my heart. You have, I hope, heard the good news from Ireland of a remarkable revival of religion there.—But alas, a bell rings which forces me to conclude. Pray tell Mr. Frost he cannot long so much to hear from me as I do to write to him; and let him know, that yesterday to amuse myself, as I took physic and might not write much, I marshalled my unanswered letters, and found them one hundred and six, near one quarter of which reached me since Friday noon, and it was then Monday evening, and all this, though I have written between fifty and sixty letters the last fourteen days with my own hand, having no secretary. And yet I sometimes think it would be almost employment enough for all my time to acknowledge a friendship like yours, and my many obligations to your tender, constant, generous love. Farewell, dear excellent man; and may the God who has given me so incomparable a friend, spare him to bless the world long after it has lost, if that be any loss.

Dear Sir,

Your ever faithful, affectionate, and obliged,

P. DODDRIDGE.

LETTER XVII

[illegible] 1750-1.

DEAR SIR,

I HAVE wrote such a multitude of letters of late, and have received so many, that not having always been so exact as I ought to have been in making memorandums, I hardly know what I have and what I have not answered, and with regard to you I am the more uncertain, as I may mistake some particular messages sent to you in Colonel [illegible]'s letter some time since, for an answer to that of yours, which informed me of his marriage; but of this I am sure, that every way I am in your debt, and always shall be so: and I can add, that as there are few on earth whom I equally honour and love, none whom I more constantly remember among my best friends, so there is none whose letters more constantly delight and refresh me. Yours of the 20th of March, however, I am sure is unanswered, and I must now entreat you to a few hasty lines to accept my thanks for it, and the former, with the assurances of the most tender sympathy with you in all you have suffered and do suffer by the death of some valuable friends, the removal of others, especially that incomparable one who has lately left us, and whom I fear I shall see no more in this world. Your own disposition, and that of your excellent lady; the wickedness of those of whom your great and generous candour has believed too well of; and the afflictions of those whose sorrows you so [illegible] heart by so tender compassion makes your own : all these things I would feel for you, and particularly for poor Mr. ———— , to whom I entreat you to give my services, assuring him that both I and Miss ———— are much touched with his case.

My heart has been much set on promoting the youths' scheme. I dispersed your papers all over the country, but, to my great grief, have not found in many of our congregations that encouragement which I hoped. Something however is done, and much more in proportion from London than from the country. There are however nine lads, some of them very promising, who are here supported by it ; and I sometimes think two of them will offer themselves as missionaries to New York, to plant the gospel among the Indians there ; and glad at my heart should I be, if my only son were desirous of being the third.

I am at present under great concern for the illness, I fear the dangerous illness, of my generous, faithful, endeared friend, Mr. Lyttelton. It is the smallest part of this concern, that it prevents him from doing that service to my subscription to the remaining volumes of the Family Expositor, which he was resolved to have attempted, and which, with so great an interest, he might probably enough have effected. The greater part of that disappointment to me is, that it may prevent it coming into the hands of some in higher life to whom it may otherwise have no access : but God limits or extends all such prospects at pleasure, and I desire to refer it to him with what degrees of encouragement the work shall be published, and indeed, whether it shall be published or not. The three volumes will hardly be published at so small a price as a thousand pounds, and I shall judge it the part of prudence, and therefore of duty, not to send them to the press on any terms on which I shall not be secure ; and if there be such a number subscribed for or bespoke by booksellers as to effect that, I shall go on with the publication as fast as I can ; and bless God for such an opportunity of doing my public homage to his word, and endeavouring, with all integrity and simplicity, to make it understood, and to enforce it on men's consciences according to the little ability he has been pleased to give me ; which truly I think so little, that I am sometimes almost ashamed of having undertaken so great a work.

I have, of late, been much indisposed with a cold, which is returned again, but not with so much violence as before. I know I have your prayers, and I delight in the thought. We are tending to one blessed home. Our interview at Norwich was pleasant, how much more will that be which we expect in our Father's house. This poor letter has been written raptim at several times. I have filled my four pages, and yet seem but to have begun. But I must conclude with every good wish for you and yours that the tenderest friendship can form : nor can I hope ever to tell my dear Mr. Wood how faithfully and affectionately I am his,

P. DODDRIDGE.

LETTER XVIII.

Northampton, May 11, 1751.

My dear Friend,

Receive in a few words my thanks for your last very kind letter, and my condolences on the death of good Mr. Holman, which grieves me exceedingly. It would be some consolation to me, under this affliction, which at present comes not alone, could I meet you at Walpole on Wednesday sevennight. I have much to say, but have no time, only must assure of my sympathy with you in dear Mrs. Wood's frequent indispositions. That charming lady ! Why must she even feel any thing painful ? but all will sit light if you are well. I pray God she may enjoy that comfort and every other. I long to talk over many matters at large with you, and will come, if God permit, from London to Sudbury, at Mr. Hextal's settlement with that people, if you will give me the meeting, and I will spend two days there that we may enjoy one another. Pray answer me this speedily, that the scheme may be ripened, and I may judge what it will be necessary to write in my next. I bless God I am pure well. My eldest daughter is finely recovered of her extreme illness ; whereas one of the loveliest girls I ever knew, a wealthy attorney's daughter here, who was but beginning to be slightly indisposed on Thursday, died this evening. A most affecting lesson of earthly vanity. Such are our children ; such are we. But there is a world which is not subjected to vanity. Excuse the hurry in which duty obliges me to write. The letter I received to-day from Mr. ———, was the four hundredth on my list since Christmas. Support, dear Sir, by your prayers,

Your very affectionate brother and friend,
and much obliged humble servant,

PHILIP DODDRIDGE.

LETTER XIX.

Northampton, June 5, 1751.

My dear Sir,

We have been much obliged to Miss Reymes for her visit, which she has made very agreeable to us ; but the time of her stay has seemed very short, and it has been a great trouble to us to part with her so soon. Her piety, sweetness of temper, discretion, and tender friendship, of which she has an exquisite sense, worthy one so conversant with you, have endeared her to us more than I can well express; and I beg you to make our acknowledgments to her worthy parents, who have so kindly indulged us in a pleasure we much regret that we must so soon lose.

I cannot express how much I long to see you, and firmly believe, that it was the secret hope of meeting you and Mr. Frost, to whom I have made shift to write a little, at Sudbury, that turned the scale for that otherwise very inconvenient appointment.

I thank you most cordially for the regard you express to the Family Expositor; to the second volume of which, that is, the fifth of the whole work, I have this morning been putting my finishing hand; except that the notes on the Hebrews are not yet transcribed.

I am much obliged to you for the noble things you have done for Breslaw. I am just writing thither, and shall not fail to inform my worthy friend Mr. Finne of your goodness. I really think it will be of great importance, for the support of the protestant cause in Germany, that their church be thus aided in this important crisis. I rejoice that Providence is still bearing you up under your various fatigues, and animating you to so many important services; in which you will be long continued and gloriously succeeded if my poor broken petitions can avail any thing.

I must not conclude without telling you that I am far from well, having a violent cough, which seems very stubborn, and sometimes almost silences me in public: I have scarce been one fortnight free from it since I left London in August last; but have kept it pretty well at bay: but this last relapse is a very bad one, and especially in conjunction with my intended London journey, gives good Mrs. Doddridge a great deal of uneasiness. I thank God, I have no aversion to the thoughts of a speedy removal; but I would husband life as well as I can, especially for his sake who gave it, and whose loving kindness is so much better than life; and truly, so far as some visible blessing on my labours can endear it to me, I never had more reason to wish it might be prolonged.

I beseech you to make my best compliments to your good lady, and all other friends your way, particularly my reverend brethren in the ministry, and Mr. Baker, of Denton, when you see him. Mrs. Doddridge joins in all these salutations. As for me, I find all language poor when I would tell you how highly I esteem you, how tenderly I love you, and how constantly and faithfully I am, to the best of my little abilities,

Reverend and dear Sir,

Your most affectionate brother,

and much obliged humble servant,

PHILIP DODDRIDGE

I greatly esteem Mr. [illegible] that he should [illegible] such a person; but cannot help but fear my friend Wood speaking of himself as to the [illegible] of his usefulness. I hardly think you yet entered at the scene of it; and often to myself that you are like to live to bless the world and the church, when I am got home.

LETTER XX

MY DEAR FRIEND,

HAVING any disappointment of the kind ever [illegible] heaviest upon me than that of not seeing you here; the expectation of which, with the hopes of an interview with good Mr. Frost, gave me resolution to break through the strong importunity of my friends in London, and through the discouragements arising from a very bad cold, which such a journey was likely to increase, that I might once more embrace him who has so much of my heart, as well as of my esteem, that if I think love could inscribe a name there, yours would be found on mine when it beats no more. But I expect to [illegible] at home, and therefore I ought to love you the better for it. I [illegible] seeing you, as I had several things to talk over with you at great length. [illegible] rather many restless hours in it, in connexion with the views of labour before me this day, for which I am but ill qualified, has detained me in bed so long, that I have now but a few minutes to write to you. As to Colonel Williams's scheme for the Indian school, I shall refer you partly to Mr. Frost, who will inform you of what passes in reference to it, and partly to some future letter, if time permit, to which I will refer you, with the [illegible] this important affair which the good Colonel sent me by the last post. And perhaps I may then send you a copy of the Bishop of London's letter to me in reference to Mr. Davies's affair in Virginia. I paid in your noble donation to Mr. Wilson for the church at [illegible], a number of [illegible] rejoicing at once [illegible] with the parish schools. It is an [illegible] and I [illegible] gathered [illegible] utterly perishing for want of supplies, that I am [illegible] but I must not enlarge. The frequent returns of my cough alarm my friends, and [illegible] I have grown many years since I was in the [illegible] I leave the event with God; but [illegible] preclude no [illegible] O how [illegible] being enabled to [illegible] rather with my [illegible] business. My second daughter was ill when I heard last from home. Pray for her, and continue your prayers for him, who is much more than he can express,

Your affectionate friend,
and much obliged humble servant,

PHILIP DODDRIDGE.

LETTER XXI.*

To a Lady, under dejection of mind on a religious account.

June 25, 1745.

DEAR MADAM,

I RETURN you my most affectionate thanks for the freedom with which you have opened your mind to me, both by repeated and unreserved conversations, and by a communication of papers intended entirely for your own use. The consequence, I most faithfully assure you, is, that the more I know you, the more firmly I am convinced, not only that you are a real, but that you are a very advanced, Christian. I have pointed to you already the principles on which I build the conclusion. But as I have not yet been happy enough to remove remaining difficulties, give me leave, in this letter, to lay before you some hints, as to what I apprehend may be the cause, and, by a divine blessing, in some measure at least, the cure, of this anxiety which so much harasses your mind. And pardon me, that in this strait of time, and in this hour which, with pleasure for your service, I take from my sleep before the journey and labours of to-morrow, I do but touch upon particulars, and give short hints, instead of illustrating or reasoning upon them at large.

Now, as to the causes of your present distress, I apprehend the following things, among others, are the chief and most peculiar; for I shall not mention those two grand cardinal causes of all our distress, —some remainder of sin in the best hearts, while they continue here,—and the artifice and malice of our common enemy. What is most peculiar seem to be, 1. The weakness of animal nature, which, after the attacks it has borne, must necessarily be very weak, unless it had been strengthened by a miracle, which even in such a case we have no warrant to expect. 2. The extraordinary elevation of devotion, which at some times you have known, and particularly when you were first setting out in religion. 3. In consequence of this, an ardent desire of equalling all the sallies of devotion, in this present infirm state of your health; by the very desire and endeavour of which, I heartily wish that you may not utterly ruin it. 4. A hasty and unjust conclusion which you have hence drawn against yourself, as if you were one of the most ungrateful and criminal of mankind, that excites an indignation against yourself, which you think you can never feel with a sufficient sensibility. 5. The sublime ideas which you have formed to yourself of the spiritual life, in which you seem not to make sufficient allowance, either for the natural infirmities of this animal frame, when in its best state; or, for the avocations inseparable from the life of one who is not absolutely a recluse from the world. I really apprehend these to be the causes of your disquiet.

With relation to the most proper method of cure, the following particulars present themselves to me; which I wish I had time to digest and express better. 1. To lay it down as a certain principle, that religion consists more in an intelligent, rational, and determinate choice of the will, than in any ardent transport of the affections. 2. To consider, that there is a certain degree of afflicting ourselves for past sins, and for present imperfections, which is so far from being our duty, that it is very likely to prove a snare, and to produce consequences displeasing to our gracious Father in heaven, and injurious both to ourselves and others. 3. Settle it deliberately in your understanding as a certain truth, that the grand security of the soul lies, in deliberately intrusting itself to Christ, chosen in all his offices, and devoting itself to God through him, according to the tenor of the Christian covenant; and steadily endeavour in consequence of it, to practise that which the word of God requires, and to forbear every thing which it forbids, and referring all its concerns, not excepting even the degrees of its spiritual comfort and enjoyment, to his wise and gracious determination. 4. In consequence of this, be often, and daily indeed, renewing your covenant with God, in the manner which that most worthy and excellent servant of Christ, your ever honoured and beloved father, has so intelligently, affectionately, and frequently recommended. 5. Let your devotions be reduced within narrow limits, and rather frequent and short, than protracted to a very great length; and in your addresses to the throne of grace be more intent upon the sincerity of the heart, and the calm fixedness of the thoughts, than about the flow of affection, which is not, and cannot be, immediately in our own power; but may, humanly speaking, depend upon a thousand mechanical causes, which we do not so much as know. 6. Consider how much of religion consists in trusting in God, in hoping in his mercy, and in rejoicing in him; and how suitable this is to the peculiar constitution of the gospel, and the character which Christ our mediator bears; by consequence, therefore, how essential a branch of gratitude it is, and how much a tender conscience should be upon its guard, that it does not fail here. 7. Remember continually, that, after all, it is by faith in the merits and intercession of Christ, and not by the perfection of our works, that we are to obtain justification and life; and that the best of Christians will have their imperfections while they are in this world; and may, and must, under a sense of them, daily apply to the great Advocate, and renew the actings of their faith upon his efficacious blood and intercession. 8. Make yourself familiarly acquainted with the promises of God; those relating to the pardon of sin, the imparting grace to the soul that seeks it, &c.: and choose, for some time, every morning, some comfortable promises to be the subject of your meditation; and now and then employ that fine talent which God has given you for poetical composition, in paraphrasing such scriptures in some short hymns. 9. Endeavour to exert yourself as much as possible in attempts of usefulness, by conversing with the children who are so happy as to be the objects of your pious care, and with those who are in circumstances that bear any resemblance to your own. 10. Disburthen yourself as much as possible of every anxious thought relating to futurity, whether regarding temporals or spirituals: confine your views to present duty, and leave future contingencies in the hands of God. 11. Be thankful for every, the least, glimmering of hope, and for any kind and degree of consolation which God is pleased to give you; and take great heed that you do not suspect those comforts which lead you to God and goodness to be delusions, merely because they are not so permanent and effectual as you could wish, lest you should injure that great Agent to whom you are so highly obliged, and whom you so tenderly fear to grieve. 12. In one word, study by all means to nourish the love of God in your heart; breathe forth with humble tenderness the genuine impressions of it; and as human nature must have its weary intervals and its barren frames, delight to look to God in them, as a Being who penetrates all the inmost recesses of the heart, and sees that secret tendency of soul to him, which neither tears nor words can express.—"Lord, thou knowest that I love thee: or that I would (thou knowest I would) prefer the sensible exercises of it to any other delight." By this method, the habits of divine love will strengthen by frequent acts; and I verily believe, that time will at length produce such a consciousness of it, that you will be no more able to doubt of it than of your own existence.

* From the author's short hand copy

These, Madam, are advices, which though not expressed with the accuracy I could wish, I would recommend to you as the most important I can give. My earnest prayer for you, and which I desire daily to repeat, is, that God himself may be your comforter, and pour out upon your wounded and mournful heart the oil of gladness in a rich abundance. To know that I have been in any instance the instrument of reviving so excellent a spirit would give me unutterable joy, and I should esteem it among the greatest honours God has ever bestowed upon.

Dear Madam,
Your most affectionate friend,
and faithful humble servant,
P. DODDRIDGE

A SERMON

OCCASIONED BY THE

DEATH OF THE REV. PHILIP DODDRIDGE, D. D.

WHO DIED OCTOBER 26, 1751, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF HIS AGE.

BY JOB ORTON.

DEDICATION.

To the Church of Christ at Northampton, lately under the pastoral care of the Rev. Dr. Doddridge: Grace, Mercy, and Peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

My dear Friends,

Though Providence has removed me a distance from you, I share largely in those sorrows, with which your minds are filled on account of the death of your learned, pious, and excellent pastor; an event which all our churches greatly and justly lament. When he assigned to me the work of preaching the Sermon on that occasion, he was sensible my respect for you, as well as for him, would not suffer me to decline it. In compliance with his desire the following Discourse was drawn up, in the best manner I could, amidst the languors of an infirm constitution, and the interruption of many necessary avocations. And it had been long ago preached among you, had not a wise Providence permitted an unhappy accident to befall me, which confines me at home. It is the most grievous circumstance in this affliction, that I am prevented from visiting you, performing the service assigned by my ever honoured friend and father, and personally suggesting to you such consolations and advices as may, in present circumstances, be peculiarly useful. To supply this lack of service, I am constrained to send you the Discourse from the press: and this, I hope, will be a sufficient apology with those, who may think it unworthy of public regard. It is some satisfaction to me to reflect, that discourses, on such solemn occasions, have been attended with great usefulness, especially to the acquaintance and friends of the deceased, which has often flowed, not so much from the thoughts and advices contained in them considered alone, as viewed in connexion with the awful events which occasioned them. I hope, therefore, that a recollection of the Doctor's eminent worth, and the loss his family, his flock, and the public sustain by his death, will cast a veil over the imperfections of this Discourse, and fill every reader's heart with so much seriousness and tenderness, as may make way for the plain remarks and admonitions contained therein, to impress it, and through the influences of the Spirit of Jesus, produce some valuable effect.

I cannot conclude this address without expressing my warmest gratitude to you, for all the respect and affection with which you honoured me, during the agreeable years I spent amongst you. And it is my earnest wish and prayer, that you may yet flourish, and be edified, walking in the fear of the Lord, and the comforts of the Holy Ghost: particularly that you may act upon those noble and truly Christian maxims of candour and unanimity, which your late pastor inculcated upon you, and the public, in all your future conduct, and especially in the choice of his successor: that the Head of the church would give you a pastor after his own heart, under whom you may daily grow in Christian knowledge and holiness, and be training up for the perfection and happiness of the heavenly state. These are the daily prayers of,

My dear friends,
Your affectionate friend,
and servant, for Jesus' sake,

JOB ORTON

THE CHRISTIAN'S TRIUMPH OVER DEATH.

1 Cor. xv. 54. latter part.

Death is swallowed up in victory.

THE dying bed of an eminent Christian is a most melancholy, and at the same time a most delightful, scene: grief for the dominion of sin and death, and the loss we are sustaining by his removal, joy in the supports of religion he feels, and the promises of the gospel he rests upon, take place in our minds by turns, and sometimes mingle together. But in a soul formed to a relish for virtuous friendship, and deeply impressed with the great truths of Christianity, the joy will preponderate; and the pious heart will overflow with sacred delight to see the terrors of death removed, to observe how wonderfully God sustains his servants in their last conflict, and what an attestation they give to the fulness and sweetness of Christian consolations. In this instance in particular, God graciously makes his providence a commentary upon his word, and illustrates the promises of his gospel by the joy and peace he diffuses into the hearts of his dying saints. Our text has often been the means of producing this joy, and is indeed one of the most comfortable declarations that mortal creatures can hear; and the awful event, which directs my thoughts to it, confirms the excellency and suitableness of it. It should certainly be regarded by all with an attention becoming dying creatures. But there are two circumstances (my friends) to recommend it to your peculiar regard, viz. that it was exemplified in the closing scenes of the life of your late worthy pastor, so justly dear to you and to me, and that out of a particular concern for your support and encouragement living and dying, it was his express, his last, and almost dying, request, that I would discourse to you from it, on this very melancholy occasion.

The excellent and reviving chapter of which the text is a part, was intended to confute the opinion of those who said, there was no resurrection of the dead.* Their error seems to have been in asserting, that what Christ and his apostles had said of a resurrection, did not refer to a resurrection of the dead, but a resurrection or renovation to a life of holiness from a state of sin, which is justly and beautifully described as a state of death. This, probably, was the error of Hymeneus and Philetus, who said, that the resurrection is past already. The apostle Paul therefore sets himself to prove at large, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead. He proves it possible, from the resurrection of Christ; a well known and undisputed fact: He proves it certain, from the connexion between this fact and the authority of the apostles to publish his religion; of which this doctrine was so distinguishing and glorious a part; and also from the relation in which Christ, the last Adam, stood to mankind. And as the objections against this doctrine chiefly arose from not understanding its nature, and the circumstances of the new body, he enlarges upon these topics in the latter part of the chapter; and concludes it with a divine and most eloquent rapture, describing the glorious resurrection of the saints, (of whom alone he there speaks,) and triumphing in the prospect of this blissful event; so (says he) when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory." The text is a quotation from the prophecies of Isaiah, where it is said, He will swallow up death in victory; and probably refers to the deliverance of the Israelites from that utter destruction, which the king of Assyria threatened, and attempted to bring upon them; a deliverance that was indeed life from the dead. It is with great propriety and beauty, that these sublime and comfortable words are by St. Paul accommodated to the resurrection of the dead. The text suggests to us these two remarks, which I will endeavour to illustrate, and then direct you to the proper improvement of them.

I. Death may naturally be considered as an enemy.

II. True Christians shall obtain a complete victory over it.

I. Death may naturally be considered as an enemy.

This is implied in the text, when the apostle speaks of a victory; and it is expressly asserted in verse 26. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. It is an enemy we are every one to conflict with, for there is no discharge in that war. Death is, by an elegant figure, often described in the Scriptures, as a person, or intelligent agent. It is emphatically styled the king of terrors, and said to reign over mankind by one man's offence. Nature and experience teach us to consider death as an enemy; for

It dissolves the union between soul and body. It dislodges the soul, willing or unwilling; and separates it from its old and dear companion. Providence has wisely implanted in every human [illegible] and a tender concern for its health. [illegible] man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it. Consequently a separation must be painful. [illegible] this must [illegible] burthened, yet there is a natural aversion to put it off. Not (says the apostle) for that we would be unclothed. It would be more agreeable to take the body with us to another world, than go through the pain and terror of dying, and have these two bosom friends divorced. * This is a circumstance we would be glad to be excused from, especially as it is the consequence and punishment of sin; but death will pull down this structure, which, mean as it is, we are fond of, having dwelt in it so long, and having been at so much care and pains to keep it in tolerable repair, and will force the inhabitant to remove.

Again, death destroys the activity and beauty of the body, and turns it into loathsomeness and corruption. Diseases, its forerunners, generally consume away the flesh that it cannot be seen, and the bones that were not seen, stick out. At length the comeliness of the body is turned into deformity, and what was an object of delight becomes a spectacle of horror. The limbs that were sprightly and active grow stiff and useless; the eyes which sparkled with life and vigour are sunk and ghastly; the learned brain, in which so many curious traces were lodged, so many ideas ranged with the utmost care, and retained by close recollection, has lost its exquisite sensibility; and the entertaining and instructive tongue is sealed up in silence. The vitals of the body have lost their powers. The lungs cease to play, and the heart to beat. The silver cord is loosed, and the golden bowl broken; the pitcher is broken at the fountain, and the wheel broken at the cistern. Then we are willing to bury our dead out of our sight; to cast the desire of our eyes into the grave, to mingle with common dust, and lie in dishonour and darkness for ages to come.

Further, death removes us from our most near and intimate friends, and other earthly comforts.

It dissolves the ties of nature, and the alliances of friendship; and breaks down the pleasing fabric of happiness, which love had been for many years erecting. The benevolent heart is ready to take up Hezekiah's mournful complaint, I shall behold man no more with the inhabitants of the world.

Further, it breaks off men's thoughts and purposes relating to this world, for the good of their families, neighbourhood, and the public. The great thoughts of wise and pious men for the glory of God and the advancement of religion perish; and the charitable schemes, which depended on the continuance of their lives, are defeated.

Finally, The little acquaintance we have with the other world, to which death transmits us, increases the fear of a removal hence.

We know so little of our souls, and their manner of existence and operation without a body, and there are so many doubts and fears about their eternal condition prevailing in us, that no wonder the thought of quitting the present scene is painful, and death, as it removes us from it, is considered as an enemy.

Whose heart is not ready to fail him in the prospect? Who does not find his reason, and sometimes his faith too, ready to sink, when he is going to encounter the king of terrors, and pass though his dark and gloomy regions to an unknown and unalterable state? And in vain we call to reason, and ask philosophy to furnish us with sufficient armour of defence, and to fortify our minds against the attacks of this stern invader. It is the peculiar glory of the gospel of Christ to assist our reason, and increase our faith in proportion to the strength of the enemy, and the different impressions which the apprehensions of it make upon our minds. And this it does by the discovery it makes of a future state, a glorious resurrection, and a final everlasting triumph over death.

Having thus briefly viewed the frightful features of the enemy, let us turn our eyes to a more bright and agreeable scene; and observe,

II. True Christians shall obtain a complete victory over death.

The text informs us that a victory shall be gained, and it shall be so complete, that death may be said to be even swallowed up in it, quite destroyed, and no traces or remainders of it be found. This is confirmed by the passage already mentioned; verse 26. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. The word [καταργεται] rendered destroyed, signifies being divested of an authority it had before, and being reduced to an incapacity of exerting any further power.* Thus, after the same apostle had been speaking of persecution, peril, and sword, of being killed all the day long, as the lot of himself and his fellow-christians, he adds, Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, complete, glorious, triumphant conquerors.—And this is agreeable to what God himself declares concerning this formidable enemy, with so much grandeur and majesty. "I will ransom them from the power of the grave: I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction; repentance shall be hid from my eyes."

For the further illustration of this comfortable truth, let us observe, that the victory is in some measure obtained in the present life,—but it shall be perfected in the future.

1. The victory is in some measure obtained even in the present life.

Christ gained a victory by his own resurrection, and the revelation and promise of a happiness beyond the grave; for he hath abolished death, (abolished its tyranny, destroyed its force, and rendered it, comparatively, of none effect,) and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. He has assured us of the certainty and eternity of the future state, and largely explained its nature.—He has not indeed removed the natural fears of death, which are wrought into our very constitution, and are the springs of many of our actions; nor is it his intention entirely to remove from the minds of good men that fear of death, which has an apparent tendency to promote seriousness and watchfulness, a heavenly disposition, which keeps them always prepared for the coming of the Lord. But he has taken away the slavish apprehensions of it, and delivered them, who, through fear of death, were all their life-long subject to bondage. Death has now, in effect, changed its nature. It only hurts the body, not the soul. It only puts an end to those pursuits, employments, and entertainments, which are suited to the body, and this present world; but not to those, about which holy souls are engaged, and with which they are delighted and improved. Nay, it is become, on many accounts, a benefit; as it puts an end to their temptations and conflicts, doubts and fears; as it hides their bodies in the grave, for ever shelters them from the pains and sorrows to which they are here exposed, and transports their separate spirits to everlasting purity and peace.

* Compare verse 24, where the same word is rendered "put down."

A present victory is obtained by the calmness with which the saints die; and that joy unspeakable and full of glory, with which the Spirit of Christ sometimes replenishes their hearts, when the flesh is sinking into the dust.—Are they not conquerors, when, with smiles in their pale countenances, and songs of praise upon their quivering lips, they calmly yield to the stroke of death, and, through Christ who strengthened them, triumph over all its frightful powers, saying, O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Let me add, this is death's last attack. It strikes once, but can never strike more; and "all the hurt it can possibly do them, is to put it absolutely out of his own power ever to hurt them any more."* Which leads me to add further,

2. The victory shall be perfected in the future world.

And this will appear, when we consider, that all the faithful servants of Christ shall be raised again; their bodies shall be transformed into the likeness of Christ's body; and they shall be fixed in a state of complete and everlasting happiness.

1. All the faithful servants of Christ shall be raised again.

They are laid in the grave, but not one of them shall be lost there. Death feeds on them, but at the great day they shall have the dominion. That there shall be a resurrection of the dead, that their bodies, which are turned to corruption, shall be redeemed, and so much of each as shall be sufficient to denominate it their own body, collected and united by the almighty power of God, is certainly declared in the holy Scriptures. We have some intimations of this in the Old Testament, upon which the Jews grounded their belief that there should be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust. But it is plainly revealed in the New. "The hour is coming when all that are in their graves, shall hear the voice of Christ, and come forth." This (says he) is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day. This doctrine the apostles preached; they assured the Christians, that he who raised up Christ from the dead, should quicken their mortal bodies. That Christ was risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept, of that plentiful harvest which should spring out of the dust, when the Lord should descend again from heaven. The resurrection of Christ, illustrated by the resurrection of other dead bodies, proves what God can do, and testifies what he will do. And this chapter alone will keep up the belief of this great event, till the trumpet shall sound, and the resurrection prove itself. Captivity shall be led captive, and death, which has triumphed over the whole human race, shall himself be triumphed over, when the earth and the sea shall give up their dead. Though we now say to corruption, Thou art my father, and to the devouring worm, Thou art my mother and my sister: the authority and power of Christ shall at length dissolve the disagreeable relation, and the grave claim no more acquaintance with us. But, as a bare resurrection is common to good and bad, and since, as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive; therefore we must add,

2. Their bodies shall be transformed into the image of Christ's body.

This is their peculiar honour; and the apostle Paul asserts it in very strong terms. Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself. The doctrine of the resurrection was ridiculed by the weaker heathens as impossible, and represented by the wiser as undesirable; turning the soul again into a prison, and laying upon it an insupportable burthen: but the account the apostle gives us in this chapter of the great alteration which shall be made in the bodies of the saints, answers their objections. He assures us, that weakness, corruption, and dishonour shall be left in the grave; and the body be raised in incorruption, glory, and power, a spiritual body, not an animal one. And as we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. The body shall be quite refined from gross matter, be more active and sprightly and more easily moved from place to place, than it now is, in its utmost flow of health and spirits. It shall have no gross organs to obscure the faculties of the soul, or clog its operations. It shall need no such supports as it now does, nor feel any of those appetites, which are often temptations to sin, and which, without resolute government, injure the health, and prevent the serviceableness of the body, as well as interrupt the tranquillity and peace of the mind. It shall have no corrupt blood or sour juices, to occasion irregular ferments, to excite the angry passions, or produce a melancholy or a fretful disposition. There will be no law in the members warring against the law of the mind, and bringing it into captivity. It will exert itself with the utmost vigour in God's service, without being wearied with it, or worn out by it. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. The place, the company, the work of heaven, will all tend to increase their lustre and activity. If Moses's converse with God for a few days left such a brightness on his countenance, that the Israelites could not bear to behold it, it is very natural to infer, that dwelling in the presence of God, the fountain of light, beholding the glory of Christ for years and ages, will improve the splendour of pure, spiritual, incorruptible bodies. And, it is probable, a covering of effulgent glory will be thrown over them, as there was over Christ's body when he was transfigured, and his face shone as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light; and make them shine as the brightness of the firmament. And the more they resemble Christ in moral excellency, the more will their spiritual bodies resemble his, and the more illustrious be this mark of distinction and dignity.—But what is the precise nature of these bodies; how they will move and act; whether new organs will be added, or the present altered; in what manner the soul will act, and be influenced by them; are questions which we cannot solve, while we dwell in houses of clay. It is sufficient for us to know, that every thing, which was an imperfection, or a mark of the divine displeasure against sin, shall be entirely removed; that the body shall be so changed and new moulded, as to be every way suited to assist the holy and happy spirit to which it is reunited, in the noblest services and enjoyments. Thus, when Christ appears, every saint shall awake in his likeness, and appear with him in glory. What a noble triumph over death will this be, when every captive shall be released, and every one clothed with the robes of glory! Especially when we consider,

* Mr. Hen.

3. They shall be fixed in a state of complete and everlasting happiness.

Of this also the Scriptures of truth assure us: they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, cannot die any more, for they are like the angels. Mortality (or that which is mortal) shall be swallowed up of life, and no traces of it left. It is a very considerable part of the glory of the heavenly world, that there shall be no more death. Some noted commentators * would interpret the words here rendered in victory, for ever, as denoting the utter destruction of death. The idea is plainly suggested in the phrase, swallowed up; and this truth is confirmed by the passages already mentioned, and many more in the Scriptures, that not one true Christian shall be liable to the attack of death any more.

There shall be no fear of death remaining. A conquered enemy may recover his strength, assault us again, and prevail, at least so far as to alarm and terrify us: but death is swallowed up, and has no more power to overcome or disturb the exalted, glorified servants of Christ for ever; not so much as one of the harbingers, or attendants of death, shall ever incommode them. There is no fear of the return of acute pains or pining sickness; which are often so grievous, as to dispose the heart to long for death, as a relief, and be glad to find the grave. Their bodies are not varnished over with an outward lustre, but perfectly free from all principles of decay. They are not only secure from external violence, but full of unfading, immortal vigour. Death has no power to take away, to molest, or even alarm, any one of their friends and associates in that better country; but because Christ lives, they shall also live, and their duration be equal to his.—Finally, There shall be no painful remembrance of death. A recollection of violent pains and cutting sorrows often gives uneasiness: when (as Jeremiah expresseth it, concerning his own misery) the soul hath the wormwood and gall still in remembrance, it imbitters present enjoyments. But the remembrance of death shall not be terrifying, but agreeable. A comparison of the present with the former state, will only tend to enhance their pleasure; to excite high admiration of that power, which produced the surprising change, and give peculiar ardour to their adorations of that grace which prepared them for it.—In short, the Lord of life shall so entirely change the scene, that all remainders of death shall be done away, and nothing shall appear by which it might be known, that it ever had the least dominion over any of his faithful servants. I shall sum up all in the striking words of the apostle. It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. It doth not yet appear what we shall be! No, not yet, what we shall be then: for although our understanding is the distinction of our nature, and our tongue the glory of our frame, the one is overwhelmed when it labours to comprehend, and the other forced into silence when it attempts to describe, the objects and glories of immortality. And therefore, without presuming to take in the full meaning of the following words. But we know, that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. We may venture to conclude, that we shall hereafter be blessed with an immediate, permanent, and influential vision of the Lord of life and glory; and such a vision, attended with vital beams surrounding us on every side, transfusing themselves through our whole frame, invigorating the divine life in us, and maintaining and increasing our sensible and intellectual joys, must import complete and everlasting happiness.

* Vat. Grot. and Whitby in loc.

Having thus illustrated the remarks founded on the text, I am now to direct you to the proper improvement of so noble and interesting a subject. Let me then entreat your attention to the following

REFLECTIONS.

1. Let us contemplate the power and grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, so illustriously displayed in this triumph over death.

It became him for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons to glory to appoint his Son the captain of their salvation, and to consecrate him to that office through sufferings. He took part of flesh and blood, that he might be capable of dying, and, through death destroy him (or weaken, and render ineffectual his influence) that had the power of death, that is, the devil; who, by his temptations, brought sin and death into the world. He died to vanquish the terrors of death, and reconcile our minds to the thoughts and approaches of it. To this work he was set apart by his Father and God, and he alone was fit for the work, and worthy the honour of overcoming the king of terrors. And because, for this end, he became obedient to death, even the death of the cross, God has highly exalted him, constituted him Lord both of the dead and the living, lodged the keys of death and the invisible world in his hands, and given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to all his sincere and genuine disciples. He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet, and death, the chief and last of them, be destroyed.—These (brethren and fellow-christians) are the reviving truths of our holy religion: let us then rejoice in Christ Jesus, and glory in our relation to him, who, by his atoning sacrifice, took away the sting of death, which is sin, bore in his own body the penalty denounced against transgressors, and by the influences of his Spirit, promotes a holy temper and conversation, which is the only proper qualification for a blessed and joyful resurrection. We are directed to consider him as the resurrection and the life, who is to come in power and glory to judge the world, the lustre of whose appearance shall penetrate the deepest grave, and whose voice shall awaken every sleeping saint. Then shall they come forth to join their glorified head and Saviour, to attend and grace the solemnity of that day, which shall complete his conquest over death, and terminate his mediatorial kingdom.—Since then we are more than conquerors through him that loved us, let this increase our veneration for his gospel, which contains the record of eternal life; and with an eye of gratitude, love, and humble dependence, let us look to Jesus the Lord of life, who, for the joy that was set before him, of being himself highly exalted, and leading on all his good soldiers to conquest and to crowns, overcame the sharpness of death, and is now set down at the right hand of God. Let him be precious to our souls, who is the purchaser and author of eternal salvation.

2. Let us reflect on the difference between good and bad men with regard to the consequences of death.

This conqueror hath dominion over all: nevertheless all shall rise again. But oh! with what different appearances, and to what different states! Some shall awake to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. All shall come forth of their graves, but with this awful distinction, they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation. With what horror and surprise will the wicked lift up their heads in that tremendous day, and how glad will they be to sink back to rottenness, or even to nothing, from the wrath of the Lamb! But they must come forth, although their bodies should be so changed, as to be capable of more exquisite pain, and a more lasting duration, than their present frame will admit of. They shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death, which shall be executed with circumstances of terror and anguish, proportioned to their crimes. On the other hand, with what a blooming air and inconceivable transport will the saints lift up their heads in that glorious day! With what unutterable delight will they leave their dusty beds, and survey their empty tombs; knowing that their warfare is accomplished, and that their Lord, whose approach they hail with the loudest Hosannas, cometh to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe! Having through the grace of Christ, which is sufficient even for the weakest of his servants, overcome, and been faithful to the end, they shall not be hurt by the second death, they shall not die for ever, but enter into eternal rest. And do you believe, brethren, that there will be such a vast difference between the future states of the righteous and the wicked? I know you believe it. Inquire then, what influence and effect this faith hath upon your hearts and lives; and which of these two states will be yours. Let me address you in the words of the great Mr. Howe: "* You can never justify it to God, or your own understandings, to remain in a dubious uncertainty about a matter of so vast consequence as this. Unconcernedness here is the most unaccountable thing in the whole world. This will come to this issue very shortly with us, that either death must, as to us, be swallowed up in victory, or we be swallowed up of victorious death. With what solicitude should we all concern ourselves to be at a certainty!" If you would desire that strong consolation which the text exhibits, let me urge you to fly for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before you, to be daily exercising repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ, to redeem your time, and make a wise improvement of the present life. Thus you will finish your course with joy, and when this earthly house of your tabernacle is dissolved, you will have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Lastly, Let the servants of Christ be calm and resigned, in the view of their own death, and when their pious friends are removed.

One would think there should be no occasion for such an exhortation as this, to any who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, and have peace with God through him. One would naturally suppose, that in the fulness of their hopes and joys they would desire to depart, and it would be necessary frequently and strenuously to urge them to wait patiently for the coming of the Lord. One would think, that instead of sorrowing as those who have no hope, for them that sleep in Jesus, they should rather rejoice for the victory they have gained, and the honour to which they are advanced. But alas! such is the unreasonable and unhappy influence which present things have upon our minds, such is the weakness of our faith and hope, so languid is our love to Christ, and so injudicious our affection to our friends, that we are loth to remove ourselves, and unwilling to part with them. God knew it would be so. He knows our frame, and remembers we are dust, and therefore pities us, and has laid in such a stock of encouragements in his word, to counteract the bias of nature, and to correct the errors of sense. Let us then (brethren) enter into the spirit, and admit the force, of them. Remember, that although the combat may be sharp, and the apprehension grievous, yet the victory is sure. The enemy has been often vanquished, and 'tis only a single feeble effort he can possibly make. Fear not, (says the Redeemer,) I am he that liveth and was dead, and am alive for evermore, and have the keys of death and the unseen world. Fear not this formidable enemy. He has slain his thousands; slain, did I say? rather, he has obtained some little advantage to his own irreparable loss and their everlasting gain. Though he strips you of the body, yet (to allude to St. Paul's words) you only part with it for a season, that you may receive it for ever, improved and beautified, and no more to see corruption. Let every sincere Christian endeavour, from such considerations, to reconcile his mind to the approaches of death, and wish to encounter this last enemy, as a brave soldier does to enter upon an action, which he has the greatest reason to believe will finish the war, put an end to all his fatigues, perils, and terrors, and bring repose, honour, and reward. Frequently meditate, O Christian, on that glorious morning, when thou shalt awake, burst the bands of death with sweet and inexpressible surprise, arise with ten thousands of thy fellow-saints, and meet thy Lord with songs of triumph, and everlasting joy upon your heads. Then shall he applaud thy resolution and labour, fidelity and patience, before his Father, the angels, and the assembled world, and give thee a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

Let these considerations also support our minds when our pious and valuable friends are removed.

In this view the apostle urges them, If we believe that Jesus died, and rose again, even them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him; the dead in Christ shall rise first, and the saints then alive (being changed) shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words. And surely no words can be more full of consolation. Our pious friends departed have gained the victory, and are present with the Lord. And though we are left behind in a world, which is at best a tiresome place, and less desirable since they were removed from it; yet we hope ere long to be restored to them, to converse with them upon more agreeable and advantageous terms, and spend an eternity together. If we are followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises, God will quickly call us to come up to them, and send a convoy of angels to fetch us to the world of spirits; and perhaps the first objects we may meet with there, may be some of our most intimate friends, sent to congratulate our safe arrival, and conduct us to the appointed mansions. And oh! with what joy and transport shall we meet them, and be welcomed by them! The small space of time the separation has continued, and in which we have known the sorrow of living without them, will endear them to us, and increase our bliss. Especially when we consider that there is no fear of another separation, that the destructions of the enemy are come to a perpetual end, and that death has yielded up all his power ever to divide us more.

* Howe's Works, vol. ii. page 429.

Let me particularly apply these consolations to you, my friends, on occasion of the sore breach God has made upon you. What joy has it already been to your late worthy and pious pastor, to meet so many of his flock in the regions of the blessed, to whom he administered these precious consolations in their last moments, and smoothed their passage to heaven! What joy will it be to him to receive one and another of you, who have obeyed the gospel, to be partakers of his felicity! What a delight will it be to him to receive your thanks for all his labours of love for the good of your souls, and join with you in adoring that grace, which wrought effectually for your salvation; to which grace, you well know, he constantly ascribed his abilities and success! What joy will it afford you to meet him there; to inform him more fully than you can now do, what pleasure and improvement you have received from his labours while he lived, and his writings, by which, being dead, he is still speaking to you, with the most serious and affectionate address, and the most insinuating eloquence! And with regard to him, and all your brethren, who shall at length meet in our Father's house; how will mutual joy flow from heart to heart, when every enemy is conquered, and the tyranny of death at an end; to be for ever instructing, improving, and entertaining one another; to recount your many struggles, temptations, and victories; and trace out the wondrous steps by which you were conducted to this happiness! These friendly dispositions will be carried to the height, conversation will never grow dull, and social entertainments never cloy. Fresh delight will be springing up in his soul and yours through eternity; in observing each other's improving knowledge and holiness, and sharing together in the smiles of the Redeemer, and the work and happiness of heaven.

After such comfortable thoughts as these, I have very little heart to renew and increase your sorrows and my own, by entering into any particulars of the character of that great and good man, whom God has removed from us. Nor is it necessary I should; as he has been so long among you, and so faithfully and constantly watched over you. I may appeal to you all, that you have fully known his doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, patience, persecutions, and afflictions, and his care of the churches. He has been labouring among you with unexampled diligence, and unwearied zeal, above twenty years, with increasing honour, comfort, and success. Notwithstanding his other most important relation, as a tutor, and the weight of business he continually had on his hands, he was in labours for your souls abundant; warning, encouraging, and comforting, with all the marks of a deep sense of religion upon his own soul, the most tender affection to you and your families, and the utmost solicitude for your everlasting welfare. The same disposition he carried with him in all his visits, and mingled the seriousness and piety of the Christian minister with the politeness of the gentleman, and the freedom and cheerfulness of the friend. His great concern for the rising generation, was manifested in his discourses on education from the pulpit, and the press, and his most affectionate addresses to your children in his catechetical lectures, and occasional visits. Ye know how heartily and compassionately he entered into your personal and relative afflictions; how many disconsolate hearts he has made to rejoice by his liberality, his counsels, and his prayers. Ye know his faithfulness and gentleness in brotherly reproof, and the exercise of godly discipline. In a word, ye know that, to his power, and (unhappily for his family, for you, and other churches) beyond his power, he went about doing good, piously devising, and with the most resolute application executing, so many generous designs for the public good.—Ye are witnesses, and God also, how much his public addresses were illustrated and enforced by his own temper and conduct, and how holily, and justly, and unblamably, he behaved himself among you.—By his writings (the value of which will, I am persuaded, be continually increasing) the world will judge, what a pastor God had favoured you with, and how very well you have been fed and taught for so many years. And they will naturally and justly expect, that you should be wise and judicious Christians, and eminent for every branch of the Christian temper. And great will be your guilt and your shame if you are not.

But, beloved, I am persuaded better things of you, and my persuasion is founded partly on my own knowledge of your temper and character, and partly on the solemn testimony your late pastor has borne to the goodness of them, in a passage in his last will, which he desired might be communicated to you on this occasion, and which I mention with pleasure, as it is at once for your honour and your admonition. Speaking of his intention of being interred in the place of your meeting, he says, "where I have spent the most delightful hours of my life, in assisting the devotions of as serious, as grateful, and as deserving a people, as perhaps any minister had ever the honour and happiness to serve; cheerfully persuading myself, that, when I am dead, they will hear me speaking in my writings with all due regard; and making it my last request to them, that those of them who have, or can borrow, my Family Expositor, will read it over in their families once at least, beginning the Lord's day after my funeral; and that they would also read over in their families, on Lord's day evenings, all my sermons which they have or can borrow, especially those on Regeneration, those on the Glory and Grace of Christ, the Sermons to Young Persons, and that on the One Thing Needful; and I desire that every parent that can procure them, would read in their retirements, my Sermons on the Education of Children, within one quarter of a year at least after my death. And I make this request from an affectionate desire of the edification and salvation of souls; and an humble hope that, in consequence of it, I may glorify God, even when I am laid in the dust."

I hope, my friends, you will pay a serious and constant regard to this his last request, out of gratitude for his services, and veneration for his memory; from a concern for your own further credit and comfort, and a desire to increase his joy, and your own, at the day of the Lord.

As to you (my brethren and friends) who were more immediately under his eye and care; God has taken your master from your head. And you will naturally adopt the mournful words of Elisha, when he had lost his tutor Elijah. My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof! He was indeed a father to you: and I believe there are few of us, who have had the advantage of being his pupils, have found more real affection and tenderness, and a warmer concern for our welfare, in our natural parents, than we have found in him. You remember his quickness of apprehension, and remarkable felicity in the despatch of business, and yet his most exemplary improvement and redemption of time. You know how faithfully he devoted his time and abilities to your service; how freely he communicated to you out of those large stores of knowledge with which God had furnished him; how fairly and candidly he proposed arguments and objections on every topic on which he lectured; what pains he took to make you eminent Christians, able ministers of the New Testament, and scribes well instructed unto the kingdom of heaven. You will, I am persuaded, join with me in acknowledging (to the praise of God) that our acquaintance with him, and relation to him, has been our honour and our happiness. May you and I remember his paternal counsels, prayers, and example, that (through a supply of the Spirit of Jesus) we may be fitted for eminent usefulness in the church, and may do honour to his memory and instructions!

It is but a just tribute to the worth of eminently wise and useful men, and of great advantage to survivors, to display at large the virtues of their character, and point out the means by which they became so eminent; and I am not without hope, that justice may hereafter be done, in some distinct account, to the distinguished abilities, eminent character, and extensive usefulness of the late reverend and learned Dr. Doddridge, who shone so conspicuously in the relations of a minister and tutor, and whose writings are in such general esteem. In the mean time, what has been said concerning him, may serve to excite you all to aspire after a temper and behaviour becoming your relation to him, whose removal, in the vigour of his faculties, we so justly, and shall so long, lament; and, to add greater weight to the solemn exhortation of St. Paul to the Philippians, which upon this occasion, I would address to you all: Those things which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in him, do; and the God of peace shall be with you.

To conclude. God has seen fit to call home his good and faithful servant; and given him not only a calm, but a joyful, dismission from the labours and sufferings of life, and enabled him thereby to triumph over death. And when we recollect the words we have been meditating upon, and this fresh seal to the truth and the comfort of them; and when by faith we look forward to that weight of glory reserved in heaven for us, and our pious friends; let us even now join in the apostle's triumphant song, and say, Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

LECTURES ON PREACHING,

SEVERAL BRANCHES OF THE MINISTERIAL OFFICE,

THE CHARACTERS OF THE MOST CELEBRATED MINISTERS AMONG DISSENTERS AND IN THE ESTABLISHMENT

ADVERTISEMENT

TO THE EDITION OF MDCCCIX

The following Lectures are the substance of those delivered by Dr. Doddridge to his theological students, in reference to preaching and the several branches of the ministerial office. They have been very frequently the subject of conversation, as containing many excellent remarks and advices, and several striking characters of authors. For the purpose of collation the editors are in possession of four copies, one written during date 1729, by a learned pupil of the author, another revised and corrected from a copy declared to be the most accurate extant, a third beautifully and accurately written, and the fourth is a transcript which differs considerably from each of the others. The editors are of opinion, however, that could they have procured ten times the number of copies and been at the first convenient it would be unsafe to trust any one of them as unexceptionable; for it is clear and apparent that the author gave the finishing hand to his own copy as fit for the public eye.

The reader, therefore, is requested to observe, that what is here presented to the world is a very full Syllabus of what the author more or less enlarged upon. A few expressions and sentences are occasionally left out, which, however proper in the lecture room, the editors are convinced the author himself would not have made public. The Lectures are presented also as they were, by means of the dash, some idea of the place and nature of the [illegible] which might be made, and may serve as proper pauses for the reader's profitable reflection. Many different copies have different ways of method, it is presumed that the plan which is here adopted is as perspicuous and useful as any, and is the same with that of the author in his Rise and Progress, and that in which the preceding Lectures now appear.

As these Lectures were never before printed, it may be expected that we should here offer reasons for giving them a place in Dr. Doddridge's Whole Works. Of these the first and principal is that we view them as possessing very considerable excellence. An excellence not inferior to any thing he ever penned, if estimated according to their tendency to do real service both to ministers, and through them to the rising generation. Here we have a collection of rules, maxims, and cautions, relative to preaching and the pastoral care, as ample and well chosen as we can any where find, delivered with the greatest perspicuity, and minutely detailed according to various circumstances. To these are discovered a great insight into human nature, a uniform regard to religious, moral, and well governed conduct, and ardent wishes to benefit mankind by promoting vital and practical religion. And much of [illegible] diligence in the author himself, which may operate as a powerful [illegible] on the reader's mind to imitate so fair an example.

From a report of their general worth many have wished, but in vain, to procure a copy; to gratify, and at the same time to benefit, such persons, is another evident reason why these Lectures should be now published. In fact, it may be well thought by many that a complete edition of the author's works could not consistently appear without them. To this we may add, supposing them in no danger of being lost, as many valuable manuscripts have been, the probability of their degenerating by repeated transcripts is a consideration of some weight. And, indeed, it is well known that there are many mutilated and very imperfect copies abroad; and it is not improbable that, from some motive or other, a copy might find its way to the press in a form calculated to reflect but little credit on either the publisher or the author. This danger is now precluded: and so precluded, it is hoped, as effectually to secure the deserved reputation of Dr. Doddridge, an object to obtain which no small degree of labour and expense has been bestowed. We are therefore persuaded that, since the author has intimated no prohibition, these considerations, among the reasonable and the good, ought to be decisive.

LECTURES

ON PREACHING AND THE MINISTERIAL OFFICE

LECTURE I.

INTRODUCTION.—GENERAL REMARKS AND DIRECTIONS RELATIVE TO THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.

§ 1. GENTLEMEN, you have devoted yourselves to the work of the MINISTRY, and it is the main thing you have in view in the course of your present studies; other things are taken in only as subservient to this.—You well know it consists of several branches. The first on which you enter is PREACHING, which, though not the only, is one of the most important parts of a minister's duty.—Preaching requires genius, application, and the divine blessing.—Of the former, few who are capable of academical studies are entirely destitute.—Nor is any great height of genius necessary.—The latter with a good intention and pious conduct may be expected.—Diligence, therefore, is generally the main thing wanting; yet this under a wrong conduct may turn to little account.—To prevent which the following advices are designed, recommending the success to the Spirit of God.

§ 2. In these Lectures I shall give some general directions as to the method to be used in order to furnish yourselves for, and make you ready in, the work, (Lect. 1.) Consider the character of the best practical writers in our language, (Lect. 2—4.) Give some advice as to the composition of sermons, (Lect. 5—10.) Offer some thoughts on the most proper method of delivery. (Lect. 11.) Add several miscellaneous remarks which will not properly fall under any of these heads, (Lect. 12.) Propose a few general directions for prayer. (Lect. 13.) Call your attention to the important duty of public expostion. (Lect. 14—16.) Then offer some directions on catechising. (Lect. 17, 18.) On administering the ordinance of baptism. (Lect. 19.) and the Lord's supper. (Lect. 20.) On visiting in general, and the sick in particular, (Lect. 21, 22.) I shall then give you some general maxims for conversation. (Lect. 23.) Rules for conduct towards particular persons. (Lect. 24.) And conclude my course of lectures with a few miscellaneous concluding remarks. (Lect. 25.)

§ 3. I shall begin with some general directions to furnish you for the work of the ministry, and prepare you for the exercise of its functions.

§ 4. 1. See to it that there be a foundation of sincere piety laid in yourselves, or else there is but little prospect of your being useful or acceptable to others.—Be therefore firmly resolved to devote yourselves to God, and do it solemnly.

§ 5. 2. Keep up a strict course of walking with God. Be watchful, diligent, and daily in secret prayer.—Maintain an habitual sense of the divine presence.—Be much in the exercise of ejaculatory devotion.—So you will learn to speak out of the fullness of the heart.—Seize every opportunity of increasing in piety.

§ 6. 3. Cultivate a tender love to souls. This will make you diligent.—Then [illegible] against every thing that tends to alienate your affections.—By [illegible] prudent conversation, [illegible] obliging behaviour and edifying images. An [illegible] amiable attitude in little matters will be required [illegible] almost impossible to act [illegible] designed for the ministry.—I foresee in it the confusion of congregations, and the ruin of your own character and usefulness.

§ 7. 4. Cultivate an extensive and candid acquaintance with the world. Things are never as we make them.—In almost all imaginable circumstances some things may be found to be despised; some things to be admired and delighted in.—Take heed of peevishness, moroseness, and disgust in your studies.—Think not the time lost which is spent out of them.—Despise not common [illegible] Converse with them [illegible] with some good consequence, some [illegible]

§ 8. (1.) It will increase your stock of knowledge. Acquaintance with the hearts of men is very desirable—and it will be better learnt by converse, as anatomy is better learnt by dissection than by books alone. You will find many good thoughts started by them—they will be like rough diamonds, which, if well polished, you may with advantage set in your sermons.

§ 9. (2.) It will awaken your own spirits. "As iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." Experience often proves this.—Lord's-day evening's conversation is sometimes particularly sweet and refreshing.—We shall find that time thus spent will not be lost, but will abundantly repay itself.

§ 10. (3.) It will conciliate respect among them. An accessible temper is, in most cases, respected and loved—especially in persons of high reputation and great employ.

§ 11. (4.) It will form you to an experimental strain of preaching, which will be very suitable to spiritual persons; and will give an air of wisdom natural and unaffected. "A wise man," says Confucius, "must learn to know the hearts of men; that taking every man according to his own inclination, he may not labour in vain when he shall discourse to him of virtue."

§ 12. 5. Form an acquaintance with the best authors, but especially the Scriptures; they are the grand magazine.—Study them continually.—Get an interleaved Greek Testament, if possible Wetstein's.—Read other books also with care.—Collect some of the most valuable; for instance, Evans's Christian Temper, Berry-street Lectures, &c. &c.

§ 13. 6. Take brief notes of the sermons you hear.—Review them in your retirement. Transcribe them, and add memorandums of your own thoughts and reflections upon them as you go along.—Painting and carving are learnt by imitation, and by observing the defects as well as the beauties of great masters.

§ 14. 7. Keep, and endeavour daily to improve, your common-place book.—Have note-books added to it.—Write schemes of sermons in different degrees of perfection.—Keep a little book for hints on various subjects as they come into your mind. Keep another book for schemes that are perfect, and here insert scriptures under the proper heads in the order you intend to use them in composing.—And when you read a book, consider how far it may help you as to scriptures, sermons, common-place book, conversation, prayer, and the like.

§ 15. 8. Be daily endeavouring to form a good style and address, which is done by insensible degrees.—Never think it too soon or too late to attain it.—Use yourselves, therefore, to various kinds of composition; at first, review them with great diligence and exactness.—Submit them to the review of a friend. Look them over afterwards at some distance of time.—Often read aloud, but in as unaffected a manner as possible.—"Elegance in a sermon," says Boyle, "is like a golden frame about a looking-glass; it would be foolish to set up the frame alone, or look only upon that; but yet it may serve to attract the eye, and prove the occasion of discovering some defect which would have been otherwise unobserved." See his Meditations, iii. 6.

§ 16. 9. Look up daily to God, that he may give you more wisdom, and advance you in every necessary gift and grace; which he will do, if his glory be simply and sincerely intended in your work, and if you accustom yourselves to rise gradually more and more above the views of interest and human applause. Mankind are taken with little things.—Have a firm persuasion in your own minds of the importance of the work, and what depends on your right management of it. The honour of God, the glory of the gospel, and good of souls, are no small trust.—Consider yourselves, then, charged with God's business, and you will have reason to believe God will be with you.

LECTURE II.

Of the Use and Character of Practical Writers.

§ 1. I SHALL first give you some general advices on the subject now before us.—And, first, let some practical writer be daily read.—Practical religion is important to ourselves; and a practical strain of preaching is important to our people.—We shall thus form ourselves to words and a proper way of expression.

§ 2. Read them at once with a view to your improvement as Christians and preachers.—Make observations on their matter and style.

§ 3. Mingle authors of various strains. Otherwise you will learn a disagreeable imitation of one.—Seem not to have any writer in view in the manner of your compositions.—Water running through a bed of steel is apt to take a chalybeate taste and tincture.

§ 4. Make references to remarkable passages, that you may review them a second time. Nor will it be amiss to mark them in the margin, if the book is your own.—Keep a catalogue of such things as you would read before you preach upon any subject.

§ 5. Having made these general remarks, I proceed to give you the characters of several practical writers of our own nation,—which may be divided into four classes; the puritans—the nonconformists of the last age—those of the present—and the authors of the established church.

§ 6. I recommend to you, FIRST, to form some acquaintance with the scriptures, though they are too often despised.—There was good sense and learning in those days, as well as now.—Our grandmothers had real beauty, though the change of fashions has made their dress ridiculous to us.—I shall name but few.

§ 7. Bolton.—He had been a great and notorious sinner, and was reclaimed by great terrors.—He is therefore excellent both for conviction and consolation.—His style is rather inclined to heaviness, yet there are many expressions truly great and magnificent. The beauties of imagination are most visible in his four last things.—But his most useful treatises are Directions for comfortable walking with God—and for comforting distressed Consciences.—There we see the traces of a soul most intimately acquainted with God.

§ 8. Bp. Hall.—The most elegant and polite writer of his age.—He abounds rather too much with antitheses and witty turns.—In some of his writings he seems to have imitated Seneca and Austin.—His sermons are much the worse for a compliance with the taste of the age in which he lived. His Contemplations are incomparably valuable for language, criticism, and devotion. Next to them his Meditations, his Letters, and Balm of Gilead are worthy of your attention.

§ 9. Reynolds.—A most elaborate writer.—He has many surprising strokes.—His style is remarkably laconic.—A world of things are gently touched upon, which show his extensive acquaintance with human nature, as well as great labour.—His works contain a judicious collection of scripture, both in the text and margin.

§ 10. Sibbs.—His language is pervous and decent.—His dedications are very humble.—His style pathetic and tender, especially so in his Bruised Reed, and Soul's Conflict.

§ 11. Ward.—Worthy to be read through.—His language is generally proper, elegant, and nervous.—His thoughts are well digested, and happily illustrated.—He has many remarkable veins of wit.—Many of the boldest figures of speech are to be found in him beyond any English writer; especially apostrophes, prosopopœias, dialogisms, and allegories. There is indeed a mixture of fancy in his writings; but pardonable, considering his youth, and that many of his sermons were not prepared by himself for the press, but copied from his mouth while preaching.—He died before he was twenty-eight years old.—Had he lived he would probably have been the phœnix of English preachers.

§ 12. Hales of Eton—generally called the ever-memorable.—He is remarkably witty.—He uses very uncommon thoughts, and vast learning.—There are many curious passages in his works of like a common-place book; but little judgment.—He has no good order and connexion.—very little of [illegible]

[illegible] appears of him.—His [illegible] very applicable.—He writes like one that knows and speaks of things by experience.—He [illegible] the things to the utmost, which he considers, whether the virtue or danger be greater.—His Golden Remains, and additional Treasure, should be read.—Nor does the man exist that has exhausted Omnipotence.

§ 13. I need add some account of the Scottish divines in the Westminster assembly of the years 1643, that is, those who wrote before 1700.

§ 14. Gillespie and Rutherford—these have been evangelical, but both very obscure, especially the latter.—Gillespie's style inconstant.—Mr. Ford.—There is great zeal and much knowledge of human life.—He appeared to all his works—especially to his book on Apostasy.—Dr. Wright seems to have taken many things from hence in his "Deceitfulness of Sin."—That on the Hebrews is no great work.—The Means of understanding the Mind of God in the Scriptures is one of the best.—Those on Communion with God, and on the Power of Christ's most celebrated.—His Exposition of the 130th Psalm is most excellent.—His discourses of Indwelling Sin, Spiritual Mindedness, and Mortification of Sin in Believers, were good [illegible] practical religion.—Hutcheson's pieces published in his Works are the most valuable.—In these Commentaries and valuable remarks on Scripture.—His [illegible] of Light shining in Darkness, is very useful and edifying.—Many are common thoughts.

§ 15. Baxter.—He is [illegible] because he has [illegible] and always wrote to [illegible] as the readers of persons for generally [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] judicious remarks on Scripture.—His chief work is on the 119th Psalm.—Many of his posthumous sermons are of little value.

§ 17. Bates—charming and elegant;—yet his style not formed. His sentences are too short,—his words, however, are very polite;—admirable studies,—only too many of them,—proper to be quoted by those whose genius does not lead in this way.—Read his Harmony of the Divine Attributes, Spiritual Perfections, and Four Last Things.—He was well acquainted with poetry and the belles lettres,—an admirer as well as imitator of Cowley.

§ 18. Howe.—He seems to have understood the gospel as well as any uninspired writer;—and to have imbibed as much of its spirit. The truest sublime is to be found in his writings, and some of the strongest pathos,—yet he is often obscure, and generally harsh.—He has unhappily imitated the worst part of Boyle's style.—He has a vast variety of uncommon thoughts;—and, on the whole, is one of the most valuable writers in our language, and I believe, in the world.—His best pieces are, The Blessedness of the Righteous, Enmity and Reconciliation, Redeemer's Tears, and the Redeemer's Dominion;—with some Funeral Sermons.

§ 19. Flavel.—Not deep, nor remarkably judicious,—but plain, popular, tender.—Proper to address afflicted cases, and melt the soul into love.—His Token for Mourners is inimitable.—His Fountain of Life very useful,—and most of the subjects proper to be preached over on sacrament-days.—Allusions to pagan stories, both in him and Bates, are entertaining and useful.

§ 20. Charnock.—Celebrated by some as a polite writer, but chiefly by those who are not true judges of politeness.—He has some fine words, but no cadence,—which is also the fault of Bates.—His divisions are too numerous,—his thoughts are often obscure and in disorder;—no clear and distinct ideas in many of the differences he makes.—Yet he has some very valuable things.—On the Attributes he is deep and sublime.—His book on Regeneration is much applauded, though much inferior to Baxter, Alleine, and Wright.

§ 21. Taylor (Nathaniel).—The dissenting South.—There is vast wit, and great strength of expression, in all he wrote;—yet apt to aggravate matters a little too much.—His language is remarkably proper and beautiful.—His best pieces are his discourses on Faith, Deism, and the Covenant.—He wrote but little more than these.—All deserve reading.

LECTURE III.

The Character of DISSENTING Writers of the PRESENT Age, or those who have written since 1700.

§ 1. Evans.—His style is grave, plain, manly, nervous.—His heads are always distinct and well arranged.—The scriptures he quotes are very properly chosen.—His thoughts, especially in the application, are thrown close together.—His Sermons to Young People are scarce and valuable.—His Christian Temper is one of the best practical pieces in our language.

§ 2. Wright.—has great simplicity and awful solemnity. His writings compose the thoughts, and gradually elevate them.—The heads are distinct,—and sentences very comprehensive.—He discovers a deep sense of God, and a good acquaintance with the world.—His words are elegant and well chosen;—cadence, however, is but little regarded.—He always appears master of himself.—There are often plain intimations of many thoughts being suppressed.—His sentiments are candid and rational.—His book on Regeneration has been remarkably acceptable,—and is one of the most useful pieces published in this age.—His work on the Deceitfulness of Sin is written with great knowledge of mankind;—with the ruin of many young people before his eyes,—and it is admirably adapted to prevent it.—His Great Concern is very comprehensive,—and even in that respect much preferable to the Whole Duty of Man.—His subsequent treatises are not equally valuable, nor is the collection of scriptures so judicious as was expected.

§ 3. Watts.—Very different from Wright.—His style is harmonious, florid, poetical, and pathetic;—but too diffuse, too many words—especially in his later works,—and his former are too much loaded with epithets.—Yet on the whole he is an excellent writer.—All that he has written is well worth reading.—I most admire the first volume of his Sermons,—Death and Heaven, the Love of God,—and Humble Attempt.—Not to mention his incomparable Lyric Poems.—Psalms and Hymns.

§ 4. Grove.—He resembles Watts, but is not equally poetical, yet rather more nervous.—He has many judicious and new thoughts,—which are disposed in a method quite peculiar, and expressed with force and elegance,—and in his former pieces there is a remarkable sweetness.—He discovers great seriousness,—but his great aversion to Calvinism, and the ill usage he had met with from bigots, have soured him of late.—The Friendly Monitor,—his book on Secret Prayer,—and some Funeral Sermons, published in his life-time, are very valuable.—His book on the Sacrament is excellent, proper for scholars,—though much exceeded by HENRY and LAVEL for common use.—Some of his meditations at the end of his Treatise on Faith are excellent.*

§ 5. HENRY.—Very popular—his style is short and pointed,—has many antitheses, and is too often a little fanciful, elegant antithesis, some peculiarities,—such as making his heads begin with the same letter, or some rhyming word—yet this is generally natural—Great seriousness—sprightly thoughts, digested in very good order.—His Commentary excellent, though rather too large—and too full of typical and allegorical interpretations—yet there are some judicious notes both critical and historical.—Many of his notes on the historical parts, on the import of some original words, and some of the most entertaining things are taken from GROTIUS, PATRICK, POOLE, JOSEPHUS, CAESAR, and many others.—However, the work is despised only by those who do not know it.—His Discourses on Meekness, the Sacrament, and Early Piety, are all very good.—His style is formed on Scripture, to which he has numberless allusions.

§ 6. FLAVEL.—Judicious, pathetic, and very fanciful.—He has written but little besides his Treatise on the Sacrament, which is excellent.—In his other pieces there are several pretty classical quotations in the margin.

§ 7. BRADBURY.—His method is by no means accurate.—Many weak arguments,—but enlivened by sprightly turns of wit, and some nice distinctions to Scripture.—Christ's Joy in finishing his Course,—and his Sermons on the fifth of November, are his best.

§ 8. BOYSE.—He has been called the discerning SCOTT,—but much more polite.—His language is plain, animated, and nervous;—pretty much resembling EVANS.—His matter is excellently digested.—He abounds with ideas;—each sermon appears to be a contraction of some judicious treatise,—and often is so.—The two volumes of his Sermons, and his discourses on the Four Last Things are his principal practical works,—and deserve attentive, repeated reading.

§ 9. BENNET.—Plain, serious, and practical—but flat.—Has many good quotations from modern authors.—His Christian Oratory is his best and almost only practical piece;—which had been better, had it been less.

§ 10. HARRIS.—He was reckoned the greatest master of the English tongue among the dissenters.—His style plain and easy—has thought to solidity, but seldom striking or uncommon.—Nothing to blame, but very much to admire.—See his discourses on the Messiah, and Funeral Sermons.

§ 11. JENNINGS.—Methodical, plain, and serious.—Some pretty turns of thought.—His sermons very evangelical.—He has given the public the Remains of the present age, only much more polite, and free from FLAVEL's fustian.—All his performances should be carefully read,—especially his Sermons to Young People, and those in the Book Seller Lectures,—which are the glory of the book, and very much to the credit of the author.

§ 12. GUYSE.—A most popular preacher with the vulgar—and justly so.—In his sermons there is a strange mixture of the familiar and pathetic.—Many strong figures of speech,—expressive phraseology—and distinctions—beyond any writer of the age.—His practical Sermons on the Name and Temper of Jesus,—the Mourner,—and his Essay on Health.

LECTURE IV

The Character of the Writers of the Last Century—Conclusion

§ 1. TILLOTSON.—There is such an easiness of style and beautiful simplicity of expression, as seems easy to be imitated yet nothing more difficult.—He had some puritanical expressions.—Sometimes prolixity.—His method admirable clear—beyond almost any other.—Many of his common-place sermons nothing remarkable,—especially his posthumous ones.—yet there are many of them equal to any he published in his life-time.—His last sermon on the Reasonableness of the Old and second Covenant is fine.—His discourse on evil speaking is excellent.

He made great use of BARROW and WILKINS,—with whom compare most of his sermons.—There is sometimes good reasoning,—but in controversy no man found such lucky expressions—no argument for the truthfulness of the subject so full, artful, and affectingly set for conviction.

§ 2. SHERLOCK.—The most learned writer among our divines.—He has an amazing number of thoughts, things not always well connected or plain.—He expounds—but in some cases excellent in many respects.—He attempted to introduce some new words, but without success.—Many useful observations and fine quotations from the ancients and the fathers in the margin.—Nothing to raise admiration.—His Art of Sacrifice—most of those Letters have outgrowed their future use,—and some of their difficulties.—Many of TILLOTSON's finest sentiments [illegible] translation from him,—particularly that on evil speaking.—The first volume of his sermons is the best, but they all deserve reading.

§ 3. WILKINS.—His method in very many of his sermons admirable.—His style is clear and pure as TILLOTSON's.—Many excellent thoughts [illegible]

* In [illegible] Dr. Isaac Watts [illegible] excellent [illegible] notes, which [illegible] and [illegible]

—His Sermons, Natural Religion, the Beauty of Providence, on Prayer, and on Preaching, are his only practical works, and well deserve a reading. —Tillotson's Wisdom of being Religious is taken in a great measure from him.

§ 4. Beveridge.—Much like Henry, but not his equal.—He discovers great devotion,—has many high flights, but is sometimes weak.—His Private Thoughts the most valuable of his works;—many of his sermons are very low.

§ 5. Scott.—His style is long and verbose;—many inelegant words,—and some phrases shocking;—yet, on the whole, he is excellent.—His reasoning is strong and conclusive, though drawn out to an excessive length. He drives on with great warmth and pathos,—yet almost all appears too much forced.—His Christian Life is the best of his works,—especially the first part.—The prayers at the end are absolutely the best I have ever read.—Many of his sermons are valuable, especially those in the first volume; the subjects being good, pretty full, and methodically handled.

§ 6. South.—Smart wit, keen satire, sometimes fine language;—but his arguments are often weak. —All his works have the appearance of an ill spirit in controversy.—He has many levities entirely unbecoming the pulpit;—and when most practical seems to write with spleen, and to aim very little at usefulness.—The best sermons are in his first volume;—though even in them there is too great an affectation of wit;—and but little appearance of being in earnest for God amidst all his zeal against heretics and schismatics.

§ 7. Norris.—Excessively affected, pert, and verbose, yet some good thoughts. His sermons on the Beatitudes are most celebrated.—He carries matters in general too high.—His discourses on the Love of God are in the mystic strain.—His sermon on Religious Discourse deserves to be read.—He is in general too abstruse and metaphysical.

§ 8. Lucas.—His style is very peculiar, sometimes exceeding free, approaching to conversation; —sometimes grand and solemn; and generally very expressive.—His method is not clear;—but his thoughts are excellent.—Many of them are taken from an attentive observation of human life. —He wrote as being entirely devoted to God, and superior to the world.—His most valuable works are his Practical Christianity, and his Enquiry after Happiness, especially the second volume.

§ 9. Sherlock.—Strong arguments, and awful representations; exceeding proper for conviction. —His style is plain and manly.—His best works are those on Death and Judgment.

§ 10. Scratt.—He is the least considerable as a practical writer.—His language is always beautiful, but many of his sentiments are very weak.—His Christian's style is too much [illegible].—Pelly is translated for many sentences together in some of his sermons, though not mentioned.—All his sermons are in one octavo volume, and deserve a reading.

§ 11. Clarke.—He slipped into very high reputation, chiefly by his peculiarities. His style is quite plain and void of pathos.—His thoughts are well ranged, but many of them very obvious and frequently repeated.—Scriptures often well explained, though sometimes he takes more pains to collect parallel scriptures than is necessary;—and with solemn parade explains others that have no difficulty.—He takes more notice of grace and the atonement than most of his followers and admirers. —Several of his sermons are on subjects too near akin. He and Tillotson have made great use of the Fratres Poloni, though they do not make any mention of them.

§ 12. Horneck.—Exceedingly pathetic, but not elegant.—He is chiefly fit for devotional subjects;—but his words are too often greater than his thoughts. —His best pieces are those on Consideration, and The Crucified Jesus.—See his pieces also on the Commandments, on Prayer, Presumptuous Sins, and several Sermons.

§ 13. Hopkins.—His motto, Aut suscitate aut ri, well answers to his works;—yet he trusts most to the latter.—He awakens awfully; sometimes there is a little of the bombast; he bends the bow till it breaks; an error carefully to be guarded against.

§ 14. Boyle.—His style is very rough and obscure. Yet some words are highly illustrative by antitheses, he being very careful in the choice of them. He has many lively similes very proper to be quoted, especially in his Seraphic Love, and Theodora and Didymus,—sentences unreasonably long, abounding with parentheses and hard words of his own coining.—He has, in short, many faults in his style, but some inimitable beauties.

§ 15. Scougal.—One of the first rank, though he wrote but little.—Every page abounds with noble and proper thoughts;—clothed with a decent eloquence, suited to the subject. He appears to be the best model of all his class.—His Life of God in the Soul of Man, and Sermons, should be often read.—His early death, at the age of twenty-eight, was an unspeakable loss to the world.

§ 16. Law.—Very recluse.—His productions have a severity seldom to be found in this age.—His language is generally just and beautiful; very nervous, but sometimes unnatural. He is ready to affect points of wit, and strokes of satire,—in which however he does not equal South. Many characters are admirably drawn.—In this he comes nearer the Jesuits than any English writer.—His Treatise on Christian Perfection is very famous.—His Serious Call still better.

§ 17. FLEETWOOD.—Surnamed Silver-tongued—remarkable for easy and proper expressions. He considers several cases, which though often occurring in human life, are seldom taken notice of in sermons. On this account he may be consulted with advantage.—In respect of true politeness he has been equalled by few.—His sermons on Relative Duties are good.—but his Four Funeral Sermons show the orator much more.

§ 18. ATTERBURY. The glory of our English orators. In his writings we see language in its strictest purity and beauty.—There is nothing dark, nothing redundant, nothing deficient, nothing misplaced. Trivial thoughts are avoided, uncommon ones introduced and set in a clear, strong light, and in a few words;—some admirable similes, and more graceful allusions to scriptures than any of this class. On the whole, he is a model for courtly preachers. His Four Volumes should be carefully read.—His two last are the best. The chief sermons are Acquaintance with God, Religious Retirement, Lady COTES's Character, Propagation of the Gospel, Sufficiency of Revelation, Terrors of Conscience, Curse on the Jews, and Felix Trembling.

§ 19. BLAIR. A man of plain good sense.—A beautiful simplicity and great seriousness run through all his writings.—A desire to spare all unnecessary words is very apparent.—His Commentary on Matt. v—viii. is the best extant.—He has some excellent and striking similes, which are chiefly taken from the affairs of slaves, planters, or foreign colonies. He lived in Jamaica.—He suggests a multitude of excellent things which he does not prosecute at large.—He appears to have been a person of the utmost candour, and has solicitously avoided all unkind and contemptuous reflections on his brethren.—He guards his hearers against all undue confidence in their immediate relation to, and strict attendance on, the established worship, beyond almost any other divine in the Church of England.—He has an excellent way of bringing down criticisms to common capacities;—and has discovered a vast knowledge of Scripture in the suitable application of them.

§ 20. SECKER. Is so remarkable an instance of the laconic style, that the few Sermons he has published deserve an attentive reading;—especially that on the Oxford act, which is the wisest I ever read, considered in the view of a Philosophical Essay.

§ 21. ABP. LEIGHTON. One of the most eminently devout and pious writers his age has produced.—His Sermons indeed are not accurately digested, and sometimes contain only hints not fully opened;—which is the more excusable, as none of them were intended for the press by the author.—His works ought to be reckoned among the greatest treasures of the English tongue.—They continually overflow with love to God, and breathe a spirit entirely transformed by the gospel above the views of every thing but pleasing God.—There is a vast deal of spirit, and charming imagination; multitudes of the most beautiful figures and metaphors applied with happiest allusions.—Metaphors, especially those in the text, are sometimes pursued into allegory; yet very natural.—Upon the whole, they are such as none but a very ingenious, learned, religious man could write;—and yet, even by such an one, must have been written with great care;—not the effect of any laborious efforts for particular discourses, through a habit of speaking and writing, but the guarded overflowings of a copious fountain.—This attainment, however, must have been the consequence of a most resolute application both of the head and heart.—Few uninspired writers have a greater tendency to mend the world.—The disappointment which the learned and polite complained of, when these posthumous works were published, is chiefly to be charged upon their ignorance of the true beauties and use of Theological Writings.

LECTURE V

Rules for composing Sermons.

§ 1. WHEN we are about composing a sermon, we are to consider, 1st. What [illegible] to be chosen? 2nd, In what manner it is to be handled? 3rd. The style of the composition. 4th. What thoughts we are to introduce with. 5th. In what order we are to throw them. I shall, therefore, give rules for each of these; and close with Additional rules not comprehended under either of these heads.

§ 2. I shall take some remarks, First, On the choice of subjects.—But before I point out what subjects are to be preferred, I shall show you what you are to decline.* Among these are,

1. The doctrines of natural religion, such as the being and perfections of God.—The nature of future rewards and punishments.—Grounds of morality.—The distinction between moral good and evil.—These subjects are not improper, because they are peculiarly heterodox and dark, but because they are plausible proposed upon by those who have little relish for the doctrines of the gospel. And preaching upon them would bring a man's reputation into question with many.—Besides, the subtilty of the arguments cannot be understood by vulgar auditors, nor is it possible [illegible] much impressed by them; yet, as they are fundamentals, they ought not to be entirely omitted.—Let them, therefore, be touched upon in parts of sermons, tending to some evangelical purpose.—This may be done from, "This is life eternal, to know thee, &c." "He hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light, &c." Of this method of treating these subjects, the Berry-Street Lectures are excellent examples.

* [illegible]

§ 3. 2. The evidences of Christianity.—These are too large to be conveniently brought into a single or even a double sermon; besides, it is seldom an acceptable subject to the generality of hearers.—Yet exceptions must be allowed for some places where deism prevails.—Let a settled minister, in two or three elaborate sermons, give a general view of the arguments; and refer to plain treatises on the subject.—It is highly proper by catechising to inform the judgments of the rising generation;—as they are in the greatest danger of being seduced.—When preaching on subjects that admit it, take an opportunity to make a few striking observations in confirmation of Christianity;—especially be careful to display its excellency above natural religion;—this will generally be sufficient.—For when our people are brought to experience the power of the gospel, they will not forsake it.—It is hard for a young preacher to support his reputation by such a topic; and if he has any thing to say that is extraordinary, it will be better to say it from the press than from the pulpit.

§ 4. 3. The inexplicable mysteries of the gospel; such as the doctrine of the Trinity, the union of the divine and human natures in Christ, the manner of the Spirit's operation, &c. for they cannot be made plain.—Besides, there is danger of puzzling, or inflaming, our hearers;—the wiser part will be offended to see you so forward and bold;—and the hungry soul will go away from these, as from the preceding subjects, but little refreshed.—It is feeding the people with roots instead of fruit.

§ 5. 4. The highest points of Calvinism, supposing them to be believed.—Such as the imputation of Adam's sin,—reprobation,—irresistible grace,—and others of the same cast. These doctrines may be abused, and prejudice some against the more necessary doctrines of Calvinism;—as those of the mediation and atonement of Christ;—the aids and influences of the Spirit, &c.—Hints on high doctrines, except on particular occasions, are better, if they are believed, than whole discourses upon them.

§ 6. 5. Types.—In these there is so much room for fancy, that it is difficult to speak judiciously upon them;—and more difficult to please if they be not drawn to excess.—But for a pastor, especially on a sacrament-day, those that are allegorized in Scripture may be very profitably enlarged upon, provided the similitude and difference be shown.

§ 7. 6. Particular sins and duties.—Atterbury, indeed, says, that "General discourses are for the most part, like large prospects, where the eye is lost in the wide compass it takes, and sees so many things at once, that it sees nothing clearly."* To young preachers, however, they are not advisable.—They are, indeed, much preferable to any of the former, but if frequently enlarged upon, may procure you the character of a legal preacher;—and the same end may as well be answered another way, as I shall soon show. Especially avoid preaching against a particular vice, as drunkenness, luxury, covetousness, pride, &c.—Rather recommend the contrary virtues of sobriety, mortification, liberality, humility;—and let these be urged chiefly by evangelical motives.—A settled minister may, however, sometimes insist on such subjects, and ought to do it;—particularly to caution youth,—and to deter them from keeping bad company,—and induce them to observe strictly the sabbath-day.—Great care should be taken, however, not to draw such descriptions of ill characters as would give just occasion to suspect that you had particular characters in view.—It may be added, these subjects often lead into a chain of reasoning too close to be popular.—and people generally know right and wrong.

§ 8. 7. A continued series of discourses from the same verse, or even chapter, ought to be avoided by young preachers.—This method tends to weary an auditory.—Few chapters afford proper subjects in every verse.—The peculiar advantages of this method may be better answered by expounding.—The explication and improvement of a variety of subjects, connected in some way together, making a course of sermons more entertaining.

§ 9. This hint is chiefly intended for a settled minister.—It will be wisdom in him to make a proper connexion between subjects,—and to leave with due allowance for other occasional discourses, a series which shall contain a system of practical divinity.

§ 10. 8. Not subjects of great terror;—as very strong representations of the wrath of God, or of the nature, degree, and duration of the torments of hell.—To make these the subject of your sermons will be likely to bring upon you the reputation of legalists, and would perhaps rather amaze and confound the hearers for the present, than make lasting good impressions on their minds.—Warn faithfully, but let it be rather in particular parts of sermons, than in distinct discourses.—Always take care to avoid representing God as a tyrant.

§ 11. Having shown what subjects you ought generally to decline, I will now point out what subjects are to be preferred, and most frequently insisted on.*

* [illegible]

§ 12. I. Those which relate immediately to Christ.—The glories of his person, and riches of his grace. Psalm xlv. 2. Cant. v. 16. Isa. ix. 6.—His incarnation, John i. 14.—His understanding. Isa. xlix. 5, 6. John xvii. 2.—His birth. Luke ii. 11.—His example. Acts x. 38. 1 Peter ii. 21.—His preaching. John vii. 46.—His ministerial conduct. Heb. iii. 1.—His passion. Lam. i. 12. Isa. liii. 12.—His death, resurrection, and ascension. John xix. 30. Luke xxiv. 51. Acts iii. 15, 19.—His intercession. Heb. vii. 25. Rom. viii. 34.—His relations offices, and characters; as Husband, Brother, Prophet, Priest, King; Physician, Shepherd, Captain, Strength, Head, Forerunner, Advocate, Friend, Saviour, Judge, &c.

§ 13. II. The constitution of the covenant of grace made with believers in Christ.—Here consider, and state the nature of, justification by his righteousness,—the nature of faith, and its place in the gospel scheme,—also the nature, necessity, reasonableness, and effects of repentance,—the freedom of the grace of God, as it is manifested in the covenant.—The excellency of the gospel,—the superiority of the covenant of grace, compared with former covenants,—how ratified by the blood of Christ the Mediator,—the seals of the covenant,—the manner in which it is to be entered into, renewed, and reflected upon, &c.

§ 14. III. The Spirit and his operations.—Represent our absolute need of him;—describe his work on the soul in conviction, conversion, and consolation;—illustrate the nature of his influences;—in the assistance he affords in prayer,—and the witness he bears to his own work on the heart.

§ 15. This is an exceedingly popular subject, and, what is of still higher importance, it is a useful and scriptural one.—When you enlarge upon it, however, it will be necessary to add cautions against grieving the Spirit,—and directions for walking in the Spirit, and being filled with the Spirit.

§ 16. IV. The privileges of the children of God;—the pardon of sin,—the renovation of their nature,—adoption,—perseverance through divine grace,—God's providential care over them,—all things working together for their good,—access to God through Christ,—communion with him,—believing views of glory, &c.—These subjects will repress the hearts of sinners, as a lancet concealed in a sponge; as well as raise the devout affections of true Christians.

§ 17. V. General views of religion.—Micah vi. 8. Titus ii. 11. Matt. xxii. 37.—Represent the various branches of duty in a [illegible] manner.—Urge them [illegible] consciences.—For people generally know what is right, but need to be persuaded to practise it.—But you [illegible] cases of conscience, that cannot be well stated in sermons, encourage your people to bring to you in private.

§ 18. VI. The love of Christ and a devotional temper.—Here represent his attributes and the genuine workings of a pious soul towards him.—Urge the keeping up a continued communion with him.—Describe the pleasing intercourse of a devout soul with him in various ordinances.—This will be particularly useful to young converts, and very acceptable to serious Christians.

§ 19. VII. The evil of sin and misery of sinners in consequence of it.—Spread the alarm, but with mingled encouragement.—Display the terrors of the law, but seldom let them be the subject of whole sermons;—and generally handle them directly, rather than menace and threaten them.

§ 20. VIII. The temptations and exercises of a pious soul.—These cases often occur among the people of God, and courses of sermons must often be interrupted to endeavor their cases. Many pleasing discouragements arise;—describe the cause,—and lay down rules for judging of sincere grace,—that Christians may be comforted, and hypocrites convicted.—Such sermons are peculiarly very profitable.—Fence them with several scripture quotations, that they may not be thought enthusiastic.

§ 21. IX. Death, judgment, and eternity.—Pathetical sermons will often demand these.—Nothing tends more to quicken us in the duties of life and preparation for death.—Here consider heaven, in various views, particularly as to God,—describing the glory of Christ,—concluding with pithy and powerful [illegible] and the influence these prospects should have upon us.

§ 22. X. Exercises of [illegible] and praise.—These are very interesting and entertaining subjects, and will often afford a pleasing opportunity of saying good things in a very inoffensive way.—Sometimes a whole sermon of hymns [illegible] be made to exemplify them, but it appears more common.—These sermons to the eye of God will be [illegible] by the examples of Asaph, Ezekiah, Samuel, &c. Hints for general observations on the nature, advantages, and reasonableness of such a [illegible]

[illegible]

* Let the most needful and profitable subjects be those most frequently insisted on. Those are the most needful truths that are the most [illegible] and those most frequently insisted on those in which the [illegible] and instruction of the audience, [illegible] Baxter's Ref. [illegible] § 92.

LECTURE VI.

On different Strains of Preaching.

§ 1. I shall not here describe all the various strains of preaching for which different men are remarkable; but only recommend some, which perfectly agree with each other, and should be found in every sermon.

§ 2. Let it be observed, that by "strain" I mean the general manner in which the whole discourse is composed. It differs much from style—this regards the structure of sentences in particular, but strain respects the aspect of the entire discourse.

§ 3. 1. Let the strain of your sermons be argumentative.—Be often proving something, even when it is not the business of the whole discourse to demonstrate one proposition.—As for instance, prove the justness of your explication; the truth of subordinate assertions;—the propriety of the directions you give;—and the necessity of your cautions.—And never expect that any of those things which you advance will by an intelligent auditory be received merely on your word.—Nevertheless, do not let your arguments be too numerous, abstracted, or disposed in too artificial an order.—Remember, the explication of your subject must be as argumentative as almost any part of your sermon.

§ 4. 2. Pathetic.—It is a wild scheme to pretend

WHAT SUBJECTS ARE MOST PROPER TO BE PREACHED AND MORE FREQUENTLY INSISTED UPON BY A YOUNG PREACHER.

1. Those that refer more immediately to Christ. The Redeemer's person, the nature of his grace, his atonement and fulness for the following on the particular offices, and the exercise of them in the conversion, sanctification, and comfort of his people, are to be insisted on and the manner in which he should be preached. The sacrifice and ransom of himself for sinners. The sufferings and death to which he submitted, and the glory consequent thereon. The resurrection from the dead, the ascension into heaven, the intercession at the right hand of God, and the glorious reward which he has purchased for his people. The fulness of grace which he has treasured up in him. The fitness and all-sufficiency of his mediation to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by him. The particular relations in which he stands to his people, as their Prophet, Priest, King, Husband, Head, Foundation, Corner Stone, Advocate, Friend, Saviour, and Judge.

2. The manifestations of the Spirit of grace as promised with his blessed Son. The necessity of purifying influences from on high, in order to the true knowledge and believing apprehension of the revealed Christ, and the grace in the exercises of our ministry. The nature, and the manner of the operations of the Spirit in the conversion of sinners, the communications of instruction with the progress of light, the supplies of strength, the consolations of hope, and the various fruits of holiness. The peculiar relations in which he stands to the saints, as their Comforter, Intercessor, Guide, Sanctifier, and Seal. The peculiar relations in which he stands to the ministers of the gospel, as their Instructor, Assistant, Friend, Saviour, and Judge.

3. The constitution of the covenant of grace as established with believers in him. The blessings of pardon, peace, and reconciliation with God, of adoption and heirship, and of holiness, particularly. The nature of faith, and the grace in the exercises of our ministry. The nature, and the manner of the operations of repentance, with its genuine fruits. The commands, promises, and threatenings of the gospel, with the manner in which they are to be addressed to the various characters of men. The nature of the ordinances of God, and the manner in which they are to be administered. The peculiar relations in which the covenant stands to particular states.

4. The institution and observation of a Christian Sabbath, and our duty in it. The nature and ends of baptism, and the manner in which the parties concerned in it are to be addressed. The nature and ends of the Lord's supper, and the manner in which communicants are to be addressed. The nature of the communion of saints, and the manner in which the duties of it are to be urged. The nature of the discipline of the church, and the manner in which it is to be exercised. The necessity of maintaining, and encouraging the institutions of learning, and the proper manner of addressing those in the power of the United States. These are the most particular subjects that occur to me.

5. The principles of Christian virtue in its various branches, and the motives and manner of inforcing them. Christian virtue is the image of God in the soul, the nature of which is to be explained, and the manner in which it is to be urged. It is the fruit of faith, and is to be urged as such. It is the effect of the Spirit of God, and is to be urged as such. It is the evidence of our interest in Christ, and is to be urged as such. It is the way to the kingdom of heaven, and is to be urged as such. It is the beginning of heaven, and is to be urged as such. It is the glory of God, and is to be urged as such. It is the glory of the gospel, and is to be urged as such. It is the glory of the Redeemer, and is to be urged as such. It is the glory of the Spirit, and is to be urged as such. It is the glory of the saints, and is to be urged as such. It is the glory of the angels, and is to be urged as such. It is the glory of the church, and is to be urged as such. It is the glory of the world, and is to be urged as such. It is the glory of the universe, and is to be urged as such. It is the glory of God himself, and is to be urged as such. The peculiar relations in which the various branches of Christian virtue stand to particular states of men, and the manner in which they are to be addressed, are to be carefully observed. Such are the relations of Christian virtue to the rich, the poor, the learned, the unlearned, the young, the old, the married, the single, the parent, the child, the master, the servant, the magistrate, the subject, the friend, the enemy, the sick, the dying, the mourner, the backslider, the penitent, the believer, the saint, the minister, the people, the church, the world, the universe, the Redeemer, God.

6. The nature of vice, and a considered, extensive, thorough conviction of it. Here the various particulars may be enumerated, and especially the following great classes of vice, as set out Christian Doctrine, Introduction, Part I. Head, Guilt, Sovereignty, Duty. Here attempts the various reasonings, which are to be used and inforce arguments to the whole, such as universal, without any exception, large, and strong, together with an application of the arguments to the various particulars of vice and corruption in the will. Here all the particular workings of a corrupt and wicked heart may be enumerated, and the reasonings of a hearing with a holy, communicative spirit from his manifestations and promises, and others, may be very convenient and lively. In this manner, with holy and devout prayers, as from an attending to the voice of the Son of God from the holy Trinity and answering the heart in every particular, the work may be done. And the more particular and circumstantial we are, the more we shall find ourselves benefited ourselves in preaching and profited to others. Christian.

7. Let your views and aim in your ministry be to promote a conformity to it. That soul is most happy and prosperous which lives the nearest to the Lord; and that people are most the people of God's inheritance, and the most prosperous and happy, among whom the Lord is most honoured, and most loves to be honoured.

8. The temptations and corruptions of the parish will, I think, often occur to you and should often be mentioned from the pulpit. Some of these should sometimes be the subjects of daily, weekly, or other expositions of certain texts of scripture, as they occur. Some you must and must not meddle with at all times. Some should be mentioned with caution, and others with freedom. Some should be mentioned with a view to the conviction of the guilty, others with a view to awaken the consciences of the careless, and others with a view to the comfort of the humble. The proper seasons, and manner of mentioning these things, you will learn by observation and experience.

9. Parish improvements, and removing. Parish improvements will probably often occasion them, if not, they should not be introduced. Sabbath breaks by parishioners among the inhabitants of the town in general are the chief.

10. The corruptions of youth more, and particular of youthful lusts. These subjects are very entertaining; and will often give occasion for expositions of very useful parts of the scriptures and sentiments. Some lessons will be useful to the whole congregation. Others to several particular classes of persons. Others to individuals. Here is ample room for the exercise of wisdom, love, and faithfulness. Let us [illegible] with God. A minister's heart is [illegible]. Attention, diligence, and fervent prayer.

to rout out the passions;—and a foolish thing to pretend to lay them asleep. They are the sails of the soul. The preacher must endeavour to fill them with a prosperous wind. Have some pathetic strokes even while explaining, as well as in your reflections or improvement;—or else your reasoning will not be attended to, nor of course understood;—and then, however strong in itself, it will prove of no avail,—and an address to the passions will appear as irrational as if no such reasoning had been formed. Therefore make your sermons addresses to your hearers, rather than general essays or speculative harangues;—a very necessary way of preaching the gospel.—However, on this head be cautious;—do not attempt to raise the passions of the people to immoderate transports, nor suffer your own to master you;—lest to those who are not so much affected as yourselves you appear ridiculous.—In the greatest emotions "Ride in the whirlwind, and direct the storm."—Remember that different degrees of fire become different subjects, and different parts of the same subject.

§ 5. 3. Insinuating.—That the passions may be moved by soft touches, and sudden turns, lead them into their own hearts;—show them the workings of their own minds and passions.—This cannot be effected, however, without deep reflection and great self-acquaintance.—A variety of this kind, suited to this strain, may be found in different authors, almost on every subject.—This insinuating manner makes little noise, but does great execution

This is the character of the Blessed Redeemer—and sometimes of St. Paul.

§ 6. 4. Evangelical.—Choose such subjects as those mentioned above—and let your sermons be such, whatever it may, during a course, what proportion of the gospel may be taught in—and what Christian experience. Let it be a maxim with you never to preach without introducing Christ and the Holy Spirit. Rather digress, as St. Paul does, and exalt them.

§ 7. 5. Spiritual and experimental.—Consider the various cases of souls in respect to the great concern of religion—how convictions are introduced—how they work—and by what means they can be best preserved, cherished and improved—and to how many ways there is great danger—either of their gradually wearing off and leaving the heart less susceptive of them, or else of their degenerating into superstition or enthusiasm—Your endeavours to stifle them—Describe the temptations with which good men are exercised—arising from the effervescence of youth, the strength of predominant passions, the hard treatment and frowns of the world, the influence of evil examples and bad customs, the torpor of gracious frame and lukewarm principles, discourage the hearer under which they sometimes groan—the regret they feel when communion with God is interrupted—the believer's combat with something on—and with doubts relative to his future state—Only touch on these things, when they are not the principal subject of your discourse. For these purposes study the Psalms—Read much in the description of Christian tempers—Cultivate a lively in your own souls—Represent the Christian speaking to and speak what you find in your own heart—what you have felt in some of your best seasons.

§ 8. 6. Scriptural.—Borrow Scripture phrases, illustrations, and proofs—Deal in frequent allusions to Scripture—Study to open the beauty and energy, as well as the sense of the particular scripture which you choose as the ground of your discourse—In your application, especially when you wish to bring home conviction to the hearts of sinners, endeavour to find one or two powerful scriptures and shoot them home—a few words may likely to pierce the heart. The principles of analogy will often make these addresses very rational, —and it is doing an honour to the Spirit of God which if we consciously regard he may graciously honour us—Isaiah and Jeremiah, and the other prophets, and St. Paul will be of vast service for pathos—And there is nothing that gives a still more melodious and impressive cadence than scriptures properly interwoven with it. Throw into these quotations a few explanatory words, with which a congregation will be delighted and edified.

LECTURE VII.

On the Style of Sermons.

§ 1. 1. It be pure.—Avoid common words and those composed of various languages—Have done with [illegible]—Attend to propriety of phrase in reading—Avoid low words when even less usually expressive and interesting.

§ 2. Intelligible and clear.—Avoid the pursuit of words [illegible] Have a sentiment quoted too long already.—What but to encourage the frequent recurrence of different periods and paragraphs by the perpetual use of connecting particles—Let either put you [illegible] with the parables—by him shall Ay much, for as much as, furthermore, howbeit," &c.—Do not deal in parentheses unless they are very short.—"An affected obscurity of style," says Quintilian, "makes a bad solution the gratification's learning, but it still makes it appear either as an hypocrisy or folly."

§ 3. Strong and nervous.—Do not [illegible] Weighty sentiments lose, by too many epithets—and by circumlocution before them which nothing [illegible] a more quiet.

§ 4. Chaste and temperate.—Do not affect [illegible] to exhibit them to the gratification of your [illegible] too high seeking [illegible] [illegible] and to all [illegible] bombast expressions.

§ 5. Elegant.—Avoid [illegible] one [illegible] must be [illegible] and endeavour to touch nothing that does.

§ 6. Grave and solemn.—Avoid [illegible] sions. That rule of Isocrates's—"Qui populum, populariter loquendum, et simpliciter orandum ad vulgus est Concionator," will not hold good to the present day—Learning is not now [illegible] gate. Keep on the surface of the gospel—the not affect those [illegible] have many a [illegible] too humble—be particularly careful to possess [illegible] of the divine Being, [illegible] other attributes [illegible] to him, as he appeared—Hearing the Almighty Power of the Gospel, and honouring the word—of knowledge. Deal with the serious truths of [illegible] [illegible] by [illegible] and of shewing the [illegible] "Ingenii" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] is "like a mean dress bespangled with jewels. Take heed of poetical lines; and if, without design, you have fallen upon them, let them be altered in the review of your sermon. Avoid many points of wit; when much of this appears it renders a man suspected whether he is in earnest for God.—There are too many instances of this in SPRATT, of whom it might be said, (as well as of his friend COWLEY,) "He more had pleased us, had he pleased us less."—These are "spiders' webs to catch flies."—"This is like Nero's lading his galleys from Egypt with sand for the wrestlers, when Rome was starving for want of corn," BATES, p. 772. "Or, like offering a basket of flowers to a hungry man," RAPIN, vol. ii. p. 55.*

§ 8. Let not your discourses, however, be too bare, but prudently interspersed with figures.—When too many, they are like flowery weeds growing among corn, which render the prospect more pleasing to the eye, but hinder the growth;—or like painted glass; yet moderately used, they exhilarate the mind, and fasten on the memory.—Therefore generally have some similes, and many allusions.—If you borrow them, quote the authors;—or it will be dressing yourselves with fine feathers which will probably soon be pulled off to your shame; by which you will be exposed to shame.—for there is nothing so quickly discovered as those passages which strike the memory so forcibly.—Remember, "Non quærit æger medicum eloquentem sed sanantem."

§ 9. Let your style be free and easy to yourselves.—Be careful not to labour it too much;—nor affect to imitate any one.—But form your own style and manner gradually, by conversing with the best authors.—When you have well digested your thoughts, write pretty fast, and afterwards review and correct;—this will have a peculiar effect, and give a popular grace, which stiff labour cannot attain.

§ 10. Lively.—This rule may take place when there is not much room or need for pathos. Something of the laconic will conduce much to this.—Great verbosity enervates and makes a discourse flat.—Yet by all means avoid an affected smartness,—similar to that which runs through ECHARD and COLLIER.

§ 11. Various.—Your style must vary with the variety of your subjects, and sometimes according to the different parts of the same subject;—in some measure too according to your auditory, and the general manner of preaching in the place where you live;—which you ought to endeavour gradually to improve.—The same style running through all your discourses will insensibly grow disagreeable, be it ever so good—and that which is richest, as writing as in food, will nauseate the soonest.

§ 12. Let it be harmonious.—Remember that harmony is a real thing, not only in speaking but in writing.—It may seem but a little thing, and it is not indeed the greatest, yet it is worth attending to, and may be attained by proper care.—Without it people will be uneasy in hearing, when perhaps they know not why. In order to attain it, let the ear be tuned by reading aloud, especially such authors as are remarkable for this excellence. Try your own compositions this way, even while composing as well as afterwards. Remember that perspicuity is a great friend to harmony. Avoid open vowels and clashing consonants, too many monosyllables, and too great a cluster of short syllables in succession. But take heed not to admit verses in your prose for the sake of being harmonious.†

* [illegible]

† In reading over a discourse to ourselves we must observe what words sound harsh, and agree together. The former we must alter in speaking as well as in writing, which is most obvious and observed in verse, in which we cannot pronounce [illegible] Pref. Lect. p. 22. See Mason's Treatise on Prosaic Numbers passim. Also as to the rule for open vowels, Smetius's Longinus.

Our author has manifested a singular partiality for Addison. I allow him a writer of sentiments and it is well known that he studied with especially in his younger years with great attention. But I must therefore suppose that the affected and [illegible] of [illegible] of energetic expression had an unwarranted influence on some parts of his own style and manner of writing, especially as he was [illegible] extended those observations, so far as I perceive, to some [illegible] taste. It is presumed, therefore, that the following observations on harmony of style in general, and the character of Addison as to this [illegible] more particularly, will form a very suitable appendix to this Lecture.

ON HARMONY OF STYLE.

Among the great and [illegible] of our English writers, none deserves to be placed at the head of the [illegible] than Addison. [illegible] to be an excellent model for those who have some [illegible] of the Good Sense and Taste; it is more [illegible] to those who have not. [illegible] add, without hesitation, the [illegible] as an excellent model; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

LECTURE VIII.

On the Choice of Thought.

§ 1. Let them be solid—Such as will stand the test of a severe judgement; for such they must expect; and unless they will bear this however you may adorn them, they will be despised. "It is "a fair woman without discretion," no less than colouring of a picture where proportion is not observed.

§ 2. Useful. Remember it is your great business to edify, not to amuse. Often ask yourselves, Will this thought be likely to do good? If not, lay it aside. An ingenious man by attentive thought may find out a set of just and rational, yet trifling and useless, speculations. But Christ's sermons furnish us with some examples of this kind.

§ 3. Proper to the subject. Never indulge yourselves in loose digressions,—but keep up a certain and easy connexion. The misery of sinners, the nature of faith, justification by the righteousness of Christ, &c. are brought in by many on every subject, avoid this. Nothing is more disagreeable in preaching than tempestiva ostentatio.

§ 4. Let them be such as naturally flow from the subject. For this purpose dwell much on your subject in previous meditation.—Talk it over,—view it in its various relations, and in composition keep it still in mind.—This will secure a happy diversity,—and the same leading thought will have distinguishing and agreeable peculiarities,—and the whole subject will appear one.

§ 5. Let some, if possible, in every discourse be new.—These are generally to be gained by remarks on Scripture,—observing the exercises of pious souls,—and the general movements of human and divine nature in mankind. Neither of extreme difficult and remarkable thoughts (on passages which are not intended as the main object to be improved) by any new thought which may arise in your own minds.—"Lab[illegible] [illegible] reliqui."

§ 6. Let them be popular.—That is suited to the people in general,—and for this purpose attend to the following hints. Study to accommodate yourselves to your own hearers, or those of your time. Consider how the circumstances of your auditories require variety, and act accordingly. Study to find pertinent, fit thoughts which will occur to the mind, when that intently is kept upon the Lord's Word. When your sermons are composed, as you first are, for various auditories, consider what to omit or add.

§ 7. Let them be natural.—Do not attempt to be learned connected on every head. Take the most natural things.—Often, in speaking even from notes, or a single sentence, contract yourselves with boldness of genius, lighted your soul to those sentiments and expressions most happy on what is peculiarly your own,—or on some other accidental circumstance, unlike the present.

LECTURE IX.

On the Manner of Expressing the Thoughts.

§ 1. Let the [illegible] not only be [illegible] but in [illegible]. Study to express those [illegible]

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

that the distinction may evidently appear;—when it is otherwise, the sermon cannot be understood, well received, or tolerably remembered,—and the preacher himself, it will be supposed, has not fully understood his subject.

§ 2. Let them not be too numerous.—If they are, it will be difficult to keep them distinct.—It will also load the memory,—and impoverish the sermon, since, in that case, but very little can be said on every head;—though the beauty, or the finest parts of a sermon, lie chiefly in the enlargement.—Sermons with a vast many heads are like the skeleton of a body,—or like the branches of a tree in winter, when neither fruit nor leaves are left.

§ 3. Have not too many subdivisions.—They soon confound the most attentive and intelligent hearers, that have not either a vast memory or a pen. Have commonly but one series of particulars under one general head mentioned by numbers;—and let those subordinate to them come on as the enlargement;—where it is of great importance to be very exact in arranging them:—and where, in a well-composed discourse, one head will often contain the stamina of a sermon.

§ 4. Let the heads be expressed in as few words as possible.—Especially have some one leading word, if you can, which may contain the principal sense.—If they must be connected with some longer sentence to make the sense complete, first mention them alone, then in their connexion;—or if together, let the common part of the sentence be placed last, rather than first. Be contented to sacrifice something of the cadence and copiousness of your language to this greater concern. Other parts of a sermon may sufficiently show you do not this from a want of ability to do otherwise.

§ 5. Place them in a natural order,—that they may illustrate and introduce each other,—and that there may be a fair transition.—Avoid inverted climaxes.—Cæt. par. let those heads on which you propose to bestow the greatest labour or ornament, or lay the greatest stress, be placed last.

§ 6. Avoid trite divisions,—especially of very common subjects,—as justification, sanctification, adoption;—the humiliation and exaltation of Christ;—his offices of Prophet, Priest, and King;—proofs from reason, and proofs from Scripture.—This looks like common place, and may expose you to censure as a plagiary.—Yet I do not say it must or can always be avoided,—only be cautious that these divisions do not grow too common,—they give a discourse a very dull air.

§ 7. Have a variety of methods in different sermons;—particularly when the subjects are, as they often must be, nearly the same.—Sometimes, let the text be the guide and groundwork throughout.—Sometimes, having opened it, draw practical remarks from it.—Sometimes, take a topic of diversity, for which the text shall be the motto.—And in your application, sometimes address your hearers under their different characters;—and in this address, bring in your motives and directions.—Sometimes, draw inferences,—or make reflections;—and at other times, let your whole discourse be applicatory;—persuasive,—or dissuasive,—and have no reflections or applications at all at the close;—or but a hint of what might have been introduced.

§ 8. Give the plan twice, as briefly as possible, and the review.—This makes TILLOTSON so clear.—A few moments thus employed are well spent.—Let your hearers always perceive where you are;—and be upon your guard against long digressions.

§ 9. To secure all this, draw a very distinct skeleton.—Or you may draw two, with different degrees of exactness and fulness.—Submit a fair draft to the examination of a friend.—Review it attentively before you begin to compose;—remember that when this is well done, the sermon is almost done;—and a due care about it may be much better than transcribing the whole sermon twice;—though that also may be done where time will allow.

LECTURE X.

More particular Rules on the Composition of a Sermon

§ 1. Take some previous time for devout meditation on your subject,—especially if it be devotional, as it generally will be.—Preach it over to your own souls.—Observe thoughts rising warm from the heart;—set them down with peculiar care,—as some of your greatest treasure.—If one view appear more affecting than another, make a proper memorandum of it.

§ 2. Choose to compose when you are in your best frame,—cæt. par.—Therefore take such time, that if you should be under any particular indisposition for study, or meet with any interruption in it, you may not be forced upon it, at so unfavourable a season.—But take care you do not too soon conclude yourselves incurably unfit;—the frame often mends.—Take notice what parts of the day you are most inclined, and in the best frame to compose,—and secure those hours to yourselves.—Generally early in the morning,—or late in the evening,—are the best time:—unless you have an extraordinary command of retirement.—But let not the intermediate hours be lost.

§ 3. Begin the work with a solemn address to God.—This will lay you in the way of his blessing and assistance;—and will naturally have some good influence to awaken, compose, and encourage your soul;—it will direct your minds to right ends and views,—which is a matter of vast importance.—Perhaps a form of prayer might not be improper for that purpose;—yet varied with some particular regard to your subject.*

§ 4. When just setting to the work, ask yourselves such questions as these, on a view of the scheme you have drawn up.

§ 5. 1. How shall the sermon begin?—Let it not be always with mentioning the context,—though it may sometimes be allowed, or indeed necessary.—Use a variety of Exordia,—sometimes, by scripture stories,—sometimes, by quotations and allusions,—sometimes, by similes,—at others, by a weighty, laconic sentence,—and, sometimes, fall directly upon your subject,—especially when it is so copious that you will be in danger of exceeding the time.—Endeavour in this part of your sermon, to awaken the attention of your auditory,—and raise their expectations,—but not too high.—Let it be always modest,—without any extraordinary flights,—and leave no room for suspicion, that it was composed merely to display the orator;—This will lead your hearers to dispute your sincerity.—Better walk than attempt to fly where your wings will not bear you.—If you have any invocation, let it be after your general division,—peculiarly appropriate,—and more frequently expressed as a wish, than as a direct prayer;—and so contrived, that it may intimate to the hearers what they ought to be concerned about in attending to the discourse.

§ 6. 2. Does the text need explication?—If it does, what explication?—Do not make difficulties for the sake of removing them;—nor in a dull manner set yourselves, as Dr. Clarke often does, to show the various senses in which any word found in the text is used in Scripture;—unless it may as it sometimes will, furnish useful thoughts.—When the difficulty is real, and expressly where it is not touched upon by commentators, critics, and exegetes, it is a fine thing, indeed.—Do not collect the sentiments of various commentators, since they only confound;—nor a variety of readings and versions,—nor deviate from our own without real necessity,—and when you do, fix upon the translation you think the best, and drop the rest;—or at least but briefly touch upon them;—and on no account be divided in your own mind, and at a loss which to choose, lest it should produce some ill effect upon the audience, by leading them to suppose that the Scripture is an uncertain thing.—When your text expresses some noble, important sentiment, in a very forcible manner, you may make it the subject of the greater part of your discourse.—Attend an interesting and just Hume.—Nothing appears a more common mean than this plan,—and does a greater honour to Scripture.—Search the context for proper thoughts,—and if there be any difficulties in the neighbourhood of it, endeavour to illustrate it by a few expressive and important words;—which, to the more judicious of your hearers, must appear to be an abstract of a much larger criticism in your own mind.

§ 7. 3. What passions are to be raised,—and what figures of speech are to be used.—Here exercise a disciplined prudence.—Indeed, you are not to meddle with the passions of a learning, [illegible].—Much more, then, soften, and still softer, machines must be used for this purpose.—If God be [illegible] speaks, it must be in a few awful, and generally scripture, words.

§ 8. 4. What strain of preaching is most suited to the subject in general, and to select parts in particular.—When these are fixed, endeavour to recollect what are the greatest maxims in these sciences, and how they would have expressed themselves had they been in your place.†

§ 9. 5. What respect to Christ and the Holy Spirit may properly be introduced into this discourse?—Does it naturally lead to them?—If not, how may they least unnaturally be introduced or concealed?—Sometimes by one of these questions they have been too much neglected.

§ 10. 6. What quotations can properly be introduced from Scripture?—Generally, have one in two under each head which may illustrate as much as possible the main matter.—In the application, some that are very pathetic should always be introduced.—The pathos of which ought to be constituted from other writings,—particularly by remarkable passages, figures, or famous sentiments, which in your reading you have met with.—For this purpose, [illegible] your common place book,—and sometimes note down thoughts you design for this purpose in your book of sermons.

§ 11. 7. What use can be made of any suggested

* The following form was drawn up for his private use by Dr. Doddridge, in the younger years, and published in the book of forms of devotion it contains:—

"Blessed God! Do thou first prepare me, by secret and unobserved influences of thy holy Spirit, for the work I am about to undertake; and then assist me, that I may not be misled by any prejudices of mind, or corruptions of heart, so as to draw any thing from Thy sacred word, my appointed rule and law.

I am now entering on a work of infinite importance, on which I would desire to be employed at the most solemn period of my precarious life. I beg that thou will command all creatures in the universe to thy service, and make every circumstance of my present situation subservient to thy glory. May no vain or unbecoming thought [illegible] my mind, or divert it from the great business I have in hand. Engage my heart, and fix it in the most agreeable manner to myself, to the most solemn and important of employments, [illegible] preaching Christ. And O may I have the influence and power of that divine truth [illegible] upon my own heart, and may my own soul [illegible] the sweetness and [illegible] of the blessed gospel, which I am proposing to others! Let me [illegible] to compose my sermons in a manner the most convenient [illegible] to expound, and to [illegible] God and Thy sacred word. Let me [illegible] the words, and accommodate [illegible] to the capacities of the people I am addressing, and attend to the [illegible]. May I [illegible] my own [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] the most [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ance with the world in this sermon?' Have I made any observations on it,—or seen any thing lately that may furnish me with an useful thought?'

§ 12. 8. When shall I address the conscience?—Remember that the final application, reflections, or inferences, are not the only places in which to introduce your addresses to the converted and unconverted,—the ignorant, the careless, the luxurious, and profane,—the moralist and the hypocrite,—the wavering and irresolute,—the doubting, tempted, and dejected in spirit,—the backsliding,—the confirmed, zealous, and joyful; nor to the aged and the young,—the prosperous and afflicted, the rich and poor,—the healthy and infirm,—those who have lost friends, &c. &c. Represent to yourselves these and various cases, and let each be seasonably noticed.

§ 13. 9. What shall the conclusion be?—Do not leave off merely because you have nothing more to say;—be sure to close handsomely.—Frequently close, though not always, with a thought of consolation:—at other times full of terror; and often with graceful scripture.—Have some sprightly thoughts, if possible, at the conclusion of each head.

§ 14. Often recollect your character and station in life. I am a man, and not a boy.—To crowd my discourses with puerile ornaments is like an academic, just come from school.—All I write must be judicious, or it will be contemptible.—I am a servant of God, and not of the world, or of men.—I must approve myself to the great God;—in all things I must promote his interest, and write and speak as in his presence;—and, to feel these sentiments more sensibly, intermingle devout and deeply humble, though silent, ejaculations while composing.—I am a minister of Christ, and not a deist, or heathen philosopher.—I am to preach the gospel, that gospel which Christ brought down from heaven, and died to confirm.—I am, in one sense, a successor of the apostles,—and am engaged in carrying on the scheme in which they and their Lord were engaged.—Am I a preacher among plain Christians, not scholars, or courtiers? Let my sermons be adapted to their capacities.—Imagine yourselves in the pulpit, and your congregation around you, and sometimes preach over some heads before you write them.—Lastly, I and my hearers are dying creatures.—I am, perhaps, composing my last sermon, a sermon which I may not live to deliver.—This method of recollecting yourselves produces a genuine air of seriousness, profitable to yourselves and your hearers.

§ 15. Compose as much of your sermon as you can at a sitting.—Choose to do this when you are in a good frame. It will give a graceful freedom to your style,—and, when you have prepared your materials, it will not be difficult to despatch your sermon in five or six hours.

§ 16. If in the course of your composition you find your thoughts wander and droop, endeavour to revive them by holy ejaculations.—Beg of God to bring by his Spirit suitable scriptures to your remembrance,—in order to help you to open doctrines clearly, to state them truly, and to apply them seriously. He knows what is in man, and can lead you to come at what you ought always most to seek.—the hearts of your hearers.

§ 17. Give your sermons a very attentive and critical review.—Here lop off excrescences,—divide sentences which are too long,—and if you can find time, transcribe the whole again. For this purpose begin soon enough;—let your general schemes be drawn up a week beforehand.—Read and enrich your schemes by additional thoughts and conversation on Monday and Tuesday;—on Wednesday and Thursday compose your sermon;—and on Saturday review and transcribe it.—Practise this method seven years, and it will become natural and easy.

LECTURE XI.

On the Delivery of Sermons.

§ 1. This is evidently a matter of great importance, and almost every body pretends to be a judge of it.—A good delivery is very much in a man's favour, and the contrary is much to his disadvantage.—In some instances hearers judge of a man's character by the manner of his speaking, as much as or more than they do by his matter.

§ 2. Several things are essential to a good delivery.—Particularly, It must be grave and serious;—agreeable to the dignity of the character in which you appear.—This is opposed to a careless air in your delivery,—and to every thing that approaches that ludicrous manner which an unhappy few have affected;—and also to improper actions, such as playing with the cushion, band, gloves, &c.

§ 3. It should be distinct.*—Take care of running your words into one another,—and of sucking in

* Every preacher wishes to be understood; so far as hearty but many are ignorant in the manner the word of a rational and serious minister ought always to be uttered. If they would attend to a few rules, without the observation of which no man can deliver himself with propriety, they would find a power of speaking, that will be irresistible, if all the qualities are combined. And if Dr. Gerard says of a wig, and the ornamental clothes, nothing can be made of it. Make the ornamental appendages, for example, [illegible] and that ye be not [illegible]. Then shall the words and [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] your breath,—or dropping your voice at the end of a sentence.—Make pauses in proper, and avoid them in improper, places.—Let the accent be laid right,—but avoid too much, lest it seem affectation.—Pause at the end of your heads,—repeat them (when repetition is thought advisable) with a stronger voice than the rest.

§ 4. Let it be affectionate.—Feel all you say.—If a tear will fall, do not restrain it,—but it should never be forced. "Nothing is more indecent than a dead preacher, speaking to dead hearers the living truths of the living God." BAXTER. "A due fervour makes a plain discourse more touching than one more exquisitely composed and coldly delivered, as a blunt iron when red-hot will pierce deeper into a piece of wood, than a much sharper one that is cold." BATES.

§ 5. Composed and sedate.—In the warmest parts do not be transported beyond your voice so as to scream.—Moderate the excess of action—such as throwing your arms over the sides of the pulpit, &c.

§ 6. Let your delivery be easy.—Your delivery must vary according to the different parts of your sermon, and the different sentiments expressed.—Explication and application must be delivered in a very different manner.

§ 7. Natural and unaffected.—Theatrical airs are by all means to be avoided.*—Do not act all you say,—it is ridiculous.—Be careful not to make pauses that look like self-admiration, between the several words of the same clause, nor affect to vary your voice too much to express very different ideas of sorrow, indignation, fear, &c.—When the delivery appears too artificial, the auditory is ready to suspect a man's sincerity, and that he is only playing his part.—Speak as a good man bringing out of the full treasure of his heart good things.

§ 8. Free, that is, above the servile use of notes.—Do not read every word, nor be afraid to change a clause, or to add a sentence which may occur readily and be useful and frequently as much so as any. To be able to preach without notes raises a man's character. Accustom yourselves to look about much upon your auditory.

§ 9. I shall finish this Lecture with some remarks on the best means of attaining an agreeable delivery.

§ 10. 1. Guard against faults, rather than strive to cure. A delivery that has no considerable faults will probably have some beauties.

§ 11. 2. Accustom yourselves to read aloud the same thing again and again;—perhaps your best sermons will be preferable to any thing else.—This will fix them fast upon your memory, and you will acquire by use the proper emphatic cadence and action.

§ 12. 3. Be sure to be master of your notes in proportion to the degree in which you intend to use them, that you may not be entangled.—It is a sad reproach to a man when he cannot read his own writing before a congregation; yet this I have often seen.

§ 13. 4. Let your mind be as composed as possible.—Endeavour to get above the fear of the people by rational and pious considerations.—Remember your own superiority to most of them in point of understanding;—also the candour of others of good sense, and how little a thing the applause of any is.—Fix your dependence upon God—be willing to be disposed of by him, in these instances, as he sees fit;—and yet cheerfully hope as you go forth in his work, that he will give you his strength.

§ 14. 5. Let your mind be recollected.—Let this progress rather seriously upon what you are to deliver. After you have composed your discourse, pray it over to yourself. Study divine assistance. Keep your mind well employed as you go to the house of God.—In the pulpit make a little pause, till you feel you become grave and recollected. Study that your hearers may be serious, and your own minds affected. Be most especially careful the first beginning of your sermon.

§ 15. 6. Avoid unnecessary exposure of yourself just before you come in.—When the service is over, the performance cannot be continued to advantage, and to entertain company in your house. Very good sometimes indeed, from prudential motives, even when we have had the least leisure.—Do not sit up late on Saturday night, nor study too intensely on Lord's-day morning.—Nor be too busy in company and trifling conversation.—Use some exercise as much as possible,—and let diversion not keep your mind in a perturbed, tense and tender frame.

§ 16. 7. Encourage the gracious Head of your Church in the ministry of your ordinances.—We have not

* It has been remarked that [illegible] Mr. Whitefield's manner [illegible] and a real confidence of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

our own voices as others do,—nor see that air and manner with which we speak in the light in which they view it.—Our friends, therefore, are the best judges.—And if they find fault, you are not, while young, to be displeased.—If, however, what is in itself right, generally, or at least frequently, displease the auditory, it should be waved.—It is much pleasanter to commend than to blame; if our friends therefore deny themselves so much as to take this trouble, we ought to be very thankful,—and, instead of being angry at their censures, should rather desire them to do it frequently.—This is a precaution of importance to all beginners, because proper admonitions may prevent ill habits from being contracted, which, when once formed, are almost incurable.

LECTURE XII.

General Directions not comprehended in the preceding Lectures.

§ 1. Do not preach the same sermon over too often, either in the same or different places;—it hurts a man's reputation if the places are contiguous, and it is apt at best to deaden his own spirits;—but least of all in the same place.—A little alteration of text and preface will not be looked upon as a sufficient excuse.

§ 2. Never borrow the words of others.—Use their works in your compositions for hints and thoughts freely,—but never transcribe, unless it be as a quotation.

§ 3. Do not preach too many sermons on a text.—This rule is not to be invariably observed, as there are some copious passages that will afford distinct matter for various sermons,—and may occasionally be made the subject of two, but very seldom more than three, discourses. Rather sometimes pursue the same subject from different texts, that you may have more of the explication and application.

§ 4. When settled, have some scheme of subjects connected with each other to be preached over;—especially a course of sermons on the characters and offices of Christ,—the operations and fruits of the Spirit,—on the privileges and duties of Christians, &c. But let these be intermingled with others,—and when any remarkable providences occur, take notice of them in your sermons.

§ 5. Preach sometimes in little country places, with greater freedom than you can allow yourselves to a larger and more refined assembly.—Go into the pulpit with the heads of a sermon only, and talk freely upon them,—and when you return, write the discourse more at large. Thus you will improve many of your compositions, and gradually get above your notes.

§ 6. Let your first sermons especially be formed into an exact analysis, or regular scheme of method.—Commit this to memory, and it will improve your judgment, make your delivery easier to yourself, and continual attention to your notes less necessary.

§ 7. Write your notes neatly and distinctly.—Rule your paper, with a large margin.—Let the heads be written apart, and the enlargement divided into various paragraphs, and each distinct sentence properly pointed, if in long hand.—Let the Scriptures be referred to in the margin, which will give an opportunity of recollecting much of the discourse, by a very transient view,—especially if you write (as it will be proper to do) not only those you professedly design to quote, but others whose phrases you borrow, or to which you only allude. Read over your notes attentively once or more, to fix your sermon in your memory, and to prevent the shame of frequently hesitating.

§ 8. Know when to have done,—and if good and pertinent thoughts arise in your minds, take care not to pursue them too far, so as to draw out your discourse to an immoderate length.—Sometimes young men, having said nothing, are full of matter when they ought to close; and, with a view to mend what they have been saying, are apt to be tedious.—Thus it costs them labour and study to be less agreeable than they would otherwise be.—Remember, your business on subjects is not to say all that can be said; but what is most just, proper, important, and useful.—And do not forget that before the organs of speech are strengthened by practice, it is a very dangerous thing to keep them upon the stretch for a long time together;—the last quarter of an hour does them more injury than all.

§ 9. Be accurate, but candid, critics of the sermons you hear.—Draw up a scheme or perhaps hints of a sermon on the text on which you have heard a discourse,—and remember to be just to the beauties as well as defects of your brothers.—Always speak with candour on the labours of other ministers, lest your reflections on them be reckoned envy, or ill-nature; which will greatly sink your own character; and lest a consciousness of that severity discompose you, as in that case you must hardly expect more candour than you have shown.—Some persons of uncharitable tempers, though of excellent sense, have been wretchedly distressed for want of this precaution.

§ 10. Retire for prayer both before and after sermon.—This will encourage the mind, and bring it into a good frame, and it is doing honour to the divine Spirit, which he will probably succeed with blessings on your labours.—Besides, it is a proper indication of a serious temper, and a mind more concerned for God's glory than its own.

§ 11. Observe what acceptance your labours meet with amongst your people.—But make your observations with great caution, lest you should appear to them to be fishing for applause, which is a meanness very unworthy a gospel minister, and the surest way to lose it. Be willing to hear of any faults in your compositions or delivery; and sometimes when you preach before your brethren, desire them to tell you plainly what they discovered amiss.

§ 12. Sometimes keep a day of solemn devotion to recommend your labours to the divine blessing.—On those days, besides the usual devotion, review the memorandums of the sermons you have lately preached, and reflect on what you have found of the acceptance and success of them, and let God have the glory.—Humble yourselves before him, that they have been no more regarded or improved.—Review Christ's promises of assistance to his ministers,—and other promises which may be applied to this purpose,—for the further encouragement of your faith.—Plead earnestly with God for a blessing on yourselves, and those committed to your care,—and forget not on these devotional occasions to seek the blessing of God on your brethren and the public,—our plantations abroad, the church of Christ in general, and the protestant interest in the whole world. Consider then what you shall preach from before the next of these days, and draw out a more particular list of the subjects; still leaving room for alterations on unforeseen emergencies.

§ 13. Maintain a character and conduct in life agreeable to your preaching.—Labour to do good wherever you come.—Avoid every thing that would bring a reproach or a reflection on your own character, or on religion.—Remember statues at the top of a house must be larger than life;—i. e. your elevated situation will render your piety diminutive, if not above the common standard.—Pray to God for daily wisdom,—and every day in secret prayer have some petitions relative to the last sermon you preached;—and make it your care for the ensuing week to practise to the utmost what you have said.—This will command the regard of others, as far as it is apparent, and through divine grace insure the blessing of God; and make your ministry most comfortable to yourselves.

LECTURE XIII

Directions for Prayer.

§ 1. Prayer is a matter of great difficulty and great importance to our usefulness, and has a greater influence even on preaching than many are aware.—I shall first suggest some general directions relating to your improvement in the gift and grace of prayer.

§ 2. Furnish yourselves with a variety of matter proper for prayer.—for this purpose, converse much with your own hearts,—get well acquainted with the state of your souls,—attend to your spiritual wants and weaknesses,—frequently recollect the mercies you receive from God, and inquire what returns you have made.—Study the nature, works, and ways of God, make yourselves familiarly conversant with his word,—and let what you read there, or in other good books, be considered in particular as affording matter for prayer.—Pray over what you have been reading, and seldom close your Bible, or lay a book of practical divinity out of your hands, without a short collect at least formed upon it.

§ 3. Make a serious business of secret and family prayer.—Have your stated times for more private exercises of devotion and be careful in them.—Do not hurry them over in a few careless words, nor be satisfied unless you have daily some communion with God in them.—Labour hard to bring your hearts to a serious frame, when approaching to God in them.

§ 4. In all your prayers avoid the extremes of too mean and too pompous a style.—A pompous style shows a mind too full of self, and too little affected with a sense of divine things.—Who would regard a beggar telling a fine story of his calamities?—But, on the other hand, take heed of too mean and paltry phrases, low images, and pert familiarities with the blessed God.—A grand solemnity should be always maintained; but especially in public.—Let all be grave and simple; and appear to aim at nothing but pouring out the soul before God in the most genuine language of a humble and devout temper.—Avoid splendid flowers and expressions, which are sure to be remembered by those who have read them.

§ 5. Guard against sentences too extremely long when you pray with others, lest they should not understand you.—Better have them too short, though the sound of the period be different as this is but a small matter compared with the former.

§ 6. Be generally careful to observe a method in your prayers.—The principal parts of prayer are invocation with adoration,—confession,—petition —intercession with thanksgiving,—which may be connected by proper transitions; but it is not necessary they should always succeed each other in this order. Thanksgiving may full as well come before confession, and the several parts may sometimes be variously intermingled and combined. Thus invocation needs not always be confined to the beginning of prayer; but may properly be repeated by way of preface to some of the principal petitions, remembering to make mention of the most suitable divine attributes; and the like mixture there may be of confession or thanksgiving with petition.

§ 7. Be not too solicitous to introduce novelties into your prayers. Desire not to pray as nobody ever prayed before, or will probably ever pray again.—Novelties may sometimes amuse, but in prayer they more frequently disgust; besides, they have the appearance of too much art; and as new things are generally the produce of the imagination, they are not so proper for prayer as preaching, and even in that they must be moderate.

§ 8. Remember it is the peculiar office of the Spirit of God to help us in prayer. Engage in it, therefore, in dependence upon him; and maintain a continual dependence on the intercession and influence of Christ.

§ 9. I shall now give you some directions which relate more immediately to public prayer.

§ 10. 1. Begin with a solemn recollection of spirit. Think seriously of the majesty of that Being to whom you are addressing yourselves, and of the importance of the business in which you are engaging. Think how near you, and those who join with you, are to the tribunal of God; and lift up your hearts in devout ejaculations to him for such degrees of present assistance, as he shall think proper to bestow.

§ 11. 2. Begin rather lower than you intend to proceed, and somewhat slower,—and as you get warm, take heed of being transported into raptures, even though you should be melted into tears. Always keep up a solemnity of spirit and behaviour; avoid and abhor a periodical tone.—Use but little action, and that chiefly the holding up, and sometimes a little stretching out, of the hand. Whether you should keep your eyes shut, is to be referred to your own judgment. If you can be composed it is better to keep them open, but generally fixed, especially, do not look about upon the people, nor seem to take notice who comes in.

§ 12. 3. Remember to introduce the most applicable of the subjects you have lately heard or read, and any peculiar scriptures that have been the subject of your late meditations or discourse.—And for this purpose keep notes of them in your pocket-book that they may be often reviewed at little intervals. But whatever scheme you may form, do not adhere to it so exactly as to neglect proper thoughts and expressions that rise; or be very uneasy if you lose sight of it.

§ 13. 4. Make frequent pauses in prayer, that you may think a little before you speak; and that your hearers may recollect their thoughts, and review yours. Observe this rule, then expletives will be less necessary.

§ 14. 5. Endeavour to have an unity of design running through your scheme of prayer,—and let one petition be connected with another by natural, but never laboured, transition.—It is better there should be no connexion at all, than any that seems forced and affected.

§ 15. 6. Insist chiefly on those parts of prayer that suit best with your own frame and state,—not entirely, however, to the neglect of others;—and endeavour to keep up a constant sense of your own concern in what you ask.

§ 16. 7. Forget not the public,—but pray for them with seriousness.—Plead for heathens, Jews, Mahometants, papists, and persecuted protestants.—Pray for your own country with cordial love and esteem.—Remember that praying for the king is part of the condition on which our toleration is granted.—Forget not magistrates,—and ministers.—Recollect of what great importance their character and conduct is,—and observe scripture expressions that may be properly applied to any of these uses.

§ 17. 8. Remember the particular cases of your hearers, and the immediate concerns of the congregation.—Here pray for the aged and the young, and particularly for the children of the flock.—Pray for the heads of families, and thus remind them of their duty; the conscientious discharge of which is of such vast importance to religion. Pray for unconverted sinners, as seeing them upon the brink of hell.—Plead earnestly for them; this is often the means of awakening them; and in this respect, while we are yet speaking, God appears to hear. Remember the afflicted and tempted tenderly, and let particular cases have a moderate share in your addresses; this engages the affections of the people greatly, and is often the means of administering support.

§ 18. 9. Let the blessed work of praise have a large share in your prayers. This made up much of the ancient liturgies, and is so suited to the Lord's day, that it is a pity it is not more regarded.—Labour to affect your hearts with a sense of God's mercies to you at all times, and then you will always be in a frame for this.

§ 19. 10. Use many scripture expressions in prayer. They are peculiarly affecting, and very proper; and the hearers also from the beginning of them will know what they are to expect; and thus one great objection against extempore prayer will be removed.

§ 20. 11. Take care you are not too long in prayer before sermon. For this purpose it is best to throw what relates to the public into the last prayer,—especially when preaching in or about London; twenty minutes is generally enough,—nor is fifteen too little.—Let the last prayer be agreeable to the sermon; introduce the principal thoughts and heads, but do not turn it into a preaching prayer, nor repeat any peculiarly fine passages of the sermon, lest you should seem too fond of them. Rather introduce some additional thoughts, which you had not time to introduce in your sermon. And if you pray at any time after any of your brethren have been preaching, suit your prayer as much as possible to what you have heard,—and, on the whole, make it a kind of specimen to the people of the manner in which sermons ought to be prayed over by them.

LECTURE XIV.

On Public Exposition and the Character of Commentators.

§ 1. It is proper to make exposition a part of worship on the Lord's day, for the following reasons:—

It tends to keep a due regard for the Scriptures by introducing them into worship; as, when you expound, you may read the whole or part of a chapter, even in congregations that have not been used to it, and where otherwise it might not be agreeable.

§ 2. It assists to draw men off from erroneous human schemes, by leading them to a scriptural religion; to which nothing is more conducive than explaining the most interesting facts of the several books of Scripture.

§ 3. It contributes much to lead them into a general acquaintance with the Scripture, and a cheerful and attentive study of it.

§ 4. It is calculated to guard an audience from being seduced into erroneous opinions by wrong interpretations of Scripture, quoted merely according to the sound of words.

§ 5. It diversifies public service, and affords opportunities of giving a great many advices, charges, admonitions, &c. without offence; it being evident to every hearer that the series of scriptures we are upon lead us to them; whereas if we choose such subjects unconnected with others, some may think there has been a personal regard to them.

§ 6. I shall now propose a few general directions for the right performance of this part of ministerial duty. But as a previous and very important direction, I recommend that you make yourself acquainted with the most considerable commentators, reading them over and making extracts from them;—and since there is no set of writers in which a man is more in danger of being lost, if he does not make a careful choice, I shall here mention some of those which I think the most valuable.

§ 7. Commentators on the Old Testament:

Patrick is the most considerable [illegible] to Solomon's Song;—he has made use of many former writers, some Jewish and others Christian.

§ 8. Poole's Paraphrase upon the Old Testament, in four volumes, octavo, is an elegant and judicious contraction of the above, and vastly to be preferred to his Paraphrase on the Epistles.

§ 9. Lowth* has compiled a judicious commentary on the Prophets, from Isaiah to Malachi; in which there are some good critical notes, and a fine collection of parallels.

§ 10. Ainsworth on the Pentateuch, Psalms, and Solomon's Song, is a good book,—full of very valuable Jewish learning,—and his translation is in many places to be preferred to our own,—especially on the Psalms.

§ 11. On the whole New Testament. Whitby is preferable to any other, on account of his learning and judicious notes on those texts which are not concerned in controversy with the Arminians;—for to them he is evidently partial, and sometimes carries matters almost to ridiculous extremes.

§ 12. Hammond is in great but [illegible] tion;†—there are indeed many good criticisms, but many that are much mistaken.—He [illegible] the Greek fathers every where, which is his principal fault.—Many of Le Clerc's Annotations upon these places are very good,—and his edition of his book in Latin I think much preferable to the original.

§ 13. Beza is undoubtedly the best critic on the Greek language of any commentator we have.—There is no translation, that I know of, equal to his;—and his remarks on Ephesians and the other Letters are wrought up in the genius and manner of the ancients.—On the whole, it is an invaluable treasure, and deserves to be read with the utmost attention.

§ 14. Erasmus is not equally accurate with Beza,—but his Latin is fine, and he has written in a pleasant style.—He is in high reputation in the learned world.—There are many good remarks on the vulgar translation,—some early various readings,—and some pretty large critical dissertations.

* [illegible]

† [illegible]

—but it is by no means of a piece, and has many marks of haste and inaccuracy.

§ 15. Castalio is only a version; it is often very elegant Latin; in several places full of affectation, and often false.—On the whole, justly exposed by Beza.

§ 16. Burkitt has but few valuable criticisms;—but he has many schemes of old sermons. His sentiments vary in different parts of his work, as the authors from whence he took his materials were orthodox or not.

§ 17. Heinsius has some good critical illustrations,—but many whimsical remarks and fancied allusions;—an air of pedantry and self-sufficiency runs through all his writings, which make them disagreeable.

§ 18. The most considerable writers upon the Harmony of the Evangelists, whose works are not extremely voluminous, are Cradock, whom I shall mention afterwards,—and Le Clerc, whose harmony is valuable on account of the view which he at once gives of what each evangelist says.

§ 19. Whiston and Wells are both much mistaken in ranging many of their facts;—and, upon the whole, I prefer Garthwaite as the most valuable I have ever seen for stating the order of the story.—This was published by Locke, with his name prefixed.

§ 20. Dr. Clarke's Paraphrase on the Evangelists deserves an attentive reading.—He narrates a story in handsome language, and connects the parts well together;—but fails much in emphasis, and seems to mistake the order of the histories.

§ 21. On the Epistles.—Locke, Pearce, and Benson make up a complete commentary on the Epistles; and are indeed all in the number of the most ingenious commentators I have ever read.—They plainly thought very closely, and attended much to connexion, which they have often set in a most clear view.—But they all err in too great a fondness for new interpretations;—and in supposing the design of the apostles less general than it seems to have been. It must be allowed that Benson illustrates the spirit of Paul sometimes in an admirable manner, even beyond any former writer.—See especially his Epistle to Philemon.—His vast fondness for Lord Barrington's* notions has often proved a snare to him, both here and in his work on the Acts, which however is a very useful piece.

§ 22. Fell on the Epistles is very short,—but most of his notes are worthy of remark. The collection of parallel scriptures is judicious, and the translation in some places altered much for the better.

§ 23. Upon the whole Scripture the most valuable are Grotius, who has done more to illustrate Scriptures by what is generally called profane learning, than perhaps almost all the other commentators put together.—Nevertheless, he too often gives up prophecies which in their original sense relate to the Messiah.—His notes on some texts are large and learned dissertations, which might have profitably been published by themselves.

§ 24. Brennius.—His notes are exceeding short, but very important. And there was reason to say of him, Ubi bene, nemo melius, &c.

§ 25. Wells's book is more despised than it ought to be.—The character of the author was deservedly low, and his style sometimes is intolerably bad;—but his method of division is very clear.—He has plundered a great many excellent writers,—brought together their spoils in a little room,—added here and there some very good notes of his own,—and he has well corrected the common version.

§ 26. Cradock's three volumes are very valuable;—though I think, contrary to most others, that the two last on the New Testament are much better than the first on the Old.—His extracts in the margin from Hammond, Lightfoot, and Grotius are very judicious:—and I think on the whole I never read any one author that assisted me more in what relates to the New Testament.—His schemes of the Epistles are generally more just than those of the ingenious writers mentioned above; because he takes the design of the apostles to be, as it certainly was, more general than they suppose.—The cheapness of the book is to me a great wonder, but to students a great advantage.

§ 27. Robertson is in rather too pedantic a form.—but, upon the whole, the analysis is very good;—and perhaps those who have studied their Bibles closest, and know where difficulties of the connexion lie, will approve it most; especially on the Old Testament, which far exceeds the New.

§ 28. Henry is perhaps the only commentator so large that deserves to be entirely and attentively read through.—The remarkable passages, I think, should be marked.—There is much to be learned in this work in a speculative, and still more in a practical, way.—The last volume is not on the whole equal to the rest; though the exposition on the Romans, begun by Henry and finished by Dr. Evans, is the best I ever saw.

§ 29. Hall, besides his contemplations, which are excellent, has written notes on select passages of the Old and New Testament,—which are extremely scarce, and so far as I can judge from a little specimen, very valuable;—especially for showing the spirit and force of many expressions that occur.—I do not, however, apprehend that there is much learned criticism in them.

§ 30. Poole's Synopsis is very useful, especially on account of the short view it gives of various translations, some of which are very scarce.—It in part supersedes the necessity of having, what yet is desirable, a Polyglot Bible.—The first volume of his English Annotations, which were written by himself after his Synopsis, is incomparably good.

* See Lowth's Exposition of Acts xxvi. 17 note. See also Lect. xv. § 12.

§ 31. CALVIN has a multitude of judicious thoughts; but they are generally intermingled with a great many that are little to the purpose.—His worst volume, which is that on Job, is most scarce.—His two best are, I think, that on the Pentateuch, and on the Harmony of the Evangelists.—On the former of these Le Clerc is famous, but I have not yet had an opportunity of perusing him.

§ 32. LEE on the New Testament, is a collection of notes chiefly from others, which the author gathered in the course of his reading: they are not very judiciously chosen, but there are some particulars in them which are to be met with no where else;—or at least in authors we shall never consult;—and therefore are worthy the little money they cost.

LECTURE XV.

General Directions on Exposition continued.

§ 1. MAKE yourselves acquainted with the most considerable authors that illustrate Scripture well, though they are not direct commentators. Such as,

§ 2. WITSIUS, of whom I may justly say, no man is more distinct in his method, elegant in his language, and candid in his sentiments.—His Miscellanea, and Misc. Sacra and Exercitat. are in this view, and indeed in every view, the most valuable works I know;—especially the last and last.

§ 3. SAURIN, in whom there is an amazing mixture of learning and politeness, takes in the most useful hints of criticism in his dissertations on the several subjects he treats of.—An index is added to this work of the particular passages in authors of rank which he has consulted.—In this, as well as in all the elegance of expression and beauty of imagination which he has found the happy art of mingling with criticisms, he incomparably exceeds most others.

§ 4. GATAKER'S barbarous Latin renders the reading of him very tedious; but he was a nice critic, and his notes, which afford the most useful matter for popular exposition, are deservedly in high esteem.

§ 5. FRANKIUS'S Marmaduceus deserves to be often read. It contains the best rules for studying the Scriptures that I ever remember to have seen;—it has not however many illustrations of particular places.

§ 6. BUDDEUS'S Sacred Classics give many well chosen instances of passages in the Classics which may justly many of them in Scripture that have been accounted obscure.—They illustrate the beauty and energy of many words and contain good observations on the divisions of chapters and verses, by which the sense of Scripture is often obscured.

§ 7. LIGHTFOOT has collected a multitude of useful and excellent illustrations of scriptures from the Talmud and other Jewish writers.—He has also shown the force of many others, especially in his harmony.—But he rather illustrates particular texts well, than gives a good account of the scope of a discourse.—And he seems to me very often mistaken in his dates, and in what he says on the occasion, particularly in many of the Psalms.

§ 8. CRUDEN has all that is valuable in him in his Dictionary and Dissertations.—The former is extravagantly dear, the latter is a pretty abridgment from the former, and is of a moderate price.—They should be bought by all means.

§ 9. MEDE has a good many original thoughts not to be found any where else.—His writings on the Revelations are peculiarly famous,—but his Daniel, will best reward a diligent perusal;—yet here many mistakes will be found.

§ 10. HALLET has many uncommon thoughts, but several of them he confesses he owes to MR. PEIRCE.—His notions and interpretations of Scripture are so exceedingly singular, that it is worth while to read them, though perhaps not one in ten will appear satisfactory.—It is observable, that some of those dissertations which he illustrates well are those in which many other commentators have failed;—and his remarks on the scheme of the present Hebrew copy are generally solid.

§ 11. EDWARDS (DR. JOHN) does not possess that excellent SPIRIT OF GRACE, with which he has in some respects fallen as a judicious writer.—His Discourses on the Scriptures in their Order, and those also entitled Examen of Dissertations and Expositions, are reckoned the best of his works, and deserve to be carefully read.

§ 12. LORD BARRINGTON'S Essay on the various dispensations of God to mankind has many original thoughts that are justly entitled to great esteem.—His Miscell. Sacra are indeed most valuable.—Some of his remarks on Texts and Discourses of Christ, especially in the first volume, which is incomparably the best.—It is proper to read his performance in all the mutual connexion he ever gave it, in order to judge what regard is to be paid to his conjectures and what Benson makes of it, in his commentary and discourse on the Acts.

§ 13. LARDNER. The first volume of his Gospel

History is one of the most valuable pieces the age has produced; and a multitude of places both in the Gospels and in the Acts are illustrated by it.

§ 11. It will be worth while to read over most of these books, and to note all the most remarkable passages; to make extracts of them in the margin of your Bible, or interleaved Testament.—And let it be a rule, when a good note occurs, to set it down immediately.

LECTURE XVI.

Further Advices relating to Exposition.

§ 1. NOTHING will be of more importance to fit you for this work, than copying into your interleaved Bible and Testament useful remarks, interpretations and criticisms that you meet with in the course of your reading, conversations or own reflections. —CLARK'S Bible with notes, and WETSTEIN'S New Testament, are preferable to all others for this purpose.

§ 2. Let free family exposition be part of your daily work. In this, labour at practical improvement chiefly, not neglecting, however, proper hints of criticism. This will give you an opportunity of saying many suitable things, that will come with more power to the mind, than things much more accurate read from HENRY and others;—it will also diversify family worship agreeably;—and, if you sing, take care to choose something suitable to what you have read.

§ 3. Have a private meeting once a week for exposition;—at these meetings, enlarge chiefly on the most devotional parts of Scriptures, in an experimental way. Indulge your private meditations on these occasions freely,—and perhaps very useful hints may arise while you are speaking.—When you have finished an exposition in the family or vestry, if convenient you may, at least sometimes, retire for a few minutes, review your memorandums, and add any thing remarkable that has occurred to your thoughts.

§ 4. When you intend to expound any scripture the next sabbath, review it the preceding Monday morning, and endeavour to keep it often in your mind in the week, and at a proper time peruse it attentively with these views; viz.

§ 5. 1. To observe the original force of every word, and to make as perfect a translation as you can, for which the original and versions must be consulted.

§ 6. 2. To observe the particular improvement of which it is capable.—And here let your inferences be often drawn from the connexion of Scripture. This will furnish rich materials, commonly omitted by those who attend merely to the words themselves.—Let these suffice for general directions.

§ 7. I shall now give some more particular directions:

1. Select the most useful passages of Scripture. —Begin with the Epistles, as they will give you an opportunity of saying many evangelical and useful things.—Go over the harmony of the Evangelists and the Acts.—Omit the Revelation, except some few chapters and sections.—Select passages from the history of the Old Testament. Mosaic laws and the prophets;—but take the whole book of Psalms, Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes.

§ 8. 2. Give a clear view of the connexion in a few words, but do not attempt to lead your hearers into all the niceties of it, which very few with the greatest pains will be able clearly to understand, and still fewer to remember.

§ 9. 3. When great difficulties occur, do not state them too largely, but rather suggest what may furnish judicious hearers with the best answers to them; and often inculcate those principles which will furnish general replies; as, God's judgments are unsearchable;—some parts and doctrines of Scripture are inexplicable and mysterious;—many quotations from the Old Testament are only allusions;—and that the actions of persons under an immediate divine commission, are not to be estimated by the common rules of human actions, &c.

§ 10. 4. When the sense of a text is dubious, do not distract the people with many interpretations, but rather propose one or two of the most probable, waving the rest.

§ 11. 5. Aim in all at practical improvement. —Labour to show the spirit of the writer, and for that purpose keep in your own mind, and that of your people, the character of the author, and the particular circumstances in which he wrote.

§ 12. 6. When you correct our version, do it modestly; and never attempt any unnecessary corrections, nor many various readings, if they do not appear indeed important.

§ 13. 7. Endeavour to make your exposition pleasant; to do this avoid dry criticism, and mention such circumstances of history as tend to illustrate it. HENRY and HALL will furnish you with a rich variety of matter; and the comparison of other scriptures will suggest much more.

§ 14. 8. Do not read your expositions, but freely talk them over, after having well studied them.

§ 15. 9. Conclude them with a prayer, in which the most considerable scriptures and thoughts of your exposition should be introduced in a devotional way.

LECTURE XVII

On Catechising.

§ 1. This is a very important branch of a minister's office; and, if properly managed, will be the means of stocking children's minds with divine knowledge, of teaching them to improve their time, and by exercising their memories, of considerably strengthening that faculty. It also conciliates their affections, and cannot fail to increase the esteem of the parents, and it serves to keep our minds impressed with a due concern for the rising generation.

§ 2. I shall here offer some hints on the choice of catechisms. In general, I advise that they be varied according to the age and improvement of the children. The Assembly's Catechism is very excellent, but improper for very young children. Dr. Watts is far preferable for the first, and ought to be taught children under six or seven years of age. After this is learned through, his second should be committed to memory; and then the Assembly's, first without, then with, Mr. Some's Exposition. Recommend Watts's Precautions against Sin and Folly to be read by them, rather than got by heart; and some easy familiar book of Scripture history, illustrated by cuts, which may be taught children before they are capable of reading; and which afterwards, for the first seven or eight years of their lives, ought to be made as much as possible their diversion.—To all this should be added a confirming catechism for those who are grown up to sixteen or twenty years of age. A brief view ought in this catechism to be given of natural and revealed religion and a foundation insensibly laid for answering objections. Proofs both of the protestant religion, and the propriety of our dissent, should also be introduced; but this ought to be managed with great tenderness towards the establishment. The nature of schism should likewise be explained.

§ 3. The manner of managing this work comes next to be considered. It must be varied according to the different ages and circumstances of the persons with whom you have to do.

§ 4. For general directions take the following.

Let most of the children be catechised in private in the vestry, on some week day.

§ 5. Take a list of their names, and call it over, that you may know who are absent.

§ 6. Have a little class of the oldest of them, to whom you may expound some catechism at large.—Begin with the Assembly's by Mr. Some, then explain Dr. Watts's second catechism, which is the most excellent of the sort in our language. Let this class also learn select portions of Scripture.

§ 7. In conducting this business observe the following rules:—

1. Instruct them in as plain a manner as possible, waving all niceties of thought or expression, and studying to make yourselves well understood.

§ 8. To keep up their attention, and for their understandings, ask them some easy questions of your own.

§ 9. Take care to lay the greatest stress upon what is most practical and affecting.

§ 10. 1. When they answer wrong, or appear ignorant, do not upbraid or ridicule them; but O the talent has been gone gently to inform them, at the same time endeavouring to keep up their spirits.

§ 11. 2. If they do well, encourage them; but have little rewards for them. Let Watts's second catechism be a reward for learning the first, and Mr. Some's for learning the second. Besides these, present to them who do extraordinarily well Watts's Hymns for Children, Watts on Reformation, and on the Heathenishness of Sin, Janeway's Sermons to Young People, or other proper tracts that you may meet with.

§ 12. 3. Close these exercises with a serious and lively prayer. Commit the instructions you have given them. Here a powerful prayer may sometimes be very proper. Pray affectionately for the children. Let your soul not rest here. Be and appear to be very serious.

§ 13. 4. Endeavour to have some grave friend, if possible, with you to see that they behave well, and if any little rude thing be done, rebuke them, or make them stay longer and talk with them when the others are gone. Take care of the corruptions of your department throughout the whole, and may success crown your labours.

LECTURE XVIII

Further Directions about Catechising.

§ 1. Let it be remembered, when you are about to expound the Assembly's Catechism, that your business is to explain it to the children.

§ 2. Select a set of children that will answer the questions tolerably well, examine them now and then constantly afresh, and take great care to reward their diligence well, that they shall have no luck given them as a bonus at the end of every month of catechising.

§ 3. Take care to have in common some good remarks, that you may have something to say worth hearing. Get an interleaved catechism, and when any good thought or expression occurs to your mind in private, make a memorandum of it there.

§ 4. Have something here for the benefit of those who are advanced in years, and make some application to them. These exercises will instruct the ignorant, and teach parents how to catechise their children.—Never forget to desire parents to enlarge upon some particular points of importance, when they go home.

§ 5. Be very careful that you do not confound the children.—Seldom reprove them publicly if they do not answer right, but remember to talk with them in private. Let them know it is an honour you have done them, to choose them out of their companions, and exhort them to be careful to preserve it.

§ 6. Engage the assistance of others,—especially the assistance of friends in buying books. There will be some considerable expense, as I advise that books be given to all,—the children of the rich as well as the poor,—lest the distinction should appear invidious.

§ 7. For this purpose endeavour to be acquainted with gentlemen who are trustees for the useful charities of giving books; or who themselves contribute towards them.—Get some exhibition from the church-stock, or prevail on some of your friends to contribute towards buying books.—Grudge not something handsome yourselves if you can afford it, to promote so good a cause;—it may in many respects prove advantageous.

§ 8. Urge parents to assist in carrying on this work.—Often mention this in the pulpit as part of their charge. Advise them to make this their business, especially on the Lord's-day evening.—Recommend it also to parents in private, and see that they are furnished with proper books, and when you visit families where there are children, catechise them before their parents.—This will fill up the time well; will teach such parents how they are to conduct the exercise, and will engage the affections of both parents and children.

LECTURE XIX.

On Administering the Sacrament of Baptism.

§ 1. Do not baptize the children of the openly profane, as it may harden them in their wickedness,—but refuse the children of none who make any thing of a hopeful profession of religion, whether they be church members or not, attend the meeting or go elsewhere.—Never, however, go into the congregations of your brethren to baptize the children of their people, unless, which is sometimes the case, they scruple infant baptism themselves.

§ 2. Insist not upon their bringing their children to meeting to be baptized.—If you have a mixture of baptists it may perhaps give offence, and private baptism will give you greater freedom in your address to the parents:—and for this reason do not baptize many children together, nor grudge an hour or two to any family on such an occasion.

§ 3. Engage the presence of two or three friends of some reputation in the society when you can;—both to prevent reflections, if the characters be dubious, and to preserve more solemnity in the administration.

§ 4. Before you baptize the child, visit the parents, if you have any opportunity, and talk seriously to them, that you may, if possible, bring them to a sense of the solemnity of the ordinance, and promote a proper preparation for it.

§ 5. Let the method of administration be generally this:—Begin with a short prayer, then deliver a brief discourse on some text of Scripture.—Keep a little catalogue of proper texts for such occasions: that you may have a proper variety, when you dispense the ordinance at different times, before the same persons; such as "I will be a God to thee and thy seed."—"I will make with thee an everlasting covenant."—"One generation shall rise and declare his works to another."—"Who am I, and what is my house, &c."—"Baptize all nations in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."—"Suffer little children to come, &c."—"The promise is unto you and to your children."—"Baptism is not putting away the filth of the flesh."—Touch gently sometimes at the reason of infant baptism; but generally employ your time in addressing the consciences of the parents, and endeavour to raise such affections as are suitable to the occasion.—Then pray, confessing the original corruption of our nature, and the demerit of sin;—acknowledge also the goodness of God in sparing root and branch, and do it affectionately. Pray also that the parents may be suitably assisted in the discharge of their duty; and let all tend to fix proper impressions on their minds.——Receive the child from the hand of one of the parents, as soon as the prayer is ended, then ask them both, Whether it is their sincere desire to give themselves and their child up to God, and their purpose to educate it in the Christian faith and fear of God?—and on their intimating their intention, solemnly pronounce the words of baptism, taking care to pour some water on the child, and to pronounce the name of each person of the sacred Trinity, in a very distinct and audible manner.—Take care also that the name of the child be so mentioned that it may evidently appear the end of the ordinance is not giving a name, but only that you might speak by that name to the child.—Then return the child to the parents, giving them a short charge to "Train it up in the way it should go." Then give them some particular directions and cautions for this purpose. Especially plead with those parents who have had a religious education, or for whom God hath done any thing remarkable in his providence.

Remind them of the obligations they are under to pray for the child, and to resign it to the divine will, that if it be taken from this life, the transactions of the baptismal day may be recollected as an engagement to Christian submission.—Conclude your discourse with an address to the spectators.—If there are any children belonging to the family old enough to be quietly present, desire that they may be, if possible,—and drop a word to them touching the meaning of the service. Then renew your thanksgiving and prayer; especially for the family, and the several branches of it, as well as for the families of the friends present, and the interest of Christ in the rising generation.—Conclude all with a benediction.

§ 6. In the entertainment which generally follows, "Let your moderation appear to all;" and endeavour to conduct the conversation so that good impressions may be promoted, rather than, as they too frequently are, weakened and erased. Remember you have many eyes upon you, and much of your reputation will depend on your conduct at such seasons. Allow yourselves intervals of moderate cheerfulness, but rather err on the grave extreme; and always retire as early as you conveniently and decently can.

§ 7. Keep a register of all the children you baptize, and the time when you administered the ordinance, which will be a means of preserving the state of families in your minds, and will lead you into proper inquiries about the state of the youth of your charge;—it may also serve to settle some disputes arising with regard to the age of children.

§ 8. Lastly, When you baptize persons of riper years, talk seriously with them, chiefly on the nature of the ordinance;—and if they insist upon being baptized by immersion, do not absolutely refuse them, but rather intimate your desire that it may be done by another person.—Admit none to this kind of baptism, but those whom you and the church are satisfied in admitting to church communion.

LECTURE XX.

On Administering the Lord's Supper.

§ 1. Labour to prepare your own hearts for the ordinance with all possible care.—Begin with some suitable reflections for the purpose early in the week.—Pray earnestly for divine assistance, and let the day before be commonly observed as a day of solemn fasting and prayer.

§ 2. Choose some evangelical and practical, some comfortable, subject for experimental days and bestow some extraordinary trouble on the sermon, especially the devotional parts of it.—Sometimes, however, a faithful address to those who are under a religious profession to walk worthy of it, is extremely proper.

§ 3. In the interval between the close of the general service and the administration of the ordinance, be very earnest with God for his presence, and labour to come to the table as devout as possible.—Much depends on the temper with which things are begun.

§ 4. Introduce the administration with some extempore meditations on some select texts of Scripture;—generally such a text as hath some connexion with the subject, or at least the ordinance.—In these addresses, avoid critical niceties by all means, and pursue a strain the most pathetic.

§ 5. In the prayer before receiving the elements, as well as in all the rest, be moderately short;—dealing much in confession of sin;—this may generally be connected with your extempore discourse before.—Take due care to introduce a variety of thoughts in prayer and speaking.—In the prayer before the cup renew your covenant engagements.—Drop some pious hints afterwards, before you receive the cup, as well as while you are breaking the bread and pouring out the wine.—Here it may be proper to take occasion to explain, enforce, &c.—After singing a suitable verse with thanksgiving, and be particular in praying for the church of Christ in general, and especially that to which you are more immediately related.

§ 6. While the elements are being distributed generally continue to sing, in order to give room for the exercise of secret devotion.—Make a pause before receiving the elements, and exhort others to do so.—Address a word now and then directly to spectators, commend them also in prayer, and endeavour to offer the means of cherishing good impressions.

§ 7. Look round the table and congratulate other you have discarded whom you may conscientiously own as your fellow-christians, and join with them in such a manner as the circumstances of the persons as your own mind may require.—Throughout the whole of dinance cultivate a social temper, and give the soul room to expand and soften itself into the most friendly sentiments,—not only towards those present, but the whole church of Christ. And do not forget those under persecution for religion, the afflicted, the dying, the poor, vacant congregations, &c.

§ 8. After the ordinance is over retire, if possible, immediately; recollect as much as you can of your meditations, and sometimes write them down with all the improvements that may be suggested to your minds.

§ 9. Let the whole of your discourse on a sacramental day be particularly spiritual and heavenly,—and as far as the infirmities of nature will allow, let every moment of it be devoted to God with the utmost zeal and care.

§ 10. Lastly, in your retirement, after you have been at the Lord's table, consider what you can do more for God.—Perhaps then you may find some schemes of usefulness dart into your minds, as well as things of importance with regard to your own souls, and the congregation, that had not before been thought of.—And take great care to act according to the resolutions you have formed, and without the least delay.

LECTURE XXI.

On Visiting in general.

§ 1. Look upon this as a considerable part of your pastoral work.—It obliges your people, it gives you an opportunity of serving them not only by your private discourse, but, by letting you into their circumstances, you may be the more capable of making a proper application to them in public.

§ 2. Endeavour to get proper information as to the state of your congregation and church.—For this purpose, when you come to a place, take a catalogue of the names of the persons that subscribe, statedly attend,—church members,—and the poor.—Make it a rule to see each of them at their own houses.—Let two or three of the most judicious be chosen, with a view of getting information with regard to the characters of the rest.—Entreat them, moreover, to inspect the behaviour of their brethren and friends,—and to inform you of such things as, upon the whole, they think you ought to know.—This, however, will not be necessary, if you have any persons solemnly set apart by the congregation for this purpose, which to me appears a rational and scriptural thing.—Have proper times of meeting with the persons appointed to this work,—to talk over church affairs,—and always conclude your conference with prayer.—Every Monday before the sacrament will be a very proper time for this business.—Consult with them before you propose any to communion.—Do not despise flying stories;—either they have a foundation, or they have not,—if they have, they ought to be regarded,—if not, care should be taken to remove the reproach, and fix it on those who raised it.—At the same time, however, do not be too ready to believe them. A general caution may be grounded on a flying story.

§ 3. Make a pastoral visit to each family,—at least once a year.—In this visit talk to the master and mistress of the family. Renew a solemn charge to them to take a religious care of their family.—Then inquire into the state and character of their children and servants.—Set down the names of both, the first pastoral visit you make,—and alter the list as occasion may require.—If you have an opportunity, talk with the several members of the family.—At a proper time charge upon them a due regard to their eternal concerns, especially the tender branches of the family.—Proper addresses weekly or monthly to the members of your own family will fit you for the regular discharge of your duty on this head.

§ 4. After you return make some memorandums how you find things.—keep a catalogue of cases, disposed under different particulars. This book must be kept secret.—Let no one in the world see it.—Make it unintelligible to every one but yourselves.—Let there be one catalogue of those who appear unconverted,—another of those under serious impressions,—another of those who seem of hopeful disposition,—another of those who are proper to bring into communion, when occasion offers;—and another of those who have generally acted very well, but in some instances need to be admonished and censured.—On your day of fasting and prayer, which may be about once a quarter, look over this book, and see what is necessary to be done for the service of religion among your people.

§ 5. In your occasional visits call frequently upon persons of great importance in your congregation,—especially if you live near them;—but endeavour to proportion your visits not merely to the external circumstances of the family,—but to the opportunities of usefulness.—Visit frequently those under any extraordinary affliction,—and those in whose circumstances there has been lately any peculiar change.

§ 6. In all your visits take a great deal of notice of children. Give them texts to learn,—and little rewards for learning them. This will often furnish matter for good discourse, and will engage the affections of children, which may be of importance to your future life, and their eternal welfare.—Some children will listen to a minister, who will not regard a parent.

§ 7. In all your visits, remember to behave like a minister, grave and serious. Though sometimes pleasant, yet never too much elevated with mirth.—Take heed at entertainments, not to be very much charmed with any thing you eat or drink. Be pleased with all, but do not indulge too much a palate. Drop some serious hints,—and take care if you have a convenient opportunity, to conclude with prayer.

§ 8. Be very careful that you retire in time,—and do not outstay the spirit of conversation.—nor spend so much of your time in visiting as to lead people to suppose, that your time hangs heavy upon your hands.—A loitering, idling, tattling minister is a contemptible character.—Rather appear properly full of business, and let it not be mere affectation.—Every hour will be well filled up if you attend strictly to the various duties of your office.

§ 9. When several of your congregation meet at a private house, be amongst them if convenient,—partly with a view to regulate their hours,—and to oblige them with your company.—You may also have an opportunity of making conversation useful. By all means spend some time in prayer before you separate.

§ 10. Engage your people sometimes to visit you; and always, on those occasions, entertain them with a prudent hospitality,—but never affect grand entertainments.—Set apart one day in the week to attend to those who wish to come to you upon spiritual accounts.—Talk seriously and tenderly to such, and pray with them at large.—Recommend their peculiar cases to the divine regard in the most affectionate manner;—this will have a tendency to make you experimental preachers.

LECTURE XXII

On Visiting the Sick

§ 1. Under this head I would first make a few preliminary remarks.—You will remember that this part of a minister's work is very important. With regard to some it is the only good office you will ever be able to perform for them.—Perhaps if you neglect it, they may go into the presence of God with a testimony against you.—Sometimes you will have to visit persons, who have been entirely regardless of religion,—to whom you may prove of singular advantage.—Another reason may be, that they may end life in a manner more comfortable,—and more honourable to religion, on account of it,—or if they live, they may make a better improvement of their future moments.—Do all you can to [illegible] with them in health, which may at the time existing call to their remembrance, and not be entirely without a good effect on their sick bed.

But let not this relax your vigilance of visiting them at those times, more than when they are healthy; you ought to attend to them at all times, that when sorrow enters the heart drop, God's good and saving truth.

§ 2. Remember that visiting the sick is a very difficult part of your work.—It is not sufficient merely to put up a hearty prayer to God,—but we ought to be concerned to make a solemn preparation for the work.—Ministers [illegible] ministers should take such care to prepare their sermons, and never take care what they should say to sick people.

§ 3. You should not wait to be sent for,—but when you hear that any of your congregation are ill, take the first opportunity of visiting them;—for diseases often take a quick turn.—Generally take the beginning of the afternoon for this purpose.—It will be proper to allot a certain portion of the day to this work, if you are in a large congregation.—This will be like laying aside a bag for charitable uses.—Keep a catalogue of the sick.

§ 4. Let your visits be frequent,—and not too long;—and be very solicitous that they may turn to the best account.

§ 5. Before you go, consider seriously [illegible] you ought to be,—what is to be said [illegible] and pray that God would go with you.—Remember how very difficult it is to do good.—And be sure to preserve a good conscience on these occasions.

§ 6. More particular directions respecting the manner in which visits to sick people are to be conducted.

§ 7. First, I shall give you some hints relating to the precautions to be taken, in order to know the case of the sick.

§ 8. For this purpose some use may be made of [illegible] Conversation [illegible] and [illegible] of others their public character,—especially from those who are best acquainted with them,—and more of those religious persons,—whose [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

state of his soul.—Inquire what his hopes are, and especially on what foundation they are built.—When you have asked him a few questions on these heads, leave him room to talk;—perhaps he may freely and fully tell you his state.

§ 10. If he does not, ask him such questions as these.—Has sin ever been your grief and burden?—What have you done to get rid of it?—In what view has Christ appeared to you?—What are your thoughts of the covenant of grace?—Have you kept up secret prayer?—Have you felt the power of Scripture upon your heart?—have you been concerned to give your thoughts and affections to God, as well as your external actions?—Have you felt a struggle with the temptations of Satan,—and the corruptions of your own heart?—Have you inquired after the remedies of the particular distempers of your own mind?—And so far as you have understood them, have you endeavoured to use them? &c.

§ 11. Secondly, I would now offer a few remarks on the advices to be given them, and discourse to be held with them.

§ 12. If their sickness be threatening, some advice as to their temporal affairs may be needful;—but your main business relates to their spiritual concerns.—As to temporal affairs, advise them, as briefly as possible, to make a disposition of them by will.—Sometimes this is of great importance,—at others, however, it is not. If there be any suspicion of ill-gotten wealth or property, urge them to an immediate restitution, as absolutely necessary;—and should they refuse, warn them of their danger and pray for them;—but in other respects show them but little attention.—Be very cautious that you do not give the smallest intimation that you wish to turn the will into such a channel as may be most for your own interest.—When you know that legacies are designed, have as little as possible to do with the will.

§ 13. As to spiritual concerns, your advice must be regulated by the state and character of each individual;—there is the bad, the dubious, and the comfortable.

§ 14. 1. You will find some whose conduct is bad,—and that are really in a state of condemnation and misery.—Here your duty is plain, though the execution of it will be difficult.

§ 15. 1. Labour to convince such, that their case is very dangerous.—In doing this, you are to rest your arguments chiefly on Scripture, with their own representation of their case.—If you find that there is any one sin prevalent in their character, rest your charge upon that.—If drunkards, liars, &c. bring such texts as prove they will be shut out of heaven.—Represent the aggravation of their sins, particularly the religious advantages they have enjoyed.

§ 16. 2. Rather lament over them upbraid such persons.—Severity will produce hatred;—and probably they will not wish to have any thing further to do with you.

§ 17. 3. Be careful you do not drive them into despair,—especially when you see that they begin to be awakened to a sense of their danger.—While they appear unconcerned, urge the most dreadful things,—represent to them the wrath of God, as inexpressibly dreadful,—borrow images from present and familiar things,—such as the burning of a fever,—the tossings of a restless night, &c.—By these, endeavour to impress upon them some idea of the excruciating and everlasting pains of hell.—But, as I have said before, do not drive them to despair; but as soon as you conceive they need consolation, exhibit to them the riches of the mercy of God in Christ.—Repeat the most consolatory passages of Scripture that you can recollect,—and let them clearly see that you have pointed out their danger, only to prevent their ruin, and lead them to the Saviour.

§ 18. If you conceive that you discern something in them that looks like genuine, evangelical repentance, be not too ready to administer consolation,—except as conditional;—there is a great danger in authoritative absolution.—Tell them plainly that if they do not rest their souls on Christ, there is no room for hope.—Remind them of the treachery of their own hearts, that they may maintain a due jealousy over themselves, and see to their sincerity before it be too late.—Represent to them the peculiar aggravation of their sins,—particularly the misimprovement of a religious education, means of grace, afflictions and temporal enjoyments. After all, perhaps, little will be done, the first visit;—but repeat it,—and particularly as your hearts charge you with past neglect of such unhappy creatures.

§ 19. II. You will be called to visit others, whose characters are dubious.

§ 20. 1. Exhort such to a very diligent scrutiny into their state.—Point out the importance of their being acquainted with their case, and especially inculcate the doctrine of human depravity and the deceitfulness of the heart.

§ 21. 2. Advise them to be willing to know the worst.—Tell them they cannot make their case better by shutting their eyes,—but on the contrary, it will be worse if they entertain false hopes;—and that a strict examination of themselves can do them no harm,—nor renewed acts of repentance be of any injury, even if they are real Christians.

§ 22. 3. Assist them in this work by particular representations of the religious dispositions, desires, fears, hopes, and pursuits of good men. Go over again what was said to them, while you were sounding their consciences;—and in proportion to the dubiousness of their case, urge these things more strongly.

§ 23. 4. Give them your own pulse—pray truly and seriously.—Remember, when you pray with them particularly to offer up earnest petitions to God to lead them into the knowledge of themselves.

§ 24. III. See what should be done for them of whom you have a good hope.

§ 25. 1. Endeavour not only to support them, but to raise them to a cheerful, animated, and thankful frame.—If they are afraid of death, point out to them the great promises of the gospel.—Endeavour to raise in them admiring and adoring thoughts of divine grace.—Nothing can be more reasonable as well as scriptural, than that a Christian should go out of the world cheerful—rising like a guest satisfied with his provision, and thankful to the master of the feast.

§ 26. 2. Exhort them to bear an honourable testimony to religion with their last breath, and to recommend it to all who come to see them, as a thing of the first importance.—Death-bed addresses have often been very useful.

§ 27. 3. Urge upon them the proper exercise of patience and resignation; and that they carefully avoid peevishness and ill-nature.

§ 28. I now come to say something about the manner how to pray with the sick.

§ 29. 1. Take care that your prayers are not too long.—Never notice public affairs, unless when praying with dying Christians of eminent characters.—Rather enlarge on the general interest of Christ in the world; and pray for a more extensive revival.—Good men love always a zeal for it, but even on this head be not too long.

§ 30. 2. Let your prayers be as serious and spiritual as possible.—Labour to get yourself into a good frame.—Lift up your heart to God for the influences of his Spirit.—His teachings will make this work pleasant to yourselves, and delightful to real Christians who may join with you.

§ 31. 3. When the person seems to be in an unconverted state, represent his case awfully before God, and earnestly beg of him to have mercy on him.—Here you are to endeavour to "save him with fear, plucking him out of the fire."—Pray that God would give him a little more time, and that he may be reprieved before the sentence of death be executed upon him.—This may awaken some in an extraordinary manner.—It may also prepare them.—A contrary method will tend to harden those of the same character.—Take care how you call them the servants of God;—our brother or sister is rather more proper on these occasions;—this, however, may have a bad effect,—and it is what we object to in the funeral service.

§ 32. 4. When you pray with a dying Christian, be much in expressions of faith and assurance of praise for him.—Acknowledge the favours God has bestowed.—Praise him for his gracious [illegible] mercy to sinners,—magnifying redemption by the Spirit,—promise of future [illegible]—to speak to surviving relations—to [illegible] be enabling him to [illegible] to the end.—Thy grace be sufficient for him,—support like Stephen.—Praise God for [illegible] received to [illegible] for the [illegible] and peace with [illegible] and [illegible] nal world, and for the hope, that though he dies to us, he will live to God.

§ 33. 5. Do not forget, on these occasions, to pray for those of the family who may join with you,—and particularly that they may be prepared for the will of God, and that the affliction may be sanctified to fit them for sickness and death.

§ 34. Take the following hints by way of supplement.

1. If we neglect the directions here given, to [illegible] the illness does not seem dangerous,—[illegible] further prompts may be needed with [illegible] [illegible]—Set [illegible] upon the work, and it may turn to good account. To habituate yourselves to these rules is of great importance.

§ 35. 2. If the person received [illegible] with your earliest [illegible].—Visit him in his recovery; remind him of former convictions and [illegible]—pray the renewed God will [illegible] upon him. Pray with him, and remind him how eternity appeared to him in his affliction, and what thoughts he had of another world.

§ 36. 3. If it please God to remove the sick person, be sure to visit the surviving relations;—at least, two or three times, will a visit of [illegible] them to a due improvement of the providence;—thus endeavour to co-operate with divine Providence, and you may, perhaps, find divine grace co-operate with you;—under such circumstances they will be the more ready to attend to your advice.

LECTURE XXIII.

General Remarks for Conversation.

§ 1. Endeavour to [illegible] and prayerful to distinguish their characters.—Do not suspect all, or any [illegible] of.—Never put [illegible] and [illegible] of the [illegible] sins.—Judge in one way [illegible] of a suspected [illegible] is given, especially if it [illegible] from the life of an [illegible] friend, or a [illegible] person.—Observe every [illegible] alteration of [illegible] conversation and behaviour, particularly in [illegible] company.

§ 2. Behave with constant [illegible] to all.—Never [illegible] your [illegible] to avoid the [illegible] of your [illegible] upon public occasions.—Nay, let the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] quested. Do not appear highly satisfied, nor much displeased, with your own performances; to find fault with them appears like inviting praise, and to discover a good opinion of them will always be construed into pride. Do not therefore even make them the subject of conversation. Boast not of the labour you bestowed on your compositions, nor of the ease with which you despatched them. Do not repeat the substance of your discourses unsolicited.—Upon the whole, neither appear to hunt for reputation, nor to despise it.

§ 3. Treat every body with condescension and complaisance, but not with the same sort. Remember that the rich tradesman generally stands more upon ceremony than those who are of the highest birth and most refined education. – Frankness pleases country people, to whom formal bows are very contemptible.—Never depend upon merit without complaisance.—As you must at times refuse invitations, study to do it in the most obliging manner. Be nearly upon a level with your company, and do not attempt to outshine them too far.—Remember to send people away as well pleased with themselves as you can without flattery, which is always to be abhorred. And for this purpose endeavour to think as well of others as you reasonably can; and be not too sharp-sighted to discover faults, nor too severe in censuring them.

§ 4. Preserve a character of strict fidelity. And for this purpose be exact, but not confident, in repeating facts.—Take heed not to talk too much.—Promise little, and when you have made promises, be punctual in performance; rather do more than you have promised than less, and sooner than later.—Take heed of seeming to be every bodies' man.—Never show so much complaisance in one company as to be inconsistent with what you show in another.

§ 5. Have no quarrels, if possible, with any; but especially with persons of eminent reputation,—or of no reputation at all.—If you have received any injury, forgive it heartily, and not merely seem to do it.—If you remember it, let it be only to make you cautious; and do such persons all the kindness you can. This is the best way of taking revenge.—When you have, through negligence of heart, done any thing that may justly offend another, frankly confess it and ask pardon.—If you have asserted any thing that you find to be a mistake, confess it, and be thankful for better information.

§ 6. Affect not to pry into the circumstances of families, you have business enough of your own, and be not forward to give directions to them in their worldly affairs; but if you see they are going to ruin, reprove them seriously at proper seasons. Sometimes a plain serious address may save a family.—Labour, on such occasions, to get such a knowledge of their circumstances will enable you to give suitable counsel. Be not however too forward in giving it. When your people are distressed, do all you can to comfort and assist them.—Keep up your acquaintance with substantial persons by whose assistance you may be a help to others.

§ 7. Affect not a priestly authority.—If you fix with a church of a congregational form, give them all the satisfaction you reasonably can. Wean your people insensibly from an excessive attachment to particular forms; especially by expositions on detached portions of Scripture. When you speak to the church as such, do it always with a mixture of tenderness and respect.—Remember Christ has given his ministers no power over men's persons, possessions, or judgment.—All we have to do is to advise and admonish.—Remember what a disgrace it is to quarrel with a society under your care,—and endeavour to avoid whatever has the least tendency towards it.

§ 8. Live above all appearance of worldly-mindedness; and not only the appearance but the thing itself.—Be satisfied and thankful for what you have, but do not make a great show of plenty; especially before those of known generosity, or great covetousness.—Manage your expenses with frugality.—Keep an account of what you receive, and what you expend.—Remember that a minister loses much of his respectability and influence when he has the character of one who spends too fast, unless it evidently appears that it is owing to nothing but excess of liberality; and an excess even in that does not, on the whole, raise his character.—Be sure, however, to lead the way, as far as you prudently can, in all generous expenses.—All you have is, in one way or another, to be devoted to God;—and to him you are to trust to provide for you and yours.—Do not attempt to screw up your people to a subscription beyond their power; if they do not give you what is necessary, it is a just cause for removal.

§ 9. Talk not of leaving your people till you see your way clear; and after all be very cautious. If you are in a large congregation, where you are beloved and useful, and have the conveniences of life in any moderate degree, the increase of income, provided it be not absolutely necessary to your support, is a wretched reason for leaving a charge. Nor is the pleasantness of situation, or a desire to be nearer your relations, much to be regarded, if you have your health.—The presence of God, and success in your labours, are the main things to be attended to.

§ 10. When differences arise, do your utmost to compose them. Plead with each of the parties by themselves, but side not hastily with either. Avoid arbitration, lest you make yourselves enemies, and rather procure some other person to arbitrate the affair, than expose yourself to censure, and your usefulness to danger.

§ 11. Be cautious in undertaking any thing, and resolutely persuing what you have begun. Smother some flying reports of a thing before you do it, that you may see what people find out.—Stake not your reputation upon any thing you undertake.—Use proper instruments for things not very reputable to the church and congregation or neighbourhood, whenever it be necessary such things should be done.—Leave room for an honourable retreat, and appear not to be much impressed with the disappointment.

§ 12. Observe proper times for talking.—Reprove very tenderly and respectfully, when you do it personally.—Let it always be in secret.—Sometimes you may drop a hint, which may give a person room to reprove himself, or unveil complaints: especially if you have reason to believe he is not aware you know his fault.—Have proper stories and passages from authors for this purpose.—Sometimes lend books, and mark the most remarkable passages

LECTURE XXIV

Rules of Conduct towards those to whom you Preach, under Care and Reward as [illegible]

§ 1. First, to deacons, or those who stand in their place. Their business will be to provide for the Lord's table, for yours, and for the poor's.—Let such persons be chosen to this office if possible, whom you can entirely trust, and who are esteemed and beloved in their place.—Leave charitable cares to them, and consult them before you propose any to communion.—For this purpose have a meeting with them at some private house once a month, a little before the preparation day.

§ 2. Secondly, towards other persons of eminence in the congregation, whether on account of age, circumstances, or character, discover a very tender regard. The aged visit and pray with.—Bear to hear their stories of what passed when they were young,—and if there be any remains of wisdom in them, you may profit much by their conversation.—As to persons of wealth, honour, and learning, do not idolize them; nor give yourselves so much to their company as to neglect others.—yet you will do well to remember, that some peculiar honour and attention are justly their due.—Never forget, that while the common people are not to be despised, they are not to be too much trusted.—Eight or ten of the most substantial and intelligent persons in a congregation often turn the whole.—endeavour therefore not only to secure the affection but the reverence of such. This can only be done by a prudent and steady conduct, and by solid and strong notoriously bad, pronounce sentence at the table of the Lord with great solemnity.—Pray for such persons seriously and affectionately, and make them one pastoral visit afterwards.—If they repent after a proper time of trial, restore them tenderly, but awfully; and let the confession be public, if the offence has been so.—Have a strict eye upon them afterwards, and admonish them frequently if you perceive them wavering or going astray.

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

LECTURE XXV.

Our Behaviour to other Ministers, and Miscellaneous Remarks in the Conclusion.

§ 1. On this interesting subject I shall offer, First, observations relative to your own brethren.

§ 2. 1. Treat them with respect. Think as honourably of them as you can, and speak well of their labours.

§ 3. 2. Avoid every thing that looks like sheep-stealing.

§ 4. 3. Assist them as much as you can in their temporal affairs.—For this purpose keep up a correspondence with people in good circumstances, and those who can inform you of legacies, &c.

§ 5. 4. Employ the most popular of them in your absence, especially those who are dearest to your people.

§ 6. 5. Encourage meetings of ministers.—Take heed however they do not grow up into authoritative synods—and that they be not burdensome to the places where they are kept.—Let the entertainment be moderate, and days of fasting and prayer for the success of the ministry be kept, wherever they are.

§ 7. 6. Encourage a society for books.—This may be of use to you and your brethren, and lead to frequent and profitable interviews.

§ 8. 7. Have but few intimate friends.—If friendship must be broken off, let it be civilly;—do not drop it abruptly, but insensibly.

§ 9. I shall now give you, Secondly, some observations relative to those of the establishment.

§ 10. 1. Be very prudent in their company; as in the nature of things you cannot expect them all to be sincere friends to you as dissenters.

§ 11. 2. Treat them on all occasions with respect. Do not enter into controversies with them, much less rail against the establishment, either then or at any other time.

§ 12. 3. Protest, if it be necessary, that you are conscientious in your dissent, and appear ready to be informed on any point of the controversy, but having the chief reasons of nonconformity at hand, do not fail to produce them if you are forced to defend yourselves.

§ 13. 4. Never join with any of them who expose your weak brethren.

§ 14. 5. When you meet with any truly pious, humble, and peaceable men in the establishment, honour them,—and be on free and friendly terms with them if they wish it.

§ 15. Thirdly, some observations relative to lay preachers.

§ 16. 1. Do not contend with them, nor inveigh against them.—God has used many of them for excellent purposes, and we must not tie him to our rules.

§ 17. 2. If there be any in the congregation over whom the great head of the church may place you, avoid intimate friendship with them—but let them be treated kindly. Do them good and no harm.

§ 18. 3. Endeavour to outdo them in what is good in their own way. Consider what makes them popular—viz.—Preaching Christ—Free grace—Visiting—Religious conversation, &c.—Let all these be your care, for they are all your duty.

§ 19. Miscellaneous remarks. In your settlement follow and do not force providence.—Avoid by all means standing candidates with others.—Never go to any place but on a considerable majority.—Keep your old friends, and get new ones.—If a few of reputation are uneasy do not accept a call.—Go to a place at first where you do not intend to spend your lives, if it may be the means of making you easy for a time, and place you in a situation for usefulness and improvement.—Labour to keep your people in as good a humour as possible. If any thing grieves or offends them, alter it if you can with a good conscience.—Remember when a minister is despised his usefulness is at an end, and no pulpit talents can support him without prudence.—In conversation be lively, but always have some useful hints to show that you are a Christian and a man of sense.—Never be ashamed of religion, nor seem to hear a wicked jest when you cannot reprove it.—Consider yourselves as weak fallible creatures.—Be thankful for instructions.—Review former miscarriages for your caution, and earnestly seek wisdom of God to direct all your future steps.—Beware of the reputation of a great politician.—Let integrity and uprightness preserve you.—Read over these rules once a year at least, and enrich them with the best remarks you can.

INDEX.

Cause, observation of, on early heat. 57. See Index.
Circumcision, some heathen accounts of. 372. Objections to, answered. 415.
Circuit. Dr. remarks of, on the natural and spiritual man, 1170.
Clark, Mrs. Sarah, dedication of a sermon to. 1259. Mr. Samuel, his preface to Dr. Jeremiah's lectures, 215.
Clarke, Dr. Samuel, his funeral sermon. 970. His ancestors. 956. His character. ib. A virtuous man by his family. 957. His studies. ib. His preaching. ib. His great moderation. ib. His conduct towards young persons. 859. note.
—— Dr. his definition of a well-spent time. 239. His notion of virtue. 274. His definition of a miracle. 341. His singular notion concerning the bones. 424. His notion of carelessness. 475. His character as a practical writer. 1226. An account of his sermons. 1242.
—— Mr. of Hull, his notion of virtue. 330.
Clemens, Alexandrinus, his works. 354. On the inspiration of the Scriptures. 430. A remark of, on regeneration. 604.
—— Romanus, his epistle to the Corinthians. 351. His testimony concerning inspiration. 430. His testimony concerning the first epistle to the Corinthians. 638.
Collier, Mr. opinion of God's immensity. 265. And infinity. 266. Of future events. 376.
Collins, his remark on liberty of choice. 270.
Combe, Mr. on the regard shown to miracles, by the Gentiles. 338.
Coming to God, what implied in. 25. By Christ, what, 27.
Commandments, a character of several. 1241
Communion, young people invited to. 602. Arguments to recommend an early attendance on. 603. Advantages of. 606. Objections against early, obviated. 607.
Community, what. 207. Who a member of a. ib.
Company, a dissuasive from keeping bad. 504. Consequences of keeping bad. 506.
Compassion, the duty of, to the sick. 920. A wise and happy way of expressing it. 924.
Concubinage, what. 1004.
Conduct, rules of unmisbetrial. 1254. Towards other ministers. 1254.
Conflagration, the general. 923.
Confucius, whether an atheist. 251.
Conscience, how far an argument for a future state. 424
Consciousness, men have not one common. 230
Consequence, what. 257. Future, known to God. ib. 258. note.
Conversation, general maxims for. 1251.
Conversion, mistakes about. 47. Whether the mind be passive in. 454.
Conviction, necessity of. 18.
Cotelerius, his edition of the Apostolic Fathers. 353.
Couplet, his opinion of Confucius. 251.
Covenant, that of works. 438. That of redemption, what. 464. Of grace and works, what. 468. Its agreement with Abraham, what. 469.
Covenants, what. 288. Whether different from conditional promises. ib.
Cradock, his harmony. 1242. His character as a commentator. ib.
Creation, the Mosaic account of the. 401.
Creditship of the gospel history. 566. Of the old Testament history. 373. Of Jesus as a divine teacher. 392.
Cudworth, Dr. on eternal and immutable morality. 275.
Cumberland, his notion of virtue. 330
Cyprian, his thoughts on war. 473

D

David, remarks on his riches. 405.
Davies, Mr. Samuel, a letter from, to Dr. Doddridge. 1240. A letter of the Bishop of London concerning him. 1205.
Day, proceedings of the last. 511.
Death, a serious view of. 71. And judgment, a view of. 106. A meditation on. 109. Directions for honouring God in. 110. A definition of. 318. That denounced to Adam. 438. The christian's triumph over. 1009.
Decay, a definition of in religion. 80. Directions for recovery from. 87. Prayer on one under. 7.
Delays, the danger of, in religion. 17. Prayer against. ib.
Deliverance, out of the hand of our enemies. 1130.
Delivery, observations on. 1236. On theatrical. 1237, note.
Deluge, heathen writers which mention the. 372. Remarks on the universality of. 373. Dr. Burnet's remarks on the. 393.
Demoniacs, what. 957.
Demonians, a remark on those of the New Testament. 958. Observations on the. 960. Principal writers on the. 959.
Dr. Clarke's definition of the expression. 318. His opinion of the seat of the soul. 324. See Gentiles.
Deuteronomy, by whom it was written. 402
Dewes, Mr. Simon, his character. 1241
Dick, Dr. his definition of the expression. 318. His opinion of the seat of the soul. 324. See Gentiles.
Dictionaries, Scripture, by whom. 1242
Dionysius of Corinth, his writings. 353
Dissenters, the account of the. 1254
Divine Commands, the reason of. 274
Divinity, the study of, recommended. 1241
Doddridge, Dr. his remark on the spirit of prayer. 7. His observations on the Lord's prayer. 8. His observations on the Lord's supper. 15. His observations on the parable of the prodigal son. 25. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 29. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 30. His observations on the parable of the ten virgins. 31. His observations on the parable of the talents. 32. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 33. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 34. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 35. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 36. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 37. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 38. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 39. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 40. His observations on the parable of the unjust judge. 41. His observations on the parable of the two debtors. 42. His observations on the parable of the good Samaritan. 43. His observations on the parable of the friend at midnight. 44. His observations on the parable of the rich fool. 45. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 46. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 47. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 48. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 49. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 50. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 51. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 52. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 53. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 54. His observations on the parable of the talents. 55. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 56. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 57. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 58. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 59. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 60. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 61. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 62. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 63. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 64. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 65. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 66. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 67. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 68. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 69. His observations on the parable of the talents. 70. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 71. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 72. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 73. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 74. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 75. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 76. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 77. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 78. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 79. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 80. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 81. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 82. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 83. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 84. His observations on the parable of the talents. 85. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 86. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 87. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 88. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 89. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 90. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 91. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 92. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 93. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 94. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 95. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 96. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 97. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 98. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 99. His observations on the parable of the talents. 100. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 101. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 102. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 103. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 104. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 105. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 106. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 107. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 108. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 109. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 110. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 111. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 112. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 113. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 114. His observations on the parable of the talents. 115. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 116. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 117. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 118. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 119. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 120. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 121. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 122. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 123. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 124. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 125. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 126. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 127. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 128. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 129. His observations on the parable of the talents. 130. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 131. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 132. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 133. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 134. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 135. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 136. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 137. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 138. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 139. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 140. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 141. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 142. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 143. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 144. His observations on the parable of the talents. 145. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 146. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 147. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 148. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 149. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 150. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 151. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 152. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 153. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 154. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 155. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 156. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 157. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 158. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 159. His observations on the parable of the talents. 160. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 161. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 162. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 163. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 164. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 165. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 166. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 167. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 168. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 169. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 170. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 171. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 172. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 173. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 174. His observations on the parable of the talents. 175. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 176. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 177. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 178. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 179. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 180. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 181. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 182. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 183. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 184. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 185. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 186. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 187. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 188. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 189. His observations on the parable of the talents. 190. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 191. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 192. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 193. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 194. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 195. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 196. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 197. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 198. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 199. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 200. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 201. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 202. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 203. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 204. His observations on the parable of the talents. 205. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 206. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 207. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 208. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 209. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 210. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 211. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 212. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 213. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 214. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 215. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 216. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 217. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 218. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 219. His observations on the parable of the talents. 220. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 221. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 222. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 223. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 224. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 225. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 226. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 227. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 228. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 229. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 230. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 231. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 232. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 233. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 234. His observations on the parable of the talents. 235. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 236. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 237. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 238. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 239. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 240. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 241. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 242. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 243. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 244. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 245. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 246. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 247. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 248. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 249. His observations on the parable of the talents. 250. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 251. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 252. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 253. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 254. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 255. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 256. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 257. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 258. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 259. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 260. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 261. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 262. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 263. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 264. His observations on the parable of the talents. 265. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 266. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 267. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 268. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 269. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 270. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 271. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 272. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 273. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 274. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 275. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 276. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 277. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 278. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 279. His observations on the parable of the talents. 280. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 281. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 282. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 283. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 284. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 285. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 286. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 287. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 288. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 289. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 290. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 291. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 292. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 293. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 294. His observations on the parable of the talents. 295. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 296. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 297. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 298. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 299. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 300. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 301. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 302. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 303. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 304. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 305. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 306. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 307. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 308. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 309. His observations on the parable of the talents. 310. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 311. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 312. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 313. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 314. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 315. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 316. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 317. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 318. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 319. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 320. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 321. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 322. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 323. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 324. His observations on the parable of the talents. 325. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 326. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 327. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 328. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 329. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 330. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 331. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 332. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 333. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 334. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 335. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 336. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 337. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 338. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 339. His observations on the parable of the talents. 340. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 341. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 342. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 343. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 344. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 345. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 346. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 347. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 348. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 349. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 350. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 351. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 352. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 353. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 354. His observations on the parable of the talents. 355. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 356. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 357. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 358. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 359. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 360. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 361. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 362. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 363. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 364. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 365. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 366. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 367. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 368. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 369. His observations on the parable of the talents. 370. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 371. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 372. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 373. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 374. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 375. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 376. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 377. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 378. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 379. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 380. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 381. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 382. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 383. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 384. His observations on the parable of the talents. 385. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 386. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 387. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 388. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 389. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 390. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 391. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 392. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 393. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 394. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 395. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 396. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 397. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 398. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 399. His observations on the parable of the talents. 400. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 401. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 402. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 403. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 404. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 405. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 406. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 407. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 408. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 409. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 410. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 411. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 412. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 413. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 414. His observations on the parable of the talents. 415. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 416. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 417. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 418. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 419. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 420. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 421. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 422. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 423. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 424. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 425. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 426. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 427. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 428. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 429. His observations on the parable of the talents. 430. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 431. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 432. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 433. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 434. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 435. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 436. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 437. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 438. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 439. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 440. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 441. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 442. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 443. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 444. His observations on the parable of the talents. 445. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 446. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 447. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 448. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 449. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 450. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 451. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 452. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 453. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 454. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 455. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 456. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 457. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 458. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 459. His observations on the parable of the talents. 460. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 461. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 462. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 463. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 464. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 465. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 466. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 467. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 468. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 469. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 470. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 471. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 472. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 473. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 474. His observations on the parable of the talents. 475. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 476. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 477. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 478. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 479. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 480. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 481. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 482. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 483. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 484. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 485. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 486. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 487. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 488. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 489. His observations on the parable of the talents. 490. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 491. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 492. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 493. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 494. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 495. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 496. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 497. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 498. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 499. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 500. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 501. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 502. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 503. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 504. His observations on the parable of the talents. 505. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 506. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 507. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 508. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 509. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 510. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 511. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 512. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 513. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 514. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 515. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 516. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 517. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 518. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 519. His observations on the parable of the talents. 520. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 521. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 522. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 523. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 524. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 525. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 526. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 527. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 528. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 529. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 530. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 531. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 532. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 533. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 534. His observations on the parable of the talents. 535. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 536. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 537. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 538. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 539. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 540. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 541. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 542. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 543. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 544. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 545. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 546. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 547. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 548. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 549. His observations on the parable of the talents. 550. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 551. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 552. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 553. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 554. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 555. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 556. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 557. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 558. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 559. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 560. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 561. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 562. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 563. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 564. His observations on the parable of the talents. 565. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 566. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 567. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 568. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 569. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 570. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 571. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 572. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 573. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 574. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 575. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 576. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 577. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 578. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 579. His observations on the parable of the talents. 580. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 581. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 582. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 583. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 584. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 585. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 586. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 587. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 588. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 589. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 590. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 591. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 592. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 593. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 594. His observations on the parable of the talents. 595. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 596. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 597. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 598. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 599. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 600. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 601. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 602. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 603. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 604. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 605. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 606. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 607. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 608. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 609. His observations on the parable of the talents. 610. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 611. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 612. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 613. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 614. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 615. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 616. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 617. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 618. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 619. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 620. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 621. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 622. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 623. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 624. His observations on the parable of the talents. 625. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 626. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 627. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 628. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 629. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 630. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 631. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 632. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 633. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 634. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 635. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 636. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 637. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 638. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 639. His observations on the parable of the talents. 640. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 641. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 642. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 643. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 644. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 645. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 646. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 647. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 648. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 649. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 650. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 651. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 652. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 653. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 654. His observations on the parable of the talents. 655. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 656. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 657. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 658. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 659. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 660. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 661. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 662. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 663. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 664. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 665. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 666. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 667. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 668. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 669. His observations on the parable of the talents. 670. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 671. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 672. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 673. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 674. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 675. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 676. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 677. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 678. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 679. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 680. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 681. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 682. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 683. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 684. His observations on the parable of the talents. 685. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 686. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 687. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 688. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 689. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 690. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 691. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 692. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 693. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 694. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 695. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 696. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 697. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 698. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 699. His observations on the parable of the talents. 700. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 701. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 702. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 703. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 704. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 705. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 706. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 707. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 708. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 709. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 710. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 711. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 712. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 713. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 714. His observations on the parable of the talents. 715. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 716. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 717. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 718. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 719. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 720. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 721. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 722. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 723. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 724. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 725. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 726. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 727. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 728. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 729. His observations on the parable of the talents. 730. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 731. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 732. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 733. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 734. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 735. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 736. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 737. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 738. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 739. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 740. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 741. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 742. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 743. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 744. His observations on the parable of the talents. 745. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 746. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 747. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 748. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 749. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 750. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 751. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 752. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 753. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 754. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 755. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 756. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 757. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 758. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 759. His observations on the parable of the talents. 760. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 761. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 762. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 763. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 764. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 765. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 766. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 767. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 768. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 769. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 770. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 771. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 772. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 773. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 774. His observations on the parable of the talents. 775. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 776. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 777. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 778. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 779. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 780. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 781. His observations on the parable of the great supper. 782. His observations on the parable of the lost piece of money. 783. His observations on the parable of the lost son. 784. His observations on the parable of the unjust steward. 785. His observations on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. 786. His observations on the parable of the importunate widow. 787. His observations on the parable of the pharisee and publican. 788. His observations on the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. 789. His observations on the parable of the talents. 790. His observations on the parable of the pounds. 791. His observations on the parable of the husbandmen. 792. His observations on the parable of the marriage supper. 793. His observations on the parable of the wedding garment. 794. His observations on the parable of the two sons. 795. His observations on the parable of the barren fig-tree. 796. His observations on Homer, observation of, on parents and children, 370.

Hopkins, Bishop, his character as a practical writer, 1229.
Horace, a remark of, on the unreasonableness of envy, 356. His reasonable wish for wealth, 361. Observation of, on human dependence, 452. A remark on the Ludi Sæculares, 466.
Horneck, his character as a practical writer, 1231.
Hoyle, Mr. posthumous sermons of, recommended, 1252. A memoir of an estimable priest, 1267. His character as a practical writer, 1231.
Hospital, see Internacy.
Hume, Mr. his threefold satire, 500 note.
Humiliation, a sermon on, at his ordination, 1.
Hunt, Dr. Thomas, his conference respecting the fall of Adam, 311. A memoir of, and his controlling Creed, 1231.
Huntingdon, the Countess of, dedication to, 1252.
Hurd, Dr. his view of prophecy, 1001.
Hutcheson, Dr. his moral system, 1231. His mode of ascertaining the degree of virtue and vice in any given moral character, 1231. His definition of a virtuous act, 1232.
Hyrne, Doddridge's, 1252. A tribute to the memory of them by the first time, 1267. An address to them, by the first time of reading, 1268.

I

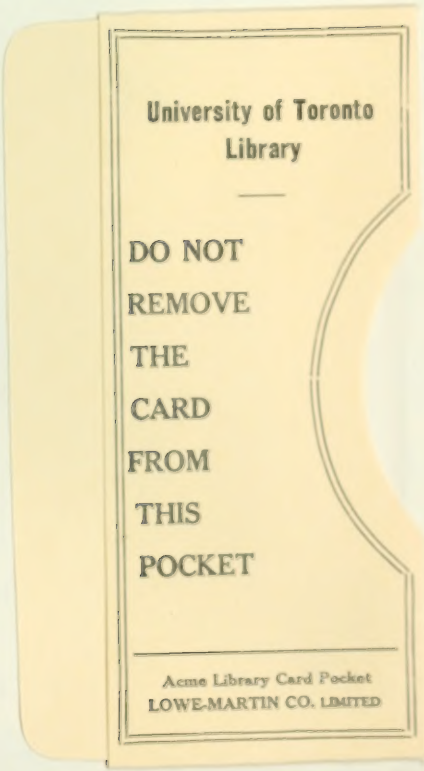
Ian'son, Dr. his Eternal Truth of the Scriptures recommended, 1231. His character as a theological writer, 1231.
Jealousy, the Prophet of, its authenticity, 1231.
Jerusalem, Mr. his notes on Locke, 1231.
Idea, a definition of, 219. Innate, 224. Whether any in the human mind, 58.
Identity, personal, wherein it consists, 1231. Locke's notion of, 58. The difficulties of the subject, 1231.
Idiocy, its connexion with death, 1231.
Idolatry, its prevalence, 1231.
Images, Mr. modern, of resemblance, 1231.
Jennings, Mr. John, Doddridge's tutor, some account of him, 617.
Jesus, the name of, to be pronounced, 1231. Is recommended, and honoured on the Mount of account of the creation, 400. His character as a practical writer, 1231.
Jewel, Bishop, his Apology for the reformed religion, 1231. His defence of the Christian religion, 1231.
Jewish, the practice of the, 1231. Each priest, when he was to burn incense, 1231. Their manner of consecrating beasts and their followers, 1231.
Jewkes, his writings, 1231.
Images, the use of, in the law, 1231.
Imagination, an account of, 1231.
Immortality, of the soul, considered, 1231. Authors on the subject of, 326.
Impossible, the, 1231. Is said to be a term of Aristotle's, 1231. Aristotle was a great writer on the subject of, 1231. Period of, 1231.
Imposition of hands, 1231.
Impression, extraordinary, 1231.
Imputation, what, 1231. Of the sin of Adam to his posterity, 1231.
Incense, remarks on, 1231.
Increase, the baptism of, 1231.
Infinite, simply, a definition of, 210. Whether a number or magnitude, 211. Whether simple or compound, 212.
Inheritance, Jewish, 1231. Same acquired at different, 1231.
Influence, of divine, gracious, 1231. The importance of, 1231. The necessity of, 1231. Some objections answered, 1231. Some objections answered, 1231. Remarks on the manner of, 1231. Remarks on the manner of, 1231. Remarks concerning it, 1231. And Christ's, 1231. Reflections on, 1231. Objections to, 1231. Arguments for these, 1231.
Inquisition, what, 1231. Of the Spanish, 1231.
Inquisitive, a remark on the, 1231.
Inscription, what, 1231. Of the Seven Spirits, 1231.
Insects, the, 1231.
Inspiration, what, 1231. Of the sacred writers, 1231. Objections against, 1231. Proofs of, 1231. Objections against, 1231. Proofs of, 1231. Objections against, 1231. Proofs of

P

Pain, what, 5.
Paley, his distinction of virtue, 220. On the doctrine of property, 267. On the subject of promises, 309.
Pamphlets, his writing, 334.
Panegyric, who, 244.
Papias, his writings, 624.
Paphos, a remarkable fable related by, 330.
Parents, the rights and obligations of, 286. Address to, 287. Exercise for cessation of their children, 289. Reflections of those on the death of deceased children, 667.
Parnassus, school of. Waller a descriptive poet of, th. 253. A genius of the 281. Division of the, according to Du Cardin, 282. Their origin, 48.
Parnell, an imitator of, 239.
Patrick, Bishop, his character as a commentator, 1241.
Pearce, his character as a commentator, 1242.
Pearse, his judicious Caveat on the overvaluation of books, 459. Of moral commonplace, 460.
Pentateuch, whether Moses wrote the, 365.
Perfection, of, what, 220.
Perfections, distinction of, 244.
Perjury, what, 308. How an crime, 309.
Persecution, its progress, the author's views of, 311. The absurdity and impiety of, 398. Pious which have been urged in favour of, 967. Job xxxi. 28 inconsistent at his own Reflections on, 974, 976.
Perseverance in the saints, what, 456.
Persons, a remark of, on forming the young mind, 567.
Peters, the word, determinate of, 4, 7, 120.
Peters, his instruction of, in the Gospel, 131.
Peter, Simon, Epistles of, introduction to, 936.
Petty, Sir William, his conception on population, 244.
Pharaoh, Gen. 4 harrowing the hearted, 405.
Philosophers, the poet his acquaintance with the declamation of, 82.
Phocylides, his opinion concerning the soul of man, 224. A saying of, concerning the Jews, 640.
Philosophy, natural, a definition of, 230.
Physicians, a remark of, on the Mosaic laws, 1007.
Pleasure, the phenomenon of, 240.
Pliny, a remark by, concerning, 72. A prayer by, 75.
Plutarch, his writings, 1167.
Poetry nature, what, 253. Absurdity of the definition of, 48.
Plato, his hope of a divine revelation, 337. A remarkable concurring declaration, 745.
Poets, variety of them could, 1 in the sciences, 21.
Pompeii, what, 200.
Pliny, his testimony concerning the christians in Bithynia, 347. Concerning the christians' view of Christ, 36. His account of the christians, 676, 686. A remark of, to Rufus, 1046. On the death of his uncle, 1187.
the elder, his account of Moses, 362
Theon, 1 ... 1058 ... 1170.
Pneumatology, definition on, 220.
Polycarp, his writings, 582. His testimony to Paul's epistles, 587.
Polycrates, ... his testimony, 588.
Porphyry, his subjection, the second, 592. Writes against, 593. Longinus on, 671.
Poole, his character as a commentator, 1243.
Porphyry, the Tyrian life of Christ, 370, 674.
Porteus, Bishop, his moral beauty of, 167.
Powers mediatorial, a definition of, 441.
Praescience, divine, 244.
Prayer, its argument for the being of a God, 208.
Prayer, active and passive, what, 230.
Prayer, immediate, illustrated considerable, 50.
Prayer, Israelites, ... defended by, 124.
Lord's, 1 ... 1 ... 1 ...

Tregelles, on Widnes, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67,

BINDING SECT. NOV 17 1966



UTL AT DOWNSVIEW
D RANGE BAY SHLF POS ITEM C
39 13 11 20 06 007 2